Mr Paur's interpretation of Bach's shepherd music from the "Christmas Oratorio" was very striking, and the orchestra elicited all the charm of which Bach's composition is susceptible. Haydn's symphony in G major afforded the orchestra opportunities for better work. The second movement, especially the largo, in D major, was played with a vivacity and charm seldom equaled at former performances. The melodious theme pervading the whole movement was beautifully presented by the delicate song of the first violins, while the accompaniment of the celli and the oboe added majesty and charm to the whole movement. Nor was the playing of the finale inferior in technique and spirit, while the brilliant conclusion won the hearty applause of the audience.

The concert ended with Beethoven's overture "Fidelio," in E major, and its beautiful measures, its sweet melody and soft rhythms, was all elucidated by Mr Paur's interpretation of the theme and the orchestra's brilliant playing.

The program for the next concert will be as follows:

Symphony No. 6 ..... Tschaikowsky
Concerto for pianoforte .... Henry Holden Huss
(First Time)
Ballet music, Die Rebe ..... Rubinstein
Overture, Benvenuto Cellini ..... Berlioz
Mr Henry Holden Huss, soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 24, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Three Short Works By Bach, Handel and Haydn.

The concert of Saturday turned back the pages of musical history and showed the attentive auditor the symphony and the orchestral score in process of formation. There were three "symphonies" on the programme, yet the concert was shorter than usual, for two of these were examples of the pre-Haydnite application of the word, and were not as long as modern overtures. The word "Symphony" has undergone strange mutations: the old Greeks used it (Sumphonia) to express the union of different instruments in a single melody, or possibly to indicate that a drone bass was being played to the melody. This opinion receives confirmation from the fact that the bagpipe of mediæval, and even of present times, receives the name of "Zumpogna" in Italy. It is possible, therefore, that the Scotch music brings us near to the style of ancient Greece. In the days of earliest opera (about 1600) the word "symphony" was used to denote an instrumental prelude, postlude, or interlude in a vocal work. In this sense the picture of the Shepherd's Music from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," which precedes the words "And there were shepherds abiding in the field," is called "Symphony" by Bach, exactly as a picture of the same subject, is called "Pastoral Symphony" by Handel, and presents the self same rhythm and style of treatment. Then there came a transition towards the modern vein and the symphony became a species of free sonata, presenting some development of figures and themes, but still quite vague in outline and hazy as to form. Such a symphony was C. P. E. Bach's work which began the concert. Finally the symphony became a grand sonata for orchestra, the finest of the instrumental cycle-forms, presenting four diverse styles of composition in a harmonious whole. This was represented upon the programme by Haydn's G major symphony (not the "Oxford" or the "Military," but the lively little one written for the Parisians), so that almost the entire concert became an exposition of the evolution of form. Yet to have made this still more educational a Bach suite should have been added, for while the first movement of the symphony, as we have it, owes its origin to the old sonata, the old symphony and the Italian concerto, yet the modern symphony as a whole is the descendant of the suite. It is scarcely within the province of a concert review to give a synopsis of the development of the sonata-form, but the logical and educational character of the programme of this concert deserves to be recognized and understood.

The performance was of a generally excellent character. The Philipp Emanuel Bach symphony was excellently performed. It was more contrapuntal than a modern work would have been, yet it foreshadowed modern music in many a theme, and particularly in its Largo. This Bach with the many initials was not a genius as his elder brother Wm. Friedemann was, (the latter was also a splendid scamp) but he proved to the world that talent counts for something at a pinch, and during the hiatus which followed the death of Beach and Handel he led the taste of the world towards a school which consisted of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven; he was the link between the old and the new. During his lifetime he achieved more success than his infinitely greater father. Burney says of him: "He is learned, I think, even beyond his father, whenever he pleases, and is far before him in variety of modulation!!!" We also learn through Burney that "Complaints have been made against his pieces, for being long, difficult, fantastic and far-fetched," but this must have been only because of his leaving the style which the old contrapuntists had established in Germany.

The second number of the concert was Handelian, being the florid aria, "Sweet Bird" from "L'Allegro." Miss Gertrude Franklin sang this with the intelligence that one has learned to associate with all her public appearances. Her voice is not one to grow enthusiastic over, its upper register being thin and betraying effort, but her middle and lower tones are rich and resonant, her enunciation clear, her intonation faultless. The staccato passages were the weakest of the generally good performance. Mr. Molé distinguished himself by excellent flute work in the obligato.

Miss Franklin's second number was much the better of the two. It was an expressive scena from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," and fitted the singer's voice like a glove. No trace of effort was apparent and the breadth and expression were commendable. The orchestra did excellent work in the accompaniment, the muted strings being especially expressive. Miss Franklin was twice recalled after each of her numbers. Bach's "Shepherd's Music" was suited to the Christmas season, and the English horns did some notable work in the number. It is decidedly a better setting of the subject than that which Handel has attained in his treatment of the same picture; and this is the more to be remarked since Handel was generally the superior of Bach in scoring, and also in dramatic effect.

The chief success of the concert was the Haydn symphony, which presented one of the best readings of the old master that we have had in many years. The tempi were taken in just the proper, conservative fashion, nothing was over-hurried, nothing was blurred. It was a delight to listen to the pure symmetry of the "father of instrumental form," and there were enough tunes in the work to set up fifty modern composers. The minuet was exquisitely performed, and its trio with drone-bass, (reproducing the so-called "Musette" of the suite) presented a most charming contrast. The finale was a jovial specimen of peasant humor and awakened the audience to the heartiest applause. It was a fine example of the older symphonic finale. It has already been stated that the cycle idea as set forth in symphony had its origin in the suite. In no movement is the mark of its paternity more evident than in the finale. The suite ended with a hearty and rollicking Gigue, nothing less than the "jig" of modern times, and it soon became an accepted axiom that the cycle form must end in a jolly manner. The early symphonies followed the established rule, and one finds all phases of joviality in the finales of Haydn and Mozart. Beethoven himself at first followed suit, and the finale of his first symphony is as hilarious as any of Father Haydn's; but (although the older vein is distinguishable in the finales of his seventh and eighth symphonies) already in his second symphony one finds the end presenting resolute power in placing of mere animal spirits. Even Beethoven, however, could not quite overcome the difficulty which attends making a climax in the finale of symphony, which lies in the fact that the strongest possible form (the sonata-movement form) is used in the first movement, the best trump is played at the beginning of the game, and while some relief was found in using a grand variation form for the finale, the movement is still handicapped by the strength of the beginning of the cycle.

The concert ended with Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, weakest of the four overtures which the composer wrote to his one opera. Beethoven was at his greatest in the dramatic overture, and his "Leonora Overture No. 3" still stands as the best example of this free treatment. In this "Fidelio" overture the composer comes near to the classical overture shape used by Mozart (as he also did in the "Prometheus" overture), and the result is not the best in the world. It was given in that heavy, powerful vein which Mr. Paur sometimes delights in. The kettledrum was pushed to the canon-ading point, the early crescendo was of tremendous strength, and almost everything was in the ultra-heroic vein. The horn, however, made a rather timid entrance, and the work was less impressive, as a whole, than the rest of the excellent concert.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The ninth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

C. P. E. Bach: Symphony in D major.
Handel: Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato."
J. S. Bach: Sinfonia ("Shepherds' Music") from the "Christmas Oratorio."
Haydn: Symphony in G major (B. & H., No. 13; Peters No. 8).
Goetz: Scena, "My strength is spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew."
Beethoven: Overture to "Fidelio," in E major, Opus 72.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer.

The programme was a feast of old music, in which the one modern dish, the scene from Goetz's opera, seemed wholly in place, so purely classical was it in spirit, if not in form. The symphony in D major seems to be about the only orchestral work of Philipp Emanuel Bach's that has survived in the modern concert repertory; it is rather an embryonic symphony, according to present notions, and the first movement looks particularly dry in the score: little more than the contrapuntal working-out of a few inconspicuous figures, and this, too, with a somewhat discouraging air of continually beginning over again that reminds one but little of the stronger, more continuous, crescit eundo style of development of the great masters of polyphonic writing. But the thing has so much life, such vigor of accent, the composer shows such fertility of resource, and each successive phrase fits so well into its place, that the effect is the very opposite of dry. Then that little slow movement, with its flutes and lower strings playing in 3rds two octaves apart, and the dainty pizzicato arpeggios of the violins coming in between the phrases, is full of charm. Nothing could be fresher and more lively than the bright little Finale. The work was exceedingly well played.

It seemed to us that the great elder Bach's Christmas "Shepherds' Music," with the bare places in the score so admirably filled out by Robert Franz, had never before been so nearly well played here as last Saturday evening. Innocent as it looks, the piece is terribly difficult for an orchestra, perhaps one of the most difficult things our band has ever had to tackle. The writing, both as regards counterpoint and instrumentation, is so clearly transparent that the slightest uncertainty or vacillation in any of the parts is a positive calamity; and there are few things in music more difficult to give with the proper grace and swing of phrasing than that exquisite Siciliano rhythm, with its dotted triplet. As we have said, the piece was better played than we have yet heard it, largely, we think, owing to Mr. Paur's somewhat faster tempo than that of his predecessors here. Regarding this and some other quasi-Siciliano movements by Bach and Handel, especially the air "And He shall feed His flock" in "The Messiah," the late Otto Dresel (one of the best authorities on such matters) used to say that, no matter what the text or general expressive character of such movements might be, the old Siciliano must never be taken very slow; as soon as you get below a certain rate of speed the whole characteristic swing of the rhythm is inevitably lost. Mr. Paur seems to have felt the force of this, for he took the movement at a tempo at which it really could be played; and the result was, if not ideally fine, at least better than we can remember hearing before.

Haydn's G-major symphony is one of the brightest gems in the old "Papa's" crown; never was the sunny old gentleman more thoroughly inspired than when he wrote it; you may find grander moments in some of the "Salomon" symphonies, but no purer afflatus nor greater vigor of development. The Largo in especial is a perfect tone-poem; its motto should be—

> For he on honey-dew hath fed,
> And drunk the milk of Paradise.

And that thrice-wonderful Finale! Where in all music has sprightly Grace taken Humor more cordially by the hand, and tripped the dainty measure in more frolicsome sport? If that is not true genius, then pray tell us what genius is?

Beethoven's fourth overture to his one opera brought the concert to an inspiring close. It is curious how this overture, which does not take a single one of its themes from the opera, is soaked through and through with the "Leonore" spirit; it fits the opera, and nothing else under the sun! And how serious of purpose it all is, in spite of its lighter style; had not the still greater "Leonore No. 3" existed, its closing climax would have beggared all else in the overture form. The performance, sad to say, was none of the very best; there was spirit enough, but want of perfect accuracy of ensemble.

Miss Franklin sang Handel's Bird Song—with the flute obbligato exquisitely played by Mr. Charles Molé—very beautifully indeed. We could have spared the closing double cadenza, not because a cadenza is in any way out of place in the song, but because the one she sang seemed particularly un-Handelian in character; but her singing of the whole song was artistic, imbued with the true poetry of the music, and technically unimpeachable. Equally good in an entirely different vein was her singing of the Goetz scena; and here we have once more to thank Miss Franklin for giving us something that is at once new and admirable; she has long been noted for what should be called artistic enterprise in the best sense, and shows no signs of falling from her high reputation in this respect now. The scena itself is very beautiful, and shows not only musical and dramatic power, but also what a true poet poor Goetz really was: notwithstanding the almost ridiculously flaccid dog-Latin of the text, he has taken the situation with quite Shaksperean seriousness and elevation of poetic feeling, and idealized it much as Mozart has idealized pregnant dramatic situations, time and time again. The music is full of genuine depth of feeling, expressed with infinite beauty and grace. Miss Franklin sang it admirably.

The next programme is: Tschaikowsky, symphony [illegible] B minor, "Pathétique" (new); H.H. Huss, concerto for pianoforte (new); Rubenstein, ballet, "La Vigne;" Berlioz, overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," opus 23. Mr. Henry Holden Huss will be the pianist.

Boston Commonwealth.
Published Saturday at No. 120 Tremont St.,
DECEMBER 22, 1894

Behold the sea,
The opaline, the plentiful and strong,
Yet beautiful as is the rose in June,
Fresh as the trickling rainbow of July;
Sea full of food, the nourisher of kinds,
Purger of earth and medicine of men;
Creating a sweet climate by my breath,
And in my mathematic ebb and flow
Giving a hint of that which changes not.
Rich are the sea gods: — who gives gifts but they?
They grope the sea for pearls, but more than pearls:
They pluck force thence, and give it to the wise
For every wave is wealth to Dædalus,—
Wealth to the cunning artist who can work
This matchless strength. Where shall he find O waves,
A load your Atlas shoulders can not lift?

I with my hammer pounding evermore
The rocky coast smite Andes into dust,
Strewing my bed, and, in another age,
Rebuild a continent of better men.
Then I unbar the doors: my paths lead out
The exodus of nations: I disperse
Men to all shores that front the hoary main.
I, too, have arts and sorceries;
Illusion dwells forever with the wave.
I know what shells are laid. Leave me to deal
With credulous imaginative men.
For though he scoop my water in his palm,
A few rods off he deems it gems and clouds.
Planting strange fruits and sunshine on the shore
I make some coast alluring, some lone isle,
To distant men who must go there, or die.

These lines of Emerson's hovered vaguely in my mind as I listened to Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony Saturday evening. The symphony, by its unprecedented length, its wonderful variety, ranging from the serenest beauty to the most tempestuous cyclonic cacophany, attempts to depict the infinite and — fails. Yet what a magnificent attempt! What invention! What extraordinary fecundity of ideas! It had never been given in Boston in its entirety before. Except as an anniversary tribute, say on the hundredth jubilee of Rubinstein's birth, it will probably never again be heard in all its ten divisions. It will be like the great epics, which few ever read from beginning to end but which serve as a perpetual glory and fund of quotations.

The storm, though unticketed, tells its own story: it is a West Indian hurricane which would justify the Weather Bureau in hanging out its new cyclone signal: it is programme music with a vengeance. It outberliozes Berlioz; the galloping horses of the Valkyrie are regular compared with the whistling, howling, hissing, shrieking, bellowing, blaring, champing, romping, thumping, thundering, conglomerating, chromatic runs, dissonances, pangs and bangs, of this extraordinary movement. It is decidedly theatrical, and one looked to see the electric flashes of the Flying Dutchman. Beethoven in bronze gazed down on Rubinstein in marble, and a questioning expression seemed to hover over his strong face: "Was a pastoral symphony the cause of all this?"

I remember the great occasion when Rubinstein conducted his Ocean Symphony in May, 1873, at the Tremont Temple. It has apparently been growing ever since. Then there was no storm: as Mr. Hassard said: "It has no trivial imitations of the sounds of the sea, roar of the angry waves, whistling of the winds or dashing the surf." The same Mr. Hassard, then musical critic of the Tribune, speaking of the finale, said that "it leads up to a magnificent climax in Luther's choral gradually introduced with many ingenious progressions and scored with surprising richness — a hymn in recognition of the Almighty, who holds the sea in the hollow of his hand."

But the choral is thoroughly Russian and is 'first cousin once removed' to the Russian national hymn.

The audience, it must be confessed, seemed somewhat restive under the excessive length of the symphony, and many left the hall before it was over. The conductor could not help being affected by this condition of things, which evidently caused him to get through with it as soon as possible. This was done with no loss of dignity or of control, but simply by somewhat hastening the pace. It was a note worthy occasion. The promramme for tonight is as follows: Ph. E. Bach — Symphony in D major; Handel — Sweet Bird (Air de Rossignol de L'Allegro et il Penseroso;) J. S. Bach — Hirtenmusik; Haydn — Symphony in G major; Goetz — Aria from Taming of the Shrew; Beethoven — Overture, Fidelio; soloist, Miss Gertrude Franklin.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1894.

The program of the ninth symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony, in D major.....Emanuel Bach
Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato" (flute obligato).....Händel
Mr. Molé.
Sinfonia, "Hirtenmusik," from the "Christmas Oratorio".....J. S. Bach
Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 13).....Haydn
Scena, "My Strength is Spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew".....Goetz
Overture to "Fidelio," in E major.....Beethoven

The symphony by Emanuel Bach has other merits than its brevity. Its interest is other than historical. Profoundly beautiful is the slow movement, with a beauty that is solemn, a solemnity of a perfect Lord's day on a lonely hillside where there is no thought, no trace of man.

The pastorale of Händel in "The Messiah" is to me more real, more naïve, more in keeping with the simple, frightened shepherds than is the Hirtenmusik of Bach. The shepherds of the latter knew their counterpoint.

The other pieces are familiar and require no comment. The performance of the orchestra as a whole was excellent; in the "Fidelio" overture there were a few slips.

Miss Gertrude Franklin sang well. In the aria by Händel she displayed an admirable technique. Nor did the careful treatment of detail conceal a broad conception of the air. I have seldom, if ever, heard a more finished performance of the aria. In the scena from "The Taming of the Shrew," Miss Franklin sang with genuine feeling and rare understanding.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert of the 29th will be as follows: sixth symphony, Tschaikowsky; concerto for piano, Huss; ballet music, "Die Rebe," Rubinstein; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz. Mr. H. H. Huss will be the pianist.

The Music Trades.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 22, 1894.

Frederick R. Comee, the efficient assistant at Music Hall, of Manager Ellis, who served as best man, was on Dec. 12 married to Clara E., daughter of F. D. Gallupe, the ceremony being performed by Rev. Leighton Parks, of Emanuel Church.

The Symphony Orchestra commemorated Rubinstein at its eighth concert, by playing a violin concerto by him, and also the Ocean Symphony, with his additional numbers.

The third Kneisol Concert was full of that peculiar charm which characterizes the work of this club. The four played Mendelsson's Quartet in D, op. 44, No. 1. With Baermann at the piano, came the lovely trio in B-flat, of Beethoven, op. 97. The novelty was Brahm's Quartet in B-minor, op. 115, for two viol viola, cello, and clarinet, the latter exquisitely played by Leon Portan, whose remarkable work in the Symphony Orchestra is exciting so much attentive admiration. This Brahms composition is redolent with the Bohemian or Hungarian spirit and treatment, and makes you think of their peripathetic minstrels, playing into your eyes. Christian Union Hall filled with listeners.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 30.

The Symphony Concert.

The tenth Symphony concert was given last night, at Music Hall. The following is the programme:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor.....Tschaikowsky.
Concerto for Pianoforte in B-major, Henry H. Huss.
Overture, "Beevenuto Cellini".....Berlioz.

Is Tschaikowsky an immortal? Fortunately the duty of answering this question rests with posterity, and it is always an unpleasant business looking a gift horse in the mouth. At least, it seems certain that one cannot thoroughly enjoy this master's music without preliminary reflection and study; that is, its beauties are not self evident; not so unmistakably in evidence as to force themselves on unquestioning faith. As an artist, of what nationality is Mozart? Does the answer in the slightest degree affect the value of the music. If we are ignorant of Beethoven's political opinions, are we unable to enjoy the "Heroic" symphony? In listening to Tschaikowsky's music we must never forget that he is a Russian, nor can we fully understand him without referring to Russian history. He gives us no view of a beauty that is universally recognized, a beauty that forces admiration for its own sake; he paints the beauty of his country, the half-attractive, half-repelling thing that is goddess and witch at the same time; that sips ambrosia from skulls and ravenously devours raw flesh served up in richly bejewelled silver platters. This is undoubtedly originality; it typifies race and reveals strong individuality; but, at the same time, it has not reached the level held sacred to the highest art, when a race reaches the high intellectual and æsthetic level of old Greece the statue of an Apollo or of an Aphrodite is accepted as the ideal standard of beauty. It is not national but simply human; with Russia at its present intellectual, and emotional level we must accept the Tschaikowsky idea with caution; separate the gold from the dross, draw a distinction between what is human and what is infernal, and then take what remains not as that which cannot be excelled, but simply as the best material obtainable. The æsthetic value of national art depends upon the civilization of the nation producing it, and when a nation is at a comparatively low level of civilization those elements which are characteristic of its art are the elements which are of the least art value; elements which will disappear as the art progresses toward perfection. The Tschaikowsky symphony, No. 6, is beautifully and elaborately instrumented; the ideas are clear-cut, and more than enough insisted on to make them clear. The first movement is strong in contrasts; melancholy and passion alternate, and largeness of thought is lost in passion worked to tatters. The second movement is pretty and graceful in idea and the themes are finely and characteristically developed; the grace merges into fever restlessness; the smile ending in a tear, for the modern artist has small faith in self-respect, his overstrung nerves tempting him to think of his own temporary woes rather than of the serene beauty which abides. The third movement is said to be of extreme liveliness, but it is not the liveliness of heroic joy; it is suggestive of semi-intoxicated mutes at a funeral. In this movement as elsewhere the greatest pleasure is caused by the lavish display of technical knowledge and the wonderful fertility and skill in giving new shapes and twisting new beauties about a given theme. The fourth movement is Adagio; it is the wail of a wounded satyr, not the Promethean grief that suffers and presents a smiling face of beauty and of defiance to his foes. It is touching, but long drawn out agony of the animal kind, and a trifle out of place in high art. As a whole the symphony shows wonderful learning, passion and feeling; but it speaks not of beauty but of the morbid melancholy of a morbid dying century.

The Huss concerto for pianoforte does not demand extended notice; it is well made but uninspired music; the ideas are small suggesting very little dwarfs attired in long-train robes. It is respectable music that will shame no one to know and to speedily forget. Elaborate preparations are made to say something that is never spoken. The work shows painstaking care, but it is not live music; it is elaborate without being interesting, and the general effect produced recalls Dr. Johnson's advice to a young and ambitious author, the advice to improve his work by cutting out all these portions that he regarded as the best.

The programme for the next concert is Mozart's Symphony in D major; Divertimento for Violin and Orchestra (MS), C. M. Loeffler; Suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit;" Grieg and "Carneval," Dvorak. The soloist is Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 30.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A New Symphony Given for the First Time in Boston.

Noble in Character and Original in Treatment—It Is Splendidly Played, and Makes a Profound Impression—Mr. Huss Plays His New Pianoforte Concerto.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was:

Symphony No. 6.....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, Henry H. Huss
Ballet music, "Die Rebe".....Rubinstein
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz

The soloist was Mr. Henry Holden Huss. The symphony, which was played here for the first time on this occasion, is its composer's large work. When it had its first hearing, it was coldly received by the public much to Tschaikowsky's surprise and disappointment. He urged another performance for it, and it was again announced, but before the date of its second playing he died and the symphony was given as his elegy. It is a remarkable composition, full of power, dignity and originality, and striking in the nobility that distinguishes it generally. It has, however, little in it that suggests the form of the symphony as it is commonly understood. It is preeminently a rhapsodic work, carrying with it, at times, much of the aspect of an impromtu in its constantly varying moods and its lack of form. It is entitled "Symphony Pathetic," and in its first and its last movements this qualification is impressively borne out. Nothing more profoundly touching and saddening in its pathos has ever been written than the finale; for the work ends with an "adagio-lamentoso." Even in its most impassioned moments it is inexpressively touching in its profound melancholy, and its themes are among the noblest and most sincere in feeling that modern musical art has produced. The first allegro is no less interesting in the beauty of its subjects, and the broad dignity of their treatment. The orchestration through the whole symphony is splendid in its richness, its clearness and its masterly contrasts of tone color. The second and the third movements have nothing of a pathetic character. The former is a charmingly melodious and vivacious bit of writing, piquant in its themes and fascinating in its instrumentation. It is in 5-4 time, and the composer has handled this awkward rythm with extraordinary grace and freedom, and with a variety of accent equally ingenious and enforced. The third movement is the most conventional and the weakest part of the work, constantly suggesting the march from Raff's "Lenore" symphony. The worth of the composition lies in its opening and its close. It bristles with difficulties and is exceptionally exacting on the players; but they met its demands with brilliant results, and Mr. Paur's reading was masterly throughout. The audience listened attentively, and the strong and appreciative applause they bestowed on it showed that it had made a deep impression on them. Mr. Paur was called forward three times at the end of the performance.

The concerto by Mr. Hass is a thoroughly well written work, but the orchestra is more prominent in it than is the solo instrument. In fact, in the first movement, the piano appears to be very much of a superfluity, and it adds nothing to the meaning of the concerto, and not infrequently has the effect of intrusiveness. The movement is very long, and for all that it says of importance there is no reason why it should not end in the middle or be prolonged to double its length. There is over-much of arpeggoing that means nothing, and one of its themes is a fragment of Bizet that has lingered in the composer's memory and strayed into the work. The orchestration is too heavy through the whole work, and overwhelms the solo instrument at almost every turn. The slow movement is a succession of clever and often pretty modulations, leading to nowhere in particular except into the flower garden of Gounod and the conservatory of Wagner. It is in the finale alone that the piano is made to assert itself vigorously in a solo aspect, but what it is all about is not easy to discern on a first hearing. The fault of the work, too heavy instrumentation, is most prominent in this movement. Mr. Huss played the first and second movements with clearness and brilliancy, manifesting the possession of a well-trained technique, but in the more exacting finale he appeared scarcely equal to the task he had set himself. To sum up in a few words, the work is eminently well and intelligently made music, evidencing a thorough knowledge of the resources of modern musical art, and admirable musicianship. It is never commonplace, and never sinks to mere virtuosity; but it is too long for what it has to say, is wondrous in effect, and now and then a little tiresome. Mr. Huss was heartily received, warmly applauded and recalled after his playing of his concerto.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in D major (without a minuet), Mozart; Divertimento, for violin and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler (first time); suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit," Grieg; and overture, "Carneval," Dvorak (first time). The soloist is to be Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

Boston Commonwealth.
Published Saturday at No. 120 Tremont St.,
DECEMBER 22, 1894

Behold the sea,
The opaline, the plentiful and strong,
Yet beautiful as is the rose in June,
Fresh as the trickling rainbow of July;
Sea full of food, the nourisher of kinds,
Purger of earth and medicine of men;
Creating a sweet climate by my breath,
And in my mathematic ebb and flow
Giving a hint of that which changes not.
Rich are the sea gods: — who gives gifts but they?
They grope the sea for pearls, but more than pearls:
They pluck force thence, and give it to the wise
For every wave is wealth to Dædalus,—
Wealth to the cunning artist who can work
This matchless strength. Where shall he find O waves,
A load your Atlas shoulders can not lift?

I with my hammer pounding evermore
The rocky coast smite Andes into dust,
Strewing my bed, and, in another age,
Rebuild a continent of better men.
Then I unbar the doors: my paths lead out
The exodus of nations: I disperse
Men to all shores that front the hoary main.
I, too, have arts and sorceries;
Illusion dwells forever with the wave.
I know what shells are laid. Leave me to deal
With credulous imaginative men.
For though he scoop my water in his palm,
A few rods off he deems it gems and clouds.
Planting strange fruits and sunshine on the shore
I make some coast alluring, some lone isle,
To distant men who must go there, or die.

These lines of Emerson's hovered vaguely in my mind as I listened to Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony Saturday evening. The symphony, by its unprecedented length, its wonderful variety, ranging from the serenest beauty to the most tempestuous cyclonic cacophany, attempts to depict the infinite and — fails. Yet what a magnificent attempt! What invention! What extraordinary fecundity of ideas! It had never been given in Boston in its entirety before. Except as an anniversary tribute, say on the hundredth jubilee of Rubinstein's birth, it will probably never again be heard in all its ten divisions. It will be like the great epics, which few ever read from beginning to end but which serve as a perpetual glory and fund of quotations.

The storm, though unticketed, tells its own story: it is a West Indian hurricane which would justify the Weather Bureau in hanging out its new cyclone signal: it is programme music with a vengeance. It outberliozes Berlioz; the galloping horses of the Valkyrie are regular compared with the whistling, howling, hissing, shrieking, bellowing, blaring, champing, romping, thumping, thundering, conglomerating, chromatic runs, dissonances, pangs and bangs, of this extraordinary movement. It is decidedly theatrical, and one looked to see the electric flashes of the Flying Dutchman. Beethoven in bronze gazed down on Rubinstein in marble, and a questioning expression seemed to hover over his strong face: "Was a pastoral symphony the cause of all this?"

I remember the great occasion when Rubinstein conducted his Ocean Symphony in May, 1873, at the Tremont Temple. It has apparently been growing ever since. Then there was no storm: as Mr. Hassard said: "It has no trivial imitations of the sounds of the sea, roar of the angry waves, whistling of the winds or dashing the surf." The same Mr. Hassard, then musical critic of the Tribune, speaking of the finale, said that "it leads up to a magnificent climax in Luther's choral gradually introduced with many ingenious progressions and scored with surprising richness — a hymn in recognition of the Almighty, who holds the sea in the hollow of his hand."

But the choral is thoroughly Russian and is 'first cousin once removed' to the Russian national hymn.

The audience, it must be confessed, seemed somewhat restive under the excessive length of the symphony, and many left the hall before it was over. The conductor could not help being affected by this condition of things, which evidently caused him to get through with it as soon as possible. This was done with no loss of dignity or of control, but simply by somewhat hastening the pace. It was a note worthy occasion. The promramme for tonight is as follows: Ph. E. Bach — Symphony in D major; Handel — Sweet Bird (Air de Rossignol de L'Allegro et il Penseroso;) J. S. Bach — Hirtenmusik; Haydn — Symphony in G major; Goetz — Aria from Taming of the Shrew; Beethoven — Overture, Fidelio; soloist, Miss Gertrude Franklin.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1894.

The program of the ninth symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony, in D major.....Emanuel Bach
Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato" (flute obligato).....Händel
Mr. Molé.
Sinfonia, "Hirtenmusik," from the "Christmas Oratorio".....J. S. Bach
Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 13).....Haydn
Scena, "My Strength is Spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew".....Goetz
Overture to "Fidelio," in E major.....Beethoven

The symphony by Emanuel Bach has other merits than its brevity. Its interest is other than historical. Profoundly beautiful is the slow movement, with a beauty that is solemn, a solemnity of a perfect Lord's day on a lonely hillside where there is no thought, no trace of man.

The pastorale of Händel in "The Messiah" is to me more real, more naïve, more in keeping with the simple, frightened shepherds than is the Hirtenmusik of Bach. The shepherds of the latter knew their counterpoint.

The other pieces are familiar and require no comment. The performance of the orchestra as a whole was excellent; in the "Fidelio" overture there were a few slips.

Miss Gertrude Franklin sang well. In the aria by Händel she displayed an admirable technique. Nor did the careful treatment of detail conceal a broad conception of the air. I have seldom, if ever, heard a more finished performance of the aria. In the scena from "The Taming of the Shrew," Miss Franklin sang with genuine feeling and rare understanding.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert of the 29th will be as follows: sixth symphony, Tschaikowsky; concerto for piano, Huss; ballet music, "Die Rebe," Rubinstein; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz. Mr. H. H. Huss will be the pianist.

The Music Trades.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 22, 1894.

Frederick R. Comee, the efficient assistant at Music Hall, of Manager Ellis, who served as best man, was on Dec. 12 married to Clara E., daughter of F. D. Gallupe, the ceremony being performed by Rev. Leighton Parks, of Emanuel Church.

The Symphony Orchestra commemorated Rubinstein at its eighth concert, by playing a violin concerto by him, and also the Ocean Symphony, with his additional numbers.

The third Kneisol Concert was full of that peculiar charm which characterizes the work of this club. The four played Mendelsson's Quartet in D, op. 44, No. 1. With Baermann at the piano, came the lovely trio in B-flat, of Beethoven, op. 97. The novelty was Brahm's Quartet in B-minor, op. 115, for two viol viola, cello, and clarinet, the latter exquisitely played by Leon Portan, whose remarkable work in the Symphony Orchestra is exciting so much attentive admiration. This Brahms composition is redolent with the Bohemian or Hungarian spirit and treatment, and makes you think of their peripathetic minstrels, playing into your eyes. Christian Union Hall filled with listeners.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 30.

The Symphony Concert.

The tenth Symphony concert was given last night, at Music Hall. The following is the programme:

Symphony No. 6, in B-minor.....Tschaikowsky.
Concerto for Pianoforte in B-major, Henry H. Huss.
Overture, "Beevenuto Cellini".....Berlioz.

Is Tschaikowsky an immortal? Fortunately the duty of answering this question rests with posterity, and it is always an unpleasant business looking a gift horse in the mouth. At least, it seems certain that one cannot thoroughly enjoy this master's music without preliminary reflection and study; that is, its beauties are not self evident; not so unmistakably in evidence as to force themselves on unquestioning faith. As an artist, of what nationality is Mozart? Does the answer in the slightest degree affect the value of the music. If we are ignorant of Beethoven's political opinions, are we unable to enjoy the "Heroic" symphony? In listening to Tschaikowsky's music we must never forget that he is a Russian, nor can we fully understand him without referring to Russian history. He gives us no view of a beauty that is universally recognized, a beauty that forces admiration for its own sake; he paints the beauty of his country, the half-attractive, half-repelling thing that is goddess and witch at the same time; that sips ambrosia from skulls and ravenously devours raw flesh served up in richly bejewelled silver platters. This is undoubtedly originality; it typifies race and reveals strong individuality; but, at the same time, it has not reached the level held sacred to the highest art, when a race reaches the high intellectual and æsthetic level of old Greece the statue of an Apollo or of an Aphrodite is accepted as the ideal standard of beauty. It is not national but simply human; with Russia at its present intellectual, and emotional level we must accept the Tschaikowsky idea with caution; separate the gold from the dross, draw a distinction between what is human and what is infernal, and then take what remains not as that which cannot be excelled, but simply as the best material obtainable. The æsthetic value of national art depends upon the civilization of the nation producing it, and when a nation is at a comparatively low level of civilization those elements which are characteristic of its art are the elements which are of the least art value; elements which will disappear as the art progresses toward perfection. The Tschaikowsky symphony, No. 6, is beautifully and elaborately instrumented; the ideas are clear-cut, and more than enough insisted on to make them clear. The first movement is strong in contrasts; melancholy and passion alternate, and largeness of thought is lost in passion worked to tatters. The second movement is pretty and graceful in idea and the themes are finely and characteristically developed; the grace merges into fever restlessness; the smile ending in a tear, for the modern artist has small faith in self-respect, his overstrung nerves tempting him to think of his own temporary woes rather than of the serene beauty which abides. The third movement is said to be of extreme liveliness, but it is not the liveliness of heroic joy; it is suggestive of semi-intoxicated mutes at a funeral. In this movement as elsewhere the greatest pleasure is caused by the lavish display of technical knowledge and the wonderful fertility and skill in giving new shapes and twisting new beauties about a given theme. The fourth movement is Adagio; it is the wail of a wounded satyr, not the Promethean grief that suffers and presents a smiling face of beauty and of defiance to his foes. It is touching, but long drawn out agony of the animal kind, and a trifle out of place in high art. As a whole the symphony shows wonderful learning, passion and feeling; but it speaks not of beauty but of the morbid melancholy of a morbid dying century.

The Huss concerto for pianoforte does not demand extended notice; it is well made but uninspired music; the ideas are small suggesting very little dwarfs attired in long-train robes. It is respectable music that will shame no one to know and to speedily forget. Elaborate preparations are made to say something that is never spoken. The work shows painstaking care, but it is not live music; it is elaborate without being interesting, and the general effect produced recalls Dr. Johnson's advice to a young and ambitious author, the advice to improve his work by cutting out all these portions that he regarded as the best.

The programme for the next concert is Mozart's Symphony in D major; Divertimento for Violin and Orchestra (MS), C. M. Loeffler; Suite, "Ans Holberg's Zeit;" Grieg and "Carneval," Dvorak. The soloist is Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVI., NO. 183.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A New Symphony Given for the First Time in Boston.

Noble in Character and Original in Treatment—It Is Splendidly Played, and Makes a Profound Impression—Mr. Huss Plays His New Pianoforte Concerto.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was:

Symphony No. 6.....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, Henry H. Huss
Ballet music, "Die Rebe".....Rubinstein
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz

The soloist was Mr. Henry Holden Huss. The symphony, which was played here for the first time on this occasion, is its composer's large work. When it had its first hearing, it was coldly received by the public much to Tschaikowsky's surprise and disappointment. He urged another performance for it, and it was again announced, but before the date of its second playing he died and the symphony was given as his elegy. It is a remarkable composition, full of power, dignity and originality, and striking in the nobility that distinguishes it generally. It has, however, little in it that suggests the form of the symphony as it is commonly understood. It is preeminently a rhapsodic work, carrying with it, at times, much of the aspect of an impromtu in its constantly varying moods and its lack of form. It is entitled "Symphony Pathetic," and in its first and its last movements this qualification is impressively borne out. Nothing more profoundly touching and saddening in its pathos has ever been written than the finale; for the work ends with an "adagio lamentoso." Even in its most impassioned moments it is inexpressively touching in its profound melancholy, and its themes are among the noblest and most sincere in feeling that modern musical art has produced. The first allegro is no less interesting in the beauty of its subjects, and the broad dignity of their treatment. The orchestration through the whole symphony is splendid in its richness, its clearness and its masterly contrasts of tone color. The second and the third movements have nothing of a pathetic character. The former is a charmingly melodious and vivacious bit of writing, piquant in its themes and fascinating in its instrumentation. It is in 5-4 time, and the composer has handled this awkward rythm with extraordinary grace and freedom, and with a variety of accent equally ingenious and enforced. The third movement is the most conventional and the weakest part of the work, constantly suggesting the march from Raff's "Lenore" symphony. The worth of the composition lies in its opening and its close. It bristles with difficulties and is exceptionally exacting on the players; but they met its demands with brilliant results, and Mr. Paur's reading was masterly throughout. The audience listened attentively, and the strong and appreciative applause they bestowed on it showed that it had made a deep impression on them. Mr. Paur was called forward three times at the end of the performance.

The concerto by Mr. Hass is a thoroughly well written work, but the orchestra is more prominent in it than is the solo instrument. In fact, in the first movement, the piano appears to be very much of a superfluity, and it adds nothing to the meaning of the concerto, and not infrequently has the effect of intrusiveness. The movement is very long, and for all that it says of importance there is no reason why it should not end in the middle or be prolonged to double its length. There is over-much of arpeggoing that means nothing, and one of its themes is a fragment of Bizet that has lingered in the composer's memory and strayed into the work. The orchestration is too heavy through the whole work, and overwhelms the solo instrument at almost every turn. The slow movement is a succession of clever and often pretty modulations, leading to nowhere in particular except into the flower garden of Gounod and the conservatory of Wagner. It is in the finale alone that the piano is made to assert itself vigorously in a solo aspect, but what it is all about is not easy to discern on a first hearing. The fault of the work; too heavy instrumentation, is most prominent in this movement. Mr. Huss played the first and second movements with clearness and brilliancy, manifesting the possession of a well-trained technique, but in the more exacting finale he appeared scarcely equal to the task he had set himself. To sum up in a few words, the work is eminently well and intelligently made music, evidencing a thorough knowledge of the resources of modern musical art, and admirable musicianship. It is never commonplace, and never sinks to mere virtuosity; but it is too long for what it has to say, is wondrous in effect, and now and then a little tiresome. Mr. Huss was heartily received, warmly applauded and recalled after his playing of his concerto.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in D major (without a minuet), Mozart; Divertimanto, for violin and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler (first time); suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit," Grieg; and overture, "Carneval," Dvorak (first time). The soloist is to be Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

Tschaikowsky's Remarkable Sixth Symphony.

A Rhapsodic Work of Mighty Imagination.

The Piano Concerto of Mr. Henry H. Huss Played.

The program of the tenth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74 (first time).....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano forte, in B major (first time).....Henry H. Huss
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz

The compiler of the program book saw fit to insert in the current number several platitudinous paragraphs masked as epigrams.

For the same number he Englished an account of sundry dances of the time of Henry III. from "Les Origines de l' Opéra," by Ludovic Celler, whose real name was Louis Leclercq. It is to be regretted that his courage failed him when he translated the description of the volte. He started out in fine feather, and the staid readers of program books were no doubt delighted to learn that "ladies who had well-turned legs could not afford to despise it (the volte), for they showed them freely. But why did he not pursue the interesting subject? Why did he not complete the paragraph ending "in keeping her skirts from flying in the air?" Why did he not follow the original (page 64), and quote from the good and free-spoken Tabouret? Why did he not tell the entertaining story of how Henry III., then Duke of Anjou, fell in love with Mary of Clèves at a famous ball in 1572, when she danced the volte with prodigious vigor? 'Tis a tale of a shirt, and the curious can find it on page 66 of Celler's book.

The reader will find in this same program-book no information concerning the early history of Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony. And yet the question about its first performance is no more beyond conjecture than the "song the Syrens sang, or what name Achilles assumed when he hid himself among women."

The reader asks about this symphony. He finds in the program-book miscellaneous information and a pedagogic and imperfect view of the symphonic structure.

***

The Musical Times (London), Jan. 1, of this year, gave the following account of Peter Tschaikowsky's last appearance in public, Oct. 16, 1893. The account was Englished from the Signale.

"The occasion was the first symphony concert of the St. Petersburg Imperial Musical Society, which the deceased master conducted. The program consisted of the overture to an unfinished opera, 'Carmosine,' by Laroche, a larghetto and gavotte from Mozart's 'Idomeneo,' Tschaikowsky's first pianoforte concerto, and his anxiously awaited new symphony (No. 6, in B minor, op. 74). * * * Although the composer was recalled many times at the finish, he was not satisfied with the effect which his new work had produced, and he expressed a hope that it might soon be performed again to enable its being better understood. To this end he also gave it, after the performance, the title of 'Symphonie Pathétique,' little thinking how soon his wish would be gratified, and the new title become, indeed, strangely appropriate."

After the death of Tschaikowsky—and some say that he deliberately poisoned himself—the symphony was repeated at the second concert of the Musical Society.

"In the middle of the orchestra," says the correspondent of the Signale, "stood a bust of the composer, surrounded by laurels and palms and crowned with a laurel wreath. Napravnik occupied the place where, only a short time before, Tschaikowsky had stood in perfect health conducting his last work. The crowded audience seemed at first depressed, but the beauty and power of the music soon drew forth enthusiastic applause. The performers were deeply moved, and surpassed themselves in their superb renderings of the various works. Besides the Symphony, the program included the master's Overture to 'Romeo and Juliet,' his Violin Concerto, played by Leopold Aeur; pianoforte solos by Miss aus der Ohe, and an air from the opera 'Eugeny Onegin,' splendidly sung by the artist who created the part of the hero in this work when it was given in London—viz., Mr. Eugène Oudin. Altogether this 'In Memoriam' concert was worthy of the greatest Russian composer and of the foremost musical society in the Russian capital.

***

This noble work of Tschaikowsky made a profound impression last evening. It is not worth while to inquire into the motives of the composer in putting the slow movement ast. Purists may object to the scheme, but in this instance the effect is marvelous. Nor in the presence of such an exhibition of genius would it be decent to say at random, "But this is not a symphony; the middle movements are too free; the music is dramatic, not symphonic."

The first movement, an allegro with adagio introduction, is skillfully constructed. The coda is remarkable, sufficient alone to prove Tschaikowsky's mastery of technical means. Who can ever forget that moaning descending scale? But greater than any technical display is the imagination of the artist. Call the second theme sensuous, if you please; it is nobly sensuous.

Sensuousness is here brought into sharp contrast with the melancholy, the gloom aroused by the thought of death. For in the embrace of lovers enters that thought and chills the kisses of the lips. No analysis can give any idea of the wealth of beauty, in the harmonic progressions, in the spontaneous melody, in the imaginative, and thoughtfully colored instrumentation.

The second movement, a Scherzo, is a graceful, piquant treatment of an eccentric rhythm. Tschaikowsky has often shown a fondness for solving such rhythmical problems, notably in the Scherzo of one of his string quartets. In this Scherzo of the symphony the question is answered with such ease and elegance that the problem is not thought of by the hearer. The trio is conspicuous for its pedal point, and it is a masterpiece of work.

The third movement is below the high level of the rest. It is not free from vulgarity, and the march suggests too strongly the famous march in Raff's "Lenore" symphony.

But the finale is one of the noblest, most sublime compositions of the last sixty years. It is a mighty lamentation. Not egotistical, personal mourning; not the bitter reflections of a jaded voluptuary, a Solomon, who finds "Vanity" the answer to the question of Life, the Sphinx; but such a lamentation as might be evoked by the fall of an empire, by the thought of the complaining millions of men. The first movement tells of the grave, and its solemnity is shudder-inducing. The last movement has nothing earthly in its nature. The sensuous theme heard earlier in the symphony has suffered a strange change. Like a novel by Dostoievsky, the movement is without hope, and its last words are words of despair. The dying measures answer no questions. They say, "It is finished."

Here then are rhapsodical impressions of a long instrumental rhapsody. Never have I realized the impossibility of describing adequately in words the effect made by a great composition to those who did not hear it as after this revelation of Tschakowsky's genius. If one should speak of the singular orchestral effects, if he should, for instance, mention the treatment of the bassoons or the brass in the first movement, would his words convey any impression to those who only know the bassoon as a word used by Coleridge, and regard brasses as the plural of brass?

***

Mr. Huss, a pupil of Rheinberger, is known to be a sincere, industrious musician. He appeared here last evening as a composer and a pianist. Now as a composer he did not apparently in writing this concerto consult his own technique, for it must be said frankly that although he has improved as a pianist his technique is not yet developed sufficiently to do justice to his work. Take the theme of the finale, for instance; it was not heard definitely until it was declaimed by the orchestra. As I had no opportunity of seeing the score and can only judge of the work as played by Mr. Huss, his very endeavor may have prejudiced his concerto. For last evening the concerto as a whole seemed labored and dull.

The first movement starts off bravely. The opening measures attract attention, but, you who were there, what do you remember of the measures that follow? There were pleasing passages, but there was also much that seemed dangerously near padding. I care not for a man's scholarship if he has nothing new to say, or if he has not a new way of saying something that has been accepted by the world. This first movement seems strung together; it is far too long; and the balance between orchestra and piano is not well observed. At times the piano was wholly beneath the orchestral billows. The second movement is like unto a dry and sandy waste. The finale appears to be the most spontaneous and firmly knit of the three movements; but it suffered from the incapacity of the pianist to bring out its points forcibly. The fundamental faults of the concerto are a desire to show contrapuntal tricks without a gain thereby, themes too short and of too undecided a character, and a lack of convincing logic in the thematic development.

It may be added here that Mr. Paur gave loose reins to the orchestra. Certainly he might have shown more discretion, as soon as he realized the pianist's moderate strength.

The performance of the orchestra throughout the evening was not flawless. Mr. Paur is getting to be too fond of violent contrasts, and forgetful of the fact that there must be measures in every work which demand moderation in treatment. And was not the sublime theme of the last movement of the symphony taken at too fast a pace?

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1894.

HUSS AT THE SYMPHONY.

His Piano Solo and the Accompaniment Somewhat at Odds.

Interest in the Symphony concert last night was divided between the first hearing in this city of the Tschaikowski symphony in B minor, and the appearance of Henry Holden Huss as a soloist in his own concerto. In the first instance much more was realized than was expected, while in the latter there was more or less disappointment.

The Tschaikowski symphony opened the programme. It is in four movements, and its rendering occupied forty-five minutes. The first movement, the longest of the four, presents many strong contrasts of light and shade, and is a quaint and ingenious bit of composition. The violin, genious bit of composition. The violins, 'celli, flutes and clarinets are used with admirable effect throughout the movement and the general theme which is manifest at the start makes its appearance frequently throughout the movement in ever changing form. The movement develops in strength as the climax is reached.

Midway the tempo changes, introducing some delightful harmonies. The general working out is elaborate in the extreme, and the movement almost from start to finish is highly dramatic. The second movement is particularly tuneful and is developed by various orchestral combinations and quaint figures. The third movement is lighter than the preceding ones, while the fourth is slow, solemn and dignified.

Mr. Paur entered heartily into the spirit of the occasion and showed a marked interest in the composition, which was given altogether a magnificent rendering. The audience was very enthusiastic, each movement being liberally applauded. The Tschaikowski symphony is likely to be long remembered by those who heard it last night, and it will always be warmly welcomed whenever it is again played.

Mr. Huss was unfortunate in selecting his own concerts in which to be heard, for it is heavy and uninteresting. The orchestral accompaniment is not clearly enough defined, and there was an apparent lack of unity of purpose between the orchestra and the solo performer. The composition lost, too, by so closely following the brilliant symphony; but a second hearing of Mr. Huss in something else, may warrant a better impression of him.

He is not a brilliant pianist, though there was a certain modesty about his work which was commendable. There is a want of style and finish in his playing and he is far more at home in the forte passages than in the pianissimo. The audience, however, took kindly to him and gave him a couple of recalls. The programme was brought to a close with the Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

The next concert will introduce two novelties, a divertimento in A minor, by C. M. Loeffler, who will also be the soloist, and the Dvorak overture to "Carneval."

[71]

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 30, 1894.

Performance of Last Work by Tschaikowsky.

The usual large audiences attended the 10th symphony rehearsal and concert in Music hall Friday afternoon and last night. On each occasion it was necessary to stop the sale of admission tickets before the performance began. From a financial point of view this season of symphony concerts is likely to compare very favorably with those of former years.

The program played last night was not the most enjoyable of the season. The performance of the Tschaikowsky symphony in B minor, the last symphony written by the famous Russian composer, was most welcome, but it is a very lengthy work, and left the audience in a frame of mind that was not especially conducive to enjoyment of the pianoforte concerto in B minor by Henry Holden Huss, which was given as the second number of the program. A much greater work than this concerto and a much more brilliant pianist than Mr Huss would have suffered under such circumstances.

It was particularly unfortunate for Mr Huss that he should appear the day after a large portion of his audience had listened to Stavenhagen, one of the most accomplished pianists ever heard here. To compare Mr Russ' playing with that of so great an artist as is Mr Stavenhagen is altogether unfair, of course, but it was impossible to dismiss from one's mind while hearing Mr Huss play the exquisite pleasure which had so recently come from listening to the greater artist.

Director Paur seems to have an extreme fondness for piano soloists, but it is to be hoped that he has not arranged for the appearance of many more at this season's symphony concerts.

Mr Huss' concerto is an interesting work and shows the hand of a cultivated musician. Although seldom notable for originality either in its melodies or its treatment, there is much in the work to command attention, even admiration.

The four movements, allegro, maestoso andante tranquillo and finale, allegro vivace, are written, generally, in an extended sonata form and are all of considerable length and elaborate development. There is a long cadenza in the first movement and this Mr Huss played with fairly good effect, but there were many passages in which the soloist cannot be said to have held his own with the orchestra. The second movement is the most enjoyable of the three. It is the most simple in treatment and is delightfully melodious. The scoring is rich and elaborate, but due prominence is allowed the solo instrument.

Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 6, in B minor, is a noble composition, and it was splendidly played, under Mr Paur's direction. While it may possibly not be entitled to rank as the best of the great Russian's writings, it is certainly one of his very best, and is likely to long remain in favor with symphony concert audiences.

The title of the symphony, "Pathetique," suggests the character of its music, which is always mournful in tone, even in its most lively passages. There is an abundance of rich harmony throughout the symphony, and the many and beautiful themes are embellished with the elaborate effects for which this composer was so noted. The symphony is written in the customary fast movements, but the slow movement comes last.

It is impossible in the limited space available at this time to tell of the many delicious melodies, the exquisite harmonies and the odd and beautifully contrasted tone colors with which the symphony is crowded. Tschaikowsky was fond of utilizing the full resources of the modern orchestra, and in this last work he has given remarkable individual prominence to each instrument, and most delightful is the effect produced by so many brief solos artistically harmonized.

Berlioz' brilliant overture to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini" was the third and last number of yesterday's program, and it was admirably played by the orchestra.

The program for the next concert will be as follows:

Symphony in D major (without minuet) .Mozart
Divertimento in A minor, for violin and orchestra (MS) .....C M Loeffler
(First time.)
Suite, Aus Holberg's Zeit .....Grieg
Overture, Carneval .....Dvorak
(First time.)
Soloist, Mr C. M. Loeffler.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 31, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

THAT OF TSCHAIKOWSKY'S IN B MINOR GIVEN.

It May Fairly be Called a Masterpiece—An American Work Suffered by Contrast—Berlioz's Benvenuto Cellini Closed the Long but Interesting Programme.

The concert of Saturday opened with a work which may fairly be called a masterpiece,—Tschaikowsky's B minor symphony, No. 6, the so-called "Pathetic Symphony." One might quarrel with the title of "symphony" as here applied; a true symphony should present the sonata-form in its greatest guise, while this work is free, ecstatic and rhapsodical. But Beethoven himself let down the bars in the Ninth Symphony, and Schumann widened the breach in the form by his later symphonies. The final result was that Bruckner introduced Wagnerism into symphony, and the classic form now rests chiefly upon the achievements of one man,—Brahms. Tschaikowsky's symphony does not belong to the extreme left, it is not so wildly radical as Bruckner's Seventh, but it mainly follows the sonata-style of Liszt and Schumann, presenting continuous development and broad and well-chosen contrasts. The value of such a free style depends wholly upon the man who uses it, and whether it is merely an imitation of modern iconoclasm, or a spontaneous expression of thought which would have been trammelled in any other form; in this case it seems to have been the latter. Such works must be regarded as monoliths in music, standing apart, not to be classified with this or that school, and their grandeur is their own sufficient justification; it is only when the young imitator comes into the field that they become pernicious. Who would imitate Walt Whitman! Yet his power is undeniable. When the growing composers have learned that the glorious Wagner "school" began and ended with Richard Wagner a great step in musical progress will have been taken. Tschaikowsky has not copied anybody in this work and even the comparison made above regarding the affinity with Liszt or Schumann must be taken in a restricted sense.

From the very first notes upon the bassoon the stamp of intense earnestness was upon the work, and development of the theme began almost immediately after it had been stated. The composer's fondness for wood wind effects was marked, and flute, clarinette and bassoon all had especially prominent passages. The contrasts were of the strongest; the auditor would be lulled to tranquility by gentle phrases upon flute or clarinette, only to be awakened roughly by some tragic episode given with the power and fury of the full orchestra. Yet these effects, which sound but poorly in the description, were not inartistic or bombastic. There was, however, too much development in the first movement, which took twenty minutes in the performance, and there were some moments of monotony.

To use 5-4 rhythm is not a new idea, from mediæval music (even from ancient Greek music) to the most modern, this rhythm has been used as a temporary device, but an entire movement in such a rhythm is a rara avis, and Tschaikowsky has achieved it without any apparent straining or bizarrerie; the movement is grace itself, spite of the boldness of impressing the rhythm by constant strokes on the kettle-drum in the second theme. The combat between two themes, which formed the third movement, was very clearly brought out, and the final majesty as the march theme triumphed was an excellent climax. Some touches of pizzicato strings combined with piccolo gave a striking tone-color to parts of this movement.

The last movement broke entirely with symphonic tradition by being in slow tempo, a species of Elegy. Strange, weird effects of brasses in the deepest register, of the hideous tones of the muted horns (also in unusually deep register) dark phrases upon the bass tuba (excellently played) were some of the strong touches of coloring in this sombre movement. Even the tam-tam, or gong, was used to add to the spectral character of the climax. To the average American citizen the gong is associated with anything but gloom, and therefor it may be to the purpose to state that no instrument can give such an uncanny effect as the gong, struck very softly. Meyerbeer uses this instrument at the rising of the nuns from their graves, in "Robert;" Rossini does the same at the opening of the tomb of Ninus, in "Semiramide;" and even the conservative Cherubini has used the gong for a similar effect in a requieum mass. At the close of the work the composer has taken a leaf from the book of Weber, for he uses the pizzicato of the contrabasses much as the latter has done in the "Freischuetz Overture." It is much to say that the capricious character of the symphony did not once disturb the unity of the orchestra; to give a constantly good ensemble in such a work means a degree of technical skill that shows clearly how our orchestra has advanced. It was gratifying to observe that the public appreciated the excellent work done, for Mr. Paur was recalled twice at its conclusion.

The end of the concert was not less powerful than its beginning, for it concluded with Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture which was given with due attention to its sharp contrasts and its glow of instrumentation. One may be allowed to speak a word of especial praise of the oboe solo in this, and also to pay a tribute to the immense power of the finale.

Between these works, as between the upper and nether millstone, the piano concerto of Henry. H. Huss was ground. It is pleasant to see that Mr. Paur intends to cherish the American muse, but he does not need actually to nurse her! One can understand a MacDowell concerto being given a place on great programmes, for that composer's works (especially in concerto form) have strength, power and imagination. This composition gives the effect of an extended and skilful exercise in classical form. The old Frenchman's remark, "Ce Senate, que me veut-il?" could have been freely translated on this occasion "What does this concerto want here?" Yet it is possible that some injustice is being done to Mr. Huss by so emphatic a statement, for he was his own pianist and was not able to force the solo instrument against the heavy scoring that he had put in the orchestral parts, especially in the finale, but even this excuse only impales the composer-pianist upon the other horn of the dilemma. There were, however, some points to commend in the first movement; firstly, there was undeniable skill in the development of themes, and the form was well within the classical lines; secondly, the beginning was bold, fiery and original, in its trumpet and drum phrases, in the immediate entrance of the piano, and in the bit of cello solo; and lastly, the climax here, when it was reached, was effective. The composer has followed the example of Mendelssohn (in his violin concerto) and placed his cadenza in the middle of the development, rather than at the end of the movement. The chief theme of the finale also deserves commendation for its spirited character and its originality although there is too much rhythmic jugglery practised with it in its development.

Mr. Huss was heartily applauded at the close of his work and was twice recalled by the audience.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1894.

The tenth Symphony concert was not long, but it made great demands upon mind, ears and nerves, for its programme named two new works of large scope and serious massiveness, together with a great and full-volumed overture.

First in place and in importance stood Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony, surnamed the "Pathetic," published not long before his lamented death, and containing some matters of such deep and significant nature that it might almost be considered as the swan song of his genius, sounding for a last time the full sweep of its compass and blending the poems of fancy with the peans of passion. It is a work which we at least should be glad to hear again before being obliged to express about it anything which must meet challenge as a formulated and balanced judgment. Not in might of sound and massed instrumentalities alone does it overwhelm the listener at times, but in its commanding and rushing enunciation of suddenly contrasted thoughts and its concentration of tone colors, now most sombre and now most lucent, and in its vehement determination to speak out, to be heard and to sway. It is both music of the imagination and of the heart, and the sensitive auditor is now made joyful by its spontaneous and vivid gayety and now depressed by its almost funereal gloom.

But let us try to analyze faintly some causes and means of that peculiar effect which demands both reflection and eloquence to resolve and define it truly. The first movement begins with a short adagio in which the deepest voice of the bassoon utters a brief sad phrase, rising and falling over dull harmonies of the lower strings. A few horn notes, supported by the wooden wind and the violas, build a bridge, as it were, over which the theme passes to be caught up as the first subject of the strong, urgent allegro. An air of agitation pervades the orchestra, and hurried responsive downward phrases sweep to and fro. But the mood changes, while a tender and almost soulful andante, cast into voicings of velvety richness, succeeds and with a secondary air continues its emotional flow until there is a sudden, fierce shock, a pause, and a return to the allegro. This goes wildly on with outcries, clamors and tremendous surges of sound from which emerge some suave and melting passages, lost in their turn in sepulchral depths to which the heavy basses of the trombone, bassoon and tuba can hardly descend. Gradually a darker spirit seems to possess the movement and the often changed rhythm moulds itself into a sombre march-like form, which dies away into moody silence. Other listeners must fashion their own theory as to what the many changes, from the solemn opening to the imposing processional, may typify; but to us all the latter portion brought to mind insistently the lines of Longfellow:

"In the wreck of noble lives
Something immortal still survives."

The second and third movements are as happy, as light, as brilliant and as impetuously fanciful as if no grief or pain or struggle existed in the world. The former has the unusual 5-4 rhythm, but this is treated so elastically that one thinks of nothing but lilting under the fairest sky in buoyant airs. The latter is even more swift and exuberant, and, like the first movement, tests all the virtuosity of the players with its involutions, its shifts and its tossing phrases. It is written upon two themes, noted as in 4-4 and 12-8 times, which, as even the tyro in music knows, can be blended together perfectly without losing their identity. The stronger finally carries all before it, and the movement ends in a jubilant triumph. If pathos be sought in these portions of the symphony, it must be by suggestion from the fundamental thought that the sources of tears and laughter lie so close together, and that from joy to sorrow one crosses often only an imaginary line.

With the finale the sense of tragedy returns. Here, in so strange a place, is found the slow movement of the symphony, dark with desolation, subdued with sorrow, and well nigh majestic with mourning. It has moments of imposing passion in which the full power of the orchestra appears to be but a suppressed revelation, and others when scarcely more than murmurs are to be heard. At last, as if exhausted by its own intensity, it dies away in faint and fainter chords to complete and impressive silence.

Departing, as it so often does, from conventional forms, this symphony is likely to afford matter for debate. The formalists will probably have many objections, but the imaginative and sympathetic ought to be touched gratefully by it. The supersensitive may be oppressed by its immense sonority; but normal dispositions will recognize, we think, that its extremities of power are only invoked when the necessary climax of passion could not else be reached.

It was inconsiderate and all but unkind to Mr. Henry Holden Huss to put his pianoforte concerto next in order. An almost crushing comparison was inevitable, because his first movement was in construction dictated by some such spirit of expression in art as pervaded much of the symphony. There were similar sharp contrasts of tone-color, irregularities of rhythm, diversions of thought, unusual choices of instrumental register, and abrupt announcements from unexpected voices. But what in Tschaikowsky was the perfection of mastery necessarily appeared in the young man as ambitious effort only, and what was excellent in purpose and treatment could not help appearing to disadvantage and seem ungracious, far-fetched and involved. Under even completely favorable conditions we doubt but Mr. Huss's nervous and forcible opening movement would be found to have some strained and ugly passages, representative rather of skill and determination than of natural and persuasive eloquence. The andante was very beautiful in thought and in form and was heard with entire pleasure. The finale left an impression not dissimilar from that made by the allegro—of a bold, but not altogether successful striving for what is yet beyond the young composer's grasp. To be discursive without being illogical, to be passionate without being spasmodic and erratic without being ungovernable, does not come in a day, nor will it be given to all just because they are ambitious and energetic. Mr. Huss—who visited Boston once, if we remember aright, as the adjunct illustrator of some of Mr. Krehbiel's apostolic expositions of Wagner—played the piano part ably, with decisive emphasis, clean technique and adequate power.

Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, with its pompous sonority, its stately splendor and occasional clangor and brilliancy, ended the programme with all due volume and vehemence.

The orchestra coped magnificently with the immense difficulties and bewildering intricacies of the symphony, and did full justice to the overture; but they were not always prompt and perfect in the concerto, playing for an occasional minute or so as if they were a little fatigued and would have been more alert and exact if refreshed by a composition void of any suggestion of the Tschaikowsky flavor.

To speak of the pianoforte is not perhaps quite in place here, but the Mason and Hamlin grand is not very often heard in Music Hall and it seems no more than fair to say that its fine qualities justified its selection by the player whom it well served.

Next Saturday's programme names two novelties—Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, and a manuscript "divertimento" for violin and orchestra, in which the soloist will be its composer, Mr. C. M. Loeffler. The other numbers will be Grieg's "In Holberg's Time" suite and Mozart's D-major symphony, without the minuet.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 29, 1894.

For the first time Boston heard Goldmark's Sappho Overture at the sixth Symphony Concert. It opens with harps, suggestive of the famous classic beauty, though the Greeks had no such music; but later you think of the sea into which Sappho cast herself, rather than of the groves and maidens amidst which she dwelt. Raff's Symphony, In the Woods, was welcome for its descriptive quality, though rather long in development. Liszt's symphonic poem, Les Preludes, No. 3, was a delightful windup. The soloist was Mrs. Elena Kehew Eaton, with her big round voice, in the Sleep aria, from Handel's Semele, and in Weber's Ocean Song, and made the former very attractive.

Eugene Ysaye made his Boston debut at the seventh Symphony Concert, and was received with an enthusiasm rarely shown by the afternoon audience. In three minutes his wonderful tones roused sympathetic vibrations in the auditorial brain. Such broad and rich violin playing has rarely been heard in our city, the softer tones winding into the air like some silky film. His two selections, admirably suited to the display of his varying qualities, were the Saint-Saens Concerto, No. 3, in B minor, op. 61, played here a season or two ago by Adamowski; and Ernst's fantasy on airs from Rossini's old opera of Othello. In acknowledging his recall Mr. Ysaye gracefully indicated to the audience that they owed part of their thanks to the orchestra. The symphony of the concert was Volkmann's First, in D minor, full of beauty. A welcome novelty was the Chasonne and Rigodon, from Monsigny's last century opera, Queen of Golconda. The concluding number was Svendsen's Carnival of Paris—a jolly bit of writing.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, JANUARY 1, 1895.

Union Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartet was held in Union Hall last evening, Mr. Arthur Whiting being the pianist. The programme included the A minor quartet, opus 132, by Beethoven; a quartet in G major by Haydn, and a sonata for piano and 'cello, opus 1, by Pfitzner, a young Frankfort musician. The great triumph of the evening was the performance of the Beethoven quartet, in which the great composer gives impressive thanks to the Lord for recovery from a serious illness. The sonata was delightfully played by Mr. Whiting and Mr. Schroeder, the latter handling his instrument in his usual masterly manner. The closing number was Haydn's quartet, which was given brilliantly and with great artistic effect.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1895.

MUSIC AT UNION HALL.

An audience, composed of lovers of classical music, filled every nook and corner of Union Hall, No. 48 Boylston street, last evening.

The Kneisel Quartet celebrated New Year's eve by giving their fourth concert. Franz Kneisel held the first violin, Otto Roth the second, while L. Svecenski and Alwin Schroeder were viola and violoncello respectively.

These four gentlemen, with the assistance of Arthur Whiting, gave an interesting programme, consisting of a quartet in A minor, from Beethoven, sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, from Hans Pfitzner, and quartet in D major, from Haydn.

SUNDAY, DEC[illegible] 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the tenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74. (First time.)
Henry Holden Huss: Concerto for Pianoforte in B major. (First time.)
Berlioz: Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," opus 23.
Mr. Henry Holden Huss was the pianist.

Tschaikowsky's latest symphony has been made the theme of not a little rumor, and some very grim romance seems to be connected with it. It has been rumored in Germany that the symphony was not only a posthumous work, but a not entirely authentic one; that—like Carl Tausig's last two "Soirées de Vienne"—it was put together after the composer's death from unfinished sketches found among his papers. But this is hardly likely, for it seems pretty certain that the work was really performed, or at least rehearsed, under Tschaikowsky's own direction, and that he died within twenty-four hours afterwards. It is whispered, too, that his sudden death was not from cholera, but by suicide; there is a rumor afloat that Tschaikowsky himself told an American musician that this symphony was to be his "last work." How much truth there is in all this, who shall tell? What gives it a semblance of credibility is the almost unprecedented fact in symphonic writing of its ending with the slow movement, a veritable dirge, if ever there were one. Did Tschaikowsky deliberately mean the last movement he ever wrote to be his own dirge, and then incontinently kill himself afterwards? Or is this all nothing more than the morbid imagination of Rumor?

Of one thing, however, we may feel tolerably certain; that this symphony, if published posthumously, is entirely authentic; there is not a sign of meddling patchwork in a single one of its four movements. No one but Peter Ilyitch Tchaikowsky himself could have written any of it, and no one but he could have put it together as it now stands. It is Tschaikowsky through and through, and nothing but Tschaikowsky!

Once reading the score and once hearing the work do not furnish any very sound basis for forming an opinion of so long, varied, and exceedingly complex a composition as this symphony. There is much in it which we personally do not like, much which we hardly know yet whether to like or not; but there is an inflexible seriousness, a deep earnestness of purpose in it throughout such as must be recognized at once. Never has Tschaikowsky shown himself more grimly in earnest. The amount of elaborate work in the score is something stupendous; and yet one can say that only the third movement, Allegro molto vivace, is in any way over-developed. Here, to be sure, in spite of a heroic cut made by Mr. Paur, the development does seem considerably in excess over what the material can well bear. But in the three other movements there does not seem to be a note too much; everything tells strongly and surely. A good deal of the first movement seems to us as yet to push dramatic strenuousness too far in the direction of the melodramatic and theatrical. The manner in which the melodious and expressive second theme of the first movement is treated, the way in which it is scored, make it verge dangerously on the "Handel Largo" style; the mere external impressiveness of the thing is unquestionably immense, but what an enormous emphasis to throw upon an essentially modest theme! It is like bellowing "I love you!" through a speaking trumpet. And yet one feels the greatest sincerity behind it all; for even tail-lashing can be sincere.

For a technical point, it is curious with what ease and naturalness Tschaikowsky has treated the cross-grained 5-4 time in the second movement, especially as he has not in the least veiled the rhythmic irregularity of the time—as Chopin did almost completely in the slow movement of his first sonata, opus 4, and Wagner did to a great extent in the 5-4 passages of the great climax in the third act of "Tristan." This theme of Tschaikowsky's flows quite naturally; it does not make the impression of the composer's forcing himself to write in 5-4 time, and carrying out his purpose through thick and thin; but with and in spite of all this, the effect upon the ear is something unexampled in our musical experience. After twenty or thirty measures of it, you begin to feel as if you were going crazy, that a little more of that sort of thing will drive you straight to Somerville! It is like having the soles of your feet tickled with a feather.

The closing threnody is without exception the blackest, most disconsolate piece of musical gloom we have ever listened to; it is not overwhelming grief, it is limitless despair, bordering on insanity. Very beautiful, too, withal, and most impressive in its sombre coloring; but one feels that "all faith has gone out from it!" Upon the whole, this last symphony of the great Russian impresses us more strongly than anything else we have ever heard of his; even the problematical character of much of it makes it interesting; would that Mr. Paur would, for once, break through the customary rule and let us hear it again, and that very soon!

The performance was exceedingly fine, and showed that the orchestra, as well as the conductor, had worked entirely con amore in preparing the work; every man in the orchestra played as if for dear life, as if the universe depended upon the symphony's going to perfection.

Berlioz's brilliant overture to his first opera was played with great dash and seemed to be heartily enjoyed. It was not the best Berlioz performance we have heard from the orchestra of late, but was fairly good nevertheless.

Of Mr. Huss's new pianoforte concerto it would hardly be fair to say much after a single hearing. The work seems to us to carry a certain lesson with it, to be in a measure a commentary on the position of a young composer in this country, especially on the difficulty he has in meeting the musical public face to face. It may well be doubted whether an American composer, who has fairly won the right to be considered as such, finds it as easy to have a work of his brought out here as a French composer of corresponding rank does in Paris. And this, too, in spite of the fact that there are ten or fifteen reputable composers in France to one here. Concert programmes in Paris literally swarm with French works; not only by men who enjoy a quasi-reputation of greatness, by men whose works are also given outside of France, but by mere local respectabilities. Here a composer, not generally admitted as standing in the first rank in this country, finds only the veriest semi-occasional [illegible] having a work brought out; when [illegible] this, and we do not [illegible] here; we merely state the [illegible] a composer of less than "national" reputation in this country has to look forward for years to bringing a composition of his before the public, and must deem himself exceptionally lucky when the long-wished-for chance does come at last. But what we do say is that, this being the case, the young composer naturally tries to make the very most of his chance when it comes. He is in somewhat the position of the poor man of epicurian tastes who is invited out to a grand dinner only once or twice in a season: it is ten to one that, when he does go out to dine, he makes himself sick; he eats that dinner for all it is worth, and more! Hope long postponed induces the young composer to try to produce a work which shall be in every way worthy of the (to him) enormously great occasion, and so he rather overdoes things.

Take Mr. Huss in the present instance. He comes forward with a concerto such as no one but a Brahms or a Tschaikowsky has any reasonable right even to attempt writing. In its length, in its imposing largeness of plan and prolixity of treatment, it aims at the very greatest things. Take the first movement: there is a first theme with two subsidiaries, a second theme with its subsidiary, and a double-headed conclusion-theme; in a word, all that any composer can allow himself in a symphonic movement on the very largest scale. Now look through—we will not say a sonata or concerto, but—any largest symphony by Beethoven or Brahms, find one in which there is such a plethora of thematic material, and see if the composer has in a single instance permitted himself to work out all this material in his second part! We have not made the experiment ourselves, but we are none the less pretty sure that such an instance can not be found. Yet this is just what Mr. Russ has done! The labor he has undertaken is positively Herculean, such as hardly a great composer has attempted. What possible tenth part of a chance of success was there? And the other movements, if not planned on quite as gigantic a scale as the first, aim all too evidently in the same direction. When Beethoven had written the first movement of his violin concerto—a movement which nothing but the composer's all-conquering genius saves from being a monstrosity—he followed it up with one of the shortest slow movements, and one of the lightest finales, on record. Mr. Huss goes on as if his first movement had been the merest trifle. There is no need of mincing matters; Mr. Huss's concerto is too big a thing for any but the most consummate and experienced genius to have carried through strongly and effectively. There is much good in it, there is even considerable skill shown at times in the development and working out; now and then one comes upon a phrase of real geniality. But the strength of arm and length of breath requisite to carry through such a labor without the interest flagging, and without incoherencies and lapses of all sorts appearing on every hand is not his. Barring Brahms, we know of no man living today who could have carried through such a work! And note also that the tendency of young composers to attempt such enormous tasks is no inducement to either concert-givers or audiences to look smilingly upon them. Let Mr. Huss write something a quarter as long, and he will have double the chance of playing it twice as often.

The next programme is: Mozart, symphony in D major (without minuet); C. M. Loeffler, divertimento in A minor for violin and orchestra (MS., first time); Grieg, suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit;" Dvorák, overture, "Carneval" (first time). Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 1, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The program of the concert given by the Kneisel Quartet last evening in Union Hall included the A minor quartet, op. 132, by Beethoven; a quartet in G major by Haydn, and, as a novelty, a sonata for piano and 'cello, op. 1, by Pfitzner, a young musician of talent in Frankfort. The quartet by Beethoven was the colossal work in which the composer expresses his thanks to the Lord for convalescence. By the way, in mentioning this movement written "in the Lydian mode," Von Lenz made the amusing mistake of translating as follows, "in lyric style." You may call the great quartets of the latter period of Beethoven orchestral sketches or strange rhapsodies, or the ne plus ultra of quartet music; no description can take away the beauty and the grandeur of the compositions when they are played by such artists as the members of the Kneisel Quartet. The sonata gave great pleasure and it was interpreted admirably. The quartet by Haydn furnished a delightful contrast to the colossal work of Beethoven. The next concert will be given Jan. 21.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN 1, 1895.

Kneisel Quartet.

Although the attendance at the Kneisel quartet concert last night (the fourth in this season's series) was not as large as usual, it was appreciative and enthusiastic. The program consisted of three numbers—Beethoven's quartet in A minor, a sonata for pianoforte and cello by Hans Pfitzner, and the Haydn quartet in D major.

Mr Kneisel refuses to believe that his programs are too long and keeps his audience at least two hours, when most of the people in the hall would be glad to have the concert last not more than an hour and a half. Last night the Beethoven quartet consumed more than 50 minutes, and this number prolonged the concert until after 10 o'clock.

The program was given in the usual artistic manner, for the quartet always plays well. The adagio movement of the Beethoven number and the performance of the Haydn quartet, as a whole, were notably effective. The sonata was interesting. This was its first performance. Mr Whiting played with refinement and style, and his associate, Mr Schroeder, was at his best. The next concert will be given Jan 21.

[72]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1894.

The tenth Symphony concert was not long, but it made great demands upon mind, ears and nerves, for its programme named two new works of large scope and serious massiveness, together with a great and full-volumed overture.

First in place and in importance stood Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony, surnamed the "Pathetic," published not long before his lamented death, and containing some matters of such deep and significant nature that it might almost be considered as the swan song of his genius, sounding for a last time the full sweep of its compass and blending the poems of fancy with the pæans of passion. It is a work which we at least should be glad to hear again before being obliged to express about it anything which must meet challenge as a formulated and balanced judgment. Not in might of sound and massed instrumentalities alone does it overwhelm the listener at times, but in its commanding and rushing enunciation of suddenly contrasted thoughts and its concentration of tone colors, now most sombre and now most lucent, and in its vehement determination to speak out, to be heard and to sway. It is both music of the imagination and of the heart, and the sensitive auditor is now made joyful by its spontaneous and vivid gayety and now depressed by its almost funereal gloom.

But let us try to analyze faintly some causes and means of that peculiar effect which demands both reflection and eloquence to resolve and define it truly. The first movement begins with a short adagio in which the deepest voice of the bassoon utters a brief sad phrase, rising and falling over dull harmonies of the lower strings. A few horn notes, supported by the wooden wind and the violas, build a bridge, as it were, over which the theme passes to be caught up as the first subject of the strong, urgent allegro. An air of agitation pervades the orchestra, and hurried responsive downward phrases sweep to and fro. But the mood changes, while a tender and almost soulful andante, cast into voicings of velvety richness, succeeds and with a secondary air continues its emotional flow until there is a sudden, fierce shock, a pause, and a return to the allegro. This goes wildly on with outcries, clamors and tremendous surges of sound from which emerge some suave and melting passages, lost in their turn in sepulchral depths to which the heavy basses of the trombone, bassoon and tuba can hardly descend. Gradually a darker spirit seems to possess the movement and the often changed rhythm moulds itself into a sombre march-like form, which dies away into moody silence. Other listeners must fashion their own theory as to what the many changes, from the solemn opening to the imposing processional, may typify; but to us all the latter portion brought to mind insistently the lines of Longfellow:

"In the wreck of noble lives
Something immortal still survives."

The second and third movements are as happy, as light, as brilliant and as impetuously fanciful as if no grief or pain or struggle existed in the world. The former has the unusual 5-4 rhythm, but this is treated so elastically that one thinks of nothing but lilting under the fairest sky in buoyant airs. The latter is even more swift and exuberant, and, like the first movement, tests all the virtuosity of the players with its involutions, its shifts and its tossing phrases. It is written upon two themes, noted as in 4-4 and 12-8 times, which, as even the tyro in music knows, can be blended together perfectly without losing their identity. The stronger finally carries all before it, and the movement ends in a jubilant triumph. If pathos be sought in these portions of the symphony, it must be by suggestion from the fundamental thought that the sources of tears and laughter lie so close together, and that from joy to sorrow one crosses often only an imaginary line.

With the finale the sense of tragedy returns. Here, in so strange a place, is found the slow movement of the symphony, dark with desolation, subdued with sorrow, and well nigh majestic with mourning. It has moments of imposing passion in which the full power of the orchestra appears to be but a suppressed revelation, and others when scarcely more than murmurs are to be heard. At last, as if exhausted by its own intensity, it dies away in faint and fainter chords to complete and impressive silence.

Departing, as it so often does, from conventional forms, this symphony is likely to afford matter for debate. The formalists will probably have many objections, but the imaginative and sympathetic ought to be touched gratefully by it. The supersensitive may be oppressed by its immense sonority; but normal dispositions will recognize, we think, that its extremities of power are only invoked when the necessary climax of passion could not else be reached.

It was inconsiderate and all but unkind to Mr. Henry Holden Huss to put his pianoforte concerto next in order. An almost crushing comparison was inevitable, because his first movement was in construction dictated by some such spirit of expression in art as pervaded much of the symphony. There were similar sharp contrasts of tone-color, irregularities of rhythm, diversions of thought, unusual choices of instrumental register, and abrupt announcements from unexpected voices. But what in Tschaikowsky was the perfection of mastery necessarily appeared in the young man as ambitious effort only, and what was excellent in purpose and treatment could not help appearing to disadvantage and seem ungracious, far-fetched and involved. Under even completely favorable conditions we doubt but Mr. Huss's nervous and forcible opening movement would be found to have some strained and ugly passages, representative rather of skill and determination than of natural and persuasive eloquence. The andante was very beautiful in thought and in form and was heard with entire pleasure. The finale left an impression not dissimilar from that made by the allegro—of a bold, but not altogether successful striving for what is yet beyond the young composer's grasp. To be discursive without being illogical, to be passionate without being spasmodic and erratic without being ungovernable, does not come in a day, nor will it be given to all just because they are ambitious and energetic. Mr. Huss—who visited Boston once, if we remember aright, as the adjunct illustrator of some of Mr. Krehbiel's apostolic expositions of Wagner—played the piano part ably, with decisive emphasis, clean technique and adequate power.

Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, with its pompous sonority, its stately splendor and occasional clangor and brilliancy, ended the programme with all due volume and vehemence.

The orchestra coped magnificently with the immense difficulties and bewildering intricacies of the symphony, and did full justice to the overture; but they were not always prompt and perfect in the concerto, playing for an occasional minute or so as if they were a little fatigued and would have been more alert and exact if refreshed by a composition void of any suggestion of the Tschaikowsky flavor.

To speak of the pianoforte is not perhaps quite in place here, but the Mason and Hamlin grand is not very often heard in Music Hall and it seems no more than fair to say that its fine qualities justified its selection by the player whom it well served.

Next Saturday's programme names two novelties—Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, and a manuscript "divertimento" for violin aud orchestra, in which the soloist will be its composer, Mr. C. M. Loeffler. The other numbers will be Grieg's "In Holberg's Time" suite and Mozart's D-major symphony, without the minuet.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 29, 1894.

For the first time Boston heard Goldmark's Sappho Overture at the sixth Symphony Concert. It opens with harps, suggestive of the famous classic beauty, though the Greeks had no such music; but later you think of the sea into which Sappho cast herself, rather than of the groves and maidens amidst which she dwelt. Raff's Symphony, In the Woods, was welcome for its descriptive quality, though rather long in development. Liszt's symphonic poem, Les Preludes, No. 3, was a delightful windup. The soloist was Mrs. Elena Kehew Eaton, with her big round voice, in the Sleep aria, from Handel's Semele, and in Weber's Ocean Song, and made the former very attractive.

Eugene Ysaye made his Boston debut at the seventh Symphony Concert, and was received with an enthusiasm rarely shown by the afternoon audience. In three minutes his wonderful tones roused sympathetic vibrations in the auditorial brain. Such broad and rich violin playing has rarely been heard in our city, the softer tones winding into the air like some silky film. His two selections, admirably suited to the display of his varying qualities, were the Saint-Saens Concerto, No. 3, in B minor, op. 61, played here a season or two ago by Adamowski; and Ernst's fantasy on airs from Rossini's old opera of Othello. In acknowledging his recall Mr. Ysaye gracefully indicated to the audience that they owed part of their thanks to the orchestra. The symphony of the concert was Volkmann's First, in D minor, full of beauty. A welcome novelty was the Chasonne and Rigodon, from Monsigny's last century opera, Queen of Golconda. The concluding number was Svendsen's Carnival of Paris—a jolly bit of writing.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, JANUARY 1, 1895.

Union Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartet was held in Union Hall last evening, Mr. Arthur Whiting being the pianist. The programme included the A minor quartet, opus 132, by Beethoven; a quartet in G major by Haydn, and a sonata for piano and 'cello, opus 1, by Pfitzner, a young Frankfort musician. The great triumph of the evening was the performance of the Beethoven quartet, in which the great composer gives impressive thanks to the Lord for recovery from a serious illness. The sonata was delightfully played by Mr. Whiting and Mr. Schroeder, the latter handling his instrument in his usual masterly manner. The closing number was Haydn's quartet, which was given brilliantly and with great artistic effect.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1895.

MUSIC AT UNION HALL.

An audience, composed of lovers of classical music, filled every nook and corner of Union Hall, No. 48 Boylston street, last evening.

The Kneisel Quartet celebrated New Year's eve by giving their fourth concert. Franz Kneisel held the first violin, Otto Roth the second, while L. Svecenski and Alwin Schroeder were viola and violoncello respectively.

These four gentlemen, with the assistance of Arthur Whiting, gave an interesting programme, consisting of a quartet in A minor, from Beethoven, sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, from Hans Pfitzner, and quartet in D major, from Haydn.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the tenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74. (First time.)
Henry Holden Huss: Concerto for Pianoforte in B major. (First time.)
Berlioz: Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," opus 23.
Mr. Henry Holden Huss was the pianist.

Tschaikowsky's latest symphony has been made the theme of not a little rumor, and some very grim romance seems to be connected with it. It has been rumored in Germany that the symphony was not only a posthumous work, but a not entirely authentic one; that—like Carl Tausig's last two "Soirées de Vienne"—it was put together after the composer's death from unfinished sketches found among his papers. But this is hardly likely, for it seems pretty certain that the work was really performed, or at least rehearsed, under Tschaikowsky's own direction, and that he died within twenty-four hours afterwards. It is whispered, too, that his sudden death was not from cholera, but by suicide; there is a rumor afloat that Tschaikowsky himself told an American musician that this symphony was to be his "last work." How much truth there is in all this, who shall tell? What gives it a semblance of credibility is the almost unprecedented fact in symphonic writing of its ending with the slow movement, a veritable dirge, if ever there were one. Did Tschaikowsky deliberately mean the last movement he ever wrote to be his own dirge, and then incontinently kill himself afterwards? Or is this all nothing more than the morbid imagination of Rumor?

Of one thing, however, we may feel tolerably certain; that this symphony, if published posthumously, is entirely authentic; there is not a sign of meddling patchwork in a single one of its four movements. No one but Peter Ilyitch Tchaikowsky himself could have written any of it, and no one but he could have put it together as it now stands. It is Tschaikowsky through and through, and nothing but Tschaikowsky!

Once reading the score and once hearing the work do not furnish any very sound basis for forming an opinion of so long, varied, and exceedingly complex a composition as this symphony. There is much in it which we personally do not like, much which we hardly know yet whether to like or not; but there is an inflexible seriousness, a deep earnestness of purpose in it throughout such as must be recognized at once. Never has Tschaikowsky shown himself more grimly in earnest. The amount of elaborate work in the score is something stupendous; and yet one can say that only the third movement, Allegro molto vivace, is in any way over-developed. Here, to be sure, in spite of a heroic cut made by Mr. Paur, the development does seem considerably in excess over what the material can well bear. But in the three other movements there does not seem to be a note too much; everything tells strongly and surely. A good deal of the first movement seems to us as yet to push dramatic strenuousness too far in the direction of the melodramatic and theatrical. The manner in which the melodious and expressive second theme of the first movement is treated, the way in which it is scored, make it verge dangerously on the "Handel Largo" style; the mere external impressiveness of the thing is unquestionably immense, but what an enormous emphasis to throw upon an essentially modest theme! It is like bellowing "I love you!" through a speaking trumpet. And yet one feels the greatest sincerity behind it all; for even tail-lashing can be sincere.

For a technical point, it is curious with what ease and naturalness Tschaikowsky has treated the cross-grained 5-4 time in the second movement, especially as he has not in the least veiled the rhythmic irregularity of the time—as Chopin did almost completely in the slow movement of his first sonata, opus 4, and Wagner did to a great extent in the 5-4 passages of the great climax in the third act of "Tristan." This theme of Tschaikowsky's flows quite naturally; it does not make the impression of the composer's forcing himself to write in 5-4 time, and carrying out his purpose through thick and thin; but with and in spite of all this, the effect upon the ear is something unexampled in our musical experience. After twenty or thirty measures of it, you begin to feel as if you were going crazy, that a little more of that sort of thing will drive you straight to Somerville! It is like having the soles of your feet tickled with a feather.

The closing threnody is without exception the blackest, most disconsolate piece of musical gloom we have ever listened to; it is not overwhelming grief, it is limitless despair, bordering on insanity. Very beautiful, too, withal, and most impressive in its sombre coloring; but one feels that "all faith has gone out from it!" Upon the whole, this last symphony of the great Russian impresses us more strongly than anything else we have ever heard of his; even the problematical character of much of it makes it interesting; would that Mr. Paur would, for once, break through the customary rule and let us hear it again, and that very soon!

The performance was exceedingly fine, and showed that the orchestra, as well as the conductor, had worked entirely con amore in preparing the work, every man in the orchestra played as if for dear life, as if the universe depended upon the symphony's going to perfection.

Berlioz's brilliant overture to his first opera was played with great dash and seemed to be heartily enjoyed. It was not the best Berlioz performance we have heard from the orchestra of late, but was fairly good nevertheless.

Of Mr. Huss's new pianoforte concerto it would hardly be fair to say much after a single hearing. The work seems to us to carry a certain lesson with it, to be in a measure a commentary on the position of a young composer in this country, especially on the difficulty he has in meeting the musical public face to face. It may well be doubted whether an American composer, who has fairly won the right to be considered as such, finds it as easy to have a work of his brought out here as a French composer of corresponding rank does in Paris. And this, too, in spite of the fact that there are ten or fifteen reputable composers in France to one here. Concert programmes in Paris literally swarm with French works; not only by men who enjoy a quasi-reputation of greatness, by men whose works are also given outside of France, but by mere local respectabilities. Here a composer, not generally admitted as standing in the first rank in this country, finds only the veriest semi-occasional chance of having a work brought out; when the chance does come, it is to be prized as a hardly estimable blessing, as a great stroke of luck. No doubt there are reasons enough for this, and we do not care to go into them here; we merely state the fact that a composer of less than "national" reputation in this country has to look forward for years to bringing a composition of his before the public, and must deem himself exceptionally lucky when the long-wished-for chance does come at last. But what we do say is that, this being the case, the young composer naturally tries to make the very most of his chance when it comes. He is in somewhat the position of the poor man of epicurian tastes who is invited out to a grand dinner only once or twice in a season; it is ten to one that, when he does go out to dine, he makes himself sick; he eats that dinner for all it is worth, and more! Hope long postponed induces the young composer to try to produce a work which shall be in every way worthy of the (to him) enormously great occasion, and so he rather overdoes things.

Take Mr. Huss in the present instance. He comes forward with a concerto such as no one but a Brahms or a Tschaikowsky has any reasonable right even to attempt writing. In its length, in its imposing largeness of plan and prolixity of treatment, it aims at the very greatest things. Take the first movement: there is a first theme with two subsidiaries, a second theme with its subsidiary, and a double-headed conclusion-theme; in a word, all that any composer can allow himself in a symphonic movement on the very largest scale. Now look through—we will not say a sonata or concerto, but—any largest symphony by Beethoven or Brahms, find one in which there is such a plethora of thematic material, and see if the composer has in a single instance permitted himself to work out all this material in his second part! We have not made the experiment ourselves, but we are none the less pretty sure that such an instance can not be found. Yet this is just what Mr. Russ has done! The labor he has undertaken is positively Herculean, such as hardly a great composer has attempted. What possible tenth part of a chance of success was there? And the other movements, if not planned on quite as gigantic a scale as the first, aim all too evidently in the same direction. When Beethoven had written the first movement of his violin concerto—a movement which nothing but the composer's all-conquering genius saves from being a monstrosity—he followed it up with one of the shortest slow movements, and one of the lightest finales, on record. Mr. Huss goes on as if his first movement had been the merest trifle. There is no need of mincing matters; Mr. Huss's concerto is too big a thing for any but the most consummate and experienced genius to have carried through strongly and effectively. There is much good in it, there is even considerable skill shown at times in the development and working out; now and then one comes upon a phrase of real geniality. But the strength of arm and length of breath requisite to carry through such a labor without the interest flagging, and without incoherencies and lapses of all sorts appearing on every hand is not his. Barring Brahms, we know of no man living today who could have carried through such a work! And note also that the tendency of young composers to attempt such enormous tasks is no inducement to either concert-givers or audiences to look smilingly upon them. Let Mr. Huss write something a quarter as long, and he will have double the chance of playing it twice as often.

The next programme is: Mozart, symphony in D major (without minuet); C. M. Loeffler, divertimento in A minor for violin and orchestra (MS., first time); Grieg, suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit;" Dvorák, overture, "Carneval" (first time). Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 1, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The program of the concert given by the Kneisel Quartet last evening in Union Hall included the A minor quartet, op. 132, by Beethoven; a quartet in G major by Haydn, and, as a novelty, a sonata for piano and 'cello, op. 1, by Pfitzner, a young musician of talent in Frankfort. The quartet by Beethoven was the colossal work in which the composer expresses his thanks to the Lord for convalescence. By the way, in mentioning this movement written "in the Lydian mode," Von Lenz made the amusing mistake of translating as follows, "in lyric style." You may call the great quartets of the latter period of Beethoven orchestral sketches or strange rhapsodies, or the ne plus ultra of quartet music; no description can take away the beauty and the grandeur of the compositions when they are played by such artists as the members of the Kneisel Quartet. The sonata gave great pleasure and it was interpreted admirably. The quartet by Haydn furnished a delightful contrast to the colossal work of Beethoven. The next concert will be given Jan. 21.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN 1, 1895.

Kneisel Quartet.

Although the attendance at the Kneisel quartet concert last night (the fourth in this season's series) was not as large as usual, it was appreciative and enthusiastic. The program consisted of three numbers—Beethoven's quartet in A minor, a sonata for pianoforte and cello by Hans Pfitzner, and the Haydn quartet in D major.

Mr Kneisel refuses to believe that his programs are too long and keeps his audience at least two hours; when most of the people in the hall would be glad to have the concert last not more than an hour and a half. Last night the Beethoven quartet consumed more than 50 minutes, and this number prolonged the concert until after 10 o'clock.

The program was given in the usual artistic manner, for the quartet always plays well. The adagio movement of the Beethoven number and the performance of the Haydn quartet, as a whole, were notably effective. The sonata was interesting. This was its first performance. Mr Whiting played with refinement and style, and his associate, Mr Schroeder, was at his best. The next concert will be given Jan 21.

[72]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The fourth concert by the Kneisel Quartet was held in Union Hall last evening, Mr. Arthur Whiting assisting. The programme was admirable throughout and was thoroughly enjoyed by the large audience present. A more finished performance than the Beethoven's Quartet in A minor, as played by the Kneisel Quartet, last evening, would be difficult to imagine, the "molto adagio" movement deserving special mention.

A sonata for piano forte and violoncello by Hans Plitzner was delightfully played by Mr. Whiting and Mr. Schroeder; one almost forgets the natural limitations of the violoncello in listening to Mr. Schroeder's masterly handling of the instrument. This number was played for the first time, but judging from its merits and the hearty reception which it won, it will be heard again. The closing number was Haydn's Quartet in D major.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1895.

The program of the tenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, "Pathétique" (first time).....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano, B major (first time).....Huss
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz

You have heard the great work of Tschaikowsky. Played here for the first time it made a profound sensation. The third movement is below the general high level; it is not free from vulgarity, and the march is too like the famous one in the "Lenore" of Raff. But how passionate, how imaginative is the first movement! As for the finale, it is a finale to everything. There is no hope. The joys and the sorrows, the lusts and the high thoughts of life are dust and ashes. What a wealth of beauty, spiritual and technical, in this wondrous composition! Do you remember the strange use of the bassoons, the combination of bassoon and flute, the wildly pathetic descending scale in the first movement, the supreme mastery of rhythm, and the pedal in the second, the stopped-horn effect and the sublime melody in the lamentation—a lamentation of the complaining millions of men?

Is it true, as some say, that Tschaikowsky deliberately poisoned himself?

The concerto of Mr. Huss suffers chiefly from these faults: the themes are too short, without particular distinction; there is not irresistible logical development; the movements are too long; there is unnecessary detail for the purpose of introducing unmeaning and incongruous contrapuntal tricks; the instrumentation is too heavy, too thick. The work does not hang together. The first movement starts off bravely, but after the trumpet phrase what remains in the memory? There are so many digressions that there is no steady course to the goal. The second movement is hopelessly dull. The finale seemed last evening the most spontaneous and effective portion of the work. I say "seemed," because the technic of Mr. Huss did not respond to his own demands. Although he has improved as a pianist since his last appearance here, he is not able to put such a work as this concerto in the most advantageous light.

Mr. Paur might well have conducted with more discretion when he realized the moderate ability of the pianist. Overwrought as is the instrumentation, the conductor should have moderated the fell orchestral rage. And I may here add that Mr. Paur is gradually getting into the habit of forcing the instruments, string, wood, brass and skin.

I admire and respect the honesty and the industry of Mr. Huss. This is not said in a conventional way. These words are not offered as a salve. I had the pleasure of his acquaintance in Munich, where for a short time we were fellow students. I know the high purpose, the sincerity of the man and the musician. In this concerto there are abundant evidences of scholarship, but they are for the most part out of place and injurious to the continuity and the effect of the work. He has had an opportunity of hearing this concerto. It is his duty now to revise, enliven and above all prune with a merciless hand.

PHILIP HALE.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Mittwoch, 2. Januar 1895.

Das dritte Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters. — Unter Mitwirkung der Solistin Frl. Adele aus der Ohe wird am nächsten Montag in der Academy of Music das dritte Konzert des berühmten Boston Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur stattfinden. Kunstfreunde seien auf dasselbe ganz besonders aufmerksam gemacht. Das Programm bietet folgende Tonwerke: Symphonie No. 7, Beethoven; Concert für Pianoforte in A moll, Schumann; Ouverture, „Carneval", Dvorak; Ouverture, Scherzo, Nocturne und Hochzeitsmarsch aus „Sommernachtstraum", Mendelssohn.

Tickets sind in No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVII., NO. 6.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 6, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Two of the Numbers Heard for the First Time in Boston.

Mr. Loeffler's Divertimento Remarkable for Its Piquant Capriciousness—His Triumph as Composer and Soloist Complete—The Mozart Symphony and the Dvorak Overture.

The programme for the concert of last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall was:

Symphony in D, No. 1.....Mozart
Divertmento, for violin and orchestra (MS.)
C. M. Loeffler
Suite, "In Holberg's Time".....Grieg
Overture, "Carneval".....Dvorak

The soloist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler. Two of the numbers were heard for the first time here. These were the divertiment and the overture. The Mozart symphony is not often heard here. It deserves more frequent performances, if only for the fascinating slow movement and the gay and melodious finale, with their Figaroish color and their freshness and beauty generally. The andante, in particular, is quite in the vein of the opera, and constantly suggests voices and stage action, and the last movement is full of the spirit of the two unequalled and unapproachable finales in that work. There are passages in it of exquisite grace and charm, and the wood wind are used with entrancing effect. The symphony was perfectly read as to tempi, feeling and character by Mr. Paur, the slow movement especially, which was given with a refreshing absence of that sickly sentimentality that is generally imparted to it. The Grieg suite is one of its composer's most felicitous successes. It is without his more striking mannerisms, and the writing for strings is masterly in its fulness and richness. The Dvorak overture is a wonderfully brilliant and stirring work. In several of its aspects it recalls Berlioz's 'Carneval Romaine," but it also has a character that is decidedly the composer's own. Its animation is immense, and is sustained with remarkable fertility of resource—orchestrally and otherwise. The themes are equally original and impressive, and the work as a whole can hardly fail of becoming a standard feature on concert programmes. It was played with a vigor that was fairly thrilling.

Mr. Loeffler's divertimento is a composition of great interest and originality. It is in three movements. The first is a "preambule," and the solo instrument dashes at once into species of "perpetual motion" of a purely virtuoso character, and from which a departure is seldom taken. Here and there is a moment of repose that gives a necessary contrast to the movement, but it is not long sustained. The interest is intensified by instrumentation that is as new as it is beautiful in effect, especially a charming combination in which the harp, violas and a horn are prominent. The second movement is an "eclogue," which is striking in the peculiar novelty of its suave themes and the orchestration that colors them. There are no violins except the solo instrument used in this part of the work, and some extraordinary effects are produced by the association of flutes, bassoons, the harp, an English horn and a muted trumpet.

The orchestration here is quite new and its delicacy is as notable as its novelty. The last movement entitled "Carnaval des morts" consists of variations on the well-known plain song "Dies Irae, dies illa." These variations are of a most extraordinary character, and tax the virtuosity of the player to the utmost. Here again the orchestration is impressive in its originality, and is of a more fiery and vigorous kind than is to be found in any other portion of the work. The divertimento is remarkable for its piquant capriciousness. It is a surprise from beginning to end, and never falls off in interest; while strange to say, dispite its extreme modern character in both form and treatment, it is never lacking in clearness and interest. Though complicated, the orchestration is always discreet, and is delightful in its effectiveness and its freedom from overloading and conventionality. The work is perhaps the best of its composer's efforts that have been heard in public.

It is a credit to his brilliant musicianship, the purity of his taste and the skill with which he departs from set forms and takes refuge in the bizarre, without becoming merely eccentric. His performance of the solo part again exemplified his masterly technique, his unerring intonation under the most exacting conditions, the beauty of his phrasing and his keen artistic instinct. He was welcomed with great cordiality, and after each movement was applauded with an enthusiasm whose sincerity was as pronounced as was the effort that called it forth, and at the close of the work he was recalled again and again, until one ceased to count how many times he came forward to bow his acknowledgments. His triumph as composer and soloist was complete.

The next concert will be devoted wholly to Wagner. The programme is: "Rienzi," overture; "Tannhaeuser," (a) act 2, Elizabeth's aria; (b) act 3, Prelude; "The Flying Dutchman," overture; "Lohengrin," (a) act 2, balcony scene; (b) act 3, Prelude; "Die Meistersinger," (a) act 3, Prelude; (b), act 1, Walther's Preislied; "Rheingold," Procession of the Gods; "Die Walkure," Spring song; "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung," (a) Waldweben; (b) Siegfried's passage to Brunhilde's rock, morning dawn and Rhine journey (Richter arrangement).

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 6, 1895.

C. M. Loeffler, the Soloist, at

Mr C. M. Loeffler was the soloist at the 11th symphony concert, and he received enthusiastic tributes of regard from the large audiences which crowded Music hall Friday afternoon and last evening.

There is no more popular man in the symphony orchestra than Mr. Loeffler, and this feeling of good will towards him is as pronounced among the members of the orchestra as it is evident among the patrons of these concerts.

During his long connection with the symphony orchestra he has endeared himself to all his associates, and his sterling merit as a musician has won for him the admiration of the musical public generally.

He appeared yesterday not only as a soloist, but also as a composer, and readily succeeded in delighting his audience in both capacities.

The composition given yesterday is entitled "Divertimento," in A minor for violin and orchestra, and was heard for the first time in public. It is a brilliant work, and is replete with original ideas and striking effects, which are treated in a thoroughly scholarly manner, and yet all is so bright and pleasing that the work is calculated to win much more popular favor than is generally accorded to scholarly musical compositions.

As the title indicates, Mr Loeffler's "Divertimento" is generally of a light, and lively character, and gives great prominence to the solo instrument, allowing the performer ample opportunity for display of virtuosity.

The work was written by Mr Loeffler last summer, and is in three movements, preambule, eclogue and carnaval des morts. Each of these three movements is so thoroughly charming that one is not to be selected as deserving of greater praise than another.

The orchestral accompaniment of the first movement is particularly elaborate, and utilizes the full resources of the modern band. There are several passages where the instrumentation is notably melodic and beautiful.

The second movement, which is of a pastorale character, is decidedly original in treatment. No violins are used in the orchestra, but many exquisite effects are gained by the other instruments which support the solo violin, especially by the wood wind in several dainty passages.

The last movement is an elaborate writing, and consists chiefly of variations on the song "Dies irae, dies illa." The passages for the solo violin are uncommonly brilliant and difficult.

After the performance of each movement there were demonstrations of delight from the audience. It was honest applause, too, not due solely to the personal popularity of Mr Loeffler, for in many respects this is the best work of its kind ever written by a resident Boston musician.

Regarding Mr Loeffler's playing only words of most cordial praise are to be said. His performance was at all times artistic and finished. His tone was fascinating in its purity, and fairly dazzling was the brilliancy of his execution in the pyrotechnic passages. It is unnecessary, however, to dilate upon the accomplishments of an artist so well known and so thoroughly appreciated by Bostonians.

The other numbers of yesterday's symphony concert program were: Mozart's symphony in D major, Grieg's suite "Aus Holberg's Zeit" and Dvorak's "Carneval" overture. The latter number was heard here for the first time.

It is one of the most brilliant short orchestral compositions ever written by the distinguished Russian composer who a few years ago took up his residence in America. It is thoroughly modern in style and is notable for the number, variety and brilliancy of its tonal pictures. It is rich in melody, and the orchestration is most elaborate.

The Mozart symphony was splendidly played under the direction of Mr Paur. He seemed to enter thoroughly into the spirit of the composer's work, and gave the audience a clearer idea of the beauties of this lovely symphony than had heretofore been offered.

No less charming was the performance of Grieg's brilliant and delightful suite. Each of the five movements were played with exquisite effect, especially the dainty gavotte which was given with marvelous grace.

The program of the next concert will be composed wholly of selections from the works of Richard Wagner, as follows:

Rienzi.....Overture
Tannhauser.....Elizabeth's aria and prelude
The Flying Dutchman.....Overture
Lohengrin.....Balcony scene and prelude
Die Meistersinger,
Prelude and Walther's preislied
Rheingold.....Procession of the gods
Die Walkure.....Spring song
Siegfried and Die Gotterdammerung,
Waldweben, Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's rock, morning dawn and Rhine journey.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 6, 1895.

The Eleventh Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall.

This is the program of the eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening:

Symphony, D major (K. 504).....Mozart
Divertimento, A minor, for violin and orchestra (MS. first time).....C. M. Loeffler
Suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit".....Grieg
Overture, "Carnival" (first time).....Dvorak

It was a pleasant concert last evening. The program was interesting, the performance was for the most part admirable, and the audience was dismissed at a reasonable hour. The qualification as to the performance is this: the attack was slightly irregular, especially in the symphony.

***

Mr. Loeffler was applauded enthusiastically for his performance and his composition. I can imagine easily an excellent and estimable person, fond of music and learned in the primer of form, saying: "Oh, yes, this divertimento is all very well as a show piece, and Mr. Loeffler played finely, but there is not much in it. No development of thematic material, and the variations in the finale are bizarre." And he would say this in good faith. Now Mr. Loeffler, as it seems to me, has a large sympathy for the modern French and Belgian decadents. He believes in tonal impressions, in effects of color, rather than in conscientious plodding in the sonata ruts. The macabre is not distasteful to him. He likes sharp contrasts. He delights in instrumental experiments. If he sought expression in verbal phrase he would cotton to Verlaine and Moréas and Rimbaud and Retté.

This divertimento shows clearly that Mr. Loeffler has a right to make experiments. There are strange or delightful effects throughout the work: as in the unison of harp and violas in the preambulum, the singularly effective use of muted trumpets in the eclogue, the alternate pizzicati in the finale. The romantic interrupts constantly the severe in the opening movement, as though it protested against the revival of old-fashioned preluding. Beautiful in thought and treatment is the eclogue, where no violins are used. The absence of the biting strings gives one some idea of how Méhul's "Uthal," a one-act opera without fiddles, would finally exasperate the ear. Mr. Loeffler stopped his eclogue in time, or the audience might have uttered the famous cry of Grétry, as he sighed for a chanterelle. "Never mind the color of the movement," says an objector. "How about the thought?" Well, it was not spectacled, it was not dull; it was fresh and soothing and delightful.

Of course, if you see the word eclogue, and then feel a 6—8 rhythm and hear instruments associated with warm landscapes, flocks and herds, and high, indolent clouds, you are pastorally inspired. But without the name, the music might be "The Bride," or "Viola," or "As You Like It." In fact, you cannot in such music separate thought and color. And the color was a rare delight. In his "Carnaval des Morts," where the plain song "Dies Irae" serves as a theme, Mr. Loeffler made a slight incursion into Shudderland; but the absolute security of the violinist allayed any possible fear and smoothed quickly the slightly developed goose-flesh. It is clever, this music; and it is more than clever; it shows imagination. Sometimes you wish that Mr. Loeffler had a little streak of coarseness in his nature; in this finale it would not be amiss. But let us be thankful for the refinement, the curiosity that would fain find new colors, the skill in finding them, and the genuine imagination. To say that it is a creditable work is to talk like a pedagogue. It is, indeed, a fascinating composition, one that pricks suggestion and provokes moods.

And the composer played his difficult part with the accuracy, the brilliancy, the delicacy, and the purity that are so characteristic of him.

***

Interesting, too, was Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, full of blood and leaping in the air and delirious delight. The contrasting andantino is charmingly orchestrated; but has the overture the strength, the swing of the Dvorak of old, before he wrote to Englishorder and made a pilgrimage to Spillville, Iowa? Portions of the suite by Grieg always give pleasure, especially the sarabande and the air. As for the Mozart symphony it is full of beauties. Such music when genius makes the dry bones of formalism live does not suffer if placed next the tonal impressions of the moderns. Such juxtaposition shows in clearest light the worth, the strength, the beauty of each school.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The fourth concert by the Kneisel Quartet was held in Union Hall last evening, Mr. Arthur Whiting assisting. The programme was admirable throughout and was thoroughly enjoyed by the large audience present. A more finished performance than the Beethoven's Quartet in A minor, as played by the Kneisel Quartet, last evening, would be difficult to imagine, the "molto adagio" movement deserving special mention.

A sonata for piano forte and violoncello by Hans Plitzner was delightfully played by Mr. Whiting and Mr. Schroeder: one almost forgets the natural limitations of the violoncello in listening to Mr. Schroeder's masterly handling of the instrument. This number was played for the first time, but judging from its merits and the hearty reception which it won, it will be heard again. The closing number was Haydn's Quartet in D major.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1895.

The program of the tenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, "Pathétique" (first time).....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano, B major (first time).....Huss
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz

You have heard the great work of Tschaikowsky. Played here for the first time it made a profound sensation. The third movement is below the general high level; it is not free from vulgarity, and the march is too like the famous one in the "Lenore" of Raff. But how passionate, how imaginative is the first movement! As for the finale, it is a finale to everything. There is no hope. The joys and the sorrows, the lusts and the high thoughts of life are dust and ashes. What a wealth of beauty, spiritual and technical, in this wondrous composition! Do you remember the strange use of the bassoons, the combination of bassoon and flute, the wildly pathetic descending scale in the first movement, the supreme mastery of rhythm, and the pedal in the second, the stopped-horn effect and the sublime melody in the lamentation—a lamentation of the complaining millions of men?

Is it true, as some say, that Tschaikowsky deliberately poisoned himself?

The concerto of Mr. Huss suffers chiefly from these faults: the themes are too short, without particular distinction; there is not irresistible logical development; the movements are too long; there is unnecessary detail for the purpose of introducing unmeaning and incongruous contrapuntal tricks; the instrumentation is too heavy, too thick. The work does not hang together. The first movement starts off bravely, but after the trumpet phrase what remains in the memory? There are so many digressions that there is no steady course to the goal. The second movement is hopelessly dull. The finale seemed last evening the most spontaneous and effective portion of the work. I say "seemed," because the technic of Mr. Huss did not respond to his own demands. Although he has improved as a pianist since his last appearance here, he is not able to put such a work as this concerto in the most advantageous light.

Mr. Paur might well have conducted with more discretion when he realized the moderate ability of the pianist. Overwrought as is the instrumentation, the conductor should have moderated the fell orchestral rage. And I may here add that Mr. Paur is gradually getting into the habit of forcing the instruments, string, wood, brass and skin.

I admire and respect the honesty and the industry of Mr. Huss. This is not said in a conventional way. These words are not offered as a salve. I had the pleasure of his acquaintance in Munich, where for a short time we were fellow students. I know the high purpose, the sincerity of the man and the musician. In this concerto there are abundant evidences of scholarship, but they are for the most part out of place and injurious to the continuity and the effect of the work. He has had an opportunity of hearing this concerto. It is his duty now to revise, enliven and above all prune with a merciless hand.

PHILIP HALE.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.
Mittwoch, 2. Januar 1895.

Das dritte Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters. — Unter Mitwirkung der Solistin Frl. Adele aus der Ohe wird am nächsten Montag in der Academy of Music das dritte Konzert des berühmten Boston Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur stattfinden. Kunstfreunde seien auf dasselbe ganz besonders aufmerksam gemacht. Das Programm bietet folgende Tonwerke: Symphonie No. 7, Beethoven; Conzert für Pianoforte in A moll, Schumann; Ouverture, „Carneval", Dvorak; Ouverture, Scherzo, Nocturne und Hochzeitsmarsch aus „Sommernachtstraum", Mendelssohn.

Tickets sind in No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVII., NO. 6.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 6, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Two of the Numbers Heard for the First Time in Boston.

Mr. Loeffler's Divertimento Remarkable for Its Piquant Capriciousness—His Triumph as Composer and Soloist Complete—The Mozart Symphony and the Dvorak Overture.

The programme for the concert of last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall was:

Symphony in D, No. 1.....Mozart
Divertmento, for violin and orchestra (MS.)
C. M. Loeffler
Suite, "In Holberg's Time".....Grieg
Overture, "Carneval".....Dvorak

The soloist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler. Two of the numbers were heard for the first time here. These were the divertiment and the overture. The Mozart symphony is not often heard here. It deserves more frequent performances, if only for the fascinating slow movement and the gay and melodious finale, with their Figaroish color and their freshness and beauty generally. The andante, in particular, is quite in the vein of the opera, and constantly suggests voices and stage action, and the last movement is full of the spirit of the two unequalled and unapproachable finales in that work. There are passages in it of exquisite grace and charm, and the wood wind are used with entrancing effect. The symphony was perfectly read as to tempi, feeling and character by Mr. Paur, the slow movement especially, which was given with a refreshing absence of that sickly sentimentality that is generally imparted to it. The Grieg suite is one of its composer's most felicitous successes. It is without his more striking mannerisms, and the writing for strings is masterly in its fulness and richness. The Dvorak overture is a wonderfully brilliant and stirring work. In several of its aspects it recalls Berlioz's 'Carneval Romaine," but it also has a character that is decidedly the composer's own. Its animation is immense, and is sustained with remarkable fertility of resource—orchestrally and otherwise. The themes are equally original and impressive, and the work as a whole can hardly fail of becoming a standard feature on concert programmes. It was played with a vigor that was fairly thrilling.

Mr. Loeffler's divertimento is a composition of great interest and originality. It is in three movements. The first is a "preambule," and the solo instrument dashes at once into species of "perpetual motion" of a purely virtuoso character, and from which a departure is seldom taken. Here and there is a moment of repose that gives a necessary contrast to the movement, but it is not long sustained. The interest is intensified by instrumentation that is as new as it is beautiful in effect, especially a charming combination in which the harp, violas and a horn are prominent. The second movement is an "eclogue," which is striking in the peculiar novelty of its suave themes and the orchestration that colors them. There are no violins except the solo instrument used in this part of the work, and some extraordinary effects are produced by the association of flutes, bassoons, the harp, an English horn and a muted trumpet.

The orchestration here is quite new and its delicacy is as notable as its novelty. The last movement entitled "Carnaval des morts" consists of variations on the well-known plain song "Dies Irae, dies illa." These variations are of a most extraordinary character, and tax the virtuosity of the player to the utmost. Here again the orchestration is impressive in its originality, and is of a more fiery and vigorous kind than is to be found in any other portion of the work. The divertimento is remarkable for its piquant capriciousness. It is a surprise from beginning to end, and never falls off in interest; while strange to say, dispite its extreme modern character in both form and treatment, it is never lacking in clearness and interest. Though complicated, the orchestration is always discreet, and is delightful in its effectiveness and its freedom from overloading and conventionality. The work is perhaps the best of its composer's efforts that have been heard in public.

It is a credit to his brilliant musicianship, the purity of his taste and the skill with which he departs from set forms and takes refuge in the bizarre, without becoming merely eccentric. His performance of the solo part again exemplified his masterly technique, his unerring intonation under the most exacting conditions, the beauty of his phrasing and his keen artistic instinct. He was welcomed with great cordiality, and after each movement was applauded with an enthusiasm whose sincerity was as pronounced as was the effort that called it forth, and at the close of the work he was recalled again and again, until one ceased to count how many times he came forward to bow his acknowledgments. His triumph as composer and soloist was complete.

The next concert will be devoted wholly to Wagner. The programme is: "Rienzi," overture; "Tannhaeuser," (a) act 2, Elizabeth's aria; (b) act 3, Prelude; "The Flying Dutchman," overture; "Lohengrin," (a) act 2, balcony scene; (b) act 3, Prelude; "Die Meistersinger," (a) act 3, Prelude; (b), act 1, Walther's Preislied; "Rheingold," Procession of the Gods; "Die Walkure," Spring song; "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung," (a) Waldweben; (b) Siegfried's passage to Brunhilde's rock, morning dawn and Rhine journey (Richter arrangement).

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN. 6, 1895.

C. M. Loeffler, the Soloist, at

Mr C. M. Loeffler was the soloist at the 11th symphony concert, and he received enthusiastic tributes of regard from the large audiences which crowded Music hall Friday afternoon and last evening.

There is no more popular man in the symphony orchestra than Mr Loeffler, and this feeling of good will towards him is as pronounced among the members of the orchestra as it is evident among the patrons of these concerts.

During his long connection with the symphony orchestra he has endeared himself to all his associates, and his sterling merit as a musician has won for him the admiration of the musical public generally.

He appeared yesterday not only as a soloist, but also as a composer, and readily succeeded in delighting his audience in both capacities.

The composition given yesterday is entitled "Divertimento," in A minor for violin and orchestra, and was heard for the first time in public. It is a brilliant work, and is replete with original ideas and striking effects, which are treated in a thoroughly scholarly manner, and yet all is so bright and pleasing that the work is calculated to win much more popular favor than is generally accorded to scholarly musical compositions.

As the title indicates, Mr Loeffler's "Divertimento" is generally of a light and lively character, and gives great prominence to the solo instrument, allowing the performer ample opportunity for display of virtuosity.

The work was written by Mr Loeffler last summer, and is in three movements, preambule, eclogue and carnaval des morts. Each of these three movements is so thoroughly charming that one is not to be selected as deserving of greater praise than another.

The orchestral accompaniment of the first movement is particularly elaborate, and utilizes the full resources of the modern band. There are several passages where the instrumentation is notably melodic and beautiful.

The second movement, which is of a pastorale character, is decidedly original in treatment. No violins are used in the orchestra, but many exquisite effects are gained by the other instruments which support the solo violin, especially by the wood wind in several dainty passages.

The last movement is an elaborate writing, and consists chiefly of variations on the song "Dies irae, dies illa." The passages for the solo violin are uncommonly brilliant and difficult.

After the performance of each movement there were demonstrations of delight from the audience. It was honest applause, too, not due solely to the personal popularity of Mr Loeffler, for in many respects this is the best work of its kind ever written by a resident Boston musician.

Regarding Mr Loeffler's playing only words of most cordial praise are to be said. His performance was at all times artistic and finished. His tone was fascinating in its purity, and fairly dazzling was the brilliancy of his execution in the pyrotechnic passages. It is unnecessary, however, to dilate upon the accomplishments of an artist so well known and so thoroughly appreciated by Bostonians.

The other numbers of yesterday's symphony concert program were: Mozart's symphony in D major, Grieg's suite "Aus Holberg's Zeit" and Dvorak's "Carneval" overture. The latter number was heard here for the first time.

It is one of the most brilliant short orchestral compositions ever written by the distinguished Russian composer who a few years ago took up his residence in America. It is thoroughly modern in style and is notable for the number, variety and brilliancy of its tonal pictures. It is rich in melody, and the orchestration is most elaborate.

The Mozart symphony was splendidly played under the direction of Mr Paur. He seemed to enter thoroughly into the spirit of the composer's work, and gave the audience a clearer idea of the beauties of this lovely symphony than had heretofore been offered.

No less charming was the performance of Grieg's brilliant and delightful suite. Each of the five movements were played with exquisite effect, especially the dainty gavotte which was given with marvelous grace.

The program of the next concert will be composed wholly of selections from the works of Richard Wagner, as follows:

Rienzi .....Overture
Tannhauser .....Elizabeth's aria and prelude
The Flying Dutchman .....Overture
Lohengrin .....Balcony scene and prelude
Die Meistersinger,
Prelude and Walther's preislied
Rheingold .....Procession of the gods
Die Walkure .....Spring song
Siegfried and Die Gotterdammerung,
Waldweben, Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's rock, morning dawn and Rhine journey.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 6, 1895.

The Eleventh Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall.

This is the program of the eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening:

Symphony, D major (K. 504).....Mozart
Divertimento, A minor, for violin and orchestra (MS. first time).....C. M. Loeffler
Suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit".....Grieg
Overture. "Carnival" (first time).....Dvorak

It was a pleasant concert last evening. The program was interesting, the performance was for the most part admirable, and the audience was dismissed at a reasonable hour. The qualification as to the performance is this: the attack was slightly irregular, especially in the symphony.

***

Mr. Loeffler was applauded enthusiastically for his performance and his composition. I can imagine easily an excellent and estimable person, fond of music and learned in the primer of form, saying: "Oh, yes, this divertimento is all very well as a show piece, and Mr. Loeffler played finely, but there is not much in it. No development of thematic material, and the variations in the finale are bizarre." And he would say this in good faith. Now Mr. Loeffler, as it seems to me, has a large sympathy for the modern French and Belgian decadents. He believes in tonal impressions, in effects of color, rather than in conscientious plodding in the sonata ruts. The macabre is not distasteful to him. He likes sharp contrasts. He delights in instrumental experiments. If he sought expression in verbal phrase he would cotton to Verlaine and Moréas and Rimbaud and Retté.

This divertimento shows clearly that Mr. Loeffler has a right to make experiments. There are strange or delightful effects throughout the work: as in the unison of harp and violas in the preambulum, the singularly effective use of muted trumpets in the eclogue, the alternate pizzicati in the finale. The romantic interrupts constantly the severe in the opening movement, as though it protested against the revival of old-fashioned preluding. Beautiful in thought and treatment is the eclogue, where no violins are used. The absence of the biting strings gives one some idea of how Méhul's "Uthal," a one-act opera without fiddles, would finally exasperate the ear. Mr. Loeffler stopped his eclogue in time, or the audience might have uttered the famous cry of Grétry, as he sighed for a chanterelle. "Never mind the color of the movement," says an objector. "How about the thought?" Well, it was not spectacled, it was not dull; it was fresh and soothing and delightful.

Of course, if you see the word eclogue, and then feel a 6—8 rhythm and hear instruments associated with warm landscapes, flocks and herds, and high, indolent clouds, you are pastorally inspired. But without the name, the music might be "The Bride," or "Viola," or "As You Like It." In fact, you cannot in such music separate thought and color. And the color was a rare delight. In his "Carnaval des Morts," where the plain song "Dies Irae" serves as a theme, Mr. Loeffler made a slight incursion into Shudderland; but the absolute security of the violinist allayed any possible fear and smoothed quickly the slightly developed goose-flesh. It is clever, this music; and it is more than clever; it shows imagination. Sometimes you wish that Mr. Loeffler had a little streak of coarseness in his nature; in this finale it would not be amiss. But let us be thankful for the refinement, the curiosity that would fain find new colors, the skill in finding them, and the genuine imagination. To say that it is a creditable work is to talk like a pedagogue. It is, indeed, a fascinating composition, one that pricks suggestion and provokes moods.

And the composer played his difficult part with the accuracy, the brilliancy, the delicacy, and the purity that are so characteristic of him.

***

Interesting, too, was Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, full of blood and leaping in the air and delirious delight. The contrasting andantino is charmingly orchestrated; but has the overture the strength, the swing of the Dvorak of old, before he wrote to English order and made a pilgrimage to Spillville, Iowa? Portions of the suite by Grieg always give pleasure, especially the sarabande and the air. As for the Mozart symphony it is full of beauties. Such music when genius makes the dry bones of formalism live does not suffer if placed next the tonal impressions of the moderns. Such juxtaposition shows in clearest light the worth, the strength, the beauty of each school.

PHILIP HALE.

[73]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 6, 1895.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.—A NEW COMPOSITION BY MR. LOEFFLER, ETC.

The fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartette, which took place on Monday evening last, was a rich and beautiful performance as usual, the chief interest so far as art-work is concerned centering in the A-minor quartette of Beethoven. Between this and Haydn's cheery D major quartette, which ended the evening, was placed a novelty,—namely, a sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, written by Hans Pfitzner. It was played most favorably by Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Schroeder and made a very agreeable impression, for it was found to be well placed upon the instruments, clear in idea and scholarly in development, thus obtaining the approval of musicians and giving pleasure to laymen.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler is more than an accomplished and sterling violinist whose playing does justice to the fine school whose stamp it bears and an intelligent and sympathetic interpreter of other men's music. He is also a composer who writes—or at any rate publishes—little, but who has always something new and individual to say and says it well. What he has heretofore presented to Boston concert audiences has been accepted at once as emanating from a reflective and inventive mind working with broad knowledge and by personal experience through the best technical means of expression. He has now added to the short list already recorded to his credit a "Divertimento" for violin and orchestra, which Mr. Paur placed upon last night's Symphony programme and which won many recalls, in which the favor of the audience was divided between the composer and the executant, for Mr. Loeffler took upon himself the responsibility of the solo part and sustained it with a modest and complete art. The composition consists of three rather brief movements,—a prelude, which begins at once in the solo instrument with a swift and wandering allegro which suggests the temperament of a chaconne, but is interrupted by a graver, quicker episode or two; an eclogue, of bland and pastoral nature, in which no violins are used and wise combinations of the wind instruments give the chief support and coloring; and finally a "Carnival of the Dead," in which bold and striking variations are woven about themes derived from the "Dies Irae" plain song. Mr. Loeffler's peculiarly original bent, observable in the other two movements, is especially evident in this finale, wherein are many contrasts and surprises, as the moods fluctuate from the wild and weird to the grave and imperative or the gentle and sweet. The orchestration of the entire score is characterized by an originality which never descends to eccentricity or makes an effort to be singular, but expresses itself by means which appear as natural as they are new. Particularly to be noted are the episodes for full orchestra and a slower soft digression in the first movement, the two-part song which finds peace in the last movement, the delicate and frequent use of the harp and the many fully scored pages which are both exquisite in their interweaving and rich in their coloring. There is life in all the work and the impression it makes is altogether grateful and encouraging.

There was another new thing on the programme—a "Carnival" overture by Dvorak. One knows pretty well by this time what to expect from any composition which bears that brand. It will have one phrase of great animation and full of musical noise, preferably based upon some foot-joggling melody, and a phrase or two of a milder cast, so that the dreamers in the audience can rhapsodize about love-making in the midst of the hurly-burly or think more prosaically about bucolic souls plodding up and down through riotous revelry. Dvorak gives all this and throws into his score a lot of minor figures of all sorts which one can interpret according to his own knowledge or imagination of carnivalesque appearances and behaviors. The author's skill in instrumentation and his spirited ways are here combined, so that the overture is brisk and sturdy and works up to a clanging and rattling climax at last.

Mozart's symphony in D major, containing no minuet, began the concert and prepared the way admirably for Mr. Loeffler's work, which was followed also advantageously by Grieg's various and delectable suite for strings, "In Holberg's Time."

The performance was generally excellent. In the slow movement of the symphony the playing of the sustained portions was rather dull, heavy and drawing, but in the "Divertimento" the band played with all consideration for their comrade, even that kettle-drummer tempering his percussions with mercy and good sense for once in his life.

It is a pity that Mr. Paur cannot use more judgment in regard to the pause after the first movement of the symphony when that stands at the head of the programme. It is right enough to begin on the dot of the set hour and make the tardy cool their heels and all the rest of them outside while the opening allegro is played. But when the doors are opened again, there is no sense in not waiting until the excluded people can get to their seats. They have been punished already, and there is no reason why the punctual majority should also be punished by having their enjoyment of the beginning of the second movement impaired by the entrance and adjustment of the delayed. It really is not fair.

There is no concert next week, but a week later a programme containing pretty nearly all the things which can be profitably extracted from Wagner will be presented.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 6.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last night at Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphony in D-major, No. 1.....Mozart
Divertimento A-minor.....C. M. Loeffler
Suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit".....Greig
Overture Carnival (first time).....Dvorak

The Mozart symphony calls for no particular mention at this late date; it was very finely and appreciatively played. The Divertimento in A-minor, for violin and orchestra is a credit to Mr. Loeffler; it is built from within outwards, it is filled with ideas, and the working out is truly a development, a growth, and not a mere display of technical knowledge. The first movement is restless gloom alternating with sunlight; it is a strong appeal to the emotions, but the feeling aroused is vague and sombre. The second movement is a fine contrast; it is a pastorale sweet in melody and developed with delightful originality and with the finest art. The orchestration is novel, and most attractive. This movement breathes of fresh air and calmness; it is a Claude landscape, full of sunlight and serenity. The third movement is more formal; the poet has given way to the scientist: there are no swift, sure flashes of beauty, but definitely-prepared-for surprises. The work throughout is finely scored. There is a wise avoidance of showy noise; a fine artistic restraint, in saying less than might be said; the stimulating a feeling of vagueness that the hearer can make definite according to his need of the moment. There is fine art in superabundance. Mr. Loeffler is first and always a lucid thinker, with full control over his emotions; and he is most conscientious. His work is polished to the highest degree with, at times, some loss of broadness. Mr. Loeffler at odd moments, forgets the composer in thinking of the instrument which he plays as beautifully and masterfully, and the skill of the soloist is then a weight on the imaginative flight of the composer. But taken all in all, the Divertimento is a work of rare beauty, a masterpiece of its kind; it is filled with countless beauties, the orchestration is fascinating written by a thorough musician, an original thinker, and an imaginative artist of a special and rare kind. Mr. Loeffler's violin playing was as charming as his composition, and both called forth the most enthusiastic and long-continued applause.

The Grieg suite is antiquity dressed in modern attire. A good, harmless old beau, who danced old tunes because they were young to him, danced them to the sound of a wheezy old clavichord, is made to go through the motions of dancing to the sound of all the technical wonders of a modern orchestra. With all respect to the composer, the old gavottes, sarabands and rigadoons are far better than the imitations for they are sincere in all their stately foolishness or gayety; with Grieg they are affectations. The thing is well done, but it would have been better if left undone. Technically considered the suite is deserving of praise only.

The Dvorak overture is of good solid workmanship; the parts are fitted together with Japanese carefulness, the dovetailing is excellently well concealed under appropriate ornamentation, noise is not wanting, and praise is due to the skill and knowledge of the manufacturer. Mr. Dvorak builds wisely and elaborates artistically, but the majority of the structures he erects are unfurnished and the sign "to be let" stares conspicuously from the Gothic portico.

The next concert, January 19, is devoted to Wagner, and a week's rest is mercifully allowed for strengthening the nerves and forgetting the old masters.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 6, 1895.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Loeffler's Divertimento and the "Carneval" Overture.

Considered in its entirety the eleventh Symphony concert, given last night, was rather uninteresting. It opened with the familiar Mozart symphony in D, in three movements, all of which were delightfully played.

Then came Mr. Loeffler, with his divertimento in A minor, which was given its first hearing. When Mr. Loeffler undertook to write this composition he doubtless knew what he wanted to say musically, and he should be credited with an honest intent, if not with satisfactory results. The composition has little meaning or form, and is wofully lacking in pleasing harmonies. The first movement was rather quaint in places, and the second contained several graceful passages. The last movement, called "Carneval des Morts," is wild and heavy, and when the divertimento is finally finished, one is at a loss to know what it is all about. Mr. Loeffler's execution was almost faultless, as might have been expected, and at the end he was rewarded with a most cordial outburst of applause, which was not silenced until he had bowed his acknowledgments several times.

The Grieg suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit," came as a delightful relief. It was light and harmonious, and was charmingly played.

The overture to Dvorak's "Carneval" was new and proved a strong, musicianly composition. It starts in with the whole orchestra, with a theme which is quite fully developed before many bars have passed. It gradually diminishes until only the strings are heard in some beautiful passages. Then the original theme returns and is elaborately worked out, the overture ending brilliantly, almost where it began.

There will be no concert next Saturday, but that of the week following will be devoted to Wagnerian compositions.

THE BOSTON [illegible]

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 6, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The fourth of the season's series of concerts was given in Union hall last Monday evening. The programme was:

Quartette in A minor, op. 132.....Beethoven
Sonata for piano and 'cello, op. 1.....Pfitzner
Quartette in D, op. 64, No. 5.....Haydn

When great players tackle a problem such as Beethoven's last quartette, the result cannot fail to be interesting, although the music itself may not be called entertaining. The Kneisel players added—if that is possible—to their laurels in their playing of the Beethoven work. While parts of it are wholly transparent and delightful, long stretches of it—particularly the adagio—can be made bearable by only the most perfect mastery in treatment. It had such treatment Monday evening, and close attention and hearty applause were the players' rewards.

The new work by Pfitzner, played by Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Arthur Whiting, struck us as in every sense worthy, but in no sense inspired.

It was excellently played, albeit that Mr. Whiting was at times a trifle less assertive than we would have desired.

The rendering of the fairy-like and brief third movement was ideal, and aroused real enthusiasm. The remarkable satisfactoriness of Mr. Whiting's method and style of playing were, perhaps, in this movement most clearly shown. Yet we would not be understood as saying that Mr. Whiting's playing of fortissimo passages is not excellent. On the contrary, in his stronger work he gives an impression of thorough command and reserve power. It is simply that his judgment as to the balance of power in the ensemble seemed to us occasionally faulty, and that he always erred toward subordination of the piano, never in the opposite direction.

It goes without saying that the rendering of the Haydn quartette was perfect.

The next concert will take place Jan. 21.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 7, 1895.

The Symphony Concert.

It was probably the similarity of the works given, rather than their performance, that made three quarters of the concert of Saturday seem dry and tame. A symphony by Mozart considerably below the level of the great final three (written in 1788), a composition by Loeffler with very much virtuosity and very little inspiration, and a suite by Grieg in the periwigged vein formed the body of the concert, after which an overture by Dvorak, in the modern style, came with irresistible power. The preceding works may have been generally good in themselves, but an hour and a quarter without a gleam of modern passion or fervor, tended in the direction of dulness; after all we are of our own epoch and most responsive to its language.

Yet the Mozart symphony was all grace and delicacy and was played with absolute clearness and intelligence, and one must recognize the impossibility of limiting the representation of Mozart's symphonic expression forever to the G minor and the Jupiter symphony. Mr. Loeffler received a welcome that must have assured him of his hold upon the popular affection, and his performance of his own Divertimento proved (which needed no proof) his complete mastery of his instrument. He is not in sympathy with stormy passion, and his performance, as well as the composition itself, showed little of Sturm or Drang. There was a Chesterfieldian presentation of great difficulties without the obtrusion of a sign of effort. The first movement pleased the reviewer least, for it gave a free improvisational style such as Bruch used in the first movement of his G minor violin concerto, but without Bruch's poetry or romance. The last movement, with its use of an old church mode as Cantus, was quaint, but by no means as dramatic as its title would indicate. It was called "Carnaval des Morts," but was no more than suavely morbid, the skeletons being done up in dress coats and white kids for the occasion. It was Edgar Allan Poe diluted with Tupper. The movement was almost entirely a genteel reproduction of St. Saens or Berlioz. But it was another matter with the eclogue, the second movement; here the scoring was masterly, and since nothing intense was demanded, the composer was not overweighted.

The omission of violins made the solo instrument all the more impressive. Possibly Mr. Loeffler was led to this by a study of Brahms, who has achieved strong effects without violins (Mehul wrote an entire opera—"Uthal"—without violins), but he deserves credit for the application of this effect in violin concerto, where, so far as the reviewer knows, no master has yet employed it. The carillon-like chief theme, and the pastoral style of the entire movement were commendable, and this part of the work was up to Mr. Loeffler's best vein. The composer-performer was recalled again and again at the close of his work.

Now followed the quaint suite by Grieg "Aus Holberg's Zeit." It gave the string orchestra an opportunity to display their precision and excellent ensemble. It is interesting to find the composer of "Peer Gynt," who usually revels in bizarre touches, holding himself strictly to the old and conservative school in this suite, at times, as in the Gavotte, giving a distinct flavor of Bach. There was a good, clear atmosphere in this work, but there had been so little of piquancy in the preceding numbers that the conservatism came in the wrong place. Yet one must pay tribute to the chaste and pure vein of it all, a whiff from the last century; after all the Trilbys of the present do not wholly abolish the Pamelas of the past, even in music.

But one could not help being more in sympathy with Dvorak's "Carnaval" overture, which received its first Boston performance on this occasion. Here was modern thought and modern orchestration, with all its fervor. The work was bold from the very beginning; full of contrast, yet not slighting the demands of melody, this overture made a splendid impression even upon a first hearing. There were some distinctly Wagnerian touches, the "Tannhaueser Overture" being strongly suggested more than once. The performance was a brilliant one, the violins especially deserving praise, for they were used mercilessly in the highest positions (Berlioz and Wagner have caused the orchestral violins to fulfil solo requirements) yet showed no hesitancy, and gave no suspicion of blurring. The next concert, as if to atone for the general mildness of this, is to consist wholly of Wagnerian numbers. It will take place a week from Saturday, as our orchestral Jasons are this week in search of the golden fleece in our musical suburbs. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 6, 1895.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.—A NEW COMPOSITION BY MR. LOEFFLER, ETC.

The fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartette, which took place on Monday evening last, was a rich and beautiful performance as usual, the chief interest so far as art-work is concerned centering in the A-minor quartette of Beethoven. Between this and Haydn's cheery D major quartette, which ended the evening, was placed a novelty,—namely, a sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, written by Hans Pfitzner. It was played most favorably by Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Schroeder and made a very agreeable impression, for it was found to be well placed upon the instruments, clear in idea and scholarly in development, thus obtaining the approval of musicians and giving pleasure to laymen.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler is more than an accomplished and sterling violinist whose playing does justice to the fine school whose stamp it bears and an intelligent and sympathetic interpreter of other men's music. He is also a composer who writes—or at any rate publishes—little, but who has always something new and individual to say and says it well. What he has heretofore presented to Boston concert audiences has been accepted at once as emanating from a reflective and inventive mind working with broad knowledge and by personal experience through the best technical means of expression. He has now added to the short list already recorded to his credit a "Divertimento" for violin and orchestra, which Mr. Paur placed upon last night's Symphony programme and which won many recalls, in which the favor of the audience was divided between the composer and the executant, for Mr. Loeffler took upon himself the responsibility of the solo part and sustained it with a modest and complete art. The composition consists of three rather brief movements,—a prelude, which begins at once in the solo instrument with a swift and wandering allegro which suggests the temperament of a chaconne, but is interrupted by a graver, quicker episode or two; an eclogue, of bland and pastoral nature, in which no violins are used and wise combinations of the wind instruments give the chief support and coloring; and finally a "Carnival of the Dead," in which bold and striking variations are woven about themes derived from the "Dies Irae" plain song. Mr. Loeffler's peculiarly original bent, observable in the other two movements, is especially evident in this finale, wherein are many contrasts and surprises, as the moods fluctuate from the wild and weird to the grave and imperative or the gentle and sweet. The orchestration of the entire score is characterized by an originality which never descends to eccentricity or makes an effort to be singular, but expresses itself by means which appear as natural as they are new. Particularly to be noted are the episodes for full orchestra and a slower soft digression in the first movement, the two-part song which finds peace in the last movement, the delicate and frequent use of the harp and the many fully scored pages which are both exquisite in their interweaving and rich in their coloring. There is life in all the work and the impression it makes is altogether grateful and encouraging.

There was another new thing on the programme—a "Carnival" overture by Dvorak. One knows pretty well by this time what to expect from any composition which bears that brand. It will have one phrase of great animation and full of musical noise, preferably based upon some foot-joggling melody, and a phrase or two of a milder cast, so that the dreamers in the audience can rhapsodize about love-making in the midst of the hurly-burly or think more prosaically about bucolic souls plodding up and down through riotous revelry. Dvorak gives all this and throws into his score a lot of minor figures of all sorts which one can interpret according to his own knowledge or imagination of carnivalesque appearances and behaviors. The author's skill in instrumentation and his spirited ways are here combined, so that the overture is brisk and sturdy and works up to a clanging and rattling climax at last.

Mozart's symphony in D major, containing no minuet, began the concert and prepared the way admirably for Mr. Loeffler's work, which was followed also advantageously by Grieg's various and delectable suite for strings, "In Holberg's Time."

The performance was generally excellent. In the slow movement of the symphony the playing of the sustained portions was rather dull, heavy and drawling, but in the "Divertimento" the band played with all consideration for their comrade, even that kettle drummer tempering his percussions with mercy and good sense for once in his life.

It is a pity that Mr. Paur cannot use more judgment in regard to the pause after the first movement of the symphony when that stands at the head of the programme. It is right enough to begin on the dot of the set hour and make the tardy cool their heels and all the rest of them outside while the opening allegro is played. But when the doors are opened again, there is no sense in not waiting until the excluded people can get to their seats. They have been punished already, and there is no reason why the punctual majority should also be punished by having their enjoyment of the beginning of the second movement impaired by the entrance and adjustment of the delayed. It really is not fair.

There is no concert next week, but a week later a programme containing pretty nearly all the things which can be profitably extracted from Wagner will be presented.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 6.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last night at Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphony in D-major, No. 1.....Mozart
Divertimento A-minor.....C. M. Loeffler
Suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit".....Grieg
Overture Carnival (first time).....Dvorak

The Mozart symphony calls for no particular mention at this late date; it was very finely and appreciatively played. The Divertimento in A-minor, for violin and orchestra is a credit to Mr. Loeffler; it is built from within outwards, it is filled with ideas, and the working out is truly a development, a growth, and not a mere display of technical knowledge. The first movement is restless gloom alternating with sunlight; it is a strong appeal to the emotions, but the feeling aroused is vague and sombre. The second movement is a fine contrast; it is a pastorale sweet in melody and developed with delightful originality and with the finest art. The orchestration is novel, and most attractive. This movement breathes of fresh air and calmness; it is a Claude landscape, full of sunlight and serenity. The third movement is more formal; the poet has given way to the scientist: there are no swift, sure flashes of beauty, but definitely-prepared-for surprises. The work throughout is finely scored. There is a wise avoidance of showy noise; a fine artistic restraint, in saying less than might be said; the stimulating a feeling of vagueness that the hearer can make definite according to his need of the moment. There is fine art in superabundance. Mr. Loeffler is first and always a lucid thinker, with full control over his emotions; and he is most conscientious. His work is polished to the highest degree with, at times, some loss of broadness. Mr. Loeffler at odd moments, forgets the composer in thinking of the instrument which he plays as beautifully and masterfully, and the skill of the soloist is then a weight on the imaginative flight of the composer. But taken all in all, the Divertimento is a work of rare beauty, a masterpiece of its kind; it is filled with countless beauties, the orchestration is fascinating written by a thorough musician, an original thinker, and an imaginative artist of a special and rare kind Mr. Loeffler's violin playing was as charming as his composition, and both called forth the most enthusiastic and long-continued applause.

The Grieg suite is antiquity dressed in modern attire. A good, harmless old beau, who danced old tunes because they were young to him, danced them to the sound of a wheezy old clavichord, is made to go through the motions of dancing to the sound of all the technical wonders of a modern orchestra. With all respect to the composer, the old gavottes, sarabands and rigadoons are far better than the imitations for they are sincere in all their stately foolishness or gayety; with Grieg they are affectations. The thing is well done, but it would have been better if left undone. Technically considered the suite is deserving of praise only.

The Dvorak overture is of good solid workmanship; the parts are fitted together with Japanese carefulness, the dovetailing is excellently well concealed under appropriate ornamentation, noise is not wanting, and praise is due to the skill and knowledge of the manufacturer. Mr. Dvorak builds wisely and elaborates artistically, but the majority of the structures he erects are unfurnished and the sign "to be let" stares conspicuously from the Gothic portico.

The next concert, January 19, is devoted to Wagner, and a week's rest is mercifully allowed for strengthening the nerves and forgetting the old masters.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 6, 1895.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Loeffler's Divertimento and the "Carneval" Overture.

Considered in its entirety the eleventh Symphony concert, given last night, was rather uninteresting. It opened with the familiar Mozart symphony in D, in three movements, all of which were delightfully played.

Then came Mr. Loeffler, with his divertimento in A minor, which was given its first hearing. When Mr. Loeffler undertook to write this composition he doubtless knew what he wanted to say musically, and he should be credited with an honest intent, if not with satisfactory results. The composition has little meaning or form, and is wofully lacking in pleasing harmonies. The first movement was rather quaint in places, and the second contained several graceful passages. The last movement, called "Carneval des Morts," is wild and heavy, and when the divertimento is finally finished, one is at a loss to know what it is all about. Mr. Loeffler's execution was almost faultless, as might have been expected, and at the end he was rewarded with a most cordial outburst of applause, which was not silenced until he had bowed his acknowledgments several times.

The Grieg suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit," came as a delightful relief. It was light and harmonious, and was charmingly played.

The overture to Dvorak's "Carneval" was new and proved a strong, musicianly composition. It starts in with the whole orchestra, with a theme which is quite fully developed before many bars have passed. It gradually diminishes until only the strings are heard in some beautiful passages. Then the original theme returns and is elaborately worked out, the overture ending brilliantly, almost where it began.

There will be no concert next Saturday, but that of the week following will be devoted to Wagnerian compositions.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 6, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The fourth of the season's series of concerts was given in Union hall last Monday evening. The programme was:

Quartette in A minor, op. 132.....Beethoven
Sonata for piano and 'cello, op. 1.....Pfitzner
Quartette in D, op. 64, No. 5.....Haydn

When great players tackle a problem such as Beethoven's last quartette, the result cannot fail to be interesting, although the music itself may not be called entertaining. The Kneisel players added—if that is possible—to their laurels in their playing of the Beethoven work. While parts of it are wholly transparent and delightful, long stretches of it—particularly the adagio—can be made bearable by only the most perfect mastery in treatment. It had such treatment Monday evening, and close attention and hearty applause were the players' rewards.

The new work by Pfitzner, played by Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Arthur Whiting, struck us as in every sense worthy, but in no sense inspired.

It was excellently played, albeit that Mr. Whiting was at times a trifle less assertive than we would have desired.

The rendering of the fairy-like and brief third movement was ideal, and aroused real enthusiasm. The remarkable satisfactoriness of Mr. Whiting's method and style of playing were, perhaps, in this movement most clearly shown. Yet we would not be understood as saying that Mr. Whiting's playing of fortissimo passages is not excellent. On the contrary, in his stronger work he gives an impression of thorough command and reserve power. It is simply that his judgment as to the balance of power in the ensemble seemed to us occasionally faulty, and that he always erred toward subordination of the piano, never in the opposite direction.

It goes without saying that the rendering of the Haydn quartette was perfect.

The next concert will take place Jan. 21.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 7, 1895.

The Symphony Concert.

It was probably the similarity of the works given, rather than their performance, that made three quarters of the concert of Saturday seem dry and tame. A symphony by Mozart considerably below the level of the great final three (written in 1788), a composition by Loeffler with very much virtuosity and very little inspiration, and a suite by Grieg in the periwigged vein formed the body of the concert, after which an overture by Dvorak, in the modern style, came with irresistible power. The preceding works may have been generally good in themselves, but an hour and a quarter without a gleam of modern passion or fervor, tended in the direction of dulness; after all we are of our own epoch and most responsive to its language.

Yet the Mozart symphony was all grace and delicacy and was played with absolute clearness and intelligence, and one must recognize the impossibility of limiting the representation of Mozart's symphonic expression forever to the G minor and the Jupiter symphony. Mr. Loeffler received a welcome that must have assured him of his hold upon the popular affection, and his performance of his own Divertimento proved (which needed no proof) his complete mastery of his instrument. He is not in sympathy with stormy passion, and his performance, as well as the composition itself, showed little of Sturm or Drang. There was a Chesterfieldian presentation of great difficulties without the obtrusion of a sign of effort. The first movement pleased the reviewer least, for it gave a free improvisational style such as Bruch used in the first movement of his G minor violin concerto, but without Bruch's poetry or romance. The last movement, with its use of an old church mode as Cantus, was quaint, but by no means as dramatic as its title would indicate. It was called "Carnaval des Morts," but was no more than suavely morbid, the skeletons being done up in dress coats and white kids for the occasion. It was Edgar Allan Poe diluted with Tupper. The movement was almost entirely a genteel reproduction of St. Saens or Berlioz. But it was another matter with the eclogue, the second movement; here the scoring was masterly, and since nothing intense was demanded, the composer was not overweighted.

The omission of violins made the solo instrument all the more impressive. Possibly Mr. Loeffler was led to this by a study of Brahms, who has achieved strong effects without violins (Mehul wrote an entire opera—"Uthal"—without violins), but he deserves credit for the application of this effect in violin concerto, where, so far as the reviewer knows, no master has yet employed it. The carillon-like chief theme, and the pastoral style of the entire movement were commendable, and this part of the work was up to Mr. Loeffler's best vein. The composer-performer was recalled again and again at the close of his work.

Now followed the quaint suite by Grieg "Aus Holberg's Zeit." It gave the string orchestra an opportunity to display their precision and excellent ensemble. It is interesting to find the composer of "Peer Gynt," who usually revels in bizarre touches, holding himself strictly to the old and conservative school in this suite, at times, as in the Gavotte, giving a distinct flavor of Bach. There was a good, clear atmosphere in this work, but there had been so little of piquancy in the preceding numbers that the conservatism came in the wrong place. Yet one must pay tribute to the chaste and pure vein of it all, a whiff from the last century; after all the Trilbys of the present do not wholly abolish the Pamelas of the past, even in music.

But one could not help being more in sympathy with Dvorak's "Carnaval" overture, which received its first Boston performance on this occasion. Here was modern thought and modern orchestration, with all its fervor. The work was bold from the very beginning; full of contrast, yet not slighting the demands of melody, this overture made a splendid impression even upon a first hearing. There were some distinctly Wagnerian touches, the "Tannhaueser Overture" being strongly suggested more than once. The performance was a brilliant one, the violins especially deserving praise, for they were used mercilessly in the highest positions (Berlioz and Wagner have caused the orchestral violins to fulfil solo requirements) yet showed no hesitancy, and gave no suspicion of blurring. The next concert, as if to atone for the general mildness of this, is to consist wholly of Wagnerian numbers. It will take place a week from Saturday, as our orchestral Jasons are this week in search of the golden fleece in our musical suburbs. LOUIS C. ELSON.

[74]

...ton Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 7, 1895.

...ic Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last Saturday evening was from the following programme:

Mozart: Symphony in D major, No. 1.
Adagio.
Andante.
Finale: Presto.
C. M. Loeffler: Divertimento in A minor, for Violin and Orchestra (MS.) (First time.)
I. Preambule.
II. Eclogue.
III. Carnaval des morts.
Grieg: Suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit."
Dvorak: Overture, "Carneval." (First time.)

The Mozart symphony, one of the most characteristic of the master, was delightfully played and proved a gratifying and refreshing draft from the purest wells of music undefiled. Taken together with the Grey suite, "In Holberg's Time," a clever and pleasing imitation of the old forms of music, with sarabande and rigodon, it furnished a setting of fine antique elegance in which to frame the extremely modern music of the two other numbers of the well-balanced programme, Mr. Loeffler's ultra-impressionistic divertisements and Dvorak's splendidly sensuous "Carneval" overture. As the work of a resident artist Mr. Loeffler's suite exacted special interest and was listened to with warm sympathy and received with loud plaudits, the composer being recalled several times after the triumphant performance of his newest concert piece. Like its predecessors heard in these concerts, it is of a dainty, wayward grace and gossamer texture, and somewhat too shifting, vague and indistinct of purpose for instant comprehension by the "general"—of course intentionally so, for many passages occur where the meaning becomes straightforward and clear and easily understood, and the accompanying effects of the orchestration are sufficiently to the popular liking to leave as the total impression one of pleasure. But the opening movement or "preambule" is almost formless fiddling—that is, apparently merely a picture of a violin virtuoso preluding as if alone and practising over and over the tricks and feats and graces of the craft—most ably and subtly executed, of course, with Mr. Loeffler as soloist presented for public entertainment, however, such music reminds one of the story of the Chinese embassy's enjoying most at the grand opera the preliminary tuning up. The second part, named "gelogue," conveys a deliciously pastoral suggestiveness according with its elegant title, as fitful in purpose as a light summer breeze laden with field flowers' fragrance and as changeable in direction as yellow butterflies on the wing in the sunshine. After this genial and ethereal fancy the "Carnaval des morts" with its heavily scored introduction on the "Dus Iral" seems rather too startlingly and rudely uncongruous even for an acknowledged "advertisements." But the reminiscences of Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre" cropping out is not the only suggestion of the dull clatter of the skeletons in the charnel house—the tonal color and atmosphere on the instrumentation is somehow made stifling, stuffy, flat, not to say fetid, and disagreeable, as utterly deprived of the essential charm of music as the interior of a well-whitewashed and cemented family vault. It is needless to say that Mr. Loeffler's skill, scholarship, modish tastes, and virtuosity are always in evidence throughout his odd, capricious combination of solo reverie and broad effectism for orchestra, but it is mainly, for all but musicians, of the stuff that dreams are made of. Grief's piece immediately following and Doorck's after it. And the effect of getting into fresh air and natural daylight again,—the innocent enjoyment there is for the public in clear, melodic phrases and emphatic rythmes, with some charm—unstrained and unforced, some sense, some true power as well as technical accomplishments.

There will be no rehearsal or concert by the Symphony Orchestra this week. The twelfth rehearsal and concert will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 18 and 19. The programme will be taken exclusively from the compositions of Wagner, including overtures to Reenzo and The Flying Dutchman, Elizabeth's ava and prelude to act 3 from Tanuhauser, balcony scene and prelude act 3 from Sohengrin, and selections from Die Meistersinger, Rheingold, Die Walküre, Siegfried and Die Götterdämmeruy.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 8. Januar 1895.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur gab gestern Abend in der Academy of Music ein großes Konzert unter Mitwirkung der Piano-Virtuosin Frl. Adele aus der Ohe, welches den Besuchern großen Genuß bereitete und zu den besten Konzerten dieses berühmten Orchesters gezählt werden muß. Es wurde Beethovens siebente Symphonie gespielt, deren Schönheiten von dem Orchester in meisterhafter Weise zum Ausdruck gebracht wurden; ferner Mendelssohns Musik zum „Sommernachtstraum", wobei die Vorzüglichkeit der Streich- und Holzblas-Instrumente des Orchesters zur vollen Geltung kamen und eine neue Ouverture „Carneval" von Dvorak, eine sehr interessante und packende Composition. Frl. aus der Ohe legte durch den Vortrag des Pianokonzertes von Schuman wiederum den Beweis ihrer Meisterschaft in Technik, Ton und poetischer Auffassung ab.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, JAN 9, 1895.

...ymphony Orchestra in Washington.

WASHINGTON, Jan 8—This was Wagner night with the Boston symphony orchestra, and the program was an admirably selected one and rendered as ... the symphony orchestra can. De... the crowd and it rained and ... incessantly all the evening, the ... was crowded with a very fashion... audience. The program included ... from "Rienzi," "Tannhauser," ... Dutchman," "Lohengrin," ... "Rheingold," "Die ... Siegfried" and "Die Gotter... The soloists were Miss ... and Mr Anton Schott.

The Leader.

JANUARY, 1895.

The Symphony concert in memory of Rubinstein was a weariness and a disappointment. Two works of the dead master were played: the "Ocean" symphony, and three additional movements, and the Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor. Rubinstein was a daring and all-attempting genius but in his large works he always fell far below his ideal. The "Ocean" symphony is a beautiful work but the additional movements do not improve it, and one of these movements, the second, sadly suggests the most vulgar kind of programme music. Imagine a man of Rubinstein's talents trying to represent a thunder storm in music! Not his impressions of a storm, please understand, but the real rain, thunder and lightning! "Bright lightning flashes in the piccolo-flute, flutes and clarinets;" "chromatic passages in the strings and wind, representing the moaning of the wind;" "every item in a storm at sea finds its musical counterpart here." These quotations are from the official programme and I make them to save you from imagining that I am exaggerating. The effect is humorous, and suggests the good old fashioned melodrama where the villan enters to the sound of a thunderstorm heard in the orchestra. I laughed, I could not help it, but I felt humiliated at the same time, and heartily wished that Rubinstein had destroyed this movement as soon as he had written it. The third movement, andante, D major, is very pretty in idea and is charmingly developed, but it adds nothing but length to the symphony. It is my conviction that Rubinstein is at his best in his smaller works, and I am sorry that some of these flawless little gems did not appear on the programme.

The piano part in the concerto was played by Mrs. Ernest Lent who has skilful fingers, but who plays heavily and not always clearly and who never succeeded in reaching up to the height of Rubinstein's ideas. It was almost painful to witness her exertions, and why she was selected, while we have so many better players in our city, is a problem that I cannot solve.

The third Kneisel concert was dull. The Mendelssohn Quartet, No. 1 in D major, has ceased to be interesting; it is affected, permeated with sweet unmeaning sentimentalism and rises like an unwelcome Banquo's ghost at the festival of modern music. Another item on the programme was a Brahms quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola and 'cello. Its great merit was that it allowed Mr. Leon Pourtau of the symphony orchestra to appear in chamber music. Mr. Pourtau is a master of the clarinet, the tones he produces are always clear and beautiful and of the very finest quality; he plays without effort, and is technically so proficient that difficulties seem commonplaces under his fingers. It was a delight to hear him. The gem of the concert, however, was the great Beethoven piano trio in B-flat, with Mr. Carl Baermann as interpreter. In my last letter I gave you my opinion of Mr. Baermann and I do not intend to repeat myself; but he is really the ideal Beethoven interpreter, and I do not know which to admire most his beautiful touch or the fine artistic broadness of his interpretation. He gives us the utmost finish, but broadness of conception is not sacrificed in minuteness of details, all going towards the making of a perfect harmonious whole. The beautiful work was beautifully played.

Boston Commonwealth.

DECEMBER 15, 1894

On Monday evening, the Kneisel Quartet gave the third Concert of their series at Union Hall. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's D Major Quartet (No. 1), Beethoven's piano trio in B flat Major with Mr. Carl Baermann at the piano, and Brahms's Quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola and cello. The Mendelssohn quartet had the right purée quality wherewith a feast should begin: not highly inspired but graceful in form, fluent and pleasing, especially when played with such perfection of style. It gave the proper perspection (if we may audaciously mix metaphors) to the splendid Beethoven trio. Mr. Baermann was at his best, and that is very high praise of one whose Beethoven best is almost unequalled. The heavenly andante cantabile will not be soon forgotten by those who heard it. In the final movement there was one short period of slight confusion, owing perhaps to Mr. Baermann's unaccented legato phrasing. Mr. Leon Pourtau played the clarinet part in the delightful Brahms's Quintet, and such clarinet playing deserves a pæan of praise. What might we not say about the chalumeau register! Those who think Brahms only intellectual should remember the adagio of this glorious work! The artists all shared and deserved the hearty applause of the large audience.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 11.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 11, 1895.

EVERYTHING WAS WAGNER'S.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Performance in New York Last Night.

(Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.)

NEW YORK, Jan. 10, 1895. Wagner was the sole composer represented upon the programme of the concert given this evening in the Metropolitan by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Evidently an attempt had been made to exhibit the art life of the master, from the cradle to the grave. Every period in the development of his genius, and every phase of his fecund imagination was displayed in some example, covering as they did "Rienzi," "Der Fliegende Hollaender," "Lohengrin," "Tannhauser," "Die Meistersinger" and the "Nibelungen" series.

The performance was worthy of the programme. The prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" was not as clear as it would have been had the tempo not been so extremely fast, for, though the technique of the organization, taken as a body, is equal to anything, an air of breathless agitation characterized the excerpt.

On the other hand, the prelude to the third act of "Tannhauser" was a perfect example of poetic pathos, and the prelude from "Die Meistersinger"—again the third act—was a marvel of tonal color and grace. The overture to "Rienzi," too, was excellently played, notwithstanding a "quack" in the brass.

Mme. Nordica sang the "Dich, Heure Halle," with magnificent breadth. The number was the most perfect in performance of any during the evening, for it breathed a spirit of exalted passion.

The excerpt from "Lohengrin"—the balcony music—was rather too dreamy, for it was almost inaudible.

Mr. Anton Schott made a strident reappearance in Wagner's "Preislied" and the "Fruhlingslied" from "Die Walkure" and delighted many of the audience.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 7, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last Saturday evening was from the following programme:

Mozart Symphony in D major, No. 1.
Adagio.
Andante.
Finale: Presto.
C. M. Loeffler: Divertimento in A minor, for Violin and Orchestra (MS.) (First time.)
I. Preambule.
II. Ectogue.
III. Carnaval des morts.
Grieg: Suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit."
Dvorak: Overture, "Carneval." (First time.)

The Mozart symphony, one of the most characteristic of the master, was delightfully played and proved a gratifying and refreshing draft from the purest wells of music undefiled. Taken together with the Grey suite, "In Holberg's Time," a clever and pleasing imitation of the old forms of music, with sarabande and rigodon, it furnished a setting of fine antique elegance in which to frame the extremely modern music of the two other numbers of the well-balanced programme, Mr. Loeffler's ultra-impressionistic divertisements and Dvorak's splendidly sensuous "Carneval" overture. As the work of a resident artist Mr. Loeffler's suite exacted special interest and was listened to with warm sympathy and received with loud plaudits, the composer being recalled several times after the triumphant performance of his newest concert piece. Like its predecessors heard in these concerts, it is of a dainty, wayward grace and gossamer texture, and somewhat too shifting, vague and indistinct of purpose for instant comprehension by the "general"—of course intentionally so, for many passages occur where the meaning becomes straightforward and clear and easily understood, and the accompanying effects of the orchestration are sufficiently to the popular liking to leave as the total impression one of pleasure. But the opening movement or "preambule" is almost formless fiddling—that is, apparently merely a picture of a violin virtuoso preluding as if alone and practising over and over the tricks and feats and graces of the craft—most ably and subtly executed, of course, with Mr. Loeffler as soloist presented for public entertainment, however, such music reminds one of the story of the Chinese embassy's enjoying most at the grand opera the preliminary tuning up. The second part, named "gelogue," conveys a deltciously pastoral suggestiveness according with its elegant title, as fitful in purpose as a light summer breeze laden with field flowers' fragrance and as changeable in direction as yellow butterflies on the wing in the sunshine. After this genial and ethereal fancy the "Carnaval des morts" with its heavily scored introduction on the "Dus Iral" seems rather too startlingly and rudely uncongruous even for an acknowledged "advertisements." But the reminiscences of Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre" cropping out is not the only suggestion of the dull clatter of the skeletons in the charnel house—the tonal color and atmosphere on the instrumentation is somehow made stifling, stuffy, flat, not to say fetid, and disagreeable, as utterly deprived of the essential charm of music as the interior of a well-whitewashed and cemented family vault. It is needless to say that Mr. Loeffler's skill, scholarship, modish tastes, and virtuosity are always in evidence throughout his odd, capricious combination of solo reverie and broad effectism for orchestra, but it is mainly, for all but musicians, of the stuff that dreams are made of. Grief's piece immediately following and Doorok's after it. And the effect of getting into fresh air and natural daylight again,—the innocent enjoyment there is for the public in clear, melodic phrases and emphatic rythmes, with some charm—unstrained and unforced, some sense, some true power as well as technical accomplishments.

There will be no rehearsal or concert by the Symphony Orchestra this week. The twelfth rehearsal and concert will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 18 and 19. The programme will be taken exclusively from the compositions of Wagner, including overtures to Reenzo and The Flying Dutchman, Elizabeth's ava and prelude to act 3 from Tannhauser, balcony scene and prelude act 3 from Sohengrin, and selections from Die Meistersinger, Rheingold, Die Walküre, Siegfried and Die Götterdämmeruy.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 8. Januar 1895.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur gab gestern Abend in der Academy of Music ein großes Konzert unter Mitwirkung der Piano-Virtuosin Frl. Adele aus der Ohe, welches den Besuchern großen Genuß bereitete und zu den besten Konzerten dieses berühmten Orchesters gezählt werden muß. Es wurde Beethovens siebente Symphonie gespielt, deren Schönheiten von dem Orchester in meisterhafter Weise zum Ausdruck gebracht wurden; ferner Mendelssohns Musik zum „Sommernachtstraum", wobei die Vorzüglichkeit der Streich- und Holzblas-Instrumente des Orchesters zur vollen Geltung kamen und eine neue Ouverture „Carneval" von Dvorak, eine sehr interessante und packende Composition. Frl. aus der Ohe legte durch den Vortrag des Piano-Konzertes von Schuman wiederum den Beweis ihrer Meisterschaft in Technik, Ton und poetischer Auffassung ab.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, JAN 9, 1895.

Symphony Orchestra in Washington.

WASHINGTON, Jan 8—This was Wagner night with the Boston symphony orchestra, and the program was an admirably selected one and rendered as only the symphony orchestra can. Despite the night, and it rained and snowed incessantly all the evening, the hall was crowded with a very fashionable audience. The program included selections from "Rienzi," "Tannhauser," "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," "Rheingold," "Die Walkure," "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung." The soloists were Miss [illegible]herra and Mr Anton Schott.

The Symphony concert in memory of Rubinstein was a weariness and a disappointment. Two works of the dead master were played: the "Ocean" symphony, and three additional movements, and the Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor. Rubinstein was a daring and all-attempting genius but in his large works he always fell far below his ideal. The "Ocean" symphony is a beautiful work but the additional movements do not improve it, and one of these movements, the second, sadly suggests the most vulgar kind of programme music. Imagine a man of Rubinstein's talents trying to represent a thunder storm in music! Not his impressions of a storm, please understand, but the real rain, thunder and lightning! "Bright lightning flashes in the piccolo-flute, flutes and clarinets;" "chromatic passages in the strings and wind, representing the moaning of the wind;" "every item in a storm at sea finds its musical counterpart here." These quotations are from the official programme and I make them to save you from imagining that I am exaggerating. The effect is humorous, and suggests the good old fashioned melodrama where the villan enters to the sound of a thunderstorm heard in the orchestra. I laughed, I could not help it, but I felt humiliated at the same time, and heartily wished that Rubinstein had destroyed this movement as soon as he had written it. The third movement, andante, D major, is very pretty in idea and is charmingly developed, but it adds nothing but length to the symphony. It is my conviction that Rubinstein is at his best in his smaller works, and I am sorry that some of these flawless little gems did not appear on the programme.

The piano part in the concerto was played by Mrs. Ernest Lent who has skilful fingers, but who plays heavily and not always clearly and who never succeeded in reaching up to the height of Rubinstein's ideas. It was almost painful to witness her exertions, and why she was selected, while we have so many better players in our city, is a problem that I cannot solve.

The third Kneisel concert was dull. The Mendelssohn Quartet, No. 1 in D major, has ceased to be interesting; it is affected, permeated with sweet unmeaning sentimentalism and rises like an unwelcome Banquo's ghost at the festival of modern music. Another item on the programme was a Brahms quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola and 'cello. Its great merit was that it allowed Mr. Leon Pourtau of the symphony orchestra to appear in chamber music. Mr. Pourtau is a master of the clarinet, the tones he produces are always clear and beautiful and of the very finest quality; he plays without effort, and is technically so proficient that difficulties seem commonplaces under his fingers. It was a delight to hear him. The gem of the concert, however, was the great Beethoven piano trio in B-flat, with Mr. Carl Baermann as interpreter. In my last letter I gave you my opinion of Mr. Baermann and I do not intend to repeat myself; but he is really the ideal Beethoven interpreter, and I do not know which to admire most his beautiful touch or the fine artistic broadness of his interpretation. He gives us the utmost finish, but broadness of conception is not sacrificed in minuteness of details, all going towards the making of a perfect harmonious whole. The beautiful work was beautifully played.

Boston Commonwealth.

DECEMBER 15, 1894

On Monday evening, the Kneisel Quartet gave the third Concert of their series at Union Hall. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's D Major Quartet (No. 1), Beethoven's piano trio in B flat Major with Mr. Carl Baermann at the piano, and Brahms's Quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola and cello. The Mendelssohn quartet had the right purée quality wherewith a feast should begin: not highly inspired but graceful in form, fluent and pleasing, especially when played with such perfection of style. It gave the proper perspection (if we may audaciously mix metaphors) to the splendid Beethoven trio. Mr. Baermann was at his best, and that is very high praise of one whose Beethoven best is almost unequalled. The heavenly andante cantabile will not be soon forgotten by those who heard it. In the final movement there was one short period of slight confusion, owing perhaps to Mr. Baermann's unaccented legato phrasing. Mr. Leon Pourtau played the clarinet part in the delightful Brahms's Quintet, and such clarinet playing deserves a pæan of praise. What might we not say about the chalumeau register! Those who think Brahms only intellectual should remember the adagio of this glorious work! The artists all shared and deserved the hearty applause of the large audience.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 11.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 11, 1895.

EVERYTHING WAS WAGNER'S.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Performance in New York Last Night.

(Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.)

NEW YORK, Jan. 10, 1895. Wagner was the sole composer represented upon the programme of the concert given this evening in the Metropolitan by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Evidently an attempt had been made to exhibit the art life of the master, from the cradle to the grave. Every period in the development of his genius, and every phase of his fecund imagination was displayed in some example, covering as they did "Rienzi," "Der Fliegende Hollaender," "Lohengrin," "Tannhauser," "Die Meistersinger" and the "Nibelungen" series.

The performance was worthy of the programme. The prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" was not as clear as it would have been had the tempo not been so extremely fast, for, though the technique of the organization, taken as a body, is equal to anything, an air of breathless agitation characteried the excerpt.

On the other hand, the prelude to the third act of "Tannhauser" was a perfect example of poetic pathos, and the prelude from "Die Meistersinger"—again the third act—was a marvel of tonal color and grace. The overture to "Rienzi," too, was excellently played, notwithstanding a "quack" in the brass.

Mme. Nordica sang the "Dich, Heure Halle," with magnificent breadth. The number was the most perfect in performance of any during the evening, for it breathed a spirit of exalted passion.

The excerpt from "Lohengrin"—the balcony music—was rather too dreamy, for it was almost inaudible.

Mr. Anton Schott made a strident reappearance in Wagner's "Preislied" and the "Fruhlingslied" from "Die Walkure" and delighted many of the audience.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1895.

The Kneisel Quartet gave a concert in Union Hall December 31. The program was as follows: Beethoven's A minor quartet, op. 132; a novelty, a sonata for 'cello and piano, op. 1, composed by Pfitzner, of Frankfort, and played by Messrs. Schroeder and Arthur Whiting, and a quartet in G major by Haydn. I regret to say that I cannot find anywhere an adequate account of the sonata. The reviewers were at the production of "Westward Ho."

Pleasing concerts were given last week by the Dartmouth College Glee Club and Mr. Clayton Johns. The latter was assisted by Miss Franklin, Miss Little and Mr. Gebhard.

* * *

The program of the Eleventh Symphony concert, given the 5th, was as follows:

Symphony in D major (K. 504).....Mozart
Divertimento in A minor, for violin and orchestra.....C. M. Loeffler
Preambule.
Eclogue.
Carnaval des morts.
(Ms.) First time.
Suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit".....Grieg
Overture, "Carnaval".....Dvorák
(First time.)

Mr. Loeffler's composition is one of genuine interest. The first movement opens immediately with the solo violin in loose figuration, a sort of perpetuum mobile against a pedal, and this apparently rambling figure is in character the nub of the movement, although there are melodic episodes of tender, melancholy or sturdy nature. There is an example of peculiar instrumentation in episode molti tranquillo, where the harp and a few violas flow in unison against the song of the solo violin while a horn sustains.

No violins are used in the eclogue. There are three flutes, two clarinets, two bassoons English horn, two horns, two trumpets, harp, kettledrums, and the usual strings with the exception noted. This movement is delightful in melody and in color. There is, for instance, a remarkable effect, due chiefly to the use of stopped trumpets. Against these effective, often strange combinations of color the solo violin stands out in bold relief.

The finale is a series of variations on the plainsong "Dies irae, dies illa." The theme is declaimed moderato and then treated somewhat after the fashion of a passacaglia. The second verse of the plainsong is used later. The cadenza is rather a series of modulatory passages than a formal cadenza.

Mr. Loeffler played with accuracy, and the peculiar brilliancy and purity that are peculiar to him. The solo part swarms with difficulties, but he played it with an air of provoking ease. He was applauded most enthusiastically.

* * *

Mr. Loeffler is a decadent. He believes in tonal impressions rather than in thematic development. How fastidious he is in his search after the proper, the one, the felicitous word! Do you know Jean Moréas? Or "L'Imitation de Notre-Dame la Lune," by Jules Laforgue? When I hear music by Mr. Loeffler I think of such decadents.

Let me explain more fully, or more obscurely. There is a strange story, entitled "The Sixth Marriage of Blue Beard," and the man that dreamed it is Henri de Régnier. You must know that Blue Beard left a widow, Héliade, whom he loved dearly: the Shepherdess, who came to meet the wedding procession, clothed in naught but her loveliness, for she was poor and had no robe worthy her lord. Naked she was wedded to him, and she was sacred to him because he had slain his other wives on account of their robes. Each robe was in a room reserved for it in the great castle. Each room was odorous with a particular perfume. The furniture was in harmony with robe and perfume. And Blue Beard would spend hours going from room to room, stroking his long beard with its tinges of silver. The solitary Lover went still further in his melancholy pleasure:—

"Far-off and fitting music came sighing through the wall. About the white robe (O tender Emmène, it was thine!) crept the slowness of the languishing viol; near the blue (which was thine, O naïve Poncette!) the hautboy sang; by the side of thine, melancholy Blismode, a lute sighed because robe was mauve and eyes were always lowered; a fife laughed, and oh how shrill! to remind that thou wert an enigma, in thy green and choral robe. Tharsile! but the instruments sounded together when the master visited the robe of Alède, a strange robe, which always seemed to clothe a phantom; then the music whispered low because Blue Beard had loved this Alède with a mighty love. She was the twin of Sister Anne; you would have taken one for the other, and he yearned for a new wife who would resemble the two, because they are six in number, these shades that wander at night about the olden ruin, and it is the last one only who is clothed."

It was Mr. Loeffler who should have arranged this music for Blue Beard. For he has the delicate sentiment, the curiosity of the hunter after nuances, the love of the macabre, the cool fire that consumes and is more deadly than fierce, panting flame.

Mr. Loeffler is more than an experimenter in color. He is a man of refined and fantastic imagination. He has set some of Verlaine's verses to music; voice, piano and viola obligato. And the viola is the one instrument that would sympathize with Verlaine.

Do you wish me to tell you about the variations on the "Dies iræ"? You must hear them for yourself. Would it be of benefit if you knew that the theme was first handled thus and in the next place so! If you are adamant in the matter of form you will undoubtedly exclaim, "Very clever and superbly played." And if that is all you say you never will understand Mr. Loeffler, for to him there is no absolute proof that 2×2—4.

* * *

Nor did the juxtaposition of Mozart and Loeffler injure either. In keeping, too, were the air and the saraband from Grieg's suite. Then, with crash and fury and bursting blood vessels, the music of Dvorák dismissed the audience that was fired with her bacchantic fury before she told them the full purport of the tender andantino, which is as though lovers sighed and whispered in a dimly lighted cul-de-sac, while the Carnival torrent swept impetuously through the neighboring thoroughfare. PHILIP HALE.

SOUR ON PAUR.

MR. HENDERSON wrote the following in the "Times" last Sunday:

"Be ye faithful unto death" is the motto of the Boston scribes. This is how Philip Hale rejoices in the "Journal" that Boston got Paur instead of Richter:

"Here is a remarkable instance of narrowness, if the statements are true. Hans Richter loved Wagner so that he therefore felt obliged to hate Rubinstein. He has prohibited the members of the Philharmonic Orchestra, of which he is the leader, from playing at the Rubinstein Festival to be held at the Singakademie, and Rubinstein's works are not allowed on the programs of the Philharmonic concerts. This deplorable attitude is the cause for much comment in musical circles in Vienna.

"It is in many ways an excellent thing for Boston that Hans Richter did not succeed Mr. Nikisch as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the first place, he is in his fifty-second year, and good judges say that he is careless in drill and slovenly at times in his public conducting. He is an ultra Wagnerite, 'sot' in his notions, and narrow in his ideas concerning modern music. He is a fine example of the old saying, 'No bigot like a radical.'

"When, in the natural course of events Mr. Paur decides to return to his fatherland—for it is not likely that he looks forward to a family vault in Jamaica Plain—why should we not have a Frenchman, an Italian, a Russian, a Swede, or, better yet, an American, for a leader? Why do otherwise sensible and reasoning creatures believe that music was a special revelation to the Germans, and that German conductors are born with batons in their hands? There is no more ridiculous fetich in the world than this slavish and unreasonable adoration of the German Muse."

Yes, but there is a cloud no bigger perhaps than a man's hand on the musical horizon. There is an undercurrent of grumbling in Boston about Mr. Paur and his cast iron beat, and the grumbling is done by the music critics. Mr. Hale's effusion, quoted above, might profitably be read between the lines. Whether Mr. Paur is or is not a great conductor is not the question now. What principally concerns Mr. Higginson is that the Boston Symphony orchestra has unquestionably lost some of its prestige during the past year.

Baltimore American
AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD, AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

"WE BUILD."

THURSDAY, JANUARY 10, 1895.

WAGNERIAN MUSIC.

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Paur Conductor.

The large and distinguished audience which the Boston Symphony Orchestra never fails to draw here, shows in what appreciation this splendid organization is held by Baltimore music lovers. At the concert last night in Music Hall the audience was not only very large but warm and enthusiastic as well.

The program offered was supposed to make it a special event, inasmuch as it was drawn entirely from Wagner, and not alone the program but the soloist previously added to its character in that regard. The soloists who appeared were Miss Elsa Kuttscherra and Anton Schott, both intimately associated with the Wagnerian music drama in their artistic careers. The program was not the most satisfactorily selected or arranged in the world; it was rather long, and by no means homogenous, but the audience seemed very grateful for it, even as it was, as Wagner, unfortunately, does not figure with great frequency in Mr. Paur's programs. It increased in interest, however, during its progress, the last half being infinitely superior to the first. The concert opened with the overture to "Rienzi," the first of Wagner's works to achieve any lasting fame, although it was his third opera. It is written in very conventional style, and scarcely, if at all, foreshadows the Wagner that was to be. It was followed by two excerpts from Tannhauser, Elizabeth's aria, "Dich Theure Halle," sung by Miss Kutscherra, and the prelude to the third act. Miss Kutscherra sings in good style, has good enunciation and dramatic ability, but her voice lacks in sonority and sweetness. The superb overture to the "Flying Dutchman" was splendidly played. Its restless, impassioned movement tells of storm and tumult, and is thrilling in its effect. After the balcony scene from Act II, in which Miss Kutscherra sang Elsa's solo with artistic effect, and the prelude to Act II, from Lohengrin, were two excerpts from Act III and the Prize Song, the latter introducing the other soloist, Herr Schott. He is a Wagner tenor par excellence, and he still retains much of his former freshness and beauty of voice. His singing of the beautiful Prize Song and his very genial manner won for him five enthusiastic recalls, but he did not respond with an encore. He also sang the Spring song from the "Walkure," a number which suits him extremely well, and which he delivered in a most dramatic and artistic manner. The performance of the Prelude to Act III. of "The Meistersinger" was one of the most enjoyable numbers on the program.

The orchestra played "The Procession of the Gods," from "Rheingold" and the lovely Siegfried "Waldweben" than which nothing more suggestive of pristine nature has ever been written, finely. The concert closed with Siegfried's "Passage to Brunhilde's Rock," "Morning Dawn" and the "Rhine Journey" from Gotterdammerung, arranged by Hans Richter to form a connected whole, an orchestral concert piece.

Mr. Paur conducted with much enthusiasm and vigor; the orchestra played with great brio, but was militated against by the weather, to which, no doubt, was due the considerable false intonation noticed. Mr. Kneisel, the concert master, did full justice to his lovely obligato in the "Waldweben," and the whole concert was a delightful affair.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 12, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert in the series by the Boston Symphony orchestra comes late this year on account of the inability of the managers to secure a date at the Academy of Music. It will be given this evening and the programme was rehearsed yesterday in the presence of a somewhat larger audience than that of the November concert. Mr. Paur departed from his precedent and gave a bill that was two and one-quarter hours' long. Some of the programmes of this orchestra have been less than an hour and a half in length. The leading number, in position and consequence, is Beethoven's Seventh symphony. Mr. Paur's reading of this work is not so smooth as that of Mr. Thomas, who has played it on the same stage many a time, but there was a force, a dash, an impetus that are rarely to be heard. These qualities are usually secured at the expense of finish, and it was so yesterday. The brasses had too much liberty and some of the accents were harsh. But the reading emphasized the wonderful vitality of the symphony. Genius has been variously described as patience, aptitude, study and the art of taking pains; but Beethoven, like Handel, Michael Angelo and Shakspeare, showed that a plenitude of life was one of its attributes. This is the writing of a man with a big brain, a big heart, sound stomach and strong nerves. There is a splendid animalism in it. And, unless it may be the Fifth symphony, there is no composition that has so large a reach of meaning. It is a conspectus of the whole art musical. Tragedy and comedy roar and laugh through it, the theme dances and anon it plods as heavily as a mourner to the tomb. Nothing has been written that surpasses the scherzo in gaiety and freshness, and the hoarse grunts of the bassoons—an Aristophenean croaking chorus—are employed humorously, yet with cunning contrast, to make the play of the violins and sparkle of the wood wind the lighter and finer. There is one modulation in this movement that ties the trio over to the repeat of the scherzo proper, that in thrilling beauty has no likeness in the literature of the orchestra—the change from D to F; only a few notes, but notes that mean as much as some epics. The calm and sunshiny dignity of the opening, the sad beauty of the allegretto and the wh iri of the finale, where one might fancy that Beethoven was trying to describe the rush of the planets around the sun, "tumbling steep in the uncontinented deep," are in fine contrast with the brilliancy of the scherzo.

Adele Aus Der Ohe was the soloist, and she played the Schumann A minor concerto, a work of mind and soundness, for Schumann is the most intellectual of composers, and for that reason, maybe, one of the most melancholy. Miss Aus Der Ohe played this number clearly, correctly, with even a touch of romance, but her style is that of health and robustness. She hears music as one imagines that she sees life, as a perfectly normal manifestation, and her fingers gambol over an allegro more willingly than they lag through the measures of a largo. She plays much as she did when she was last in Brooklyn, and received as hearty a welcome. She was called out three or four times, but there were other pieces on the programme, and she wisely declined to tire herself or the audience with a repetition of the concerto. The "Midsummer Night's Dream" suite, lacking the vocal parts, was played with sympathy, yet with muscle. It was a well fed crowd of fairies that gamboled through the overture, and something more than flower nectar was the food, too; there was a half suspicion of hot frankfurters. The scherzo and nocturne were somewhat more restrained, but in the wedding march the trombones and cornets had things much their own way. The queer conceit of Saint-Saens that he has formulated into his prelude to "The Deluge" discovered the excellence of the strings, and in the solo part of it, for Mr. Kneisel, that modest young artist gained quite his share of glory. His tone reminds one somewhat of Ysaye's in its clearness and resonance, and when the strings altogether were at work the delightful voice quality was obvious. It is hard to say what an overture means without hearing the work that it preludes, but judging from this exhibit the view taken by the French composer is that the cataclysm which drowned the world was rather a subject for sentimental regret than for surprise and horror.

The closing piece was a work by Dvorak—a Carnival overture, that had not before been played. It is musicianly in its construction, but as wild as a gypsy dance in its inception. Dvorak is another man who carries a great quantity of steam. The "Carnival" is written at high pressure and with an almost barbaric clamor. It suggests a circus coming into town, with a whole procession of red wagons and several live elephants. It is not coarse, however; on the contrary, there are some bits of song for the wood wind, notably for the English horn, that are almost lovely, and in the most swinging and easy of the themes there is a hint of that sadness that seems to pertain to the art of eastern Europe which Mr. Dvorak exemplifies. He is one of the last of men to stand chargeable with thematic peculation, hence the likeness of some of his chromatic runs and ascents to the "Tannhauser" bacchanal may be honestly set down to accident. The orchestra found congenial employment in this overutre, and it brought the concert to a close with a fine sense of exploit. The programme will be repeated under advantageous circumstances to-night, and the next concert will occur in the early part of February.

No Dinner for Mr Paur.

The dinner announced to be given to Conductor Paur of the Boston Symphony orchestra by the Musicians' club this evening, has been postponed and in its place an informal reception will be tendered him at the club rooms from 6 to 7 P. M.

[76]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1895.

The Kneisel Quartet gave a concert in Union Hall December 31. The program was as follows: Beethoven's A minor quartet, op. 132; a novelty, a sonata for 'cello and piano, op. 1, composed by Pfitzner, of Frankfort, and played by Messrs. Schroeder and Arthur Whiting, and a quartet in G major by Haydn. I regret to say that I cannot find anywhere an adequate account of the sonata. The reviewers were at the production of "Westward Ho."

Pleasing concerts were given last week by the Dartmouth College Glee Club and Mr. Clayton Johns. The latter was assisted by Miss Franklin, Miss Little and Mr. Gebhard.

* * *

The program of the Eleventh Symphony concert, given the 5th, was as follows:

Symphony in D major (K. 504).....Mozart
Divertimento in A minor, for violin and orchestra.....C. M. Loeffler
Preambule.
Eclogue.
Carnaval des morts.
(Ms.) First time.
Suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit".....Grieg
Overture, "Carnaval".....Dvorák
(First time.)

Mr. Loeffler's composition is one of genuine interest. The first movement opens immediately with the solo violin in loose figuration, a sort of perpetuum mobile against a pedal, and this apparently rambling figure is in character the nub of the movement, although there are melodic episodes of tender, melancholy or sturdy nature. There is an example of peculiar instrumentation in episode molti tranquillo, where the harp and a few violas flow in unison against the song of the solo violin while a horn sustains.

No violins are used in the eclogue. There are three flutes, two clarinets, two bassoons English horn, two horns, two trumpets, harp, kettledrums, and the usual strings with the exception noted. This movement is delightful in melody and in color. There is, for instance, a remarkable effect, due chiefly to the use of stopped trumpets. Against these effective, often strange combinations of color the solo violin stands out in bold relief.

The finale is a series of variations on the plainsong "Dies irae, dies illa." The theme is declaimed moderato and then treated somewhat after the fashion of a passacaglia. The second verse of the plainsong is used later. The cadenza is rather a series of modulatory passages than a formal cadenza.

Mr. Loeffler played with accuracy, and the peculiar brilliancy and purity that are peculiar to him. The solo part swarms with difficulties, but he played it with an air of provoking ease. He was applauded most enthusiastically.

* * *

Mr. Loeffler is a decadent. He believes in tonal impressions rather than in thematic development. How fastidious he is in his search after the proper, the one, the felicitous word! Do you know Jean Moréas? Or "L'Imitation de Notre-Dame la Lune," by Jules Laforgue? When I hear music by Mr. Loeffler I think of such decadents.

Let me explain more fully, or more obscurely. There is a strange story, entitled "The Sixth Marriage of Blue Beard," and the man that dreamed it is Henri de Régnier. You must know that Blue Beard left a widow, Héliade, whom he loved dearly: the Shepherdess, who came to meet the wedding procession, clothed in naught but her loveliness, for she was poor and had no robe worthy her lord. Naked she was wedded to him, and she was sacred to him because he had slain his other wives on account of their robes. Each robe was in a room reserved for it in the great castle. Each room was odorous with a particular perfume. The furniture was in harmony with robe and perfume. And Blue Beard would spend hours going from room to room, stroking his long beard with its tinges of silver. The solitary Lover went still further in his melancholy pleasure:—

"Far-off and fitting music came sighing through the wall. About the white robe (O tender Emmène, it was thine!) crept the slowness of the languishing viol; near the blue (which was thine, O naive Poncette!) the hautboy sang; by the side of thine, melancholy Blismode, a lute sighed because robe was mauve and eyes were always lowered; a fife laughed, and oh how shrill! to remind that thou wert an enigma, in thy green and choral robe. Tharsile! but the instruments sounded together when the master visited the robe of Alède, a strange robe, which always seemed to clothe a phantom; then the music whispered low because Blue Beard had loved this Alède with a mighty love. She was the twin of Sister Anne; you would have taken one for the other, and he yearned for a new wife who would resemble the two, because they are six in number, these shades that wander at night about the olden ruin, and it is the last one only who is clothed."

It was Mr. Loeffler who should have arranged this music for Blue Beard. For he has the delicate sentiment, the curiosity of the hunter after nuances, the love of the macabre, the cool fire that consumes and is more deadly than fierce, panting flame.

Mr. Loeffler is more than an experimenter in color. He is a man of refined and fantastic imagination. He has set some of Verlaine's verses to music; voice, piano and viola obligato. And the viola is the one instrument that would sympathize with Verlaine.

Do you wish me to tell you about the variations on the "Dies iræ"? You must hear them for yourself. Would it be of benefit if you knew that the theme was first handled thus and in the next place so! If you are adamant in the matter of form you will undoubtedly exclaim, "Very clever and superbly played." And if that is all you say you never will understand Mr. Loeffler, for to him there is no absolute proof that 2×2=4.

* * *

Nor did the juxtaposition of Mozart and Loeffler injure either. In keeping, too, were the air and the saraband from Grieg's suite. Then, with crash and fury and bursting blood vessels, the music of Dvorák dismissed the audience that was fired with her bacchantic fury before she told them the full purport of the tender andantino, which is as though lovers sighed and whispered in a dimly lighted cul-de-sac, while the Carnival torrent swept impetuously through the neighboring thoroughfare. PHILIP HALE.

SOUR ON PAUR.

MR. HENDERSON wrote the following in the "Times" last Sunday:

"Be ye faithful unto death" is the motto of the Boston scribes. This is how Philip Hale rejoices in the "Journal" that Boston got Paur instead of Richter:

"Here is a remarkable instance of narrowness, if the statements are true. Hans Richter loved Wagner so that he therefore felt obliged to hate Rubinstein. He has prohibited the members of the Philharmonic Orchestra, of which he is the leader, from playing at the Rubinstein Festival to be held at the Singakademie, and Rubinstein's works are not allowed on the programs of the Philharmonic concerts. This deplorable attitude is the cause for much comment in musical circles in Vienna.

"It is in many ways an excellent thing for Boston that Hans Richter did not succeed Mr. Nikisch as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the first place, he is in his fifty-second year, and good judges say that he is careless in drill and slovenly at times in his public conducting. He is an ultra Wagnerite, 'sot' in his notions, and narrow in his ideas concerning modern music. He is a fine example of the old saying, 'No bigot like a radical.'

"When, in the natural course of events Mr. Paur decides to return to his fatherland—for it is not likely that he looks forward to a family vault in Jamaica Plain—why should we not have a Frenchman, an Italian, a Russian, a Swede, or, better yet, an American, for a leader? Why do otherwise sensible and reasoning creatures believe that music was a special revelation to the Germans, and that German conductors are born with batons in their hands? There is no more ridiculous fetich in the world than this slavish and unreasonable adoration of the German Muse."

Yes, but there is a cloud no bigger perhaps than a man's hand on the musical horizon. There is an undercurrent of grumbling in Boston about Mr. Paur and his cast iron beat, and the grumbling is done by the music critics. Mr. Hale's effusion, quoted above, might profitably be read between the lines. Whether Mr. Paur is or is not a great conductor is not the question now. What principally concerns Mr. Higginson is that the Boston Symphony orchestra has unquestionably lost some of its prestige during the past year.

Baltimore American
AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD, AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

"WE BUILD."

THURSDAY, JANUARY 10, 1895.

WAGNERIAN MUSIC.

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Paur Conductor.

The large and distinguished audience which the Boston Symphony Orchestra never fails to draw here, shows in what appreciation this splendid organization is held by Baltimore music lovers. At the concert last night in Music Hall the audience was not only very large but warm and enthusiastic as well.

The program offered was supposed to make it a special event, inasmuch as it was drawn entirely from Wagner, and not alone the program but the soloist previously added to its character in that regard. The soloists who appeared were Miss Elsa Kuttscherra and Anton Schott, both intimately associated with the Wagnerian music drama in their artistic careers. The program was not the most satisfactorily selected or arranged in the world; it was rather long, and by no means homogenous, but the audience seemed very grateful for it, even as it was, as Wagner, unfortunately, does not figure with great frequency in Mr. Paur's programs. It increased in interest, however, during its progress, the last half being infinitely superior to the first. The concert opened with the overture to "Rienzi," the first of Wagner's works to achieve any lasting fame, although it was his third opera. It is written in very conventional style, and scarcely, if at all, foreshadows the Wagner that was to be. It was followed by two excerpts from Tannhauser, Elizabeth's aria, "Dich Theure Halle," sung by Miss Kutscherra, and the prelude to the third act. Miss Kutscherra sings in good style, has good enunciation and dramatic ability, but her voice lacks in sonority and sweetness. The superb overture to the "Flying Dutchman" was splendidly played. Its restless, impassioned movement tells of storm and tumult, and is thrilling in its effect. After the balcony scene from Act II, in which Miss Kutscherra sang Elsa's solo with artistic effect, and the prelude to Act II, from Lohengrin, were two excerpts from Act III and the Prize Song, the latter introducing the other soloist, Herr Schott. He is a Wagner tenor par excellence, and he still retains much of his former freshness and beauty of voice. His singing of the beautiful Prize Song and his very genial manner won for him five enthusiastic recails, but he did not respond with an encore. He also sang the Spring song from the "Walkure," a number which suits him extremely well, and which he delivered in a most dramatic and artistic manner. The performance of the Prelude to Act III. of "The Meistersinger" was one of the most enjoyable numbers on the program.

The orchestra played "The Procession of the Gods," from "Rheingold" and the lovely Siegfried "Waldweben" than which nothing more suggestive of pristine nature has ever been written, finely. The concert closed with Siegfried's "Passage to Brunhilde's Rock," "Morning Dawn" and the "Rhine Journey" from Gotterdammerung, arranged by Hans Richter to form a connected whole, an orchestral concert piece.

Mr. Paur conducted with much enthusiasm and vigor; the orchestra played with great brio, but was militated against by the weather, to which, no doubt, was due the considerable false intonation noticed. Mr. Kneisel, the concert master, did full justice to his lovely obligato in the "Waldweben," and the whole concert was a delightful affair.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 12, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert in the series by the Boston Symphony orchestra comes late this year on account of the inability of the managers to secure a date at the Academy of Music. It will be given this evening and the programme was rehearsed yesterday in the presence of a somewhat larger audience than that of the November concert. Mr. Paur departed from his precedent and gave a bill that was two and one-quarter hours' long. Some of the programmes of this orchestra have been less than an hour and a half in length. The leading number, in position and consequence, is Beethoven's Seventh symphony. Mr. Paur's reading of this work is not so smooth as that of Mr. Thomas, who has played it on the same stage many a time, but there was a force, a dash, an impetus that are rarely to be heard. These qualities are usually secured at the expense of finish, and it was so yesterday. The brasses had too much liberty and some of the accents were harsh. But the reading emphasized the wonderful vitality of the symphony. Genius has been variously described as patience, aptitude, study and the art of taking pains; but Beethoven, like Handel, Michael Angelo and Shakspeare, showed that a plenitude of life was one of its attributes. This is the writing of a man with a big brain, a big heart, sound stomach and strong nerves. There is a splendid animalism in it. And, unless it may be the Fifth symphony, there is no composition that has so large a reach of meaning. It is a conspectus of the whole art musical. Tragedy and comedy roar and laugh through it, the theme dances and anon it plods as heavily as a mourner to the tomb. Nothing has been written that surpasses the scherzo in gaiety and freshness, and the hoarse grunts of the bassoons—an Aristophenean croaking chorus—are employed humorously, yet with cunning contrast, to make the play of the violins and sparkle of the wood wind the lighter and finer. There is one modulation in this movement that ties the trio over to the repeat of the scherzo proper, that in thrilling beauty has no likeness in the literature of the orchestra—the change from D to F; only a few notes, but notes that mean as much as some epics. The calm and sunshiny dignity of the opening, the sad beauty of the allegretto and the wh irl of the finale, where one might fancy that Beethoven was trying to describe the rush of the planets around the sun, "tumbling steep in the uncontinented deep," are in fine contrast with the brilliancy of the scherzo.

Adele Aus Der Ohe was the soloist, and she played the Schumann A minor concerto, a work of mind and soundness, for Schumann is the most intellectual of composers, and for that reason, maybe, one of the most melancholy. Miss Aus Der Ohe played this number clearly, correctly, with even a touch of romance, but her style is that of health and robustness. She hears music as one imagines that she sees life, as a perfectly normal manifestation, and her fingers gambol over an allegro more willingly than they lag through the measures of a largo. She plays much as she did when she was last in Brooklyn, and received as hearty a welcome. She was called out three or four times, but there were other pieces on the programme, and she wisely declined to tire herself or the audience with a repetition of the concerto. The "Midsummer Night's Dream" suite, lacking the vocal parts, was played with sympathy, yet with muscle. It was a well fed crowd of fairies that gamboled through the overture, and something more than flower nectar was the food, too; there was a half suspicion of hot frankfurters. The scherzo and nocturne were somewhat more restrained, but in the wedding march the trombones and cornets had things much their own way. The queer conceit of Saint-Saens that he has formulated into his prelude to "The Deluge" discovered the excellence of the strings, and in the solo part of it, for Mr. Kneisel, that modest young artist gained quite his share of glory. His tone reminds one somewhat of Ysaye's in its clearness and resonance, and when the strings altogether were at work the delightful voice quality was obvious. It is hard to say what an overture means without hearing the work that it preludes, but judging from this exhibit the view taken by the French composer is that the cataclysm which drowned the world was rather a subject for sentimental regret than for surprise and horror.

The closing piece was a work by Dvorak—a Carnival overture, that had not before been played. It is musicianly in its construction, but as wild as a gypsy dance in its inception. Dvorak is another man who carries a great quantity of steam. The "Carnival" is written at high pressure and with an almost barbaric clamor. It suggests a circus coming into town, with a whole procession of red wagons and several live elephants. It is not coarse, however; on the contrary, there are some bits of song for the wood wind, notably for the English horn, that are almost lovely, and in the most swinging and easy of the themes there is a hint of that sadness that seems to pertain to the art of eastern Europe which Mr. Dvorak exemplifies. He is one of the last of men to stand chargeable with thematic peculation, hence the likeness of some of his chromatic runs and ascents to the "Tannhauser" bacchanal may be honestly set down to accident. The orchestra found congenial employment in this overutre, and it brought the concert to a close with a fine sense of exploit. The programme will be repeated under advantageous circumstances to-night, and the next concert will occur in the early part of February.

No Dinner for Mr Paur.

The dinner announced to be given to Conductor Paur of the Boston Symphony orchestra by the Musicians' club this evening, has been postponed and in its place an informal reception will be tendered him at the club rooms from 6 to 7 P. M.

[76]

THE MORNING HERALD

THURSDAY, JANUARY 10.

AN EVENING WITH WAGNER.

An Exclusive Programme of Works by This Composer Presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WHILE Emil Paur does not possess the qualifications that characterize the ideal orchestra conductor, he nevertheless showed himself last night to be a fairly intelligent reader of Richard Wagner's writings. The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of the season in the Music Hall, and presented an exclusive Wagner programme, quite a novelty in these parts.

Seidl has done something in this direction during his rare visits to this city, but while he is the superior as far as interpretation goes, he had not the good fortune to have such a splendid corps of instrumentalists at his command.

It was also noticeable last night that the lethargic disposition which characterized the orchestra upon previous occasions was happily absent. The men seemed to have become imbued with the Wagner spirit now sweeping over the musical people of this country, and they did full justice to the works essayed.

The occasion offered a good opportunity for Baltimoreans to contrast the ideas of Paur and Seidl—the one arrogant in mannerisms yet conscientiously aggressive, and the other good-natured in spirit but lacking of firmness and command.

Yet withal Mr. Paur produced a concert well in keeping with the Boston Symphony standard, and the Baltimore public showed as much eagerness to be considered worshipers at the shrine of Wagner as has been known of other musical assemblages throughout the land.

The programme was well selected. The only fault to be found, if any, was the over-abundance of entire act selections, and this had the effect of making the entertainment somewhat tiresome to those who take exceptions to the same style of compositions being played all evening. With few exceptions, the numbers were fairly familiar, but they all seemed new from the splendid manner in which they were presented.

One feature was the novel tempo given for the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," and the change was certainly a gratifying one. The rapidity of action in the introductory motif precluded dragging work by horns and trombones, which is usually an instance that mars the work of other organizations.

That the tone of the concert be kept intact, the Wagner solos were sung by experienced Wagner vocalists. Miss Elsa Kutscheria was the soprano; a powerful woman with a powerful voice, equal to the volume of accompaniment, but lacking in warmth and music. She sung the recitative for Elizabeth from the second act of "Tannhauser," and an aria from the balcony scene of "Lohengrin," the latter which was the better rendered of the two.

Herr Anton Schott was the other soloist He is also "built" to meet the occasion with a strong tenor voice that shows considerable evidence of much Wagner wear and tear. Herr Schott is amusing if not entertaining, and at once became a favorite. His numbers were Walter's "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger," and a "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure." He received an ovation after the first selection, and seemed surprised at so much warmth on such a cold night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra should certainly feel gratified that so large and brilliant an audience turned out in all that snow, slush and rain to attend the concert. After the performance the scene in front of the hall was one long to be remembered. Hackmen and policemen stood dripping, ankle deep in slush, shouting out numbers, and their cries were returned with vigor by those under hosts of umbrellas who were anxious to ride home.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 8, 1895.

Academy of Music.

A thoroughly well chosen and well executed programme drew one of the largest audiences of the season to the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music. The house was crowded in every part, and never did this fine organization confer greater pleasure upon the lovers of good music. The symphony was Beethoven's seventh, always a joy to listen to. Mr. Paur's reading is sometimes peculiar and not always convincing; but it is always clear and firm, and the work of the orchestra under his direction was admirable throughout. The allegretto was played with uncommon beauty of sentiment and the final allegro was as noble a piece of ensemble playing as one could demand, full of life and color and movement and splendidly effective. Miss Aus der Ohe, who was warmly welcomed after an absence of two seasons, during which she has continued to advance in all the qualities of a great pianist, played the Schumann A minor concerto with a really masterly fluency and brilliancy, with a broad artistic conception and a refinement of feeling that made her performance, sustained by Mr. Paur and the orchestra with rare appreciation and taste, one to be remembered with delight. These two great compositions made up the body of the programme, but the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music which followed would have made the concert noteworthy. As a mere piece of dainty execution neither of Mr. Paur's predecessors ever gave us anything finer than the overture, yet beside this it had poetry and feeling and richness of color and its essential harmony of proportion. We recall no concert performance of this music more satisfying. A "Carneval" overture by Dvorak closed the concert. The modern composer has added a triangle, a tambourine, cymbals and a harp to the instruments employed by Beethoven and Mendelssohn, but we do not see that he has added very much else of importance in this work, though it is a bright bit of impressionism and was played with

The Washington Post

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1895.

TWELVE WAGNER NUMBERS.

The Boston Symphony Club Successfully Carries Out a Daring Innovation.

It is a high commentary on the musical culture of Washington that an entirely Wagnerian programme could attract and hold entranced such an audience as filled Metzerott Music Hall last evening. Wagnerian music is commonly considered caviare to the general public, so when it comes to sitting through a whole feast of the harmonies of the future it requires an educated taste. The music of the Bairenth master demands brains as well as ears; it appeals not merely to the senses, but to the highest faculties of the intellect; the imagination is stimulated and the finer emotions stirred to their depths by the magnificent motives of what has not extravagantly been termed the music of the soul rather than the senses.

It was the third concert of the Boston Symphony season, and Conductor Paur was evidently determined to prove that his organization is the peer of any in America in the interpretation of Wagnerian music. That the proof offered in a programme of twelve select numbers was conclusive, was the unanimous verdict of the audience, many of whom pronounced it the finest Wagnerian concert yet given in Washington.

It opened with the stirring "Rienzi" overture, which the programme commentator has somewhat disparagingly termed "a brilliant and rather noisy opera overture of the then French school." But either this critic is too severe or the overture improved through its masterly rendition, for it fairly enthused the audience, and the smiling conductor was kept bowing his thanks for fully five minutes. The "Flying Dutchman" overture, with its strange commingling of stormy and devotional motives, was also well rendered, but perhaps next in popular appreciation was the "Lohengrin" prelude, with its clashing cymbals and horns bellowing like melodious bulls of Bashan. Again the audience broke into applause so continuous that it became almost embarrassing to blushing Mr. Paur.

The second part of the orchestral programme was perhaps less appreciated because less familiar. It included the "Meistersinger" prelude and the "Procession of the Gods," from "Die Rheingold," the latter a remarkable composition in which the harp and oboes, horns, and violins are combined with weird yet stirring effects, and Hans Richter's arrangement of excerpts from the last two dramas of the Niebenlungen tetralogy, "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung." These include the graphically descriptive scenes of Siegfried's passage through the fire to Brunnhilde's rock, the morning dawn, and Siegfried's voyage up the Rhine, a composition for which familiarity will breed greater appreciation of its eminent merit.

The vocal part of the programme was fittingly supplied by Miss Elsa Kutscherra, a powerful, full-voiced soprano, who was heard at her best in Elizabeth's aria from "Tannhauser." She dominated the orchestra and brought out the full dramatic strength of this number, but her voice was rather heavy for the balcony scene from "Lohengrin." She received much well-merited applause, but it was reserved for Herr Anton Schott to bring down the house with his masterly rendition of Walther's "Preislied," from "Die Meistersinger." The veteran Wagnerian tenor was in his best voice, and his performance would have won the prize in any of those celebrated song contests. His rendition of the Spring Song from "Die Walkure" was equally fine, and the singer was kept bowing his thanks until he was as rosy as the ribbon which suspends the Kaiser's decoration from his collar.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1895.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy Last Evening.

The most delightful concert of the season was that given at the Academy of Music last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, in the presence and with the plaudits of the usual crowded and brilliant audience. In every respect the performance was one of extraordinary interest and merit. The symphony was Beethoven's, in A major, No. 7, and it may be doubted whether this beautiful work, so full of grace, of melody and charm, so perfect in form, so spontaneous in utterance, so eloquent and sympathetic in sentiment, was ever more artistically, more expressively or more convincingly interpreted. Its exuberance of joy, its poetry of feeling, its outpouring of happiness and of life, every shade of its meaning, every phase of its beauty, all the details of its development, were appreciated by Mr. Paur with a perception which missed nothing, and an insight that was never at fault, and were conveyed by the orchestra with a combination of delicacy and power which left nothing to be imagined or desired. If there were any who thought the rendering of the allegretto unduly pensive, the brilliancy of the concluding allegro must have effaced the impression. The other exclusively orchestral numbers were the exquisite "Midsummer Night's Dream" music of Mendelssohn, in which the virtuosity of Mr. Paur's strings and the splendid quality of his wood wind were of course superbly exhibited, and a new overture by Dvorak, entitled "Carnival," which proved to be very vivid, vital and interesting. The soloist was Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, who received a very cordial welcome after her long absence, and who played Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto with that absolute adequacy of technique, virile breadth of method and constant lucidity of intelligence which have made her one of the great pianists of the day.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, January 8, 1895.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so finely given last evening in the Academy, before the customary large audience, placed Mr. Paur in an admirable light as a programme builder. The music was, of course, all of the best, and, what was equally to the purpose, it had so adroit arrangement that the general effect proved unusually attractive; there was enjoyment for the lovers of the purely classic, while at the same time those who go to a concert in a cheerful frame of mind, and want something more than ponderous technicalities and abstruseness, found the most congenial sort of entertainment. Beginning with the joyous Seventh Symphony of Beethoven (A major), so full of poetic life and the spirit of dance, the list next provided Schumann's noble piano-forte concerto (A minor, op. 54), with Miss Adèle Aus der Ohe as the soloist, and these were followed by the overture, scherzo, nocturne and wedding march from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music of Mendelssohn, and, by way of novelty, Dvorak's "Carneval" overture.

One of the most welcome features of the evening was the appearance of Miss Aus der Ohe, who has not been heard here for some time. She is a charming executant, with a sureness and vigor of touch not always to be found in a feminine performer, and to this she adds remarkable tonal beauty, clearness and elegance of style. All these qualities had brilliant exposition last night, her work possessing the old-time verve and effectiveness, and, possibly, even more than the old-time finesse.

On the performance of the Beethoven Symphony too much praise could not be bestowed, but the successes of the Boston Orchestra have become so familiar, and the admirable playing of its members are now taken so much as a matter of course, that it would be superfluous to go into an analysis of this particular achievement excepting to note, in passing, that the indescribable grace of the lovely "Seventh" seemed peculiarly well suited to the delicate effects which Mr. Paur knows so thoroughly how to get out of his responsive musicians. The "Midsummer Night's Dream" selections, particularly the fairy-like scherzo, had equally worthy interpretation, and here again the orchestra had a delicate task that they could fulfill con amore.

The Dvorak overture, coming as it did at the last, might not have been heard under the best auspices, yet, for all that, it made a picturesque impression by its bizarre gaiety, its fluency, melodic beauty and unconventionality. In some respects it proved very characteristic of the composer, notably in showing his skill in scoring for the orchestra; in one or two instances it diverged from the Dvorak standard, but, be that as it may, the overture was full of color and brilliancy, and gave a spirited ending to a delightful concert.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, January 8, 1895.

Fourth Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy.

The novelty of the Fourth Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music last evening was Antonin Dvorak's "Overture, Carnival, in A major." The first hearing of this Opus 92 revealed the work to be inspired by the characteristic energy and fire of that highly temperamental composer and yet to be not nearly so original as might have been expected in tonal effects. The absence of coloring was somewhat redeemed by the masterly instrumentation. The contrapuntal passagework in the strings and the introduction of the second theme in E minor on the first and second violins playing melodies in octaves over the arpeggios of the minor strings were delightfully conceived, while the coda was most effective. The excessive fortissimo of the opening tended, however, to destroy the true force of this finale, which was only saved by the interpolation of a striking but questionable andantino transition. The orchestral responses were happily developed, in spite of this, and the general effect on the listeners was that of slightly uninteresting brilliancy.

The famous seventh symphony of Beethoven, the apotheosis of Terpsichore, which opened the programme, was magnificently interpreted by Herr Emil Paur, the remarkable persistency of its dance rhythms and key in A minor working a subtle spell over the listeners. The popular allegretto and the technical presto were splendidly performed. The fine trumpet and flute effects were handled with keen appreciation of their value, while the allegro fourth movement was worked up to a stirring finale. Herr Paur admirably revealed the mysticism of this movement, which so many seem determined to make either rustic or bacchanalian. The superb power of strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not only again demonstrated in all these numbers, but the woodwinds and horns had more to do than usual, and demonstrated the thorough efficiency of the organization. A delicate contrast to these numbers was introduced in the exquisite music of Mendelssohn's Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream." This romantic masterpiece of the little 17-year-old maestro was exquisitely given, and the onomatopoetic effects of the tripping elves and braying donkey so picturesquely treated, that one saw Mustard-seed and Peasblossom waiting on Bottom lolling in Titania's lap.

Of the consummate technique and imaginative quality of the soloist of the evening, Fraulein Aus der Ohe, nothing need be said. She revealed her mastery of the one beyond question in the final passages of the intermezzo and the entire allegro conclusion of Schumann's Concerto in A minor, and played with a rare touch and grace. The value of pianoforte concertos may be doubted, but such is the vogue, and will be for a long time to come. It is an unmusical fashion, however, although in Schumann's solitary example the piano is properly attuned to its place in the orchestral work.

FOURTEEN PAGES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Beethoven's Seventh and Miss Aus Der Ohe Share the Honors of the Evening.

As no two persons are likely to hit on the same metaphor, to use the same figurative phrase in expressing the emotions, especially those evoked by so delicious an evening as the Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music last evening, the attempt therefore to describe the various musical effects is at the best futile. There were two strong features of the concert last night. One was the Beethoven symphony and the other was the playing of Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe. This gifted pianist has not been seen in Philadelphia for two years. Always a favorite here, her friends were delighted to note the great advance in her art since she last appeared before them. She has kept all the qualities which have won her applause in the past, and has added a brilliancy, force and breadth which made her playing a new delight.

The programme ran as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92; Schumann, Concerto in Pianoforte in A minor, Op. 54; Mendelssohn, Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream;" Dvorak, Overture, "Carneval" (first time); soloist, Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe. In selecting Beethoven's seventh symphony—one of the master's pre-eminent compositions and one he loved himself, Conductor Paur unconsciously ran counter to the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, composed of amateurs, which recently played this same masterpiece, and, as one of the local patronesses held last evening, more poetically. However that may be, the symphony, as interpreted last evening, gave one that overwhelmingly offset its great value and beauty, as it is the chief of romantic compositions. The wonderful introduction, with its three interwoven themes, led up to the fire of the vivace movement. The lively allegretto, one of the famous concert pieces to some, and, seemingly, to a large number in the audience, was less beautiful than the scherzo, which is the triumph of Beethoven's art. The witchery of the delicate dance effects and the general richness of the scherzo were in extraordinary contrast to the boisterous finale. This is differently interpreted figuratively, as is natural it should be. To some it is a peasant's dance, to others a revelry of Olympian character. Unquestionably the effect at first is that of a dance of hobgoblins, a sort of "Peer Gynt" arrangement, if Beethoven had but known "Peer Gynt." This hobgoblin dance, then, becomes, as it were, involved in a more humorous phrase till, without any thought of belittling a great composition, it suggests the humors of a round-up of an unearthly circus in a wierd land. There is the crack of the whip, the whirl of the performers, the clown's cry and the general rush and clamor and excitement of a mad throng.

When Miss Aus Der Ohe took her seat at the piano everyone knew it was to be a treat, but just what difference two years had made was not known till she struck the keys. Then the old grace, flexibility of her playing, the limpid loveliness of her notes, which, unmusically speaking, were seen, added to new powers which completely captivated the audience, especially in intermezzo. After her performance she was called out three times. The programme was completed in a most harmonious manner by the Mendelssohn music—the scherzo being a particularly lovely bit of playing and the familiar welding march, by the way, being given with several odd effects—and then the fiery and audacious overture of Dvorak, which was rendered with great spirit, bringing out all the individuality in this brilliant composition.

[77]

GENIUS OF WAGNER.

As Interpreted by Paur and the Boston Orchestra.

IN A CONCERT AT THE MUSIC HALL.

The Programme Was Exclusively of Wagnerian Compositions, and the Notable Performance Held the Rapt Attention of a Large Audience.

Partly because of the strength of the programme and partly to make the acquaintance of Emil Paur in the role of a Wagnerian leader musical Baltimore filled the Music Hall at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

As both of the points of attraction hinged closely together, the success of the programme—and it was a genuine success—meant also the success of Paur. There have been Wagner performances in Baltimore of greater finish and poetry, perhaps, but there have been few of equal vigor.

Director Paur, who has been thought at times to be mechanical and pedantic in his work, could certainly not have been accused of lack of enthusiasm last night. He was earnest and absorbed in the music and showed in the results achieved that his men were inspired by and in touch with him.

The fact that a long programme of eleven numbers in an unbroken Wagner cycle was listened to with rapt attention was a tribute not only to the composer, the director and to the orchestra, but to the appreciation and intelligence of the audience.

The opening number was the overture to Wagner's first successful dramatic work, "Rienzi, the Last of the Tribunes," the text of which was taken from Bulwer's novel. Nothing could have more strikingly marked the difference between Wagner in his early stage and Wagner in his prime than this overture and the works chosen for the closing numbers. "Rienzi," except for certain unmistakable effects in the treatment of the themes now and then, is peculiarly un-Wagnerlike. In its showy and tuneful measures and its simple and clear-cut rhythm it suggests oftentimes Weber's overtures, and in its brilliant orchestration there is apparent rather a desire for popular effects than to express depths of thought. It was played with great dash and spirit.

In the "Tannhauser" prelude, which was the next orchestral number, there was an occasional suggestion of lack of perfect accord in intonation between the strings and woodwind, but the contrasting color of the instruments was exquisitely brought out.

A strong performance of the great "Flying Dutchman" overture followed, with its wondrous and mystic roar of ocean and its weird and mysterious atmosphere, forming a musical picture of the whole opera.

The prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" was taken at a breathless tempo which made the music seem to sparkle and flash with brilliance and took the audience by storm.

Following each other with ever-increasing power came the numbers from Wagner's great operas, including a prelude from "Die Meistersinger," the "Procession of the Gods" from "The Rheingold" and the magnificent music of "Die Gotterdammerung," including the beautiful and characteristic tone-pictures of Siegfreid's passage to Brunhilde's rock, the dawn of morning and the Rhine journey, all combined into a single orchestra number, and forming in the beauty of the themes, their wonderful development and their poetical and spiritual power a masterpiece of musical genius.

The interest of the programme was heightened by the appearance of two excellent German singers—one, Miss Elsa Kutscherra, a newcomer to this country, who made her Baltimore debut recently with the Germania Maennerchor, and the other, Anton Schott, a noted opera and ballad singer, whose name has long been foremost among those of great singers in Europe and America.

IMPRESSIONS OF AN EVENING AT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The series of concerts given each Winter in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to be regarded by New Yorkers as a well-established institution, and as noteworthy and important a feature of the musical season as the old Philharmonics and the Symphony and Oratorio Society concerts.

The entertainment given by the gentlemen from Boston Thursday evening at the Metropolitan Opera-House was specially interesting, as being devoted exclusively to the exposition of Richard Wagner's music. Critics agree that the interpretation of the programme on that occasion showed not only the admirable training of the band, but its perfect mastery of the technical difficulties which abound in the music of Wagner.

In fact, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now regarded as one of the leading musical organizations of the country, and its conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, as a conspicuous exponent of the music of the future. Since he took charge of the Boston Orchestra, after the retirement of Mr. Nikitsch, that organization has lost none of the old time delicacy and precision for which it has always been famous, and if anything plays with more warmth, color and spirit than before.

Our artist has caught some of the characteristic poses of Conductor Paur, as well as certain individual peculiarities of Boston musicians and New York concert-goers.

BROOKLYN LIFE

BROOKLYN, N. Y., JAN. 12, 1895.

THE January concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Academy of Music this (Saturday) evening. Mr. Emil Paur has arranged a solid but delightful bill of music for the night. It leads off with Beethoven's seventh symphony, the most beautiful of all in the opinion of many critics, though it has not the strength of the fifth. Then follow the prelude to "The Deluge," by Saint-Sæns, and the new "Carnival" overture by Dvorak, whose "New World" symphony leads us to expect something good. The four principal numbers from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream,"—that is, the overture, the scherzo, the nocturne and the wedding march—are to close the concert. The soloist will be Fraulein Adele Aus Der Ohe, a young woman of remarkably finished technique and musicianly intelligence—one of the most satisfying women artists that has been heard here since Essipoff played. She is to give Schumann's A minor concerto, the work that one of his critics declared to be the most intensely personal of his compositions. "All the melancholy of the man, his sweetness, his poetic nature and the sensitiveness which was as usual its attendant, may be traced in this work." The orchestra requires no words of praise. There is none other in the world so fine.

THIS (Saturday) afternoon the Kneisel Quartet, consisting of the four leading string players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give its first concert at Wissner Hall. There will be three of these concerts during the season, with distinguished solo talent.

Baltimore Life,

BALTIMORE, MD., JANUARY 12, 1895.

A WAGNER CONCERT.

A very large appreciative and music loving audience attended the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the new Music Hall on Wednesday evening last, notwithstanding the very inclement weather. The program was exclusively devoted to Wagnerian compositions and the skill and preciseness in which they were interpreted reflect great credit upon director Paur and his great orchestra of ninety-five artists. The opening number was the overture from "Rienzi" and was followed by selections from Wagner's great operas, Tannhaeuser," "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," "Rheingold," "Die Walkure," "Siegfried" and "Goetterdammerung." In addition to the magnificent work of the orchestra two noted solo artists also made their appearance; namely, Miss Elsa Kntscherra (Prima Donna Soprano, from the Royal Opera House, Dresden,) and Mr. Anton Schott; both are artists of high musical culture, and their numbers were warmly and heartily applauded. Miss Kutcherra has been heard here before having made her debut in this city at the first concert this season of the Germania-Maennerchor. The next concert takes place Wednesday evening, February 6, at the new Music Hall.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE REPUBLIC

SATURDAY, JANUARY 12, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The third concert of the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the very efficient baton of Conductor Emil Paur, was given at Metzerott Music Hall, on Tuesday evening last, consisting entirely of Wagner music, and attracted one of the largest and most refined and fashionable audiences of the present season, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather. It is safe to say that no one who was present regretted having braved the storm, for it was a most delightful musical feast in every particular, and the Baireuth master himself would doubtless have heartily joined in the prolonged applause which greeted each number of the program, for each was a gem, rendered in a manner that could not have failed to have won the approbation of even so severe a critic as the immortal Wagner, whose name will live and whose compositions will delight cultivated ears as long as the world stands.

If there were those in the audience who entertained prejudice against Wagnerian music, Conductor Paur and his orchestra must have dispelled their prejudices, for everybody applauded.

The soloists of the evening were Miss Elsa Kutzcherra, soprano, and Mr. Anton Schott, tenor, both of whom were in good voice and added materially to the pleasure of the very best musical entertainment of the present season. It was creditable to Conductor Paur and the management that they positively and firmly refused to respond to encores, notwithstanding the fact that they were vociferously and repeatedly demanded. Encores have grown to be a positive nuisance, lengthening the performance into unreasonable hours and usually resulting in many of the audience leaving before the close of the concert. We trust others will profit by the good example set by this great orchestra, and that all entertainments will be confined strictly to the printed program, a course which will unquestionably give the greatest satisfaction to the greatest number.

The fourth concert will be given in Metzerott Music Hall on Tuesday evening, February 5.

The World.

Published by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 13, 1895.

Musical Notes and Items.

The estimate placed upon Mr. Emil Paur in his capacity of Kapelmeister of the foremost of American orchestra organizations—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—by his work during the two seasons of his incumbency, was fully confirmed by the Wagner concert last Thursday evening.

Mr. Paur thinks. He does not feel. He is intellectual and not emotional. He is precise, careful, skilful, but cold, unsympathetic and prosaic. He is traditional, classical if you will; he observes every printed direction in a score, elaborates with attention to every minute detail, but fails to catch the spirit, the significance, the vis anima of the composition. If the work so treated is one in which there is no emotional significance, descriptive of things rather than suggestive of human thoughts and feelings, the result is entirely satisfying.

This fact established, it carries with it the status of Mr. Paur as a Wagnerian interpreter.

Witness the manner in which, at the concert in question, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" was played. Or the "Lohengrin" prelude—both musical morceaux that describe things that have a visual character, or are simply illustrative in purport. It was superb work. There was dash, rhythmic accentuation, broad phrasing, tone gradations, rich tonal quality, faultless technique. It was superb. Per contra, turn your thoughts back to the impressions received by the performance of the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," and those of the prelude of the third act of "Tannhauser."

In these pieces there is something beneath the surface—a significance of thoughts and emotions. They are not musical pictures, they are poems in melody and harmony. Of this there was not the faintest intimation in their performance.

To be a successful interpreter of Wagner one must understand his music, of course, but the comprehension must be sympathetic. If one is not emotionally appealed to by his musical sentences, an expressive formulation of their sense is impossible.

The work of the orchestra was beyond criticism. Its technical equipment is such that nothing is beyond its grasp. There were moments in last Thursday's concert when this premier organization established an actual standard.

[78]

IMPRESSIONS OF AN EVENING AT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The series of concerts given each Winter in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to be regarded by New Yorkers as a well-established institution, and as noteworthy and important a feature of the musical season as the old Philharmonics and the Symphony and Oratorio Society concerts.

The entertainment given by the gentlemen from Boston Thursday evening at the Metropolitan Opera-House was specially interesting, as being devoted exclusively to the exposition of Richard Wagner's music. Critics agree that the interpretation of the programme on that occasion showed not only the admirable training of the band, but its perfect mastery of the technical difficulties which abound in the music of Wagner.

In fact, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now regarded as one of the leading musical organizations of the country, and its conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, as a conspicuous exponent of the music of the future. Since he took charge of the Boston Orchestra, after the retirement of Mr. Nikitsch, that organization has lost none of the old time delicacy and precision for which it has always been famous, and if anything plays with more warmth, color and spirit than before.

Our artist has caught some of the characteristic poses of Conductor Paur, as well as certain individual peculiarities of Boston musicians and New York concert-goers.

THE GENIUS OF WAGNER.

As Interpreted by Paur and the Boston Orchestra.

IN A CONCERT AT THE MUSIC HALL.

The Programme Was Exclusively of Wagnerian Compositions, and the Notable Performance Held the Rapt Attention of a Large Audience.

Partly because of the strength of the programme and partly to make the acquaintance of Emil Paur in the role of a Wagnerian leader musical Baltimore filled the Music Hall at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

As both of the points of attraction hinged closely together, the success of the programme—and it was a genuine success—meant also the success of Paur. There have been Wagner performances in Baltimore of greater finish and poetry, perhaps, but there have been few of equal vigor.

Director Paur, who has been thought at times to be mechanical and pedantic in his work, could certainly not have been accused of lack of enthusiasm last night. He was earnest and absorbed in the music and showed in the results achieved that his men were inspired by and in touch with him.

The fact that a long programme of eleven numbers in an unbroken Wagner cycle was listened to with rapt attention was a tribute not only to the composer, the director and to the orchestra, but to the appreciation and intelligence of the audience.

The opening number was the overture to Wagner's first successful dramatic work, "Rienzi, the Last of the Tribunes," the text of which was taken from Bulwer's novel. Nothing could have more strikingly marked the difference between Wagner in his early stage and Wagner in his prime than this overture and the works chosen for the closing numbers. "Rienzi," except for certain unmistakable effects in the treatment of the themes now and then, is peculiarly un-Wagnerlike. In its showy and tuneful measures and its simple and clear-cut rhy it suggests oftentimes Weber's overtures, and in its brilliant orchestration there is apparent rather a desire for popular effects than to express depths of thought. It was played with great dash and spirit.

In the "Tannhauser" prelude, which was the next orchestral number, there was an occasional suggestion of lack of perfect accord in intonation between the strings and wood-wind, but the contrasting color of the instruments was exquisitely brought out.

A strong performance of the great "Flying Dutchman" overture followed, with its wondrous and mystic roar of ocean and its weird and mysterious atmosphere, forming a musical picture of the whole opera.

The prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" was taken at a breathless tempo which made the music seem to sparkle and flash with brilliance and took the audience by storm.

Following each other with ever-increasing power came the numbers from Wagner's great operas, including a prelude from "Die Meistersinger," the "Procession of the Gods" from "The Rheingold" and the magnificent music of "Die Gotterdammerung," including the beautiful and characteristic tone-pictures of Siegfreid's passage to Brunhilde's rock, the dawn of morning and the Rhine journey, all combined into a single orchestra number, and forming in the beauty of the themes, their wonderful development and their poetical and spiritual power a masterpiece of musical genius

The interest of the programme was heightened by the appearance of two excellent German singers—one, Miss Elsa Kutscherra, a newcomer to this country, who made her Baltimore debut recently with the Germania Mænnerchor, and the other, Anton Schott, a noted opera and ballad singer, whose name has long been foremost among those of great singers in Europe and America.

BROOKLYN LIFE

BROOKLYN, N. Y., JAN. 12, 1895.

THE January concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Academy of Music this (Saturday) evening. Mr. Emil Paur has arranged a solid but delightful bill of music for the night. It leads off with Beethoven's seventh symphony, the most beautiful of all in the opinion of many critics, though it has not the strength of the fifth. Then follow the prelude to "The Deluge," by Saint-Sæns, and the new "Carnival" overture by Dvorak, whose "New World" symphony leads us to expect something good. The four principal numbers from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream,"—that is, the overture, the scherzo, the nocturne and the wedding march—are to close the concert. The soloist will be Fraulein Adele Aus Der Ohe, a young woman of remarkably finished technique and musicianly intelligence—one of the most satisfying women artists that has been heard here since Essipoff played. She is to give Schumann's A minor concerto, the work that one of his critics declared to be the most intensely personal of his compositions. "All the melancholy of the man, his sweetness, his poetic nature and the sensitiveness which was as usual its attendant, may be traced in this work." The orchestra requires no words of praise. There is none other in the world so fine.

THIS (Saturday) afternoon the Kneisel Quartet, consisting of the four leading string players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give its first concert at Wissner Hall. There will be three of these concerts during the season, with distinguished solo talent.

Baltimore Life,

BALTIMORE, MD., JANUARY 12, 1895.

A WAGNER CONCERT.

A very large appreciative and music loving audience attended the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the new Music Hall on Wednesday evening last, notwithstanding the very inclement weather. The program was exclusively devoted to Wagnerian compositions and the skill and preciseness in which they were interpreted reflect great credit upon director Paur and his great orchestra of ninety-five artists. The opening number was the overture from "Rienzi" and was followed by selections from Wagner's great operas, Tannhaeuser," "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," "Rheingold," "Die Walkure," "Siegfried" and "Goetterdammerung." In addition to the magnificent work of the orchestra two noted solo artists also made their appearance; namely, Miss Elsa Kutscherra (Prima Donna Soprano, from the Royal Opera House, Dresden,) and Mr. Anton Schott; both are artists of high musical culture, and their numbers were warmly and heartily applauded. Miss Kutcherra has been heard here before having made her debut in this city at the first concert this season of the Germania-Maennerchor. The next concert takes place Wednesday evening, February 6, at the new Music Hall.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE REPUBLIC

SATURDAY, JANUARY 12, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The third concert of the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the very efficient baton of Conductor Emil Paur, was given at Metzerott Music Hall, on Tuesday evening last, consisting entirely of Wagner music, and attracted one of the largest and most refined and fashionable audiences of the present season, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather. It is safe to say that no one who was present regretted having braved the storm, for it was a most delightful musical feast in every particular, and the Baireuth master himself would doubtless have heartily joined in the prolonged applause which greeted each number of the program, for each was a gem, rendered in a manner that could not have failed to have won the approbation of even so severe a critic as the immortal Wagner, whose name will live and whose compositions will delight cultivated ears as long as the world stands.

If there were those in the audience who entertained prejudice against Wagnerian music, Conductor Paur and his orchestra must have dispelled their prejudices, for everybody applauded.

The soloists of the evening were Miss Elsa Kutzcherra, soprano, and Mr. Anton Schott, tenor, both of whom were in good voice and added materially to the pleasure of the very best musical entertainment of the present season. It was creditable to Conductor Paur and the management that they positively and firmly refused to respond to encores, notwithstanding the fact that they were vociferously and repeatedly demanded. Encores have grown to be a positive nuisance, lengthening the performance into unreasonable hours and usually resulting in many of the audience leaving before the close of the concert. We trust others will profit by the good example set by this great orchestra, and that all entertainments will be confined strictly to the printed program, a course which will unquestionably give the greatest satisfaction to the greatest number.

The fourth concert will be given in Metzerott Music Hall on Tuesday evening, February 5.

The World.

Published by the Press Publishing Company,
53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 13, 1895.

Musical Notes and Items.

The estimate placed upon Mr. Emil Paur in his capacity of Kapelmeister of the foremost of American orchestra organizations—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—by his work during the two seasons of his incumbency, was fully confirmed by the Wagner concert last Thursday evening.

Mr. Paur thinks. He does not feel. He is intellectual and not emotional. He is precise, careful, skilful, but cold, unsympathetic and prosaic. He is traditional, classical if you will; he observes every printed direction in a score, elaborates with attention to every minute detail, but fails to catch the spirit, the significance, the vis anima of the composition. If the work so treated is one in which there is no emotional significance, descriptive of things rather than suggestive of human thoughts and feelings, the result is entirely satisfying.

This fact established, it carries with it the status of Mr. Paur as a Wagnerian interpreter.

Witness the manner in which, at the concert in question, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" was played. Or the "Lohengrin" prelude—both musical morceaux that describe things that have a visual character, or are simply illustrative in purport. It was superb work. There was dash, rhythmic accentuation, broad phrasing, tone gradations, rich tonal quality, faultless technique. It was superb. Per contra, turn your thoughts back to the impressions received by the performance of the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," and those of the prelude of the third act of "Tannhauser."

In these pieces there is something beneath the surface—a significance of thoughts and emotions. They are not musical pictures, they are poems in melody and harmony. Of this there was not the faintest intimation in their performance.

To be a successful interpreter of Wagner one must understand his music, of course, but the comprehension must be sympathetic. If one is not emotionally appealed to by his musical sentences, an expressive formulation of their sense is impossible.

The work of the orchestra was beyond criticism. Its technical equipment is such that nothing is beyond its grasp. There were moments in last Thursday's concert when this premier organization established an actual standard.

[78]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 14, 1895.

Music Hall: The First Ysaye Concert.

Mr. Eugene Ysaÿe, assisted by Miss Theodore Pfaffiin, soprano, and Mr. Aimé Lachaume, pianist, gave his first concert in the Music Hall last Saturday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

César Franck: Sonata for Violin and Pianoforte (first time).
Mr. Ysaye and Mr. Lachaume.
Saint-Saëns: Air, "Mon cœur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila."
Miss Pfaffiin.
Vieuxtemps: Fantasia appassionata for Violin.
Mr. Ysaye.
Chopin: Ballade No. 3, in A-flat major, opus 47.
Mr. Lachaume.
Bach: Sarabande, Gigue, and Chaconne from Sonata for Violin alone, in D minor.
Mr. Ysaye.
Bizet: Pastorale.
Delibes: "Les filles de Cadiz."
Miss Pfaffiin.
Ysaye: Solos for Violin, Scène au Berceau. Mazurka No. 3 ("Dans le lointain"). Saltarelle carnavalesque.
Mr. Ysaye.

It was interesting to hear the sonata by César Franck, a composer for whom a considerable posthumous reputation has been growing in France of late years. During his not too successful lifetime Franck was always spoken of with respect, and now he has been made the object of no little sincere admiration; he was a man of rather classical and un-French tendencies for his day, the unpopularity attaching to which his compositions seem gradually to be living down. Regarding the sonata played here for the first time on Saturday afternoon we can only say that it made but little impression upon us; there is no little earnestness evident in the work, together with a good deal that is graceful and charming. But at this first hearing we were unable to grasp what of coherency there might be in the composition, and its musical meaning escaped us; only the last movement, Allegretto poco mosso, in which all the subtleties of canon are treated not only with consummate skill and ease, but with a rare vitality and musical vigor, seemed perfectly clear and really inspiring. It is hard to say, regarding a new work played by unfamiliar artists, exactly where the responsibility for an unsatisfying impression lies. Naturally a great part of it lies with the listener. Still we could not help receiving the impression—if the truth must be told—that, in this case some share in the responsibility lay with Mr. Ysaÿe; even acknowledging that first impressions are apt to be deceptive, we certainly did get the impression that Mr. Ysaÿe's playing, ineffably beautiful as it was in many ways, rather veiled than revealed what coherency of development there might be in the music; and this impression was strengthened by some of his subsequent playing of more familiar things. Apart from his rare beauty of tone and wondrously perfect technique, his melodic phrasing is in general singularly beautiful; and yet he seems to be as a player what not a few noteworthy modern composers have been called to a considerable extent, "l'artiste de la phrase"—the artist of the phrase—throwing a great amount of power and expressiveness into each individual phrase, by and for itself, somewhat to the detriment to that constructive part each phrase should play as a member in a stoutly built and coherently developed whole. We felt there was more exquisite beauty of detail work in his playing than there was comprehensive totality of conception. Instead of going on and on, with that "crescit eundo" force which all true musical development acquires, he seemed to a certain extent to be continually beginning over again.

We felt this far less, if at all, in his playing of the Vieuxtemps Fantasia. Here, to be sure, the musical development was in itself so perfectly clear and unmistakable that none but absolutely poor playing could have in any way obscured it; but his playing was far more than merely negatively good in this respect; it was masterly in its whole pre-ordained scheme. Especially admirable was the sort of compromise the great violinist made between the modern style of playing and that so-called "grand" style which belonged more especially to the day when the music was written. Mr. Ysaÿe allowed himself just as much of the old "grand style" of phrasing as modern ears could bear in such music, pushing it just far enough to be enormously effective, but stopping short of the point where it would have raised a smile. His whole performance of this piece was as artistic as possible, and in point of virtuosity beggared all description.

His playing of the Bach Sarabande and Gigue was exceedingly beautiful in some respects, if rather superficial in feeling and mannered in expression; one looks for something more frank and downright in old Bach than such sophisticated airs and graces. With the Chaconne Mr. Ysaÿe approached one of the great touchstones of a violinist's power. His playing of the mighty composition left us with very mingled feelings of admiration and dissatisfaction. For one thing, it showed a worthy study of the work, a great deal of careful thought expended upon drawing up the general scheme of performance; there was not a carelessly or thoughtlessly played measure in the whole. In a word, it was the most highly elaborated rendering of the Chaconne we ever heard; all imaginable effects of contrast between one variation and another were resorted to, and yet wholly without crassness or merely clap-trap effectiveness. And yet in the earlier portions of the work Mr. Ysaÿe certainly did not succeed in holding the music together with as sure a grasp as some other less brilliant players we have heard. There seemed to us to be a certain lack of true nobility of feeling and expression; until the entrance of the theme in D major, we could feel nothing higher than a certain exquisiteness of mondain grace, with now and then a touch of rather mawkish sensibility. On the other hand, the expression in that ineffable first major variation struck us as being somewhat overdone; the divine music was not enough allowed to tell its own story. But with the long climax that follows this variation, Mr. Ysaÿe rose to far higher things; here one felt real earnestness, naturalness and power of expression; and the climax was worked up to a white heat with all the force of a true master. It was grand!

Mr. Ysaÿe's own little pieces are charming enough, and showed off both his grace and virtuoso brilliancy in the most convincing manner.

Miss Pfaffiin, whom we do not remember to have heard before, has a sweet, light soprano voice which she uses with considerable skill, [illegible] at times verges somewhat dangerously [illegible]. She shows no little [illegible], but the way in which she [illegible] Dalila" to my own father tendous means never trying to do more than she could do well—was really admirable. She was heard, too, with pleasure in the Bizet and Delibes songs.

Mr. Lachaume played his part in the Franck sonata like a fully competent pianist and musician; in an honest, clear, and unaffected style, and with much feeling and beauty of tone. His playing of the Chopin Ballade—one of the most difficult things to "hold well together" in the whole pianist's repertory—had much that was fine in it, with some less satisfying moments.

The audience was gratifyingly large; indeed it was a real "Paderewski house." Yet, although evidently receptive and by no means cold—nothing could have been cold, by the way, in the oven into which the Music Hall was converted for the occasion—it committed no excesses of enthusiasm. Mr. Ysaÿe's next concert comes on Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 23.

The Cambridge Tribune

SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1894.

Symphony Concert

A Wagner Evening Which Was a Grand Success—Anton Schott Enthusiastically Received—"The Best Concert of the Season" the General Verdict.

The fifth concert in Sanders on Thursday evening, was devoted exclusively to selections from Wagner's works, this being the programme:

Rienzi ..... Overture
Tannhaeuser ..... (a) Elizabeth's Aria
(b) Prelude to Act III.
The Flying Dutchman ..... Overture
Lohengrin ..... Act II. Balcony Scene
Act III. Prelude
Die Meistersinger ..... Prelude to Act III.
Walther's Preistied ct I.
Das Rheingold ..... Procession of the Gods
Die Walküre ..... Spring Song
Siegfried and ..... (a) W aldweben
Die Götteidämerung... (b) Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey.

The soloists were Miss Elsa Kutscherra and Mr. Anton Schott.

At last we have had a full-fledged programme of Wagner music, and a splendidly arranged one at that! Mr. Paur has won and deserved the gratitude of Cambridge for his skill and energy in surmounting the difficulties of such an undertaking. The absence of Madame Nordica alone prevented the concert from being an ideal one, but as it was, the banquet of good things was eagerly and enthusiastically enjoyed by the large audience. The brilliant "Rienzi" overture was splendidly played, the beautiful melody of Rienzi's prayer given out by the strings in the slow Introduction, being interrupted by a roll on the snare drum for all that it was worth! Nothing could be more sharply defined than the contrast between the slow majesty of this theme, and the "Santo Spirito Cavaliere" of the Allegro. This overture was composed with the entire opera of Rienzi, der Letzte der Tribunen for the Academic de Musique in Paris and perhaps that is the reason why it constantly suggests French Grand opera, rather than Wagner's characteristic later style, of which it has not a trace.

Miss Elsa Kutscherra, Mr. Walter Damrosch's principal Wagnerian prima donna, made a charming appearance, and sang acceptably and with spirit "Elizabeth's greeting to the hall of song," in the opening scene of the second act in Tannhaeuser. Unfortunately Miss Kutscherra's intonation was constantly false, but she was heard to much better advantage in Elsa's beautiful balcony song. She was warmly received and applauded. The Prelude to Act III introducing Tannhaeuser's pilgrimage was beautifully played, as was also the introduction to the bridal procession in the third act of Lohengrin. This opera is on the most deeply poetic and highly intellectual plane of all Wagner's works, and the smallest excerpts from it are always a source of delight. The overture to the "Flying Dutchman" in which Wagner first developed the idea of first symbolizing his dramatic conceptions by corresponding musical phrases, was faultlessly rendered. One could easily discern the wanderings of the Old Man of the Sea, the Norwegian boat song, Senta's motif, the Angel of Mercy, etc. The Prelude to the third act of Die Meistersinger, was another gem, and a familiar one. Mr. Schott was evidently remembered with delight by the audience, and he was given a rousing reception. He was in splendid voice, and sang Walther's Preisleid with absolute perfection. We have never heard it given with such splendid fire and dramatic force. He was recalled again and again, but, owing to a wise provision in these concerts, he was not allowed to accept the much desired encore. He was equally fine in Siegmund's exquisite love song from the first act of Die Walküre "Die Liebe lockte den Lenz," and was again greeted with a storm of enthusiasm.

Mr. Paur showed his usual good judgment in importing such an artist expressly for the occasion. "The Procession of the Gods," from "Das Rheingold," lost some of its impressiveness by being taken out of its natural environment, but was, nevertheless, highly interesting and beautifully played. The Waldweben from "Siegfried" is to our mind far less wonderful than the Siegfried Idyl, but it is redeemed by the flavor of Wagner's genius, and was exquisitely played. The concert ended with a superb performance of Siegfried's journey to Brünnhilde's, rock in which the ever beautiful "fire charm" was given with much brilliancy, also the bird-motive. The introduction to the second part of the Gotterdämmerung prologue was especially fine, in which Siegfried takes leave of Brünnhilde in the morning twilight. The softness of the trombones and horns is gradually joined by the whole orchestra, until the sun rises with a grand outburst of all the brass. We should like to have heard the great closing scene of Brünnhilde, but that was impossible, and too much praise cannot be given Mr. Paur for his wonderfully artistic management of the closing selection and for his masterly conducting throughout the concert. For one small detail four horns were imported for the occasion from New York. The next concert will be on Thursday evening, January 24.

C. R.

...Mrs. Emil Paur, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony, will give five piano recitals in February on the afternoons of the days upon which the Symphony concert is given, as follows: Monday, February 4, Philadelphia; Tuesday, 5, Washington; Wednesday, 6, Baltimore; Thursday, 7, New York; Friday and Saturday, 8 and 9, Brooklyn.

...Madame Lilian Nordica will be the soloist at the Symphony concert in Boston on the 18th and 19th of January. She will also sing at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in New York on Thursday evening of next week. Those who know, say that Mme. Nordica receives $700 each night she sings in opera and $600 for each concert.

..."The very best concert of the season!" was heard on all sides as the delighted crowd filed out of Sanders Theatre last Thursday night. The evening with Wagner was certainly a most pronounced success and Mr. Anton Schott's reception was something unusual in enthusiasm for a Cambridge Symphony audience.

...By one of the accidents that occasionally happen to artists, Mr. Anton Schott's luggage did not come on with him from New York, and as the distinguished singer is of a massive and rotund style of architecture, the ghastly dilemma confronted him of appearing before a Cambridge audience to sing Wagner's "Spring Song" and "Walther's Preislied" in a very unconventional travelling suit. Some kind friend endeavored to charter a dress suit for the occasion, but the measurements appalled the Schneider, and that plan fell through, ignominously. At the last moment a combination suit was improvised from the wardrobes of three accomodating friends, and, nothing daunted, Mr. Schott came and, like Cæsar, conquered. It is not every tenor that could have risen to his best efforts in borrowed linen and another man's swallow-tail, but Mr. Schott sang like a cherub, carried the audience by storm and was called and recalled by his enthusiastic hearers. The very remarkable likeness, in face and physique, between Mr. Schott and a well-known Harvard professor was generally commented upon, and it would seem that if our genial professor had been called upon, in time, the singer could have been readily accommodated in the matter of a dress suit. However, Cambridge will always be ready to hear Mr. Schott—even if he should be compelled to sing in a shooting jacket.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

IT certainly seemed as if Mr. Emil Paur had determined to "do or die" last Thursday night, for with his orchestra he gave us a tremendous Wagner program made up with considerable skill and fairly illustrative of Wagner's development as a composer. It was an inclement night, but the Metropolitan Opera House was fairly well filled and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played so brilliantly this season. This was the program:

"Rienzi"—
Overture
"Tannhäuser"—
Act II.—"Elisabeth's Aria"
Act III.—Prelude
"The Flying Dutchman"—
Overture
"Lohengrin"—
Act II.—"Balcony Scene"
Act III.—Prelude
"Die Meistersinger"— ..... Wagner
Act I.—"Walther's Preislied"
Act III.—Prelude
"Rheingold"—
"Procession of the Gods"
"Die Walküre"—
"Spring Song"
"Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung"—
"Waldweben," "Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock," "Morning Dawn" and "Rhine Journey" (Richter arrangement)

Nordica and Mr. Anton Schott were the solo singers.

It may be premised that an entire evening devoted to an exposition of Wagner's music on the concert stage is neither in consonance with the master's views nor fair to the music played. But to offset this New York has heard so many times the Wagnerian music drama that it is not in the dark when excerpts are given. But frankly the practice is not a laudable one. The symphony should be the "piece de resistance" of the concert room, and the dramatic overture a subsidiary number in the program. The Boston band was at its best in the "Rienzi," the "Dutchman," and the Prelude to the third act of the "Meistersinger." Mr. Paur is not at home in Wagner. The intense dynamic effects are beyond his sympathies, and his temperament is not in touch with the surging, restless, feverish phrases of the modern music drama.

The "Waldweben" lacked poetry, atmosphere, and the Richter arrangement was without climax. The most vital work of the evening was the "Dutchman" overture, which was played with surpassing fire and effect. Nordica sang "Dich Theure Halle" with fervor, and the "Lohengrin" number with much delicacy and feeling. Mr. Schott was happy in his selections, although his voice has lost its bloom and his tendency to explosive emission is painful. But he was vigorous and enthusiastic. So was Mr. Paur, but other qualities are needful, both for singer and conductor. The orchestra was often clangorous, as Mr. Paur is much given to forced dynamic effects.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 14, 1895.

Music Hall. The First Ysaye Concert.

Mr. Eugene Ysaÿe, assisted by Miss Theodore Pfafflin, soprano, and Mr. Aimé Lachaume, pianist, gave his first concert in the Music Hall last Saturday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

César Franck: Sonata for Violin and Pianoforte (first time).
Mr. Ysaye and Mr. Lachaume.
Saint-Saëns: Air, "Mon cœur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila."
Miss Pfafflin.
Vieuxtemps: Fantasia appassionata for Violin.
Mr. Ysaye.
Chopin: Ballade No. 3, in A-flat major, opus 47.
Mr. Lachaume.
Bach: Sarabande, Gigue, and Chaconne from Sonata for Violin alone, in D minor.
Mr. Ysaye.
Bizet: Pastorale.
Delibes: "Les filles de Cadiz."
Miss Pfafflin.
Ysaye: Solos for Violin, Scène au Berceau, Mazurka No. 3 ("Dans le lointain"). Saltarelle carnavalesque.
Mr. Ysaye.

It was interesting to hear the sonata by César Franck, a composer for whom a considerable posthumous reputation has been growing in France of late years. During his not too successful lifetime Franck was always spoken of with respect, and now he has been made the object of no little sincere admiration; he was a man of rather classical and un-French tendencies for his day, the unpopularity attaching to which his compositions seem gradually to be living down. Regarding the sonata played here for the first time on Saturday afternoon we can only say that it made but little impression upon us; there is no little earnestness evident in the work, together with a good deal that is graceful and charming. But at this first hearing we were unable to grasp what of coherency there might be in the composition, and its musical meaning escaped us; only the last movement, Allegretto poco mosso, in which all the subtleties of canon are treated not only with consummate skill and ease, but with a rare vitality and musical vigor, seemed perfectly clear and really inspiring. It is hard to say, regarding a new work played by unfamiliar artists, exactly where the responsibility for an unsatisfying impression lies. Naturally a great part of it lies with the listener. Still we could not help receiving the impression—if the truth must be told—that, in this case some share in the responsibility lay with Mr. Ysaÿe; even acknowledging that first impressions are apt to be deceptive, we certainly did get the impression that Mr. Ysaÿe's playing, ineffably beautiful as it was in many ways, rather veiled than revealed what coherency of development there might be in the music; and this impression was strengthened by some of his subsequent playing of more familiar things. Apart from his rare beauty of tone and wondrously perfect technique, his melodic phrasing is in general singularly beautiful; and yet he seems to be as a player what not a few noteworthy modern composers have been called to a considerable extent, "l'artiste de la phrase" — the artist of the phrase—throwing a great amount of power and expressiveness into each individual phrase, by and for itself, somewhat to the detriment to that constructive part each phrase should play as a member in a stoutly built and coherently developed whole. We felt there was more exquisite beauty of detail work in his playing than there was comprehensive totality of conception. Instead of going on and on, with that "crescit eundo" force which all true musical development acquires, he seemed to a certain extent to be continually beginning over again.

We felt this far less, if at all, in his playing of the Vieuxtemps Fantasia. Here, to be sure, the musical development was in itself so perfectly clear and unmistakable that none but absolutely poor playing could have in any way obscured it; but his playing was far more than merely negatively good in this respect; it was masterly in its whole pre-ordained scheme. Especially admirable was the sort of compromise the great violinist made between the modern style of playing and that so-called "grand" style which belonged more especially to the day when the music was written. Mr. Ysaÿe allowed himself just as much of the old "grand style" of phrasing as modern ears could bear in such music, pushing it just far enough to be enormously effective, but stopping short of the point where it would have raised a smile. His whole performance of this piece was as artistic as possible, and in point of virtuosity beggared all description.

His playing of the Bach Sarabande and Gigue was exceedingly beautiful in some respects, if rather superficial in feeling and mannered in expression; one looks for something more frank and downright in old Bach than such sophisticated airs and graces. With the Chaconne Mr. Ysaÿe approached one of the great touchstones of a violinist's power. His playing of the mighty composition left us with very mingled feelings of admiration and dissatisfaction. For one thing, it showed a worthy study of the work, a great deal of careful thought expended upon drawing up the general scheme of performance; there was not a carelessly or thoughtlessly played measure in the whole. In a word, it was the most highly elaborated rendering of the Chaconne we ever heard; all imaginable effects of contrast between one variation and another were resorted to, and yet wholly without crassness or merely clap-trap effectiveness. And yet in the earlier portions of the work Mr. Ysaÿe certainly did not succeed in holding the music together with as sure a grasp as some other less brilliant players we have heard. There seemed to us to be a certain lack of true nobility of feeling and expression; until the entrance of the theme in D major, we could feel nothing higher than a certain exquisiteness of mondain grace, with now and then a touch of rather mawkish sensibility. On the other hand, the expression in that ineffable first major variation struck us as being somewhat overdone; the divine music was not enough allowed to tell its own story. But with the long climax that follows this variation, Mr. Ysaÿe rose to far higher things; here one felt real earnestness, naturalness and power of expression; and the climax was worked up to a white heat with all the force of a true master. It was grand!

Mr. Ysaÿe's own little pieces are charming enough, and showed off both his grace and virtuoso brilliancy in the most convincing manner.

Miss Pfafflin, whom we do not remember to have heard before, has a sweet, light soprano voice which she uses with considerable skill, albeit her tone at times verges somewhat dangerously on throatiness. She shows no little dramatic instinct, too; the way in which she [illegible] Dalila" to her own father tenuous means—never trying to do more than she could do well—was really admirable. She was heard, too, with pleasure in the Bizet and Delibes songs.

Mr. Lachaume played his part in the Franck sonata like a fully competent pianist and musician; in an honest, clear, and unaffected style, and with much feeling and beauty of tone. His playing of the Chopin Ballade—one of the most difficult things to "hold well together" in the whole pianist's repertory — had much that was fine in it, with some less satisfying moments.

The audience was gratifyingly large; indeed it was a real "Paderewski house." Yet, although evidently receptive and by no means cold—nothing could have been cold, by the way, in the oven into which the Music Hall was converted for the occasion — it committed no excesses of enthusiasm. Mr. Ysaÿe's next concert comes on Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 23.

The Cambridge Tribune

SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1894.

Symphony Concert

A Wagner Evening Which Was a Grand Success—Anton Schott Enthusiastically Received—"The Best Concert of the Season" the General Verdict.

The fifth concert in Sanders on Thursday evening, was devoted exclusively to selections from Wagner's works, this being the programme:

Rienzi ..... Overture
Tannhaeuser ..... (a) Elizabeth's Aria
(b) Prelude to Act III.
The Flying Dutchman ..... Overture
Lohengrin ..... Act II. Balcony Scene
Act III. Prelude
Die Meistersinger ..... Prelude to Act III.
Walther's Preisliedct I.
Das Rheingold ..... Procession of the Gods
Die Walküre ..... Spring Song
Siegfried and ..... (a) Waldweben
Die Götterdämerung... (b) Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey.

The soloists were Miss Elsa Kutscherra and Mr. Anton Schott.

At last we have had a full-fledged programme of Wagner music, and a splendidly arranged one at that! Mr. Paur has won and deserved the gratitude of Cambridge for his skill and energy in surmounting the difficulties of such an undertaking. The absence of Madame Nordica alone prevented the concert from being an ideal one, but as it was, the banquet of good things was eagerly and enthusiastically enjoyed by the large audience. The brilliant "Rienzi" overture was splendidly played, the beautiful melody of Rienzi's prayer given out by the strings in the slow Introduction, being interrupted by a roll on the snare drum for all that it was worth! Nothing could be more sharply defined than the contrast between the slow majesty of this theme, and the "Santo Spirito Cavalere" of the Allegro. This overture was composed with the entire opera of Rienzi, der Letzte der Tribunen for the Academic de Musique in Paris and perhaps that is the reason why it constantly suggests French Grand opera, rather than Wagner's characteristic later style, of which it has not a trace.

Miss Elsa Kutscherra, Mr. Walter Damrosch's principal Wagnerian prima donna, made a charming appearance, and sang acceptably and with spirit "Elizabeth's greeting to the hall of song," in the opening scene of the second act in Tannhaeuser. Unfortunately Miss Kutscherra's intonation was constantly false, but she was heard to much better advantage in Elsa's beautiful balcony song. She was warmly received and applauded. The Prelude to Act III introducing Tannhaeuser's pilgrimage was beautifully played, as was also the introduction to the bridal procession in the third act of Lohengrin. This opera is on the most deeply poetic and highly intellectual plane of all Wagner's works, and the smallest excerpts from it are always a source of delight. The overture to the "Flying Dutchman" in which Wagner first developed the idea of first symbolizing his dramatic conceptions by corresponding musical phrases, was faultlessly rendered. One could easily discern the wanderings of the Old Man of the Sea, the Norwegian boat song, Senta's motif, the Angel of Mercy, etc. The Prelude to the third act of Die Meistersinger, was another gem, and a familiar one. Mr. Schott was evidently remembered with delight by the audience, and he was given a rousing reception. He was in splendid voice, and sang Walther's Preisleid with absolute perfection. We have never heard it given with such splendid fire and dramatic force. He was recalled again and again, but, owing to a wise provision in these concerts, he was not allowed to accept the much desired encore. He was equally fine in Siegmund's exquisite love song from the first act of Die Walküre "Die Liebe lockte den Lenz," and was again greeted with a storm of entusiasm.

Mr. Paur showed his usual good judgment in importing such an artist expressly for the occasion. "The Procession of the Gods," from "Das Rheingold," lost some of its impressiveness by being taken out of its natural environment, but was, nevertheless, highly interesting and beautifully played. The Waldweben from "Siegfried" is to our mind far less wonderful than the Siegfried Idyl, but it is redeemed by the flavor of Wagner's genius, and was exquisitely played. The concert ended with a superb performance of Siegfried's journey to Brünnhilde's, rock in which the ever beautiful "fire charm" was given with much brilliancy, also the bird-motive. The introduction to the second part of the Gotterdämmerung prologue was especially fine, in which Siegfried takes leave of Brünnhilde in the morning twilight. The softness of the trombones and horns is gradually joined by the whole orchestra, until the sun rises with a grand outburst of all the brass. We should like to have heard the great closing scene of Brünnhilde, but that was impossible, and too much praise cannot be given Mr. Paur for his wonderfully artistic management of the closing selection and for his masterly conducting throughout the concert. For one small detail four horns were imported for the occasion from New York. The next concert will be on Thursday evening, January 24.

C. R.

...Mrs. Emil Paur, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony, will give five piano recitals in February on the afternoons of the days upon which the Symphony concert is given, as follows: Monday, February 4, Philadelphia; Tuesday, 5, Washington; Wednesday, 6, Baltimore; Thursday, 7, New York; Friday and Saturday, 8 and 9, Brooklyn.

....Madame Lilian Nordica will be the soloist at the Symphony concert in Boston on the 18th and 19th of January. She will also sing at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in New York on Thursday evening of next week. Those who know, say that Mme. Nordica receives $700 each night she sings in opera and $600 for each concert.

...."The very best concert of the season!" was heard on all sides as the delighted crowd filed out of Sanders Theatre last Thursday night. The evening with Wagner was certainly a most pronounced success and Mr. Anton Schott's reception was something unusual in enthusiasm for a Cambridge Symphony audience.

...By one of the accidents that occasionally happen to artists, Mr. Anton Schott's luggage did not come on with him from New York, and as the distinguished singer is of a massive and rotund style of architecture, the ghastly dilemma confronted him of appearing before a Cambridge audience to sing Wagner's "Spring Song" and "Walther's Preislied" in a very unconventional travelling suit. Some kind friend endeavored to charter a dress suit for the occasion, but the measurements appeared to be hopelessly [illegible] and nothing [illegible] Mr. Schott [illegible] professor [illegible] that [illegible] possible [illegible] song [illegible] dress suit. However, Cambridge will always be ready to hear Mr. Schott even if he should be compelled to sing in a shooting jacket.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

IT certainly seemed as if Mr. Emil Paur had determined to "do or die" last Thursday night, for with his orchestra he gave us a tremendous Wagner program made up with considerable skill and fairly illustrative of Wagner's development as a composer. It was an inclement night, but the Metropolitan Opera House was fairly well filled and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played so brilliantly this season. This was the program:

"Rienzi"—
Overture.....
"Tannhäuser"
Act II.—"Elisabeth's Aria".....
Act III.—Prelude.....
"The Flying Dutchman"—
Overture.....
"Lohengrin"—
Act II.—"Balcony Scene".....
Act III.—Prelude.....
"Die Meistersinger"— .....Wagner
Act I.—"Walther's Preislied".....
Act III.—Prelude.....
"Rheingold"—
"Procession of the Gods".....
"Die Walküre"—
"Spring Song".....
"Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung"—
"Waldweben," "Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock," "Morning Dawn" and "Rhine Journey" (Richter arrangement).....

Nordica and Mr. Anton Schott were the solo singers.

It may be premised that an entire evening devoted to an exposition of Wagner's music on the concert stage is neither in consonance with the master's views nor fair to the music played. But to offset this New York has heard so many times the Wagnerian music drama that it is not in the dark when excerpts are given. But frankly the practice is not a laudable one. The symphony should be the "piece de resistance" of the concert room, and the dramatic overture a subsidiary number in the program. The Boston band was at its best in the "Rienzi," the "Dutchman," and the Prelude to the third act of the "Meistersinger." Mr. Paur is not at home in Wagner. The intense dynamic effects are beyond his sympathies, and his temperament is not in touch with the surging, restless, feverish phrases of the modern music drama.

The "Waldweben" lacked poetry, atmosphere, and the Richter arrangement was without climax. The most vital work of the evening was the "Dutchman" overture, which was played with surpassing fire and effect. Nordica sang "Dich Theure Halle" with fervor, and the "Lohengrin" number with much delicacy and feeling. Mr. Schott was happy in his selections, although his voice has lost its bloom and his tendency to explosive emission is painful. But he was vigorous and enthusiastic. So was Mr. Paur, but other qualities are needful, both for singer and conductor. The orchestra was often clangorous, as Mr. Paur is much given to forced dynamic effects.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 17, 1895.

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall before an audience whose numbers were but slightly, if at all, affected by the disagreeable weather outside. Nor was there any lack of the usual cordial and discriminating applause, although the programme was certainly not one that would be thought likely to appeal strongly to any except those whose tastes run level with ultra modern musical ideas. The superb playing of the orchestra, of course, furnishes an excuse—no matter what they play—for recognition and enjoyment, and certainly they deserved the one and afforded the other by their brilliant execution of last night's programme. The numbers, which were selected from the works of Richard Wagner, were as follows:

"Rienzi".....Overture
"Tannhauser".....Act III., Prelude
"The Flying Dutchman".....Overture
"Lohengrin".....Act III., Prelude
"Die Meistersinger".....
.....(a) Act III., Prelude.
.....(b) Act I., Walther's Preislied
"Rheingold".....Procession of the Gods
"Die Walkure".....Spring Song
"Siegfried" and.....(a) Waldweben.
"Die Gotterdammerung"..(b) Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey...(Richter Arrangement)

Such a programme, though it does not offer the pleasing element of variety, is of interest as displaying the gradual development of a great creative mind. Here the first four selections are from operas which were all composed previous to the year 1848, at which time Wagner was 35 years of age. There is force and originality enough in them all to show conclusively that a new composer had arisen, yet in but one ("Lohengrin") are there to be found any marked hints of the wide divergence from established forms with which Wagner was to startle the musical world in after years.

The selections from "Die Meistersinger" belong to a period 20 years later, when his ideas as to the form and mission of opera had been fully formulated, and here they are presented so far as the limitations of a comic opera allow. To this period belong "Rheingold" (the prelude to the "Ring des Nibelungen") and "Tristan and Isolde." In this latter opera he fully expressed himself. To quote his own language—"Here I moved with entire freedom and disregard of all theoretic scruples."

The three final numbers are taken from the great "Nibelungen" trilogy, first produced under his own direction at Bayreuth in 1876. This was his crowning work, and, save for "Parsifal," his last. In these he exhibits not only the freedom in which he exulted 10 years before, but the ripened experience of years and the boldness of one who thoroughly believes in himself and his methods.

The music of no composer, living or dead, suffers more from being presented in fragments on a concert programme than does that of Richard Wagner. It is well known that he himself realized this, and disliked to have it so performed. The reason is not far to seek. It is as though a great painter should be called upon to exhibit his palette and brushes instead of the completed picture. No matter with what gorgeous colors the one might be covered, or of what admirable material the others might be made, the exhibition would hardly be considered a worthy one. There is great originality and wonderful color in Wagner's orchestration, abundance of thematic material and supreme skill in the handling thereof on any page of a Wagner score, but to understand what it all means the whole picture should be undraped. The structural form of any part of his music is more or less meaningless except as it constitutes a part of the grand whole. Consequently a knowledge of the signification of the various "leit-motifs" so cunningly contrasted and intertwined, and a familiarity with the story they are meant to illustrate, must precede any intelligent understanding of Wagner's later works. As this knowledge and familiarity are not possessed by the great majority of concert-goers, the only impression they receive is that of a bewildering maze of sound, which leads they know not where. That, which all this disadvantage, excerpts from Wagner's works do impress audiences profoundly is a sufficient proof that "the master," as his admirers lovingly term him, was in very truth one of the world's greatest composers.

The soloist of the evening was Herr Anton Schott, the famous German tenor, long and brilliantly identified with the singing of Wagnerian roles. His voice shows but little decadence from its prime, though its owner is past the meridian of life. It is still of marvellous power, mellow as the note of a horn, and able to dominate the powerful orchestration with which it has to contend for supremacy. His singing last night gave great satisfaction, and he was often recalled. Herr Schott's breast blazed with medals, some of which he has won upon other than musical fields, for he has been through the great German wars, and won his decorations for conspicuous bravery on the field of battle. He commanded a battery of artillery with rank of Captain, and, though not now in active service, holds the rank of Major, and would command a section if the German army should again be mobilized.

The orchestra's next concert takes place on the evening of Wednesday, Feb. 20.

THE EVENING BULLETIN.

PUBLISHED BY THE

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 17, 1895.

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall before an audience whose numbers were but slightly, if at all, affected by the disagreeable weather outside. Nor was there any lack of the usual cordial and discriminating applause, although the programme was certainly not one that would be thought likely to appeal strongly to any except those whose tastes run level with ultra modern musical ideas. The superb playing of the orchestra, of course, furnishes an excuse—no matter what they play—for recognition and enjoyment, and certainly they deserved the one and afforded the other by their brilliant execution of last night's programme. The numbers, which were selected from the works of Richard Wagner, were as follows:

"Rienzi".....Overture
"Tannhauser".....Act III., Prelude
"The Flying Dutchman".....Overture
"Lohengrin".....Act III., Prelude
"Die Meistersinger".....
.....(a) Act III., Prelude.
.....(b) Act I., Walther's Preislied
"Rheingold".....Procession of the Gods
"Die Walkure".....Spring Song
"Siegfried" and.....(a) Waldweben.
"Die Gotterdammerung"..(b) Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey...(Richter Arrangement)

Such a programme, though it does not offer the pleasing element of variety, is of interest as displaying the gradual development of a great creative mind. Here the first four selections are from operas which were all composed previous to the year 1848, at which time Wagner was 35 years of age. There is force and originality enough in them all to show conclusively that a new composer had arisen, yet in but one ("Lohengrin") are there to be found any marked hints of the wide divergence from established forms with which Wagner was to startle the musical world in after years.

The selections from "Die Meistersinger" belong to a period 20 years later, when his ideas as to the form and mission of opera had been fully formulated, and here they are presented so far as the limitations of a comic opera allow. To this period belong "Rheingold" (the prelude to the "Ring des Nibelungen") and "Tristan and Isolde." In this latter opera he fully expressed himself. To quote his own language—"Here I moved with entire freedom and disregard of all theoretic scruples."

The three final numbers are taken from the great "Nibelungen" trilogy, first produced under his own direction at Bayreuth in 1876. This was his crowning work, and, save for "Parsifal," his last. In these he exhibits not only the freedom in which he exulted 10 years before, but the ripened experience of years and the boldness of one who thoroughly believes in himself and his methods.

The music of no composer, living or dead, suffers more from being presented in fragments on a concert programme than does that of Richard Wagner. It is well known that he himself realized this, and disliked to have it so performed. The reason is not far to seek. It is as though a great painter should be called upon to exhibit his palette and brushes instead of the completed picture. No matter with what gorgeous colors the one might be covered, or of what admirable material the others might be made, the exhibition would hardly be considered a worthy one. There is great originality and wonderful color in Wagner's orchestration, abundance of thematic material and supreme skill in the handling thereof on any page of a Wagner score, but to understand what it all means the whole picture should be undraped. The structural form of any part of his music is more or less meaningless except as it constitutes a part of the grand whole. Consequently a knowledge of the signification of the various "leit-motifs" so cunningly contrasted and intertwined, and a familiarity with the story they are meant to illustrate, must precede any intelligent understanding of Wagner's later works. As this knowledge and familiarity are not possessed by the great majority of concert-goers, the only impression they receive is that of a bewildering maze of sound, which leads they know not where. That, which all this disadvantage, excerpts from Wagner's works do impress audiences profoundly is a sufficient proof that "the master," as his admirers lovingly term him, was in very truth one of the world's greatest composers.

The soloist of the evening was Herr Anton Schott, the famous German tenor, long and brilliantly identified with the singing of Wagnerian roles. His voice shows but little decadence from its prime, though its owner is past the meridian of life. It is still of marvellous power, mellow as the note of a horn, and able to dominate the powerful orchestration with which it has to contend for supremacy. His singing last night gave great satisfaction, and he was often recalled. Herr Schott's breast blazed with medals, some of which he has won upon other than musical fields, for he has been through the great German wars, and won his decorations for conspicuous bravery on the field of battle. He commanded a battery of artillery with rank of Captain, and, though not now in active service, holds the rank of Major, and would command a section if the German army should again be mobilized.

The orchestra's next concert takes place on the evening of Wednesday, Feb. 20.

The Telegram.

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

PROVIDENCE TELEGRAM PUB. CO.,

THURSDAY, JANUARY, 17, 1895.

MIGHTY WAGNER.

Symphony Concert Devoted to the Master's Great Work.

It takes a pretty boisterous night to depreciate attendance at a Boston Symphony orchestra concert, and this was abundantly evidenced by the size of the assemblage in Infantry hall last night. The orchestra appeared there for the fourth time this season, and it is a pleasure to record that the occasion was the most distinguished, so far as the character of the music and the quality of the performance went. Every selection on the program was a Wagner production, starting with the virile and polished "Rienzi" overture and finishing with "Die Gotterdammerung." Naturally so heavy a menu required vigorous and trained powers of digestion, and to those who possessed this capacity it was a treat not to be described in words.

The orchestra was skillfully directed by Mr. Paur, and it gave a series of interpretations that was thoroughly grand. The unrivaled opportunities for tone coloring and massing, the picturesqueness and magnificence of the brass effects, the impetuousness and thunder and the deft shading, which are so wonderfully characteristic of Wagner's imposing works, all these elements were most effectively brought out. Perfection is the only term which fits the style in which the orchestra rendered every passage.

The soloist, Mr. Anton Schott, proved a big power in the entertainment. He is a massive personage, commanding and impressive in his bearing, and enthusiastic in his manner, and as he came before the audience last night, his broad front glittering with medals of honor received during his illustrious career as a soldier and a musician, he made a most conspicuous figure. His vocal work was admirable. His voice rang resonantly and magnetically as of yore, and he displayed the same faculty for holding every auditor as if by some occult and irresistible influence that he has always possessed. Encores demonstrated the satisfaction of the gathering.

The fifth performance will occur Feb. 23.

The New-York Times.

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, JAN. 11, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening was devoted to the exposition of the works of Richard Wagner. As a natural result, the house was a large one for such a discouraging night. Had the weather been clear, the audience would have been the largest that has attended any concert of the gentlemen of Boston this season. The programme was comprehensive and delightful. It embraced the following numbers: Overture to "Rienzi," Elizabeth's aria from Act II. and the prelude to Act III. of "Tannhäuser," the overture to the "Flying Dutchman," the balcony scene and the prelude to Act III. of "Lohengrin," the prelude to Act III. and Walther's prize song from the same act of "Die Meistersinger," the procession of the gods from the last scene of "Das Rheingold," the Spring song from "Die Walküre," the "Waldweber" from "Siegfried," and Hans Richter's arrangement of Siegfried's passage to Brünnhilde's rock, the morning dawn, and the Rhine journey. The soloists were Mme. Nordica and Anton Schott.

It is hardly necessary to say anything about either of these singers. Mme. Nordica's Wagner singing has been made sufficiently familiar in the course of the opera season, and Mr. Schott's can be made sufficiently familiar to any reasonable human being in about three minutes. There was very little left of either Hans Sachs or Sieglinde when he got through with his work last night. Mme. Nordica deserves a special word for her beautiful delivery of Elsa's balcony reverie. Mr. Paur is hardly an ideal interpreter of Wagner's music. He is too methodical. His readings remind one of M. Maurel's acting. The whole scheme is on the surface. This is especially the case when Mr. Paur has to deal with such a delicate and poetic bit of music as the first part of the prelude to Act. III. of "Die Meistersinger." The joints of his phrasing show themselves altogether too clearly. In the overture to the "Flying Dutchman," where he was compelled to take a tempo too fast for such dissecting articulation, he was at his best. The number was played with splendid spirit, with warmth, and with color. It made one think of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of old times. In the prelude to Act. III. of "Lohengrin," the conductor was again at home. In the music selected from the trilogy, he appeared to less advantage. Here again his deliberate method of exposing all the joints between phrases was injurious to the romantic spirit of the music. However, it was a delight to hear all the old favorites again, and the concert served as a pleasant foretaste of the feast which Mr. Damrosch is to set before us later on.

The New York Recorder.

BY GEORGE W. TURNER.

FRIDAY, January 11, 1895.

ONLY WAGNER WAS PLAYED

Nine of His Music Dramas Sampled at the Boston Symphony Concert.

Conductor Paur Deals Too Much in Overwrought Crescendoes—A Cloying Programme.

For a visiting orchestra to play a Wagner programme in New York is like fetching coals to New Castle, especially when Mr. Emil Paur conducts such an excursion. So the Wagner programme, played last night at the Metropolitan Opera House by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was too long and dragged in interest, despite a rather ingeniously arranged scheme, one that illustrated Wagner's development, for no less than nine of his music dramas were represented, while "Tristan and Isolde" and "Parsifal" were conspicuous by their absence.

It is more than an open question whether an entire Wagner programme can be defended on good aesthetic grounds. Of all the musical moderns, Wagner can least stand the test of the concert room. He knew it himself, and laid the embargo of his displeasure on the conductor who gave excerpts from his music in concert performances. Then, it is true, with Wagnerian logic, he broke his own rule, but even such a precedent is dangerous.

Wagner's style is so foreign to the concert halls and depends so much on dramatic accessories that it suffers without them. Then, too, for a whole evening his music is cloying as despite all the boasts of his blind worshippers. His versatility is much overrated. His moods run in high, emotional grooves. His restless feverishness becomes monotonous when not framed by the operatic mise en scene, and his orchestral language, sonorous, sumptuous in suggestion and high-pitched in color scheme, tells heavily on the nerves before an evening wears away. And when you add to all this a conductor who is more muscular than poetic, and without imagination or mood-versatility, you tell the story of last night's concert.

Paur has of late gone in for temperament, no doubt because his critics have dwelt on his temperamental deficiencies. So in the playing of his band there is noticeable now a strenuous quality, forced fortissimos, strained pianissimos. The effect is of roughness, even of harshness. The wood wind and brass are made to work too hard by Mr. Paur, who has suddenly become enamored of power and overwrought crescendos. Delicacy of phrasing is often sacrificed, and the most brilliant the orchestra did last night was the "Rienzi" overture with its circus-like finale.

There was, however, other good work done during the evening. The prelude to the third act of "Tannhauser," the Rhinegold selection, and the "Dutchman" overture were played well. When Mr. Paur is not on the rampage he is neat. Really his earlier manner was the best—for him; cut and dried mechanical conducting. Of storm and stress he should beware. The "Walweben" was cleverly done, with few technical slips, but it lacked poesy, the mellow atmosphere of the mid-forest.

Nordica sang "Dich Theure Halle" and looked very smiling and handsome. Then she sang the balcony scene from "Lohengrin," and only looked handsome—her smile had fled. She was in good Nordica voice. Anton Schott, the famous tenor with the apopleptic method, delivered, or rather shot, at his audience the prize song from 'Die Walkure." His voice, his face, his decorations, were an impressionistic study in scarlet. He seems well preserved for a Wagner singer.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, JANUARY 11, 1895.

WAGNER WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Wagner was the sole composer represented upon the programme of the concert given last evening in the Metropolitan by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Evidently an attempt had been made to exhibit the art life of the master, from the cradle to the grave. Every period in the development of his genius and every phase of his fecund imagination was displayed in some example, covering as they did "Rienzi," "Der Fliegende Hollaender," "Lohengrin," "Tannhaeuser," "Die Meistersinger," and the "Nibelungen" series.

The performance was worthy of the programme. The prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" was not as clear cut as it would have been had the tempo not been so extremely fast, for, though the technique of the organization, taken as a body, is equal to anything, an air of breathless agitation characterized the excerpt. On the other hand the prelude to the third act of "Tannhaeuser" was a perfect example of poetic pathos, and the prelude from "Die Miestersinger"—again the third act—was a marvel of tonal color and grace. The overture to "Rienzi," too, was excellently played.

Mme. Nordica sang the "Dich, theure Halle" with magnificent breadth. The number was the most perfect in performance of any during the evening and breathed a spirit of exalted passion. The excerpt from "Lohengrin"—the balcony music—was rather too dreamy, for it was almost inaudible.

Mr. Anton Schott made a strident reappearance in Walther's "Preislied" and the "Fruhlingslied" from "Die Walkure" and delighted many of the audience.

[80]

...AIL AND EXPRESS.
... & St. Paul's Churchyard,
New York.

Evening, Jan. 11, 1895.

...ston Symphony Orchestra Wagner Concert Last Night.

The first concert of the season devoted exclusively to the works of Richard Wagner was given last night at the Metropolitan Opera House by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Emil Paur's leadership. The programme was put together with skill and a good idea of contrast, and was rendered with the assistance of Mme. Nordica and Mr. Anton Schott.

Mr. Paur's leadership of the admirably trained orchestra was not altogether satisfactory. In several of the numbers the work was very good indeed, but in "Rhinegold" and Hans Richter's arrangement of the excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung" his interpretation lacked the real meaning and depth which could have been brought out. There was no imagination or deep feeling shown, and the wonderful "motives" sometimes rather lost their significance from the narrow manner in which they were played. In some of the numbers, however, Mr. Paur succeeded well, especially where real inspiration was not needed.

The orchestra is one of the best in training and general make-up, and the smoothness and precision of its work were as much a feature last night as at all the concerts of this organization.

Mme. Nordica was thoroughly satisfactory in her two solos, Elizabeth's aria from Act II. of "Tannhauser" and Elsa's song on the balcony from Act II. of "Lohengrin." When Mme. Nordica sings Elsa one feels that she has behind her interpretation the authority of Mme. Wagner, and she is convincing and adequate in the role. The rendition of the balcony scene was delightful, and the aria from "Tannhauser" was sung with significance and power.

Mr. Anton Schott sang the "Prieslied" from "Die Meistersinger" and the "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure." His voice is of fine quality in the upper registers, though lacking in life and vibration. His singing of the "Preislied" was not what it should have been; he slighted the lower notes and gave the whole less dignity and fervor than it needed. The "Spring Song" was also rather inadequate.

The large attendance last night, in spite of the exceedingly disagreeable weather, shows how the New Yorkers appreciate a Wagner concert by such a fine organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Kneisel Quartet of Boston will play this evening in Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall. The programme includes a quartet in F major of Dvorak, the Larghetto and Scherzo from Cherubini's D minor quartet and the A minor quartet of Beethoven. This is to be the first of three concerts by this organization.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 11, 1895.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The need of a "Wagner programme" in the scheme of a concert orchestra's series in New-York at the present day is not evident, at least so far as the musical public is concerned. The justification for a concert devoted wholly to excerpts and fragments from Wagner's works lies not so much in the aesthetic needs of the community as in an ambition, undoubtedly pardonable, on the part of the conductor of such an organization at the Boston Symphony Orchestra to exploit the magnificent powers of his band in this special field and to make known his own ideas respecting the interpretation of Wagner's music. In this view of the case the concert of Wagnerian fragments offered last evening by the Boston Orchestra was an eminent success. It revealed anew the mastery of the organization over some of the most difficult tasks that can be set an orchestra, and it showed Mr. Paur's abilities and limitations as a conductor more clearly than they have before been shown.

The programme included some of the most familiar of Wagner's overtures and instrumental movements. The technical achievements of the orchestra were of the highest; it responded to every intention of the conductor, as clay in the hands of the potter, and there was much that was brilliantly played, and with an admirable and satisfying richness of tonal quality; such were the "Flying Dutchman" overture, and the selection from the third act of "Die Meistersinger." But in general it may be said that there were evident in Mr. Paur's readings an excessive effort at elaboration, an overdue emphasis of detail, a lack of freedom and of fire that were fatal to the impression of unity and to the emotional significance of the music. In his climaxes, too, there was a lack of that reserve power and overwhelming dramatic intensity that the New-York musical public has learned are inherent in Wagner's music and can be brought out of it by him who has the secret. Mr. Paur can justly be credited with many excellences, but he failed last evening to carry conviction as an interpreter of Wagner's music.

The solo singers were Mme. Nordica, who sang "Dich, theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," and the balcony scene from "Lohengrin," the latter with exquisite tenderness and dignity; and Anton Schott, whose selections were Walther's "Preislied" from "Die Meistersinger" and Siegmund's song from the first act of "Die Walküre." He sang with vigor and with declamatory forcefulness, and even, generally, in time, but his voice sounded worn and lacking in color.

...Evening Post.

New York, Friday, Jan. 11, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Wagner programme which Mr. Paur selected for the third concert of his orchestra drew a larger audience than attended the other concerts, although the weather was abominable and the condition of the streets a horrible reminiscence of Tammany rule. Without going into details, it may be said that Mr. Paur was heard to better advantage in the selections from the music-dramas than in those from the early operas. The music of Wagner's "storm and stress" period calls for a Bohemian abandon which does not comport well with academic nicety and trimness. It is useless to try to make the "Rienzi" overture refined; it should be played as a sensational attempt to beat Meyerbeer on his own grounds. But in everything that the Boston Orchestra played one could not but admire the wonderful ensemble, the absolutely perfect crescendos and decrescendos, the rich glow of color, which in the Procession of the Gods, from "Rheingold," and in Siegfried's Rhinejourney, especially dazzled the hearer. It was excellent Wagner-playing, much better than what we are accustomed to hear at Carnegie Hall; yet it was not fully convincing; it interested but did not convey the heat of enthusiasm. The plain truth is that Mr. Seidl has spoiled us for other Wagner conductors, just as Mr. Paderewski has spoiled us for other pianists. The one disadvantage of going to Switzerland is that other mountain-chains ever after seem small, and make us long again for Monte Rosa and the Matterhorn.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 11, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert—A Wagnerian Programme.

It is not a pleasure to record that the Metropolitan Opera House contained a small audience last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Society. The programme was made up exclusively from Wagner's works, containing a selection given in chronological order from every one of his operas, excepting "Tristan and Isolde." The soloists of the evening were Mme. Nordica and Anton Schott, the veteran tenor whose participation in the performance was no element in its success; and last night his present incapacity was augmented by the temporary drawback that he was not in good voice. Mme. Nordica sang Elisabeth's aria from "Tannhäuser," "Euch theure Hallen," with splendid expressiveness, and gave the balcony music from "Lohengrin" as she has often sung it this season. Her voice was not in particularly good condition in either aria, but this deficiency was compensated for by the admirable intelligence and feeling with which she rendered the music. Herr Schott laboriously intoned the Preislied and Siegmund's Love Song with very discouraging results.

Mr. Paur conducted the instrumental music with the greatest familiarity, rarely glancing at the score. New Yorkers may have grown to accept as authoritative Mr. Seidl's readings of Wagner's music, and the fact that Mr. Paur often takes the slow movements more slowly than we are accustomed to hear them, and the fast movements with unaccustomed accelerando, may have proved a novelty for which the audience was unprepared. The orchestra showed, however in spite of its many admirable characteristics, the splendid sonority of the strings and its exquisite delicacy in the wood instruments, that it lacks one feature which makes the music of Wagner different from all other, and that is the quality of elasticity. This is the quality one is likely to appreciate first in the hastening and retarding of the tempo and in the indeterminate and conflicting rhythms and melodies of Wagner's music. The Boston Symphony plays admirably as to every formal requirement in tone and shading, and these excellent qualities make it deficient at times in the most completely successful interpretation of Wagner's music. The introduction to the third act of "Tannhäuser" was taken much more slowly than it is usually given. The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" was the best performance of the concert, played with splendid spirit and expression. The prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" was the usual arrangement of the prelude in conjunction with the scenes of festivities in the third act, and was marked by rather more lively movement than it is usually given with. Four excerpts from the Nibelung Ring closed the concert.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 20, 1895.

It is probably essential to the contentment of a considerable portion of the musical community that a Wagner programme should come in somewhere during the Symphony season. M. Paur put it in yesterday, making it the basis of his twelfth concert And thus he arranged it: "Rienzi"—Overture. "Tannhauser"—Act. II., "Elizabeth's Aria." Act. III., prelude. "Flying Dutchman"—Overture. "Lohengrin"—Act. III., prelude. "Meistersinger"—Act. III., prelude; Dance of Apprentices and Procession; Act I., "Walther's Preislied." "Rheingold"—"Procession of the Gods." "Die Walkure"—"Spring Song." "Siegfried"—"Waldweben." "Gotterdammerung"—"Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," arranged by Hans Richter.

About such a programme there is nothing critical to be said. It illustrates the best that there is in the great composer's scores of what can be taken as absolute music, capable of giving pleasures and awakening moods by its own sounds and phrases. In its way this was a historical programme, because with one exception its order was chronological, beginning with the furious clangor and tremendous piety of the melodramatic period, and so passing on through the transition period of the "Dutchman" and other romantic operas to the "lyric drama" epoch, with its dying suggestions of that possible return to lighter and more melodious moods which Wagner's own end precluded.

The performance by the orchestra, much enlarged according to the exigencies of some selections, generally was splendid work. The present homogeity and and fine qualities of the wooden wind were never more manifest, the brass succeeded in being full almost to tumultuousness without being blatant, and the virtuosity of the strings was splendid in its strength, surety and celerity. Great animation, order and interest prevailed, and when all the special instruments of percussion were involved, the kettle-drummer, even though he had a whole row about him, was obliged to give up sometimes as beaten as his drums. Mr. Paur's treatment was for the most part felicitous both intellectually and passionately; but the gentler and more suave passages suffered from too much severity and too little sympathy. The two songs were rendered with his best appreciation and ability by Mr. Schott, whose eminent merit as a Wagner singer has been long recognized here. In the "Prize Song" even his voluminous and resonant tones were overwhelmed by the irrational violence of the accompaniment; but in the "Spring Song" Mr. Paur showed some consideration and allowed the audience to hear something beside the band.

The audience packed the hall and applauded loud and long, recalling Mr. Paur at the end of the first part and Mr. Schott at the end of his song.

At the next concert Mr. Cesar Thomson, the other distinguished violinist of the season, will make his debut, playing a concerto of Goldmark, and the orchestra will perform Dvorak's "American" symphony, a symphonic poem of Smetana and Beethoven's "Leonora, No. 2" overture.

And apropos of this Wagner programme, which was the same to all effects and purposes as was given in New York week before last, a funny thing was printed in the Commercial Advertiser over the signature of Mr. Vance Thompson, who has some about as original and eccentric ideas about music and performances of music as anybody who divulges in public his private opinons. For in commenting upon the concert, he remarked that Mr. Paur conducted the overture "in far too well-bred a manner" and further alleged that the conductor's "chief sin is lackadaisicality." We believe Mr. Thompson to be a newcomer to New York—certainly to the department of musical criticism there. Can it be that what he has heard of the New York orchestras has deadened the normal sensibility of his tympanum? Or was he perhaps born with a dullness of hearing? For us of Boston, who have four times as many opportunities of acquainting ourselves with Mr. Paur's conducting, the opinion stands that his "chief sin" is a growing robustiousness of effect and a disposition to force the volume of orchestral sound until its quality is in danger of degenerating into noise. But stay—can it be that Boston is becoming enfeebled and assimilating itself unconsciously to the nature of a friend who accompanied Mr. Thompson to the concert and gave assurance that "he was affected with the proper vibration?" Because of this friend it is not too kindly written that his "temperament is unusually gelatinous." But yet again—can Mr. Thompson be so very wise in men, manners or music, since in this same article, laboring to be humorous about Hans Sachs sitting under a supposititious elder tree, he says of himself,—"My arboreal knowledge is very scant; I couldn't tell an elder from Susannah." That certainly does not argue much good for the young gentleman's cognitions or his judgment. And so, perhaps, the average Boston opinion about Mr. Paur's handling of Wagner is quite as likely to be correct as Mr. Thompson's, especially as the Tribune, which measures the world of music with its yard-stick, implies that the rendering of the programme was overcharged, in spite of some lack of dramatic intensity.

If so small a thing can afford a grain of comfort to the Musical Courier, which has been sitting in silent, speechless sorrow since its diatribes against Mr. Paur went for nothing, why should any good Bostonian begrudge it? Mr. Philip Hale having said in print, as has been also said and sung by others, that it would not be a bad plan to have a man of some other than German birth and education come in time to the head of the Symphony Orchestra, bringing more catholic views, tastes and cognitions, the Courier plucks up a spirit for new imaginings and writes:—"There is a cloud no bigger perhaps than a man's hand on the musical horizon. There is an undercurrent of grumbling in Boston about Mr. Paur and his cast iron beat, and the grumbling is done by the music critics. Whether Mr. Paur is or is not a great conductor is not the question now. What principally concerns Mr. Higginson is that the Boston Symphony orchestra has unquestionably lost some of its prestige during the past year." All of which shows that the Courier does not understand Boston criticism any better than Mr. Krehbiel and does not get a good grip on facts.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston ...

SUNDAY, JANUARY 20, 1895.

The program of the 12th Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was devoted to selections from the opera of Wagner, and was as follows:

"Rienzi," overture (1842).
"Tannhauser," introduction to Act III. (Tannhauser's pilgrimage), (1845).
"Der Fliegende Hollander," overture (1843).
"Lohengrin," introduction to Act III. (1850).
"Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," a. Prelude to Act III., dance of apprentices, procession of master singers and hymn to Hans Sachs (1868). b. Walther's prize song, Act III., scene 5.
"Das Rheingold," procession of the gods and lament of the Rhine daughters (1869).
"Die Walkure," Siegmund's love song, Act I., scene 3 (1870).
"Siegfried," "Waldweben" (1876).
"Gotterdammerung," Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's rock, morning dawn, and Siegfried's Rhine journey (1876).

This program is given in full as a matter of record, and also because, as arranged, it gives some idea of the growth of Wagner. As the compiler of the program book justly says, "Rienzi" contains "little or nothing that can be called characteristically Wagnerian." No wonder that Wagner in later years was ashamed of it, and would fain have all copies burned or at the bottom of the sea. The overture is one of the cheapest and most vulgar compositions ever written by a great musician. Yet its brutality and circus-pomp appeal to an audience and it is almost always welcomed as though it were a masterpiece. The growth of Wagner from this crude imitation of the style of Meyerbeer and Halévy to the best portions of "Parsifal" is only equaled by the steady improvement of Verdi from "Oberto" to "Aida."

Again let it be said, that Mr. Paur arranged this program with more than ordinary skill. It not only showed the growth of Wagner; it also gave within a reasonable length of time an excellent opportunity of hearing him at his best. However much ferocious Wagnerites may deplore the fact, the people at large prefer such tunes as Walther's prize song and Siegmund's love song to the passages that are so dear to the ultra-Wagnerites on account of alleged tremendous meaning and dire import. It may be said in passing that Mr. Schott declaimed these same tunes vigorously and with what is called Wagnerian understanding. He was in good voice and excellent general physical condition.

It would be easy to dilate on the fact that such a program seems singularly out of place in a Symphony concert. But, after all, perhaps it is better, if these excerpts must be heard to lump them all together, and devote an evening to the exhibition. If any of the subscribers do not like the feast provided, they can then send their regrets without fear of losing the opportunity of meeting an old and esteemed friend, or becoming acquainted with some one worth knowing. There was a time when such a concert would have provoked wild discussion. Some would have found no pleasure in it. Others, afflicted sorely with Wagneritis, would have echoed King Nebuchadnezzar and commanded their neighbors in these words: "That at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the golden image."

But there is no golden image in music to be worshiped blindly. The genius of Wagner is acknowledged, just as the genius of Mozart, Weber, Verdi, and Bizet is acknowledged. No one is now compelled to say that everything in the gigantic music dramas is worthy of blind adoration.

Indeed, the more you hear the music of Wagner, the more you detect commonplace passages. This may sound like a paradox; and perhaps it needs this explanation: That just as in "Don Giovanni" there are certain Mozartian formulas which today seem stale and trite, so beyond doubt and peradventure mannerisms and formulas of Wagner will provoke yawns a century from now. That which is great and glorious will remain. Remember that "Don Giovanni" and "The Marriage of Figaro" still hold the stage, and they were written over a century ago.

It would be idle also to dilate on the fact that such concerts are flagrantly in variation of the expressed theories of Wagner. As Wagner himself violated nearly all his pet theories, what would be the use of spinning words about the enormity of this particular offence?

Let it be said, then, that there was a great audience, which gave long and loud manifestations of delight. The performance of the orchestra was brilliant, and Mr. Paur showed himself thoroughly in sympathy with the works of which he was interpreter.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 20, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

Brilliant Wagner Programme — Other Musical Events.

The patrons of the Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening thoroughly enjoyed themselves. Instead of endeavoring not to look bored over a long symphony, which nine-tenths of them could not understand, they were treated to a Wagner programme, composed of selections from the chief works of the great composer.

Mr. Paur had chosen wisely, and every one of the ten numbers was heartily applauded. The leader demonstrated that he was as much at home with the writings of the German masters as in the classic works of Beethoven, and a more pleasing interpretation of Wagner has seldom, if ever, been heard in this city. The orchestral numbers of Wagner are especially effective, and rendered by the large orchestra whose leader not only has his men in perfect control, but is thoroughly familiar with the compositions of his fellow countryman, the result could scarcely fail to be pleasing. The overtures to "Rienzi" and the "Flying Dutchman," the introd uction to the third act of "Lohengrin" and the procession of the gods from "Rhine-Gold" were the best.

Anton Schott was the soloist and sang Walther's prize song from "The Meistersinger" and Seigmund's love song from "Der Walkure." In the latter Mr. Schott's voice sounded hard and metallic and failed to realize the full beauty of the number. The audience was by far the largest of the season.

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the soloist will be Mr. Carson Thomson, the violinist.

[81]

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS.
Broadway & St. Paul's Churchyard, New York.
Friday Evening, Jan. 11, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Wagner Concert Last Night.

The first concert of the season devoted exclusively to the works of Richard Wagner was given last night at the Metropolitan Opera House by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Emil Paur's leadership. The programme was put together with skill and a good idea of contrast, and was rendered with the assistance of Mme. Nordica and Mr. Anton Schott.

Mr. Paur's leadership of the admirably trained orchestra was not altogether satisfactory. In several of the numbers the work was very good indeed, but in "Rhinegold" and Hans Richter's arrangement of the excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung" his interpretation lacked the real meaning and depth which could have been brought out. There was no imagination or deep feeling shown, and the wonderful "motives" sometimes rather lost their significance from the narrow manner in which they were played. In some of the numbers, however, Mr. Paur succeeded well, especially where real inspiration was not needed.

The orchestra is one of the best in training and general make-up, and the smoothness and precision of its work were as much a feature last night as at all the concerts of this organization.

Mme. Nordica was thoroughly satisfactory in her two solos, Elizabeth's aria from Act II. of "Tannhauser" and Elsa's song on the balcony from Act II. of "Lohengrin." When Mme. Nordica sings Elsa one feels that she has behind her interpretation the authority of Mme. Wagner, and she is convincing and adequate in the role. The rendition of the balcony scene was delightful, and the aria from "Tannhauser" was sung with significance and power.

Mr. Anton Schott sang the "Prieslied" from "Die Meistersinger" and the "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure." His voice is of fine quality in the upper registers, though lacking in life and vibration. His singing of the "Preislied" was not what it should have been; he slighted the lower notes and gave the whole less dignity and fervor than it needed. The "Spring Song" was also rather inadequate.

The large attendance last night, in spite of the exceedingly disagreeable weather, shows how the New Yorkers appreciate a Wagner concert by such a fine organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Kneisel Quartet of Boston will play this evening in Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall. The programme includes a quartet in F major of Dvorak, the Larghetto and Scherzo from Cherubini's D minor quartet and the A minor quartet of Beethoven. This is to be the first of three concerts by this organization.

New-York Daily Tribune.
FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 11, 1895.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The need of a "Wagner programme" in the scheme of a concert orchestra's series in New-York at the present day is not evident, at least so far as the musical public is concerned. The justification for a concert devoted wholly to excerpts and fragments from Wagner's works lies not so much in the aesthetic needs of the community as in an ambition, undoubtedly pardonable, on the part of the conductor of such an organization at the Boston Symphony Orchestra to exploit the magnificent powers of his band in this special field and to make known his own ideas respecting the interpretation of Wagner's music. In this view of the case the concert of Wagnerian fragments offered last evening by the Boston Orchestra was an eminent success. It revealed anew the mastery of the organization over some of the most difficult tasks that can be set an orchestra, and it showed Mr. Paur's abilities and limitations as a conductor more clearly than they have before been shown.

The programme included some of the most familiar of Wagner's overtures and instrumental movements. The technical achievements of the orchestra were of the highest; it responded to every intention of the conductor, as clay in the hands of the potter, and there was much that was brilliantly played, and with an admirable and satisfying richness of tonal quality; such were the "Flying Dutchman" overture, and the selection from the third act of "Die Meistersinger." But in general it may be said that there were evident in Mr. Paur's readings an excessive effort at elaboration, an overdue emphasis of detail, a lack of freedom and of fire that were fatal to the impression of unity and to the emotional significance of the music. In his climaxes, too, there was a lack of that reserve power and overwhelming dramatic intensity that the New-York musical public has learned are inherent in Wagner's music, and can be brought out of it by him who has the secret. Mr. Paur can justly be credited with many excellences, but he failed last evening to carry conviction as an interpreter of Wagner's music.

The solo singers were Mme. Nordica, who sang "Dich, theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," and the balcony scene from "Lohengrin," the latter with exquisite tenderness and dignity; and Anton Schott, whose selections were Walther's "Preislied" from "Die Meistersinger" and Siegmund's song from the first act of "Die Walküre." He sang with vigor and with declamatory forcefulness, and even, generally, in time, but his voice sounded worn and lacking in color.

The Evening Post.
New York, Friday, Jan. 11, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Wagner programme which Mr. Paur elected for the third concert of his orchestra drew a larger audience than attended the other concerts, although the weather was abominable and the condition of the streets a horrible reminiscence of Tammany rule. Without going into details, it may be said that Mr. Paur was heard to better advantage in the selections from the music-dramas than in those from the early operas. The music of Wagner's "storm and stress" period calls for a Bohemian abandon which does not comport well with academic nicety and trimness. It is useless to try to make the "Rienzi" overture refined; it should be played as a sensational attempt to beat Meyerbeer on his own grounds. But in everything that the Boston Orchestra played one could not but admire the wonderful ensemble, the absolutely perfect crescendos and decrescendos, the rich glow of color, which in the Procession of the Gods, from "Reingold," and in Siegfried's Rhinejourney, especially dazzled the hearer. It was excellent Wagner-playing, much better than what we are accustomed to hear at Carnegie Hall; yet it was not fully convincing; it interested but did not convey the heat of enthusiasm. The plain truth is that Mr. Seidl has spoiled us for other Wagner conductors, just as Mr. Paderewski has spoiled us for other pianists. The one disadvantage of going to Switzerland is that other mountain-chains ever after seem small, and make us long again for Monte Rosa and the Matterhorn.

The Sun.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 11, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert—A Wagnerian Programme.

It is not a pleasure to record that the Metropolitan Opera House contained a small audience last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Society. The programme was made up exclusively from Wagner's works, containing a selection given in chronological order from every one of his operas, excepting "Tristan and Isolde." The soloists of the evening were Mme. Nordica and Anton Schott, the veteran tenor whose participation in the performance was no element in its success; and last night his present incapacity was augmented by the temporary drawback that he was not in good voice. Mme. Nordica sang Elisabeth's aria from "Tannhäuser," "Euch theure Hallen," with splendid expressiveness, and gave the balcony music from "Lohengrin" as she has often sung it this season. Her voice was not in particularly good condition in either aria, but this deficiency was compensated for by the admirable intelligence and feeling with which she rendered the music. Herr Schott laboriously intoned the Preislied and Siegmund's Love Song with very discouraging results.

Mr. Paur conducted the instrumental music with the greatest familiarity, rarely glancing at the score. New Yorkers may have grown to accept as authoritative Mr. Seidl's readings of Wagner's music, and the fact that Mr. Paur often takes the slow movements more slowly than we are accustomed to hear them, and the fast movements with unaccustomed accelerando, may have proved a novelty for which the audience was unprepared. The orchestra showed, however in spite of its many admirable characteristics, the splendid sonority of the strings and its exquisite delicacy in the wood instruments, that it lacks one feature which makes the music of Wagner different from all other, and that is the quality of elasticity. This is the quality one is likely to appreciate first in the hastening and retarding of the tempo and in the indeterminate and conflicting rhythms and melodies of Wagner's music. The Boston Symphony plays admirably as to every formal requirement in tone and shading, and these excellent qualities make it deficient at times in the most completely successful interpretation of Wagner's music. The introduction to the third act of "Tannhäuser" was taken much more slowly than it is usually given. The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" was the best performance of the concert, played with splendid spirit and expression. The prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" was the usual arrangement of the prelude in conjunction with the scenes of festivities in the third act, and was marked by rather more lively movement than it is usually given with. Four excerpts from the Nibelung Ring closed the concert.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 20, 1895.

It is probably essential to the contentment of a considerable portion of the musical community that a Wagner programme should come in somewhere during the Symphony season. M. Paur put it in yesterday, making it the basis of his twelfth concert And thus he arranged it: "Rienzi"—Overture. "Tannhauser"—Act. II., "Elizabeth's Aria." Act. III., prelude. "Flying Dutchman"—Overture. "Lohengrin"—Act. III., prelude. "Meistersinger" —Act. III., prelude; Dance of Apprentices and Procession; Act I., "Walther's Preislied." "Rheingold" —"Procession of the Gods." "Die Walkure"—"Spring Song." "Siegfried"—"Waldweben." "Gotterdammerung"—"Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," arranged by Hans Richter.

About such a programme there is nothing critical to be said. It illustrates the best that there is in the great composer's scores of what can be taken as absolute music, capable of giving pleasures and awakening moods by its own sounds and phrases. In its way this was a historical programme, because with one exception its order was chronological, beginning with the furious clangor and tremendous piety of the melodramatic period, and so passing on through the transition period of the "Dutchman" and other romantic operas to the "lyric drama" epoch, with its dying suggestions of that possible return to lighter and more melodious moods which Wagner's own end precluded.

The performance by the orchestra, much enlarged according to the exigencies of some selections, generally was splendid work. The present homogeity and and fine qualities of the wooden wind were never more manifest, the brass succeeded in being full almost to tumultuousness without being blatant, and the virtuosity of the strings was splendid in its strength, surety and celerity. Great animation, order and interest prevailed, and when all the special instruments of percussion were involved, the kettle-drummer, even though he had a whole row about him, was obliged to give up sometimes as beaten as his drums. Mr. Paur's treatment was for the most part felicitous both intellectually and passionately; but the gentler and more suave passages suffered from too much severity and too little sympathy. The two songs were rendered with his best appreciation and ability by Mr. Schott, whose eminent merit as a Wagner singer has been long recognized here. In the "Prize Song" even his voluminous and resonant tones were overwhelmed by the irrational violence of the accompaniment; but in the "Spring Song" Mr. Paur showed some consideration and allowed the audience to hear something beside the band.

The audience packed the hall and applauded loud and long, recalling Mr. Paur at the end of the first part and Mr. Schott at the end of his song.

At the next concert Mr. Cesar Thomson, the other distinguished violinist of the season, will make his debut, playing a concerto of Goldmark, and the orchestra will perform Dvorak's "American" symphony, a symphonic poem of Smetana and Beethoven's "Leonora, No. 2" overture.

And apropos of this Wagner programme, which was the same to all effects and purposes as was given in New York week before last, a funny thing was printed in the Commercial Advertiser over the signature of Mr. Vance Thompson, who has some about as original and eccentric ideas about music and performances of music as anybody who divulges in public his private opinons. For in commenting upon the concert, he remarked that Mr. Paur conducted the overture "in far too well-bred a manner" and further alleged that the conductor's "chief sin is lackadaisicality." We believe Mr. Thompson to be a newcomer to New York—certainly to the department of musical criticism there. Can it be that what he has heard of the New York orchestras has deadened the normal sensibility of his tympanum? Or was he perhaps born with a dullness of hearing? For us of Boston, who have four times as many opportunities of acquainting ourselves with Mr. Paur's conducting, the opinion stands that his "chief sin" is a growing robustiousness of effect and a disposition to force the volume of orchestral sound until its quality is in danger of degenerating into noise. But stay—can it be that Boston is becoming enfeebled and assimilating itself unconsciously to the nature of a friend who accompanied Mr. Thompson to the concert and gave assurance that "he was affected with the proper vibration?" Because of this friend it is not too kindly written that his "temperament is unusually gelatinous." But yet again—can Mr. Thompson be so very wise in men, manners or music, since in this same article, laboring to be humorous about Hans Sachs sitting under a supposititious elder tree, he says of himself,—"My arboreal knowledge is very scant; I couldn't tell an elder from Susannah." That certainly does not argue much good for the young gentleman's cognitions or his judgment. And so, perhaps, the average Boston opinion about Mr. Paur's handling of Wagner is quite as likely to be correct as Mr. Thompson's, especially as the Tribune, which measures the world of music with its yard-stick, implies that the rendering of the programme was overcharged, in spite of some lack of dramatic intensity.

If so small a thing can afford a grain of comfort to the Musical Courier, which has been sitting in silent, speechless sorrow since its diatribes against Mr. Paur went for nothing, why should any good Bostonian begrudge it? Mr. Philip Hale having said in print, as has been also said and sung by others, that it would not be a bad plan to have a man of some other than German birth and education come in time to the head of the Symphony Orchestra, bringing more catholic views, tastes and cognitions, the Courier plucks up a spirit for new imaginings and writes:—"There is a cloud no bigger perhaps than a man's hand on the musical horizon. There is an undercurrent of grumbling in Boston about Mr. Paur and his cast iron beat, and the grumbling is done by the music critics. Whether Mr. Paur is or is not a great conductor is not the question now. What principally concerns Mr. Higginson is that the Boston Symphony orchestra has unquestionably lost some of its prestige during the past year." All of which shows that the Courier does not understand Boston criticism any better than Mr. Krehbiel and does not get a good grip on facts.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 20, 1895.

The program of the 12th Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was devoted to selections from the opera of Wagner, and was as follows:

"Rienzi," overture (1842).
"Tannhauser," introduction to Act III. (Tannhauser's pilgrimage), (1845).
"Der Fliegende Hollander," overture (1843).
"Lohengrin," introduction to Act III. (1850).
"Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," a. Prelude to Act III., dance of apprentices, procession of master singers and hymn to Hans Sachs (1868). b. Walther's prize song, Act III., scene 5.
"Das Rheingold," procession of the gods and lament of the Rhine daughters (1869).
"Die Walkure," Siegmund's love song, Act I., scene 3 (1870).
"Siegfried," "Waldweben" (1876).
"Gotterdammerung," Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's rock, morning dawn, and Siegfried's Rhine journey (1876).

This program is given in full as a matter of record, and also because, as arranged, it gives some idea of the growth of Wagner. As the compiler of the program book justly says, "Rienzi" contains "little or nothing that can be called characteristically Wagnerian." No wonder that Wagner in later years was ashamed of it, and would fain have all copies burned or at the bottom of the sea. The overture is one of the cheapest and most vulgar compositions ever written by a great musician. Yet its brutality and circus-pomp appeal to an audience and it is almost always welcomed as though it were a masterpiece. The growth of Wagner from this crude imitation of the style of Meyerbeer and Halévy to the best portions of "Parsifal" is only equaled by the steady improvement of Verdi from "Oberto" to "Aida."

Again let it be said, that Mr. Paur arranged this program with more than ordinary skill. It not only showed the growth of Wagner; it also gave within a reasonable length of time an excellent opportunity of hearing him at his best. However much ferocious Wagnerites may deplore the fact, the people at large prefer such tunes as Walther's prize song and Siegmund's love song to the passages that are so dear to the ultra-Wagnerites on account of alleged tremendous meaning and dire import. It may be said in passing that Mr. Schott declaimed these same tunes vigorously and with what is called Wagnerian understanding. He was in good voice and excellent general physical condition.

It would be easy to dilate on the fact that such a program seems singularly out of place in a Symphony concert. But, after all, perhaps it is better, if these excerpts must be heard to lump them all together, and devote an evening to the exhibition. If any of the subscribers do not like the feast provided, they can then send their regrets without fear of losing the opportunity of meeting an old and esteemed friend, or becoming acquainted with some one worth knowing. There was a time when such a concert would have provoked wild discussion. Some would have found no pleasure in it. Others, afflicted sorely with Wagneritis, would have echoed King Nebuchadnezzar and commanded their neighbors in these words: "That at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the golden image."

But there is no golden image in music to be worshiped blindly. The genius of Wagner is acknowledged, just as the genius of Mozart, Weber, Verdi, and Bizet is acknowledged. No one is now compelled to say that everything in the gigantic music dramas is worthy of blind adoration.

Indeed, the more you hear the music of Wagner, the more you detect commonplace passages. This may sound like a paradox; and perhaps it needs this explanation: That just as in "Don Giovanni" there are certain Mozartian formulas which today seem stale and trite, so beyond doubt and peradventure mannerisms and formulas of Wagner will provoke yawns a century from now. That which is great and glorious will remain. Remember that "Don Giovanni" and "The Marriage of Figaro" still hold the stage, and they were written over a century ago.

It would be idle also to dilate on the fact that such concerts are flagrantly in variation of the expressed theories of Wagner. As Wagner himself violated nearly all his pet theories, what would be the use of spinning words about the enormity of this particular offence?

Let it be said, then, that there was a great audience, which gave long and loud manifestations of delight. The performance of the orchestra was brilliant, and Mr. Paur showed himself thoroughly in sympathy with the works of which he was interpreter.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 20, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

Brilliant Wagner Programme --- Other Musical Events.

The patrons of the Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening thoroughly enjoyed themselves. Instead of endeavoring not to look bored over a long symphony, which nine-tenths of them could not understand, they were treated to a Wagner programme, composed of selections from the chief works of the great composer.

Mr. Paur had chosen wisely, and every one of the ten numbers was heartily applauded. The leader demonstrated that he was as much at home with the writings of the German masters as in the classic works of Beethoven, and a more pleasing interpretation of Wagner has seldom, if ever, been heard in this city. The orchestral numbers of Wagner are especially effective, and rendered by the large orchestra whose leader not only has his men in perfect control, but is thoroughly familiar with the compositions of his fellow countryman, the result could scarcely fail to be pleasing. The overtures to "Rienzi" and the "Flying Dutchman," the introd uction to the third act of "Lohengrin" and the procession of the gods from "Rhine-Gold" were the best.

Anton Schott was the soloist and sang Walther's prize song from "The Meistersinger" and Seigmund's love song from "Der Walkure." In the latter Mr. Schott's voice sounded hard and metallic and failed to realize the full beauty of the number. The audience was by far the largest of the season.

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the soloist will be Mr. Carson Thomson, the violinist.

[81]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XXVII., NO. 20.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 20, 1895.

WAGNER HAD THE FLOOR.

Last Night's Symphony Concert Given Over to His Music.

Audience One of the Largest and Most Enthusiastic of the Season—Programme Began with "Rienzi" and Ended with "Die Gotterdammerung"—Soloist M. Anton Schott.

The concert in Music Hall last night by the Boston Symphony orchestra attracted one of the largest and most enthusiastically demonstrative audiences of the season. The programme was devoted wholly to Wagner, and the selections were given in chronological order, beginning with "Rienzi" and ending with "Die Gotterdammerung." It was as follows:

Overture to "Rienzi".....(1842)
Introduction to act 3 of "Tannhaeuser"..(1845)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman".....(1843)
Introduction to act 3 of "Lohengrin".....(1850)
Prelude to act 3. Dance of apprentices, procession of the master singers and hymn to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg".....(1868)
Walther's prize song, from the "Master Singers of Nuremberg."
Procession of the gods and lament of the Rhine-daughters, from "The Rhine-Gold".....(1869)
Siegmund's love song, from "The Valkyr".....(1870)
Forest sounds. "Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....(1876)
Siegfried's passage to Brunhilde's rock, morning dawn, and Siegfried's trip up the Rhine, from "Twilight of the Gods".....(1876)

The soloist was M. Anton Schott. This was a rather large instalment of Wagner, to be sure, but the selections were made judiciously, and with as close an approach to variety in contrasts as was possible. Nevertheless it became very monotonous at last, owing to the similarity of the inevitable stormy climaxes, the unbroken sumptuousness of the tone color, and the constant iteration and reiteration of the same orchestral effects to the point of satiety. The vulgar circus overture to "Rienzi" was given with tremendous fire and effect. In fact, the playing of the orchestra through the whole concert was magnificent in its dashing and, at times, really exciting virtuosity. It was especially fine in the selection from "Tannhauser," and in that from "Lohengrin" the players reached a point of brilliancy, of precision and of fiery spirit that has never before had its parallel here.

Mr. Paur read all the selections in a manner that showed him to be thoroughly in sympathy with the composer, and his interpretations were masterly in the deeply intelligent conception that distinguished them. He conducted with a magnetism that swayed his orchestra and audience alike, and he stirred the latter so completely that on several occasions they applauded him wildly and recalled him again and again. There is nothing new to be said of the music. It has all been given here so frequently that it is quite familiar to the musical public, and all that can be said for or against it has been said until it would be superogatory to discuss it again at this late date.

Mr. Schott, who was cordially welcomed, sang the "Prize Song" and the "Love Song" in that manly and noble style, with that lofty and impressive feeling and with that convincing sincerity that have always characterized his performances. The singing of so much Wagner music may have played some havoc with his voice, but his artistic intelligence remains undimmed and it is still a genuine pleasure to listen to him. He was given hearty applause and recalled after each effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak; Concerto for violin, in A minor, Goldmark; Symphonic Poem, Sonetana; overeture, "Leonore" No. 2, Beethoven. The soloist will be Mr. Cesar Thomson.

THIRTY-SIX PAGES.

SUNDAY, JAN. 20, 1895.

Wagner Program Played at Symphony Concert.

The program of the 12th symphony concert was composed wholly of selections from the writings of Richard Wagner. It was an admirably arranged program, presenting a wide range of the great composer's works, from his first to his last writings.

That the program was very welcome to the symphony patrons was shown by the great size of the audience, and by unusually lavish applause. Such was the demand for tickets to the Friday afternoon rehearsal that the sale of admissions was necessarily stopped so long ago as last Monday.

The full program was as follows:

Overture to "Rienzi." (1842.)
Introduction to act 3 of "Tannheuser." (1845.)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." (1843.)
Introduction to act 3 of "Lohengrin." (1850.)
Prelude to act 3. Dance of apprentices, procession of the master singers, and hymn to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg." (1868.)
Walther's prize song, "Morgenlich Leuchtend," from the "Master Singers of Nuremberg," act 3, scene 5.
Procession of the gods and lament of the Rhine daughters, from "The Rhine-Gold." (1869.)
Siegmund's love song, "Winterstumme wichen dem Wonnemond," from "The Valkyr," act 1 scene 3. (1870.)
Forest sounds, "Waldweben," from "Siegfried." (1876.)
Siegfried's passage to Brunhilde's rock, morning dawn, and Siegfried's trip up the Rhine, from "Twilight of the Gods." (1876.)

The playing of the orchestra last evening was so excellent generally that it is unnecessary to single out any one interpretation for special praise. Every number was magnificently given, with intelligence, expression and splendid spirit. The Wagner program played a year ago under Mr Paur's direction was generally acknowledged to be the most enjoyable performance of the German master's music ever given by the Boston symphony orchestra. Yesterday's program was even more delightfully performed and was decidedly better arranged.

Not since Mr Paur's first appearance here has he been so enthusiastically applauded, and he well merited all the praise bestowed. No more exacting program could have been arranged, and the admirable results attained was gratifying evidence that the past high standard of the Symphony orchestra has not only been sustained, but has actually improved under Mr Paur's direction.

The full resources of the band was required and every demand was satisfactorily met. The playing of the wind instruments was never better than last evening, and the work of the string players was as near perfection as is possible of attainment.

The remarkable precision of the latter was notably shown in the exquisite performance of the long and beautiful passage in the selection from "Siegfried," where the first violins are wholly unaccompanied. So exact was the time and so perfect the pitch of each instrument, that it seemed to the ear as though a single violin of magnificent tone and volume was being played.

Mr Anton Schott was the soloist, and his singing was very agreeable. He has a voice of tremendous volume, and sings with spirit and clearness of enunciation. He made the most favorable impression in the prize song from the "Master Singers," but he also gave Siegmund's love song with good effect. He had no apparent difficulty in making himself heard above the big orchestra, and that in itself was rather a remarkable feat.

At the next concert the celebrated Belgian violinist, Cesar Thompson, will be the soloist. It will be his first appearance in Boston and he will be heard with especial interest because of the sensation which his fellow countryman, Ysaye, has created here. The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 8 in E minor, "From the New World," Dvorak; concerto for violin in A minor, Op. 28, Goldmark; symphonic poem, Smetana; overture, "Lenore," No. 2, Beethoven.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 20.

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last night, at Music Hall. It was a Wagner programme, and included selections from "Rienzi," "Tannhauser," "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," "Rheingold," "Die Walkure," "Siegfried" and "The Twilight of the Gods."

The concert was a trifling monotonous and a clear idea of Wagner's merits could not be drawn from it. Noise followed noise with nerve-wearing persistency, and the effect of this noise on the ear was to deaden it to any sound less than that of a whirlwind.

The orchestra performed its work with rare skill, and it is doubtful if Wagner ever had a finer body of interpreters, or a conductor of a finer fibre than Mr. Paur. The "Lohengrin" selection was conducted and played with exquisite skill, and was greeted with the most enthusiastic applause. In fact, the large audience was more than usually liberal in indicating its approbation, and, in this sense, the Wagner programme was a veritable triumph.

Whether justice can be done to Wagner in selections is a question that would be interesting to discuss, and to represent them on the concert stage is to deprive them of two-thirds of their effect that Wagner intended, and for which he deliberately planned. His music was joined to poetry and painting; it was a triple-faced unity, and from this it would seem to follow that to produce its full effect, poetry of dialogue and a background of scenery are necessary. It is certain that, notwithstanding the brilliant interpretation, the music at last palled on the ear, and produced the curious illusion of being of one color throughout, until the hearer was in danger of confounding "Rienzi" with "Lohengrin," and Siegfried with Hans Sachs.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Anton Schott, who sung Walther's Prize song from the "Meistersinger" and Siegmund's Love Song from the "Valkyr." Mr. Schott was applauded with enthusiasm.

The programme for the next concert is Dvorak's symphony in E minor, No. 8. "From the New World," Goldmark's concerto for violin in A minor op. 28; Smetana's Symphonic Poem and Beethoven's overture "Lenore" No. 2. Mr. Cesar Thompson will be the soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 21, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

WAGNER NEVER SO MUCH APPRECIATED AS NOW.

The Assertion that His "School of the Future" is Already One of the Past is False—Three Selections Saturday Night Aroused Enthusiasm—Mr. Paur at His Best.

Every few weeks one reads in the columns of the ultra-classical reviewers that Wagner's music is dying out, that the taste for his works is on the wane, that the school of the future has already become the school of the past. Possibly, therefore, the tremendous audience which attended the Wagner concert of saturday, a concert which had not even the assistance of an especially great soloist, came to attend the funeral service. probably the reason that they all stayed to the very end was that they thought that the moribund school might expire in their presence, and undoubtedly the constant and enthusiastic applause was given simply to make its last moments pleasant. To speak seriously, Wagner's music was never more intelligently appreciated than in this decade; the public begin to understand that the so-called "Wagner school" is purely and simply Wagner himself; they begin to comprehend that the thunderbolts of Jove cannot be used by his successors, and while they now venture to disagree with one or the other of the theories which the master has enunciated, and even to use the blue pencil in cases where theory stood in the light of musical beauty, there is enough left to make a dozen masters immortal. Continuity, dramatic unity, the evolution of the music from the poem, intellectuality as represented in the leit-motif (its explanatory function is not unlike the use of the old Greek chorus, although much less clumsy), all these points are beacon lights on the path of musical progress. The programme was arranged in a sequential manner, so as to afford the auditor an outline sketch of the development of the composer's work, and this order of performance accentuated the fact that the musical public, and even the Wagnerians, are not led blindly by the views of Wagner himself. Let him discard all his earlier works if he will, the melodic power of the prayer from "Rienzi," the splendor of the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" (without a single theory in it), or the dramatic fervor of the overture to the "Flying Dutchman" (and Wagner denounced a separate overture as artistically wrong), will carry any cultured audience to enthusiasm. The fact is that Wagner was a genius with or without his theories, sometimes in spite of them (as Hans Sachs was a genius even when following the pedantic rules of the Mastersingers), a genius even when following Auber and producing a "Rienzi." The overture to this opera, which began the programme, was finely played, and Mr. Paur was entirely in his element in working up the great climaxes of festivity and triumph.

The prelude to the third act of "Tannhaeuser" was less effective, for the brasses forced their tone to its detriment, although the woodwind and the violins played with much beauty and good shading. The "Flying Dutchman" overture was effective in every measure. Seldom can one hear the fury of the tempest, the bold sailor calls, the motif of the Flying Dutchman and the sweet theme of Senta (alluding to the salvation of the hero) so well intertwined. The beginning was especially full of dramatic force, for here Mr. Paur in a glorious manner.

Rides in the whirlwind and directs the storm,

The popular success of the concert was reached in the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin." This shows a melodic Wagner (and Wagner, all his theories to the contrary notwithstanding, was a born melodist), and became a universal favorite in Europe years before its opera did. It was taken more rapidly than we are accustomed to hear it, but the violins were able to keep their swift figure without blur, and the trombones thundered forth their theme with appropriate power. It seemed as if the audience intended to force an encore here, and Mr. Paur was called again and again to respond to the long-continued plaudits, but wisely forbore from infringing upon the custom of the concerts.

A well-arranged set of selections from "Die Meistersinger" followed, beginning with the prelude to the third act, and introducing the attractive "Dance of the 'prentices." This latter is a perfect bit of mediaevalism and its piquant seven-barred phrases and its delicious subtheme are attractive even without the action of the stage. It is a great tribute to the power of Wagner that such music is able to make its effect, even when separated from its appropriate adjuncts, and it is an equally strong point, (and one less generally understood) that the libretto of this opera would be a valuable work of art, given by itself, without a note of the wonderful music.

How much of a historian Wagner was can best be studied from this opera, whether we approach it from the musical or dramatic side. In the music the great theme of the Mastersingers is an actual piece of contemporaneous song, and the Sachs chorus of Homage is founded on the style of the middle ages. In the play, the characters are mostly actual, the customs portrayed from a Sitten-bild more graphic and more exact than Scott's "Quentin Durward," Kingsley's "Hereward," Ebers' "Egyptian Princess," or Conan Doyle's "White Company." One may, however, doubt if Albrechtsberger would have approved of the counterpoint which ushers in the prelude, and it is difficult to bring out the many themes intact from the subsequent hurly-burly. The violins lost their infallibility just before the Prentice dance, but the muted trumpets stood out well in the final picture of the festival. Now came the soloist. To speak justly of Mr. Anton Schott's work in this concert is a task of some difficulty. He has done much in building up the Wagnerian opera among us, and one feels grateful for that, but the reviewer may only look upon the present, and the voice as used Saturday seemed explosive beyond all necessity. The Prize Song was given in a series of dynamite phrases and with a prominence of sibilants that suggested the sputtering fuses of the musical bombs. Nor was Siegmund's "Love Song" much better. It was taken at too quick a tempo; singers know so well how Wagner hated sentimentality that they often rush to the opposite extreme and hurry the tender theme. Mr. Schott's intonation, however, calls for commendation, for he sang quite true throughout the evening, and his own earnestness and enthusiasm were caught in some degree by the audience, for he received a host of recalls after each of his numbers.

The procession of the gods, from "Rheingold," was given in lofty style, and the tremendous faufare at its end was excellently done. "Waldesweben," from the opera "Siegfried," is one of the finest pictures of nature in the whole musical repertoire. It makes, however, inordinate demands upon the orchestra. Such a division of string parts, to picture the multitudinous life of the woods, exists in no other work, and when an orchestra of less than one hundred is thus divided there is likely to be thinness in some spots. The glockenspiel might have been surer, and the strings a trifle more delicate, but the tone-picture as a whole was adequately conveyed and the number successful. The end of the concert presented Richter's well-known arrangement of the last part of "Siegfried" and the first portion of "Gotterdaemmerung." There was good balance of parts in this, and most of the motives stood forth with reasonable clearness. At times an extreme of force was reached, but this was permissible in a number of this heroic character. One might find fault with the way in which the title of this work is done into English. "Siegfried's Trip Up the Rhine" is altogether too suggestive of Cook's tickets, of personally conducted tours, and of an excursion boat from Cologne to Wiesbaden. Louis C. Elson.

---

[82]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVII., NO. 20.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 20, 1895.

WAGNER HAD THE FLOOR.

Last Night's Symphony Concert Given Over to His Music.

Audience One of the Largest and Most Enthusiastic of the Season—Programme Began with "Rienzi" and Ended with "Die Gotterdammerung"—Soloist M. Anton Schott.

The concert in Music Hall last night by the Boston Symphony orchestra attracted one of the largest and most enthusiastically demonstrative audiences of the season. The programme was devoted wholly to Wagner, and the selections were given in chronological order, beginning with "Rienzi" and ending with "Die Gotterdammerung." It was as follows:

Overture to "Rienzi".....(1842)
Introduction to act 3 of "Tannhaeuser"..(1845)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman".....(1843)
Introduction to act 3 of "Lohengrin".....(1850)
Prelude to act 3. Dance of apprentices, procession of the master singers and hymn to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg".....(1868)
Walther's prize song, from the "Master Singers of Nuremberg."
Procession of the gods and lament of the Rhine-daughters, from "The Rhine-Gold".....(1869)
Siegmund's love song, from "The Valkyr".....(1870)
Forest sounds. "Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....(1876)
Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's rock, morning dawn, and Siegfried's trip up the Rhine, from "Twilight of the Gods".....(1876)

The soloist was M. Anton Schott. This was a rather large instalment of Wagner, to be sure, but the selections were made judiciously, and with as close an approach to variety in contrasts as was possible. Nevertheless it became very monotonous at last, owing to the similarity of the inevitable stormy climaxes, the unbroken sumptuousness of the tone color, and the constant iteration and reiteration of the same orchestral effects to the point of satiety. The vulgar circus overture to "Rienzi" was given with tremendous fire and effect. In fact, the playing of the orchestra through the whole concert was magnificent in its dashing and, at times, really exciting virtuosity. It was especially fine in the selection from "Tannhauser," and in that from "Lohengrin" the players reached a point of brilliancy, of precision and of fiery spirit that has never before had its parallel here.

Mr. Paur read all the selections in a manner that showed him to be thoroughly in sympathy with the composer, and his interpretations were masterly in the deeply intelligent conception that distinguished them. He conducted with a magnetism that swayed his orchestra and audience alike, and he stirred the latter so completely that on several occasions they applauded him wildly and recalled him again and again. There is nothing new to be said of the music. It has all been given here so frequently that it is quite familiar to the musical public, and all that can be said for or against it has been said until it would be superogatory to discuss it again at this late date.

Mr. Schott, who was cordially welcomed, sang the "Prize Song" and the "Love Song" in that manly and noble style, with that lofty and impressive feeling and with that convincing sincerity that have always characterized his performances. The singing of so much Wagner music may have played some havoc with his voice, but his artistic intelligence remains undimmed and it is still a genuine pleasure to listen to him. He was given hearty applause and recalled after each effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak; Concerto for violin, in A minor, Goldmark; Symphonic Poem, Sonetana; overeture, "Leonore" No. 2, Beethoven. The soloist will be Mr. Cesar Thomson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
THIRTY-SIX PAGES.
SUNDAY, JAN. 20, 1895.

Wagner Program Played at Symphony Concert.

The program of the 12th symphony concert was composed wholly of selections from the writings of Richard Wagner. It was an admirably arranged program, presenting a wide range of the great composer's works, from his first to his last writings.

That the program was very welcome to the symphony patrons was shown by the great size of the audience, and by unusually lavish applause. Such was the demand for tickets to the Friday afternoon rehearsal that the sale of admissions was necessarily stopped so long ago as last Monday.

The full program was as follows:

Overture to "Rienzi." (1842.)
Introduction to act 3 of "Tannheuser." (1845.)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." (1843.)
Introduction to act 3 of "Lohengrin." (1850.)
Prelude to act 3. Dance of apprentices, procession of the master singers, and hymn to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg." (1868.)
Walther's prize song, "Morgenlich Leuchtend," from the "Master Singers of Nuremberg," act 3, scene 5.
Procession of the gods and lament of the Rhine daughters, from "The Rhine-Gold." (1869.)
Siegmund's love song, "Winterstурme wichen dem Wonnemond," from "The Valkyr," act 1 scene 3. (1870.)
Forest sounds, "Waldweben," from "Siegfried." (1876.)
Siegfried's passage to Brunhilde's rock, morning dawn, and Siegfried's trip up the Rhine, from "Twilight of the Gods." (1876.)

The playing of the orchestra last evening was so excellent generally that it is unnecessary to single out any one interpretation for special praise. Every number was magnificently given, with intelligence, expression and splendid spirit. The Wagner program played a year ago under Mr Paur's direction was generally acknowledged to be the most enjoyable performance of the German master's music ever given by the Boston symphony orchestra. Yesterday's program was even more delightfully performed and was decidedly better arranged.

Not since Mr Paur's first appearance here has he been so enthusiastically applauded, and he well merited all the praise bestowed. No more exacting program could have been arranged, and the admirable results attained was gratifying evidence that the past high standard of the Symphony orchestra has not only been sustained, but has actually improved under Mr Paur's direction.

The full resources of the band was required and every demand was satisfactorily met. The playing of the wind instruments was never better than last evening, and the work of the string players was as near perfection as is possible of attainment.

The remarkable precision of the latter was notably shown in the exquisite performance of the long and beautiful passage in the selection from "Siegfried," where the first violins are wholly unaccompanied. So exact was the time and so perfect the pitch of each instrument, that it seemed to the ear as though a single violin of magnificent tone and volume was being played.

Mr Anton Schott was the soloist, and his singing was very agreeable. He has a voice of tremendous volume, and sings with spirit and clearness of enunciation. He made the most favorable impression in the prize song from the "Master Singers," but he also gave Siegmund's love song with good effect. He had no apparent difficulty in making himself heard above the big orchestra, and that in itself was rather a remarkable feat.

At the next concert the celebrated Belgian violinist, Cesar Thompson, will be the soloist. It will be his first appearance in Boston and he will be heard with especial interest because of the sensation which his fellow countryman, Ysaye, has created here. The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 8 in E minor, "From the New World," Dvorak; concerto for violin in A minor, Op. 28, Goldmark; symphonic poem, Smetana; overture, "Lenore," No. 2, Beethoven.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 20.

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last night, at Music Hall. It was a Wagner programme, and included selections from "Rienzi," "Tannhauser," "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "Die Meisiersinger," "Rheingold," "Die Walkure," "Siegfried" and "The Twilight of the Gods."

The concert was a trifling monotonous and a clear idea of Wagner's merits could not be drawn from it. Noise followed noise with nerve-wearing persistency, and the effect of this noise on the ear was to deaden it to any sound less than that of a whirlwind.

The orchestra performed its work with rare skill, and it is doubtful if Wagner ever had a finer body of interpreters, or a conductor of a finer fibre than Mr. Paur. The "Lohengrin" selection was conducted and played with exquisite skill, and was greeted with the most enthusiastic applause. In fact, the large audience was more than usually liberal in indicating its approbation, and, in this sense, the Wagner programme was a veritable triumph.

Whether justice can be done to Wagner in selections is a question that would be interesting to discuss, and to represent them on the concert stage is to deprive them of two-thirds of their effect that Wagner intended, and for which he deliberately planned. His music was joined to poetry and painting; it was a triple-faced unity, and from this it would seem to follow that to produce its full effect, poetry of dialogue and a background of scenery are necessary. It is certain that, notwithstanding the brilliant interpretation, the music at last palled on the ear, and produced the curious illusion of being of one color throughout, until the hearer was in danger of confounding "Rienzi" with "Lohengrin," and Siegfried with Hans Sachs.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Anton Schott, who sung Walther's Prize song from the "Meistersinger" and Siegmund's Love Song from the "Valkyr." Mr. Schott was applauded with enthusiasm.

The programme for the next concert is Dvorak's symphony in E minor, No. 8. "From the New World," Goldmark's concerto for violin in A minor op. 28; Smetana's Symphonic Poem and Beethoven's overture "Lenore" No. 2. Mr. Cesar Thompson will be the soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 21, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

WAGNER NEVER SO MUCH APPRECIATED AS NOW.

The Assertion that His "School of the Future" is Already One of the Past is False—Three Selections Saturday Night Aroused Enthusiasm—Mr. Paur at His Best.

Every few weeks one reads in the columns of the ultra-classical reviewers that Wagner's music is dying out, that the taste for his works is on the wane, that the school of the future has already become the school of the past. Possibly, therefore, the tremendous audience which attended the Wagner concert of Saturday, a concert which had not even the assistance of an especially great soloist, came to attend the funeral service. probably the reason that they all stayed to the very end was that they thought that the moribund school might expire in their presence, and undoubtedly the constant and enthusiastic applause was given simply to make its last moments pleasant. To speak seriously, Wagner's music was never more intelligently appreciated than in this decade; the public begin to understand that the so-called "Wagner school" is purely and simply Wagner himself; they begin to comprehend that the thunderbolts of Jove cannot be used by his successors, and while they now venture to disagree with one or the other of the theories which the master has enunciated, and even to use the blue pencil in cases where theory stood in the light of musical beauty, there is enough left to make a dozen masters immortal. Continuity, dramatic unity, the evolution of the music from the poem, intellectuality as represented in the leit-motif (its explanatory function is not unlike the use of the old Greek chorus, although much less clumsy), all these points are beacon lights on the path of musical progress. The programme was arranged in a sequential manner, so as to afford the auditor an outline sketch of the development of the composer's work, and this order of performance accentuated the fact that the musical public, and even the Wagnerians, are not led blindly by the views of Wagner himself. Let him discard all his earlier works if he will, the melodic power of the prayer from "Rienzi," the splendor of the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" (without a single theory in it), or the dramatic fervor of the overture to the "Flying Dutchman" (and Wagner denounced a separate overture as artistically wrong), will carry any cultured audience to enthusiasm. The fact is that Wagner was a genius with or without his theories, sometimes in spite of them (as Hans Sachs was a genius even when following the pedantic rules of the Mastersingers), a genius even when following Auber and producing a "Rienzi." The overture to this opera, which began the programme, was finely played, and Mr. Paur was entirely in his element in working up the great climaxes of festivity and triumph

The prelude to the third act of "Tannhaeuser" was less effective, for the brasses forced their tone to its detriment, although the woodwind and the violins played with much beauty and good shading. The "Flying Dutchman" overture was effective in every measure. Seldom can one hear the fury of the tempest, the bold sailor calls, the motif of the Flying Dutchman and the sweet theme of Senta (alluding to the salvation of the hero) so well intertwined. The beginning was especially full of dramatic force, for here Mr. Paur in a glorious manner.

Rides in the whirlwind and directs the storm,

The popular success of the concert was reached in the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin." This shows a melodic Wagner (and Wagner, all his theories to the contrary notwithstanding, was a born melodist), and became a universal favorite in Europe years before its opera did. It was taken more rapidly than we are accustomed to hear it, but the violins were able to keep their swift figure without blur, and the trombones thundered forth their theme with appropriate power. It seemed as if the audience intended to force an encore here, and Mr. Paur was called again and again to respond to the long-continued plaudits, but wisely forbore from infringing upon the custom of the concerts.

A well-arranged set of selections from "Die Meistersinger" followed, beginning with the prelude to the third act, and introducing the attractive "Dance of the 'prentices." This latter is a perfect bit of mediaevalism and its piquant seven-barred phrases and its delicious subtheme are attractive even without the action of the stage. It is a great tribute to the power of Wagner that such music is able to make its effect, even when separated from its appropriate adjuncts, and it is an equally strong point, (and one less generally understood) that the libretto of this opera would be a valuable work of art, given by itself, without a note of the wonderful music.

How much of a historian Wagner was can best be studied from this opera, whether we approach it from the musical or dramatic side. In the music the great theme of the Mastersingers is an actual piece of contemporaneous song, and the Sachs chorus of Homage is founded on the style of the middle ages. In the play, the characters are mostly actual, the customs portrayed from a sitten-bild more graphic and more exact than Scott's "Quentin Durward," Kingsley's "Hereward," Ebers' "Egyptian Princess," or Conan Doyle's "White Company." One may, however, doubt if Albrechtsberger would have approved of the counterpoint which ushers in the prelude, and it is difficult to bring out the many themes intact from the subsequent hurly-burly. The violins lost their infallibility just before the Prentice dance, but the muted trumpets stood out well in the final picture of the festival. Now came the soloist. To speak justly of Mr. Anton Schott's work in this concert is a task of some difficulty. He has done much in building up the Wagnerian opera among us, and one feels grateful for that, but the reviewer may only look upon the present, and the voice as used Saturday seemed explosive beyond all necessity. The Prize Song was given in a series of dynamite phrases and with a prominence of sibilants that suggested the sputtering fuses of the musical bombs. Nor was Siegmund's "Love Song" much better. It was taken at too quick a tempo; singers know so well how Wagner hated sentimentality that they often rush to the opposite extreme and hurry the tender theme. Mr. Schott's intonation, however, calls for commendation, for he sang quite true throughout the evening, and his own earnestness and enthusiasm were caught in some degree by the audience, for he received a host of recalls after each of his numbers.

The procession of the gods, from "Rheingold," was given in lofty style, and the tremendous faufare at its end was excellently done. "Waldesweben," from the opera "Siegfried," is one of the finest pictures of nature in the whole musical repertoire. It makes, however, inordinate demands upon the orchestra. Such a division of string parts, to picture the multitudinous life of the woods, exists in no other work, and when an orchestra of less than one hundred is thus divided there is likely to be thinness in some spots. The glockenspiel might have been surer, and the strings a trifle more delicate, but the tone-picture as a whole was adequately conveyed and the number successful. The end of the concert presented Richter's well-known arrangement of the last part of "Siegfried" and the first portion of "Gotterdaemmerung." There was good balance of parts in this, and most of the motives stood forth with reasonable clearness. At times an extreme of force was reached, but this was permissible in a number of this heroic character. One might find fault with the way in which the title of this work is done into English. "Siegfried's Trip Up the Rhine" is altogether too suggestive of Cook's tickets, of personally conducted tours, and of an excursion boat from Cologne to Wiesbaden. LOUIS C. ELSON.

---

[82]

FADED TEXT

The Music Trades.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 19, 1895.

Loeffler's Latest Work.

At the Eleventh Symphony Concert two works were heard for the first time: Dvorak's Carnival overture, and an unpublished Divertimento, in A minor for violin and orchestra, written by C. M. Loeffler, a member of the orchestra, who himself played the violin. This opus was exceedingly interesting and received with great favor. Both of these new productions were most welcome. Even if new works are not better than old ones, we want to hear and judge for ourselves. The other numbers were Grieg's Suite, Aus Holberg's Zeit, and Mozart's Symphony in D, No. One.

Mr. Loeffler has been a violin pupil of Leonard, Joachim, and Massart, and began his pubiic career in 1878, as a member of the orchestra of Prince Dervies, who lived alternately in Nice and Lugano. Having studied composition with Kiel, of Berlin, and Guiraud, of Paris, Mr. Loeffler took naturally to writing, and several of his pieces have been produced within five years, mostly in Boston: Les Leillees de l'Ukraine; Fantastic Cello Concerto; string sextet and quartet; violin sonata; songs with violin obligato.

We learn from the program that this Divertisemento was composed last summer, after his return from Europe. It is, in the best sense of the phrase, a virtuoso composition. It is also a study in tonal color, and makes no pretensions to strict form, which, indeed, would not be in keeping with the character of the work. The first movement, the preambulum, opening allegro, in A-minor, $\frac{3}{4}$, calls for these instruments: three flutes (one interchangeable with piccolo), two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, the usual strings, harp and kettle drums. The solo violin begins at once in loose and and flexible figuration against a pedal. It is as though one should extemporize, preparing for the coming theme; and yet the character of this apparent episode is the character of the movement, interrupted by melodic episodes of plaintive or forcible nature. There is a noteworthy passage of instrumentation in the episode molto tranquillo, where the harp and four violas in unison flow against the song of the solo violin which a horn sustains. The Eclogue is naturally in the character of a pastorale. No violins are used. There are three flutes, two clarinets, two bassoons, an English horn, two horns, two trumpets, kettledrums, harp, and the usual strings, with the exception noted. The last movement, Carn eval des Morts, is a series of variations on the plainsong, Dies Iræ, Dies Illa. The theme is declaimed moderato, 4-2, and then treated after the fashion of passacaglia. The second verse of the plainsong is also used later. To the instruments mentioned in the first movement are now added the tuba and the cymbals. There is no formal cadenza; or the cadenza is rather a series of modulatory passages.

Said a celebrated wit of the strawberry: "Doubtless God might have made a better berry, but doubtless he never did"; and this saying came to mind in listening to the fourth Kneisel Concert, of that Quartet's tenth season. The novelty of the eve was a sonata for piano and cello, op. 1, by Hans Pfitzner, a young Frankfort composer. In the second movement, langsam, Mr. Schroeder's cello was as clear at a trumpet. The third movement, sehr schnell, runs from a sort of sleighbell ride into a spin-song, strongly suggestive of Wagner. It was so beautifully played that the audience was disposed to demand a repetition, and has really quite as much humor as the fourth movement, specially so marked. The piano part was admirably played by Arthur Whiting. The quartets were both old and both good. Haydn's in D, op. 54, No. 5, is as merry as a grig, and the finale leaps you into our old-time Sailor's Hornpipe. Beethoven's A minor, op. 132, has not been given here since about 1880, and is specially interesting because of its adagio in the Lydian mode, a thank giving for restored health, written only two years before the composer's death.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 21, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert last Saturday evening was wholly made up of selections from the works of Richard Wagner, and was as follows:

"Rienzi," Overture.....(1842).
"Tannhäuser," Introduction to Act III.....(1845).
"Der fliegende Holländer," Overture.....(1843).
"Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III.....(1850).
"Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg".....(1868).
a.) Prelude to Act III., Dance of Apprentices, and Procession of the Master Singers.
b.) Walther's Prize Song, Act III., Scene 5.
"Das Rheingold," Procession of the Gods and Lament of the Rhine-Daughters.....(1869).
"Die Walküre," Siegmund's Love Song, Act I., Scene 3.....(1870).
"Siegfried," Waldweben.....(1876).
"Siegfried," Siegfried's Passage to Brünhilde's Rock, and "Götterdämmerung," Morning Dawn, and Siegfried's Rhine Journey.....(1876).
Mr. Anton Schott was the singer.

Who shall say the public do not like Wagner, after seeing last Saturday's audience? for, with all due civility to Mr. Schott, we think it was the programme, rather than he, that was the bait to catch so many fish! The programme was, in one sense, admirably selected; it gave a taste of every great stage work by Wagner, excepting "Tristan" and "Parsifal," and this, too, in chronological order, with one easily explicable exception. Save for the introduction to the third act of "Tannhäuser" (Tannhäuser's Pilgrimage), the selections were all familiar; and none the worse for that! About the character of one or two of the selections, and their fitness for figuring on a programme of one of our symphony concerts, there may be some question. Upon the whole, what separates the selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," made by Hans Richter, and those from "Das Rheingold," arranged by H. Zumpe, from ordinary operatic potpourris? It cannot be the dignity of the music itself; for only the maddest Wagner enthusiast would care to claim that the Wagner music-dramas stand on a higher plane of artistic dignity (to put it mildly) than Mozart's "Don Giovanni" or Beethoven's Fidelio;" and we all know what any rational conductor would say to putting "selections" from either of these operas on a first-class symphony concert programme. Or is it the character of the music? To be sure, most of the Wagner excerpts were purely orchestral selections, and so far fit for their place on the programme; but there was at least one passage in Richter's lot where voice-parts were omitted, and a long one in Zumpe's where the original voice parts were actually arranged for orchestral instruments—just as in any common potpourri. Moreover, this whole arrangement of Zumpe's is in the fullest sense of the term a "transcription," not a concatenated series of excerpts from the original score; it is a transcription for smaller orchestra, such as commonly finds a home in "popular concerts" only. Some of Wagner's most famous orchestral effects are absolutely lost in it. It does seem to us that this sort of thing is rather infra dig. for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of its regular concerts.

We have exceedingly little sympathy with the talk that is often made against presenting excerpts from Wagner's music dramas off the stage. When the music is given in its original shape, we find it just as acceptable concert music as we do excerpts—such as intermezzi, arias, duets, or ensemble-pieces—from operas by other composers. But it should be given in its original shape, and with the original scoring. We would not be over-nice in this last matter, either; there are some wind parts in the "Nibelungen" scores that can well be dispensed with: no living soul would know the difference through his ear alone. Then, as a merely practical matter, where should we find six good harps? The lack of a few harps, more or less, should not be a bar to our hearing Wagner! But there are other instruments which cannot be so well spared, some processes of instrumentation the effect of which cannot be got by any other process; and it is doubly hard to have such effects missed when the proper instruments are perfectly available. In one passage in the "Rheingold" selections, Wagner divides his strings into sixteen separate parts; and it so happens that the effect he gets from this subdivision cannot possibly be obtained with Zumpe's nine parts. We certainly have enough strings in our orchestra to play the original version! Again, Mr. Paur had (for once) eight horns in his orchestra last Saturday, four of the players being new to the orchestra. Now, without speculating upon what can be done with new players, could not the first quartet of horns—the regular players in our orchestra—have learnt to play the "Bayreuth" tubas, so that these important instruments need not have been omitted? The orchestra owns a complete set, and now that selections from the "Nibelungen" may have to be given at any time, ought not our horn-players to have regular practice on the Bayreuth tubas, just as it is well to have a clarinet-player who can play the alto-Saxophone? Remember that the tuba-parts in the "Nibelungen" are by no means difficult, and require no extraordinary technique; a fine horn-player who could not master the mechanism of these instruments in a month ought to be ashamed of himself.

But enough of this! The performance by the orchestra was almost without exception admirable, and the great music was played with finish, fire and grand effectiveness. Mr. Paur's readings were also unexceptionable. And the audience enjoyed the concert to the top of its bent. It was undoubtedly one of the high tides of the season in the estimation of a large majority of listeners.

Mr. Schott sang his two songs with splendid understanding of their meaning and character. The intellectual and emotional sides of a great artist were plainly there, and this is not a little. Unfortunately, Mr. Schott has that peculiar throaty emission of tone that is almost "academic" with many German tenors, who seem somehow to swallow their tone—as the cigarette smoker does his smoke—before giving it out. Not only does this peculiar school of tone formation result in a quality of sound distressing to the ear, but it gives the singer every facility for singing out of tune. That Mr. Schott sang often out of tune on Saturday evening is not to be denied; and whatever of novelty there may be in Wagner's music, it has not so utterly broken loose from all conventions as not to require to be sung in tune. Wagner's harmonies are often abstruse and exceedingly complicated, but false intonation plays the very deuce with them, just as it does with the harmonies of Adolph Adam or any other composer in the whole list.

The next programme is: Dvorák, Symphony No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World;" Goldmark, concerto for violin, in A minor, opus 28: Smetana, symphonic poem; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 2, in C major, opus 72. Mr. Cesar Thomson will be the violinist.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 20, 1895.

The Symphony Concerts.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

May there not be a sincere word said regarding the Boston Symphony concerts, both this season and previously, without displaying a captious spirit of criticism or casting doubt upon the sincerity and ability of the business and artistic management of the greatest instrumental organization in America?

These concerts have been of wonderful educative value to this city, and they are this season of much greater value than ever before, chiefly by reason of the acute and illuminating talks by Mr. Louis Elson that preface them at Sayles Hall. But, while the music-lovers of Providence have progressed and are able to appreciate programmes of a higher order, it seems that the programme-maker of the orchestra is not aware of the fact, and continues to select pieces of a "popular" nature to a greater extent than is warranted by the degree of musical culture of his Providence audiences. It is also felt that, in the matter of solo artists, we are discriminated against, and I am inclined to believe that this charge is, in a measure, justified. Take the concert on Wednesday evening of last week for example. When the same programme was given in New York a week previous there were two soloists, Mme. Nordica and Herr Anton Schott. We were accorded only the famous old tenor, who may be said to have seen his best singing days, though still an artist entirely worthy of great roles and an interpreter of Wagner of deservedly high standing. This last concert is also the best example of the criticism that is urged with regard to the makeup of the programmes. When the course was first announced Providence patrons were promised a Wagner night. This, it seems to me, should have meant the devotion of one concert to the high purpose of exhibiting Wagner in the truest possible manner. Assuredly that cannot be done by giving several brilliant fragments of his works, however meritorious the fragments might be or however faultlessly they might be rendered by the orchestra. We do not get a true conception of Wagner in that way, as the Journal very justly pointed out in its notice of the concert on the following morning. The management of the orchestra treated Providence as New York was treated in this matter; but the management made a mistake in both cases. There is no musical organization in America that can interpret Wagner with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York cannot approach the standard of the Symphony. This splendid organization owed it to itself to give an expose of Wagner that should be entirely worthy of itself and as nearly worthy of Wagner as possible. Even conceding that the best policy required the exposition of Wagner by means of selections, there would still be grounds for questioning the programme as given here. The selections were the best known Wagner fragments, the most frequently given, those that might be said to have been already worn out, so far as their adaptability for use by the foremost musical organization in the country for the purpose of a notable Wagnerian concert is concerned.

The programme for the concert before the last, that of Dec. 19, was not the most flagrant example of the perverted judgment of whoever arranged them, as it gave us Beethoven's great Seventh Symphony, which is itself a feast sufficient for one evening, but the putting of Carl Baermann, an artist who needs no orchestral background, in competition with the resonant strength of the orchestra had the effect to vulgarize the orchestral work and belittle Baermann, whose delicate genius needs the most sympathetic background.

But I did not mean to enter into the general question of the composition of the Symphony programmes, although that field of observation is rich in opportunity. I merely wish to express here, in a fashion that may possibly attract the attention of Conductor Paur or Manager Ellis, the feeling that I know has been indulged by some of the orchestra's Providence patrons for two or three seasons. I do not suppose the Symphony people realize fully the truth that is so evident to us, namely, that the educative work of the orchestra in this city has been so effective and of such a high order that the public taste and capacity for appreciation has advanced far beyond the point at which the orchestra managers found it when they began to plan programmes for Providence. The teacher should have in mind his pupil's capacity for advancement, and should see to it that the text-book or oral lesson is keyed to a note constantly in advance of the pupil's achievement.

G. F.

Providence, Jan. 17, 1895.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1895.

The Kneisel Concert.—The opening concert of the Kneisel Quartet on Friday last was a memorable event, and the playing was so unexceptionably fine that the hall will be found too small for the next of the series. The musical public owes a debt of gratitude to Mr. Kneisel and his companions. Such a treat has been seldom enjoyed. Beethoven's Quartet in A minor, an immortal composition that deserves all the enthusiasm it has created, was richly and reverently interpreted. There were two pretty movements of Cherubini in D minor that delighted, but of course in a less degree, and the concluding number was Dvorak's great quartet in F major, played so often last year. It is a great work, and repetition but adds to its popularity.

NY FIGARO

PUBLISHERS:

Sonnabend, den 19. Januar 1895.

Herausgeber: Leo von Raven.
Redakteur: Emil Jasper.

Providence, R. J., 17. Jan. '95.

Wenn Ihr Berichterstatter durch Abwesenheit von Berichten geglänzt hat, so ist dies nicht seine Schuld, sondern der nicht zu langen, aber doch glänzenden Reihe von Konzerten, welche bis jetzt in dieser Saison stattgefunden haben. Da nur Besprechungen der allerbesten Konzerte in den Rahmen eines Figaro-Berichtes passen, so beziehe ich mich nur auf die Messias-Aufführung des Arion-Clubs und die paar Symphonie-Konzerte des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters. Die Aufführung des Messias vom Arion-Club unter Leitung von Jules Jordan fand die größte Bewunderung bei unserem kritischen Publikum. Der Chor zeigte die vollgültigsten Beweise des ernsten, gründlichen Studiums, welches derselbe unter der sicheren Lehrmethode Jordan's erhält. Gegen allen bisherigen Usus hat auch das Boston Symphonie-Orchester in dieser Saison schon einige Novitäten gebracht, und ist es ein Vergnügen für uns zu konstatiren, daß Herr Paur in der Hinsicht etwas Rücksicht auf das hiesige Publikum genommen hat, denn wollte man in früheren Jahren etwas Neues hören, mußte man nach Boston wandern. Von Solisten, welche in diesen Konzerten auftreten, sind besonders der Franzose Plancon, der Pianist Carl Baermann und „unser" Anton Schott zu nennen, und besonders war es der letztere, welcher in dem großen Raume der Infantry Halle seine Stimme zu seltenem Glanze entfaltete. Das letzte Konzert war ein „Wagner Abend". Die mustergültigen Aufführungen dieses Orchesters ziehen nicht die vollen Häuser, wie sie es verdienen. — Diese Woche war die be—rühmte Lillian Russell hier und absolvirte ein Gastspiel im Prov. Opera House. Jeder ging um die viel-besprochene, viel-beschriebene und viel-geschiedene Diva zu sehen, wir glauben nicht, daß sehr viele aus musikalischem Interesse aus ins Theater gegangen sind. Da das Prov. Opera House jeden Abend ausverkauft war, so war der Zweck erfüllt und das ist wohl die Hauptsache des Managers.

Herm. Mueller.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, JANUARY 24, 1895.

TICKET SPECULATORS A NUISANCE.

Manager Ellis of Music Hall Complains to the Police of Their Presence.

For some time it has been noticed by patrons of some of the theatres in the city, and by those who are accustomed to go to Music Hall, that about the doors and on the sidewalks in the neighborhood of the buildings for entertainment there have been a number of ticket speculators soliciting patronage from the passers-by. On Monday nights especially one sees boys near the theatre doors trying to sell "billboard" passes for a sum much less than the ordinary price of admission, and it has become a decided nuisance. At the stage-doors of some of the theatres it is customary for the doorkeeper to keep a little rattan stick to drive away the youngsters who are in the habit of loitering about to get a chance to act as "supe," but in the front of the house there seems to be no adequate means of keeping the idlers away, save by calling upon the police. In the case of Music Hall this has been done by Manager Ellis. Superintendent of Police Eldridge has been requested to detail a policeman to stop the nuisance, and it is probable that the patrons of the Friday-afternoon symphony rehearsals will be troubled no more by requests to purchase tickets. In most instances the speculators are persons who have stood in line for some special attraction in order to get a premium on a particularly good seat, but sometimes persons who have bought tickets to be used by themselves have been known to stand in the theatre or Music Hall lobby and solicit a purchase.

[83]

The Music Trades.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 19, 1895.

Loeffler's Latest Work.

At the Eleventh Symphony Concert two works were heard for the first time: Dvorak's Carnival overture, and an unpublished Divertimento, in A minor for violin and orchestra, written by C. M. Loeffler, a member of the orchestra, who himself played the violin. This opus was exceedingly interesting and received with great favor. Both of these new productions were most welcome. Even if new works are not better than old ones, we want to hear and judge for ourselves. The other numbers were Grieg's Suite, Aus Holberg's Zeit, and Mozart's Symphony in D, No. One.

Mr. Loeffler has been a violin pupil of Leonard, Joachim, and Massart, and began his pubiic career in 1878, as a member of the orchestra of Prince Dervies, who lived alternately in Nice and Lugano. Having studied composition with Kiel, of Berlin, and Guiraud, of Paris, Mr. Loeffler took naturally to writing, and several of his pieces have been produced within five years, mostly in Boston: Les Leillees de l'Ukraine; Fantastic Cello Concerto; string sextet and quartet; violin sonata; songs with violin obligato.

We learn from the program that this Divertisemento was composed last summer, after his return from Europe. It is, in the best sense of the phrase, a virtuoso composition. It is also a study in tonal color, and makes no pretensions to strict form, which, indeed, would not be in keeping with the character of the work. The first movement, the preambulum, opening allegro, in A-minor, ¾, calls for these instruments: three flutes (one interchangeable with piccolo), two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, the usual strings, harp and kettle drums. The solo violin begins at once in loose and and flexible figuration against a pedal. It is as though one should extemporize, preparing for the coming theme; and yet the character of this apparent episode is the character of the movement, interrupted by melodic episodes of plaintive or forcible nature. There is a noteworthy passage of instrumentation in the episode molto tranquillo, where the harp and four violas in unison flow against the song of the solo violin which a horn sustains. The Eclogue is naturally in the character of a pastorale. No violins are used. There are three flutes, two clarinets, two bassoons, an English horn, two horns, two trumpets, kettledrums, harp, and the usual strings, with the exception noted. The last movement, Carn eval des Morts, is a series of variations on the plainsong, Dies Iræ, Dies Illa. The theme is declaimed moderato, 4-2, and then treated after the fashion of passacaglia. The second verse of the plainsong is also used later. To the instruments mentioned in the first movement are now added the tuba and the cymbals. There is no formal cadenza; or the cadenza is rather a series of modulatory passages.

Said a celebrated wit of the strawberry: "Doubtless God might have made a better berry, but doubtless he never did"; and this saying came to mind in listening to the fourth Kneisel Concert, of that Quartet's tenth season. The novelty of the eve was a sonata for piano and cello, op. 1, by Hans Pfitzner, a young Frankfort composer. In the second movement, langsam, Mr. Schroeder's cello was as clear at a trumpet. The third movement, sehr schnell, runs from a sort of sleighbell ride into a spinsong, strongly suggestive of Wagner. It was so beautifully played that the audience was disposed to demand a repetition, and has really quite as much humor as the fourth movement, specially so marked. The piano part was admirably played by Arthur Whiting. The quartets were both old and both good. Haydn's in D, op. 54, No. 5, is as merry as a grig, and the finale leaps you into our old-time Sailor's Hornpipe. Beethoven's A minor, op. 132, has not been given here since about 1880, and is specially interesting because of its adagio in the Lydian mode, a thank giving for restored health, written only two years before the composer's death.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 21, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert last Saturday evening was wholly made up of selections from the works of Richard Wagner, and was as follows:

"Rienzi," Overture.....(1842).
"Tannhäuser," Introduction to Act III.....(1845).
"Der fliegende Holländer," Overture.....(1843).
"Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III.....(1850).
"Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg".....(1868).
a.) Prelude to Act III., Dance of Apprentices, and Procession of the Master Singers.
b.) Walther's Prize Song, Act III., Scene 5.
"Das Rheingold," Procession of the Gods and Lament of the Rhine-Daughters.....(1869).
"Die Walküre," Siegmund's Love Song, Act 1., Scene 3.....(1870).
"Siegfried," Waldweben.....(1876).
"Siegfried," Siegfried's Passage to Brünhilde's Rock, and "Götterdämmerung," Morning Dawn, and Siegfried's Rhine Journey.....(1876).
Mr. Anton Schott was the singer.

Who shall say the public do not like Wagner, after seeing last Saturday's audience? for, with all due civility to Mr. Schott, we think it was the programme, rather than he, that was the bait to catch so many fish! The programme was, in one sense, admirably selected; it gave a taste of every great stage work by Wagner, excepting "Tristan" and "Parsifal," and this, too, in chronological order, with one easily explicable exception. Save for the introduction to the third act of "Tannhäuser" (Tannhäuser's Pilgrimage), the selections were all familiar; and none the worse for that! About the character of one or two of the selections, and their fitness for figuring on a programme of one of our symphony concerts, there may be some question. Upon the whole, what separates the selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," made by Hans Richter, and those from "Das Rheingold," arranged by H. Zumpe, from ordinary operatic potpourris? It cannot be the dignity of the music itself; for only the maddest Wagner enthusiast would care to claim that the Wagner music-dramas stand on a higher plane of artistic dignity (to put it mildly) than Mozart's "Don Giovanni" or Beethoven's Fidelio;" and we all know what any rational conductor would say to putting "selections" from either of these operas on a first-class symphony concert programme. Or is it the character of the music? To be sure, most of the Wagner excerpts were purely orchestral selections, and so far fit for their place on the programme; but there was at least one passage in Richter's lot where voice-parts were omitted, and a long one in Zumpe's where the original voice parts were actually arranged for orchestral instruments—just as in any common potpourri. Moreover, this whole arrangement of Zumpe's is in the fullest sense of the term a "transcription," not a concatenated series of excerpts from the original score; it is a transcription for smaller orchestra, such as commonly finds a home in "popular concerts" only. Some of Wagner's most famous orchestral effects are absolutely lost in it. It does seem to us that this sort of thing is rather infra dig. for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of its regular concerts.

We have exceedingly little sympathy with the talk that is often made against presenting excerpts from Wagner's music dramas off the stage. When the music is given in its original shape, we find it just as acceptable concert music as we do excerpts—such as intermezzi, arias, duets, or ensemble-pieces—from operas by other composers. But it should be given in its original shape, and with the original scoring. We would not be over-nice in this last matter, either; there are some wind parts in the "Nibelungen" scores that can well be dispensed with; no living soul would know the difference through his ear alone. Then, as a merely practical matter, where should we find six good harps? The lack of a few harps, more or less, should not be a bar to our hearing Wagner! But there are other instruments which cannot be so well spared, some processes of instrumentation the effect of which cannot be got by any other process; and it is doubly hard to have such effects missed when the proper instruments are perfectly available. In one passage in the "Rheingold" selections, Wagner divides his strings into sixteen separate parts; and it so happens that the effect he gets from this subdivision cannot possibly be obtained with Zumpe's nine parts. We certainly have enough strings in our orchestra to play the original version! Again, Mr. Paur had (for once) eight horns in his orchestra last Saturday, four of the players being new to the orchestra. Now, without speculating upon what can be done with new players, could not the first quartet of horns—the regular players in our orchestra—have learnt to play the "Bayreuth" tubas, so that these important instruments need not have been omitted? The orchestra owns a complete set, and now that selections from the "Nibelungen" may have to be given at any time, ought not our horn-players to have regular practice on the Bayreuth tubas, just as it is well to have a clarinet-player who can play the alto-Saxophone? Remember that the tuba-parts in the "Nibelungen" are by no means difficult, and require no extraordinary technique; a fine horn-player who could not master the mechanism of these instruments in a month ought to be ashamed of himself.

But enough of this! The performance by the orchestra was almost without exception admirable, and the great music was played with finish, fire and grand effectiveness. Mr. Paur's readings were also unexceptionable. And the audience enjoyed the concert to the top of its bent. It was undoubtedly one of the high tides of the season in the estimation of a large majority of listeners.

Mr. Schott sang his two songs with splendid understanding of their meaning and character. The intellectual and emotional sides of a great artist were plainly there, and this is not a little. Unfortunately, Mr. Schott has that peculiar throaty emission of tone that is almost "academic" with many German tenors, who seem somehow to swallow their tone—as the cigarette smoker does his smoke—before giving it out. Not only does this peculiar school of tone formation result in a quality of sound distressing to the ear, but it gives the singer every facility for singing out of tune. That Mr. Schott sang often out of tune on Saturday evening is not to be denied; and whatever of novelty there may be in Wagner's music, it has not so utterly broken loose from all conventions as not to require to be sung in tune. Wagner's harmonies are often abstruse and exceedingly complicated, but false intonation plays the very deuce with them, just as it does with the harmonies of Adolph Adam or any other composer in the whole list.

The next programme is: Dvorák, Symphony No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World;" Goldmark, concerto for violin, in A minor, opus 28: Smetana, symphonic poem; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 2, in C major, opus 72. Mr. César Thomson will be the violinist.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 20, 1895.

The Symphony Concerts.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

May there not be a sincere word said regarding the Boston Symphony concerts, both this season and previously, without displaying a captious spirit of criticism or casting doubt upon the sincerity and ability of the business and artistic management of the greatest instrumental organization in America?

These concerts have been of wonderful educative value to this city, and they are this season of much greater value than ever before, chiefly by reason of the acute and illuminating talks by Mr. Louis Elson that preface them at Sayles Hall. But, while the music-lovers of Providence have progressed and are able to appreciate programmes of a higher order, it seems that the programme-maker of the orchestra is not aware of the fact, and continues to select pieces of a "popular" nature to a greater extent than is warranted by the degree of musical culture of his Providence audiences. It is also felt that, in the matter of solo artists, we are discriminated against, and I am inclined to believe that this charge is, in a measure, justified. Take the concert on Wednesday evening of last week for example. When the same programme was given in New York a week previous there were two soloists, Mme. Nordica and Herr Anton Schott. We were accorded only the famous old tenor, who may be said to have seen his best singing days, though still an artist entirely worthy of great roles and an interpreter of Wagner of deservedly high standing. This last concert is also the best example of the criticism that is urged with regard to the makeup of the programmes. When the course was first announced, Providence patrons were promised a Wagner night. This, it seems to me, should have meant the devotion of one concert to the high purpose of exhibiting Wagner in the truest possible manner. Assuredly that cannot be done by giving several brilliant fragments of his works, however meritorious the fragments might be or however faultlessly they might be rendered by the orchestra. We do not get a true conception of Wagner in that way, as the Journal very justly pointed out in its notice of the concert on the following morning. The management of the orchestra treated Providence as New York was treated in this matter; but the management made a mistake in both cases. There is no musical organization in America that can interpret Wagner with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York cannot approach the standard of the Symphony. This splendid organization owed it to itself to give an expose of Wagner that should be entirely worthy of itself and as nearly worthy of Wagner as possible. Even conceding that the best policy required the exposition of Wagner by means of selections, there would still be grounds for questioning the programme as given here. The selections were the best known Wagner fragments, the most frequently given, those that might be said to have been already worn out, so far as their adaptability for use by the foremost musical organization in the country for the purpose of a notable Wagnerian concert is concerned.

The programme for the concert before the last, that of Dec. 19, was not the most flagrant example of the perverted judgment of whoever arranged them, as it gave us Beethoven's great Seventh Symphony, which is itself a feast sufficient for one evening, but the putting of Carl Baermann, an artist who needs no orchestral background, in competition with the resonant strength of the orchestra had the effect to vulgarize the orchestral work and belittle Baermann, whose delicate genius needs the most sympathetic background.

But I did not mean to enter into the general question of the composition of the Symphony programmes, although that field of observation is rich in opportunity. I merely wish to express here, in a fashion that may possibly attract the attention of Conductor Paur or Manager Ellis, the feeling that I know has been indulged by some of the orchestra's Providence patrons for two or three seasons. I do not suppose the Symphony people realize fully the truth that is so evident to us, namely, that the educative work of the orchestra in this city has been so effective and of such a high order that the public taste and capacity for appreciation has advanced far beyond the point at which the orchestra managers found it when they began to plan programmes for Providence. The teacher should have in mind his pupil's capacity for advancement, and should see to it that the text-book or oral lesson is keyed to a note constantly in advance of the pupil's achievement.

G. F.

Providence, Jan. 17, 1895.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1895.

The Kneisel Concert.—The opening concert of the Kneisel Quartet on Friday last was a memorable event, and the playing was so unexceptionably fine that the hall will be found too small for the next of the series. The musical public owes a debt of gratitude to Mr. Kneisel and his companions. Such a treat has been seldom enjoyed. Beethoven's Quartet in A minor, an immortal composition that deserves all the enthusiasm it has created, was richly and reverently interpreted. There were two pretty movements of Cherubini in D minor that delighted, but of course in a less degree, and the concluding number was Dvorak's great quartet in F major, played so often last year. It is a great work, and repetition but adds to its popularity.

NY-FIGARO.

PUBLISHERS:

Sonnabend, den 19. Januar 1895.

Herausgeber: LEO VON RAVEN.
Redakteur: EMIL JASPER.

Providence, R. J., 17. Jan. '95.

Wenn Ihr Berichterstatter durch Abwesenheit von Berichten geglänzt hat, so ist dies nicht seine Schuld, sondern der nicht zu langen, aber doch glänzenden Reihe von Konzerten, welche bis jetzt in dieser Saison stattgefunden haben. Da nur Besprechungen der allerbesten Konzerte in den Rahmen eines Figaro-Berichtes passen, so beziehe ich mich nur auf die Messias-Aufführung des Arion-Clubs und die paar Symphonie-Konzerte des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters. Die Aufführung des Messias vom Arion-Club unter Leitung von Jules Jordan fand die größte Bewunderung bei unserem kritischen Publikum. Der Chor zeigte die vollgültigsten Beweise des ernsten, gründlichen Studiums, welches derselbe unter der sicheren Lehrmethode Jordan's erhält. Gegen allen bisherigen Usus hat auch das Boston Symphonie-Orchester in dieser Saison schon einige Novitäten gebracht, und ist es ein Vergnügen für uns zu konstatiren, daß Herr Paur in der Hinsicht etwas Rücksicht auf das hiesige Publikum genommen hat, denn wollte man in früheren Jahren etwas Neues hören, mußte man nach Boston wandern. Von Solisten, welche in diesen Konzerten auftreten, sind besonders der Franzose Plancon, der Pianist Carl Baermann und „unser" Anton Schott zu nennen, und besonders war es der letztere, welcher in dem großen Raume der Infantry Halle seine Stimme zu seltenem Glanze entfaltete. Das letzte Konzert war ein „Wagner Abend". Die mustergültigen Aufführungen dieses Orchesters ziehen nicht die vollen Häuser, wie sie es verdienen. — Diese Woche war die be—rühmte Lillian Russell hier und absolvirte ein Gastspiel im Prov. Opera House. Jeder ging um die viel-besprochene, viel-beschriebene und viel-geschiedene Diva zu sehen, wir glauben nicht, daß sehr viele aus musikalischem Interesse aus ins Theater gegangen sind. Da das Prov. Opera House jeden Abend ausverkauft war, so war der Zweck erfüllt und das ist wohl die Hauptsache des Managers.

Herm. Mueller.

* *

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, JANUARY 24, 1895.

TICKET SPECULATORS A NUISANCE.

Manager Ellis of Music Hall Complains to the Police of Their Presence.

For some time it has been noticed by patrons of some of the theatres in the city, and by those who are accustomed to go to Music Hall, that about the doors and on the sidewalks in the neighborhood of the buildings for entertainment there have been a number of ticket speculators soliciting patronage from the passers-by. On Monday nights especially one sees boys near the theatre doors trying to sell "billboard" passes for a sum much less than the ordinary price of admission, and it has become a decided nuisance. At the stage-doors of some of the theatres it is customary for the doorkeeper to keep a little rattan stick to drive away the youngsters who are in the habit of loitering about to get a chance to act as "supe," but in the front of the house there seems to be no adequate means of keeping the idlers away, save by calling upon the police. In the case of Music Hall this has been done by Manager Ellis. Superintendent of Police Eldridge has been requested to detail a policeman to stop the nuisance, and it is probable that the patrons of the Friday-afternoon symphony rehearsals will be troubled no more by requests to purchase tickets. In most instances the speculators are persons who have stood in line for some special attraction in order to get a premium on a particularly good seat, but sometimes persons who have bought tickets to be used by themselves have been known to stand in the theatre or Music Hall lobby and solicit a purchase.

[83]

SUNDAY, JAN. 27, 1895.

THIRTY-SIX PAGES.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Cesar Thompson, Soloist, at Symphony Concert.

Cesar Thomson, the celebrated Belgian violinist, regarding whom much has of late been published, was the soloist at the 13th Symphony concert. He has been in America several months and has played in half a dozen cities, but his first appearance in Boston was at the Friday afternoon rehearsal.

He came to this country with the endorsement of the leading European critics, who appear to have been unanimous in declaring him one of the greatest violinists of the age. He is a native of Liege, where he received his early education. In later years he studied with Vieutemps and Wieniawski.

Mr Thomson did not receive a very enthusiastic greeting Friday afternoon, the proverbial coldness of Boston audiences to strangers was strikingly evident. Last night's audience was rather more cordial, but on neither occasion did the violinist receive the reception that his reputation demanded. After he had played the first movement of Goldmark's A minor concerto his great ability was recognized and there was considerable applause, but no enthusiasm.

The fact is, Mr Thomson appears here under great disadvantage, for it is impossible not to compare him with Ysaye, who has been so generally worshipped as the greatest of all violinists. Had Mr Thomson been the first to appear there is no doubt but that he would have created something of a sensation. As it is, his really marvelous playing will be listened to in a calmly critical mood, and because he may not be the equal in all respects of the accepted idol, will not be likely to receive due praise for the great merit every one will acknowledge he does possess.

Personal magnetism and showy effect are important factors in winnng favor from the average audience. Mr Thompson depends solely upon his art for success. His command of technque is simply marvelous, if possible it is superior to that of Ysaye. But he is very cold. His playing appeals to the intelligence rather than to the heart. In other words, one needs be an educated musician to fully appreciate his work.

Mr Thomson is always calm and reposeful. He performs the most remarkable technical exploits with such apparent ease that their real difficulty is not evident. He plays double octaves with rapidity and sureness that is simply amazing. His intonation is always absolutely correct, and he produces harmonics with exquisite effect. His bowing is firm and clean, graceful, but never showy. The tone is clear and beautiful, broad without being especially powerful, and in the lower register is delightfully warm. In short, Mr Thomson is a great artist. It matters not that there may be others who are greater, he is great enough to command attention, and his playing will well repay hearing.

His performance of the beautiful and exacting Goldmark concerto was intelligent at all times, and was not lacking in expression. His playing of the brilliant cadenza was one of the most marvelous exhibitions of technical dexterity ever witnessed in this city.

The orchestral numbers were Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," Bedrich Smetana's symphonic poem "Sarka" and the No. 2 "Leonore" overture. The Dvorak symphony was reviewed at length in these columns when it was played a year ago, and further comment is unnecessary at this time. A second hearing of the work does not change the impression made by the first performance. It is a long and rather interesting work, but is no more suggestive of America than of any other country. There are other, many other, symphonies which would be listened to with much greater pleasure.

The poem "Sarka" by Smetana was heard here for the first time. It is an elaborate and pleasing piece of descriptive music, and was finely played by the orchestra. A splendid performance of the "Leonore" overture was given under Mr Paur's intelligent direction.

The program for the next concert will be as follows:

Mozart .....Overture, "Don Giovanni"
Lachner .....Suite in D major, Op 113
Mendelssohn .....
Symphony No. 4, in A major, "Italian"

The Dvorak symphony, on a second hearing, did not seem to justify its title any more than it did when it was first given here. It has many pleasing, many beautiful moments, but it is not a work of the first order, and its alleged themes founded on native folk tunes will not bear examination. The first movement has a decided Slavonic flavor, the slow movement is Scottish in its prevailing color, with a slight Scandinavian tint. The opening of the scherzo is Spanish in character, and its trio bears a very close resemblance to a German waltz, while the finale opens with a melody of an Irish cast, and before it is over breaks into something that is not wholly unsuggestive of an Irish jig. It was thoughtfully read by Mr. Paur and splendidly played by his orchestra; in fact, the work of the latter was up to its best standard through the whole concert.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Don Giovanni," Mozart; suite in D, op. 113, Lachner; "Italian," symphony, Mendelssohn. There will be no soloist. The orchestra will give a concert on Tuesday afternoon, at which Melba will appear. Every seat has been sold.

---

[84]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 27.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 27, 1895.

AUDIENCE HELD IN RAPTURE.

Cesar Thomson Charms All at the Symphony Concert.

Violinist Proves Himself an Artist in the Most Exacting Sense of the Word—Wonders of His Technique Bewildering—Complete Triumph Wins a Fury of Plaudits.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last night before a very large audience, the magnet, of course, being Mr. Cesar Thomson, who was the soloist of the evening. The programme was:

Symphony, "From the New World"....Dvorak
Concerto for violin and orchestra....Goldmark
Overture, "Leonora," No. 2.....Beethoven
Symphonic poem, "Sarka".....Smetana

Mr. Thomson's success was overwhelming. At a first glance there is little in him that indicates the master artist. His figure is short and he has a slight stoop in the shoulders, and as he came on the stage he seemed to shrink from the welcome that was accorded him. He scarcely looked at the audience, but turned toward the orchestra and bowed his acknowledgments in that direction. When he took his place it was then seen that he had a fine face, full of intelligence and striking in its mingled expression of sternness and of poetic suggestion. He stands firmly, almost rigidly, and never sways to the right or the left while he is playing, seeking no adventitious aid to intensify the effect of his work or to impress his audience. His performance of the concerto revealed an artist in the highest and most exacting sense of the word. His tone is large, pure and searching; his bowing is large and his style is equally chaste, noble and sympathetic. In point of technique he surpasses any violinist who has ever been heard here. In his art he is a veritable giant. Though a virtuoso of the most brilliant order, there is nothing of mere virtuosity in his playing, which is always tempered by fine discretion, broad dignity and profound artistic sincerity. It would be easy to deal in superlatives regarding his marvellously fluent octave playing, the astonishing ease and freedom of his "double-stopping," the purity and closeness of his double trilling and the really astounding brilliancy of his pyrotechnics generally, but it is more pleasing to dwell on his glorious tone, his classical style, always serious and at times almost ascetic, and the solidity and impressiveness of his playing. While he appeals irresistfoly to the wonder of his hearers he makes no less a demand on their intelligence. He plays without seeming effort and with an earnestness that imparts itself to his audience and holds it in rapt attention.

CESAR THOMSON.

The Goldmark concerto is a long work, and though it is good music, and the solo part is admirably adapted to the instrument, it is somewhat dry; but it was read and played in a manner that kept his hearers steadily interested throughout, and at the close of the first movement there was an outburst of applause that emphasized as great and as fairly earned a success as was ever made by a great artist in Music Hall. His performance of the slow movement was very beautiful in the broad and majestic sentiment he accorded it, and in the finale the wonders of his technique were bewildering, notably in the immensely difficult cadenza, in which his bowing and his finger work were alike dazzling and exciting. He is unmistakably a unique artist, well balanced, intellectual, and never caried away by his emotions beyond the point of discretion. His powers are entitled to a closer consideration than can be given them in a hastily written criticism. Suffice it to repeat that he achieved a complete triumph; and at the end of the concerto he was applauded with a frenzy of enthusiasm, and was vigorously recalled and so often that he at last responded by playing a cadenza of his own, written for a Paganini fantasia, in which he gave a hurricane of octaves, tenths and of complicated double-stopping, the like of which was surely never heard here before. Again a fury of plaudits broke out, and he was compelled to come to the front again and again to bow his acknowledgments. Of the cordiality of his reception in Boston on his future appearances there cannot be the shadow of a doubt.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 27.

The Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall, last night. The programme was:

Symphony No. 8, in E-minor.....Dvorak.
Concerto for Violin, A-minor, op. 28, Goldmark.
Symphonic Poem, "Sarka".....Smetana.
Overture, "Lenore," No. 2.....Beethoven.

In the not distant past so much has been written about the Dvorak "From the New World" symphony, that it is needless to renew old discussions. The work is good, solid and scholarly; the scoring is always strong, not infrequently ingeniously original, and what is said is well worth the saying. No more intrinsically valuable and beautiful work has been written in these later days. There is, however, and there can be nothing distinctly American in the symphony. Music is a universal language; but it is not universally read in the same way. It appeals differently to every individual; or, rather, every individual draws from it the elements that he can understand and assimilate. In reality, the assertion that music is a universal language simply means that everybody understands it, that is, understands it according to his education and capacity. This, again, simply means that the emotions that each individual extracts from the music are the emotions that he has put into the music. A competent musician has asserted of the adagio of Dr. Dvorak's symphony that it is "so suggestive of the loneliness of the immense prairies of the West." A Russian would use word "steppes" in place of "prairies," and an impressionable chamois hunter might find in the music the desolation of the summit of the Matterhorn. The feeling is first put into the music, and then extracted from it. The Dvorak symphony is fine artistic work, but the only really descriptive elements in it are those in its title, and this title might be changed to "From the Old World" without in the slightest affecting the musical elements of the work, although the hearer might dream of Siberia and polar bears as he now dreams of immense prairies, Indians and negroes. The title, by the way, is faultless, for it, and not the music, induces the mood the composer wishes us to feel. But any further word description is needless; he supplies the universal language; we must be allowed to interpret it according to our individual need and capacity.

Of Mr. Cesar Thompson, the soloist of the evening, it is impossible, after only hearing him once, to give a formal judgment, and what may be said must be taken as first impression to be confirmed or rejected in the future. One fact, however, does not need further confirmation. Mr. Thompson is a consummate master of technique; he masters difficulties with an almost contemptuous ease. His double stopping, chord and octave playing are startling surprises; he throws them off as placidly as a child throw off soap bubbles; his bowing is strong and free, and the tone he produces large, clear resonant and most exquisite in quality. All this is positive, but when higher artistic symptoms are sought for certainty is lost in doubt. Mr. Thompson seems to be an artist of taste rather than of feeling; he seems to have studied his art so closely that he has lost all faith in natural impulses. He has a reason for whatever he does, he has carefully argued it out and he can shield himself behind intellect and pure taste. He is always dignified, but he is lacking in spontaneity and in that power born of irresistible emotional impulse. The word 'cold' will not describe his playing, and yet the moon's beams contain more warmth, care. Elaborate thought, carefully reasoned out dynamic effects mark all his work; nothing is left to the inspiration of the moment; the effect intended is always the effect produced; the premises given all else follows with the logical exactness of a syllogism. This is the method followed by French actors, and to like or to dislike it is simply a matter of taste, of education. Mr. Cesar Thompson then is not an emotional player, he attracts attention through his rare skill, intellectual admiration reaches the point of wonder; what he does is of surpassing excellence; but the admiration aroused is cold, critical; we are never moved to that degree of enthusiasm wherein we forget the artist in the work done, wherein beauty hides skill, and emotional ecstasy raises feeling above thinking. Mr. Thompson is a rare artist, a rare solver of the most complex violin problems. The demonstration is faultless, the quod erat demonstrandum crushing in its sufficiency; but he is seemingly only a one-sided genius; his violin speaks in unimpeachable grammar, but it never reveals its soul. The marvels that are done are beyond praise, but the puzzle is why are they done at all.

The Smetana symphonic poem is programme music; it needs a descriptive preface to make it understood and an untroubled mind and strong imagination to find out what it means. Some of the audience present mistook it for Beethoven's "Lenore" overture, and consequently the work received more credit than it deserved. It tells of butchery and provokes weariness.

The programme for the next concert is Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," Lachner's Suite in D-major, op. 113, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The fifth Kneisel Quartet concert was given in Union Hall, on Monday evening. The programme was; Quartet in D-major, Borodine; Quartet in B-flat, major, op. 18, Beethoven; Quintet in D-minor, op. 38, H. W. Parker.

The Borodine quartet is a fascinating work; from start to finish the work holds the attention by its originality, freshness and large ideas. The first movement is delightful, both in subject and development; it is filled with melody, and, in its frank, broad treatment, has nothing in common with the over-labored refinements of modern mediocrity; it is broad, fine art throughout. The scherzo is attractive, but there is nothing of joy in its restlessness, and it leads, very naturally, to the slow movement, a most delicate and memory-haunting "notturno," overflowing with real tenderness and pathos, but always large and manly. The finale reflects the sadness of the previous movement; but the restfulness has vanished, the vivacity is that of a hashish victim; it is forced and nervous. The work is both intellectually and emotionally satisfying; there is pleasure and profit in studying its fine workmanship, delight in simply listening to its beauties.

The other novelty of the evening, Mr. Parker's quintet, has only an intellectual interest; what is said is of less importance than the manner of saying it. The workmanship is good and solid, but the ideas are weak, and, occasionally, trivial. The first movement is broadly treated, but the subject hints at commonplace; it seems to suggest, wrongly, of course, that the composes was indifferent as to what theme he selected, provided he could use it to show his technical knowledge. Then when a seemingly novel effect has been found, Mr. Parker harps on it to the point of weariness. The andante lento is attractive but not strong, and the composer seems to have reserved his invention for the finale, which is by far the best movement in the work. Skill in construction is everywhere evident, but it is in vain to look for even the smallest flash of inspiration. The quintet is careful studio work, admirable as far as it goes; but the pity is that it does not go farther.

The programme was finely played throughout. Mr. Kneisel [illegible] their ra[illegible]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1895.

A VARIETY OF CONCERTS—THE KNEISEL, THE APOLLO, THE SYMPHONY, YSAYE, ETC.

The fifth Kneisel programme, played on Monday evening in Union Hall, placed the ever welcome Beethoven quartette in B flat, opus 18, between two novelties, which were a quartette in D major by Borodine and a quintette (with a second 'cello) by H. W. Parker. All were performed to perfection, and Mr. Leo Schulz's 'cello slipped into its place in complete sympathy with the style and disposition of other instruments. The Borodine composition charmed at once by its openness of spirit and its frankness of statement. Melodious thoughts had come freely to the author's mind and he had given them out without pausing to do more than arrange them gracefully, genially and perspicuously, presenting them first for their own sakes and leaving academic formality of construction to take care of itself. Nor was the hearer ever reminded by strange figures, blunt contrasts, and unfamiliar rhythms that real Russian music was being played, which might not be recognized as such if some familiar label or trade mark were not impressed upon it. It was all music for the sake of music, and so it pleased and refreshed. Mr. Parker's quintette proved to contain good, sensible writing; but, as was said of that work of his which Mr. Whiting brought out with Mr. Adamowski, it seemed more a work of deliberation than of interior compulsion. It had well formed ideas put into proper and proportionate forms; but we could not exactly feel a purpose in it or regard it as other than a study in its particular class of composition— interesting, to be sure, but sometimes uncertain in drift and equipoise and sometimes apparently scarcely more than tentative. Indeed one occasionally thought that if Mr. Parker had been sure in his own mind that some passages would sound as they did, he would have altered them beforehand.

The features of the Thirteenth Symphony concert would undoubtedly be considered the first appearance in Boston of Mr. Cesar Thomson, who has been dividing public attention with Mr. Ysaye as a solo violinist. He is an elder man, thick set, and with a physiognomy which suggests Du Maurier's drawings of Svengali in "Trilby," although he has a far pleasanter and more reasonable face, with the expression upon it of a scholar and not of a cynic. It is a quiet, concentrated face, over which pass few changes; the beard is slightly grizzled, and the hair is thick, heavy and black. Altogether the man's appearance interests and his passionless devotion to his task commands a respectful attention wherewith will be soon blended a great admiration and much astonishment. For when they who understand something of the difficulties of violin technique hear and see him perform such feats as he executed in the last movement of the concerto which he had chosen, they realize that they have before them an executant who cannot at present be surpassed. Because he meets and conquers the most stupendous problems of execution as if he were playing a simple exercise. There is absolutely no trickery, no display to catch the eye and no intimation but that all is plain and easy and might be so for any virtuoso of approved proficiency. There is not much depth to his art, if it be fair to judge him by this one hearing, nor is there much resplendency. He does not lack animation, incisiveness, emphasis or decision, and he has often a tender and gentle tone. But it is as a philosopher and not as a poet that he renders his music, and the dramatic quality seems to be quite lacking in his style. Beautiful perfection of method and unstrained command of all complexities have their value and their influence, and Mr. Thomson will be accepted and heard gladly and appreciatively as an artist of peculiar and eminent power. He took for this occasion Goldmark's concerto in A minor, opus 28, of which the first movement is dull, labored and unfavorable for a soloist's debut; the second contains a genial sostenuto air and the third with its tremendous cadenza offers a chance for all the virtuosity which the player possesses, thus bringing in a sensation along with the conclusion.

The Symphony was Dvorak's "From the New World," a second hearing of which confirms our previous impression that this composition must be considered as only theoretically and not illustratively relevant to the life and character of America, and as typical conditions in historical development instead of suggestive of musical forms and ideas. The allegro hints at the barbaric freedom of untutored peoples in its rhythms and phrases, which are at least as Oriental as Western, and might be dropped consistently enough into a new "Lakme." The larghetto breathes the native peaceful of a primitive and unperturbed state. The scherzo is like the stirring up of irregular and vagrant forces, and the finale is an orderly confusion of diverse elements, characterized alternately by erratic excitement and prideful pomposity. The band played it all well; the wooden wind did wonders of grace and finish, and Mr. Paur actually conceded a pianissimo at the end of the larghetto.

A short symphonic poem by Smetana was the novelty of the night, and created a fairly favorable impression. It is supposed to depict an episode in a war between vengeful Amazons and guilty Man. He, in the form of a knight, is smitten with compassion for the fair and injured Sarka (whose name the music bears) and she in return summons her sister after he and his comrades have fallen asleep in bivouac, and remorselessly extirpate them.

Beethoven's second "Leonore" overture ended the concert. But although it was well played, it made comparatively little effect, for want of contrast with the heavy and engrossing music which had gone before. A light overture, preferably of the French school, would have been better and more encouraging.

For next Saturday are announced,—the overture to "Don Giovanni," a suite by Lachner and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony.

The programme book for this last concert was one of the most indiscreet and unhelpful which has yet been printed—and that is saying a good deal. About the Dvorak symphony, concerning which people would gladly have been informed, there were just three valueless lines, while upon the familiar overture were expended five pages of analytic academic details. Last year many pages were expended by the editor on reprints from the works of Berlioz; this year many are being wasted on the egotistical and inconsequential autobiographic chatter of Mr. Martin Roeder, whose manuscripts apparently do not find other access easy to printers' ink. If this gentleman's confessions and experiences had been "left in the pen" of the translator and transcriber, and something inserted about Mr. Thomson's life, education, work and success, the programme-book would have deserved well of the people who take it up expectantly from week to week. But then its chief object seems to be to tell what people do not need or desire to know and to avoid what might interest or inform them.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN. 27, 1895.
THIRTY-SIX PAGES.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Cesar Thompson, Soloist, at Symphony Concert.

Cesar Thomson, the celebrated Belgian violinist, regarding whom much has of late been published, was the soloist at the 13th Symphony concert. He has been in America several months and has played in half a dozen cities, but his first appearance in Boston was at the Friday afternoon rehearsal.

He came to this country with the endorsement of the leading European critics, who appear to have been unanimous in declaring him one of the greatest violinists of the age. He is a native of Liege, where he received his early education. In later years he studied with Vieutemps and Wieniawski.

Mr Thomson did not receive a very enthusiastic greeting Friday afternoon, the proverbial coldness of Boston audiences to strangers was strikingly evident. Last night's audience was rather more cordial, but on neither occasion did the violinist receive the reception that his reputation demanded. After he had played the first movement of Goldmark's A minor concerto his great ability was recognized and there was considerable applause, but no enthusiasm.

The fact is, Mr Thomson appears here under great disadvantage, for it is impossible not to compare him with Ysaye, who has been so generally worshipped as the greatest of all violinists. Had Mr Thomson been the first to appear there is no doubt but that he would have created something of a sensation. As it is, his really marvelous playing will be listened to in a calmly critical mood, and because he may not be the equal in all respects of the accepted idol, will not be likely to receive due praise for the great merit every one will acknowledge he does possess.

Personal magnetism and showy effect are important factors in winnng favor from the average audience. Mr Thompson depends solely upon his art for success. His command of technque is simply marvelous, if possible it is superior to that of Ysaye. But he is very cold. His playing appeals to the intelligence rather than to the heart. In other words, one needs be an educated musician to fully appreciate his work.

Mr Thomson is always calm and reposeful. He performs the most remarkable technical exploits with such apparent ease that their real difficulty is not evident. He plays double octaves with rapidity and sureness that is simply amazing. His intonation is always absolutely correct, and he produces harmonics with exquisite effect. His bowing is firm and clean, graceful, but never showy. The tone is clear and beautiful, broad without being especially powerful, and in the lower register is delightfully warm. In short, Mr Thomson is a great artist. It matters not that there may be others who are greater, he is great enough to command attention, and his playing will well repay hearing.

His performance of the beautiful and exacting Goldmark concerto was intelligent at all times, and was not lacking in expression. His playing of the brilliant cadenza was one of the most marvelous exhibitions of technical dexterity ever witnessed in this city.

The orchestral numbers were Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," Bedrich Smetana's symphonic poem "Sarka" and the No. 2 "Leonore" overture. The Dvorak symphony was reviewed at length in these columns when it was played a year ago, and further comment is unnecessary at this time. A second hearing of the work does not change the impression made by the first performance. It is a long and rather interesting work, but is no more suggestive of America than of any other country. There are other, many other, symphonies which would be listened to with much greater pleasure.

The poem "Sarka" by Smetana was heard here for the first time. It is an elaborate and pleasing piece of descriptive music, and was finely played by the orchestra. A splendid performance of the "Leonore" overture was given under Mr Paur's intelligent direction.

The program for the next concert will be as follows:

Mozart .....Overture, "Don Giovanni"
Lachner .....Suite in D major, Op 113
Mendelssohn .....
Symphony No. 4, in A major, "Italian"

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 27.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 27, 1895.

AUDIENCE HELD IN RAPTURE.

Cesar Thomson Charms All at the Symphony Concert.

Violinist Proves Himself an Artist in the Most Exacting Sense of the Word—Wonders of His Technique Bewildering—Complete Triumph Wins a Fury of Plaudits.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last night before a very large audience, the magnet, of course, being Mr. Cesar Thomson, who was the soloist of the evening. The programme was:

Symphony, "From the New World"....Dvorak
Concerto for violin and orchestra....Goldmark
Overture, "Leonora," No. 2.....Beethoven
Symphonic poem, "Sarka".....Smetana

Mr. Thomson's success was overwhelming. At a first glance there is little in him that indicates the master artist. His figure is short and he has a slight stoop in the shoulders, and as he came on the stage he seemed to shrink from the welcome that was accorded him. He scarcely looked at the audience, but turned toward the orchestra and bowed his acknowledgments in that direction. When he took his place it was then seen that he had a fine face, full of intelligence and striking in its mingled expression of sternness and of poetic suggestion. He stands firmly, almost rigidly, and never sways to the right or the left while he is playing, seeking no adventitious aid to intensify the effect of his work or to impress his audience. His performance of the concerto revealed an artist in the highest and most exacting sense of the word. His tone is large, pure and searching; his bowing is large and his style is equally chaste, noble and sympathetic. In point of technique he surpasses any violinist who has ever been heard here. In his art he is a veritable giant. Though a virtuoso of the most brilliant order, there is nothing of mere virtuosity in his playing, which is always tempered by fine discretion, broad dignity and profound artistic sincerity. It would be easy to deal in superlatives regarding his marvellously fluent octave playing, the astonishing ease and freedom of his "double-stopping," the purity and closeness of his double trilling and the really astounding brilliancy of his pyrotechnics generally, but it is more pleasing to dwell on his glorious tone, his classical style, always serious and at times almost ascetic, and the solidity and impressiveness of his playing. While he appeals irresistfoly to the wonder of his hearers he makes no less a demand on their intelligence. He plays without seeming effort and with an earnestness that imparts itself to his audience and holds it in rapt attention.

CESAR THOMSON.

The Goldmark concerto is a long work, and though it is good music, and the solo part is admirably adapted to the instrument, it is somewhat dry; but it was read and played in a manner that kept his hearers steadily interested throughout, and at the close of the first movement there was an outbust of applause that emphasized as great and as fairly earned a success as was ever made by a great artist in Music Hall. His performance of the slow movement was very beautiful in the broad and majestic sentiment he accorded it, and in the finale the wonders of his technique were bewildering, notably in the immensely difficult cadenza, in which his bowing and his finger work were alike dazzling and exciting. He is unmistakably a unique artist, well balanced, intellectual, and never carried away by his emotions beyond the point of discretion. His powers are entitled to a closer consideration than can be given them in a hastily written criticism. Suffice it to repeat that he achieved a complete triumph; and at the end of the concerto he was applauded with a frenzy of enthusiasm, and was vigorously recalled and so often that he at last responded by playing a cadenza of his own, written for a Paganini fantasia, in which he gave a hurricane of octaves, tenths and of complicated double-stopping, the like of which was surely never heard here before. Again a fury of plaudits broke out, and he was compelled to come to the front again and again to bow his acknowledgments. Of the cordiality of his reception in Boston on his future appearances there cannot be the shadow of a doubt.

The Dvorak symphony, on a second hearing, did not seem to justify its title any more than it did when it was first given here. It has many pleasing, many beautiful moments, but it is not a work of the first order, and its alleged themes founded on native folk tunes will not bear examination. The first movement has a decided Slavonic flavor, the slow movement is Scottish in its prevailing color, with a slight Scandinavian tint. The opening of the scherzo is Spanish in character, and its trio bears a very close resemblance to a German waltz, while the finale opens with a melody of an Irish cast, and before it is over breaks into something that is not wholly unsuggestive of an Irish jig. It was thoughtfully read by Mr. Paur and splendidly played by his orchestra; in fact, the work of the latter was up to its best standard through the whole concert.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Don Giovanni," Mozart; suite in D, op. 113, Lachner; "Italian," symphony, Mendelssohn. There will be no soloist. The orchestra will give a concert on Tuesday afternoon, at which Melba will appear. Every seat has been sold.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 27.

The Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall, last night. The programme was:

Symphony No. 8. in E-minor.....Dvorak.
Concerto for Violin, A-minor, op. 28, Goldmark.
Symphonic Poem, "Sarka".....Smetana.
Overture, "Lenore," No. 2.....Beethoven.

In the not distant past so much has been written about the Dvorak "From the New World" symphony, that it is needless to renew old discussions. The work is good, solid and scholarly; the scoring is always strong, not infrequently ingeniously original, and what is said is well worth the saying. No more intrinsically valuable and beautiful work has been written in these later days. There is, however, and there can be nothing distinctly American in the symphony. Music is a universal language; but it is not universally read in the same way. It appeals differently to every individual; or, rather, every individual draws from it the elements that he can understand and assimilate. In reality, the assertion that music is a universal language simply means that everybody understands it, that is, understands it according to his education and capacity. This, again, simply means that the emotions that each individual extracts from the music are the emotions that he has put into the music. A competent musician has asserted of the adagio of Dr. Dvorak's symphony that it is "so suggestive of the loneliness of the immense prairies of the West." A Russian would use word "steppes" in place of "prairies," and an impressionable chamois hunter might find in the music the desolation of the summit of the Matterhorn. The feeling is first put into the music, and then extracted from it. The Dvorak symphony is fine artistic work, but the only really descriptive elements in it are those in its title, and this title might be changed to "From the Old World" without in the slightest affecting the musical elements of the work, although the hearer might dream of Siberia and polar bears as he now dreams of immense prairies, Indians and negroes. The title, by the way, is faultless, for it, and not the music, induces the mood the composer wishes us to feel. But any further word description is needless; he supplies the universal language; we must be allowed to interpret it according to our individual need and capacity.

Of Mr. Cesar Thompson, the soloist of the evening, it is impossible, after only hearing him once, to give a formal judgment, and what may be said must be taken as first impression to be confirmed or rejected in the future. One fact, however, does not need further confirmation. Mr. Thompson is a consummate master of technique; he masters difficulties with an almost contemptuous ease. His double stopping, chord and octave playing are startling surprises; he throws them off as placidly as a child throw off soap bubbles; his bowing is strong and free, and the tone he produces large, clear resonant and most exquisite in quality. All this is positive, but when higher artistic symptoms are sought for certainty is lost in doubt. Mr. Thompson seems to be an artist of taste rather than of feeling; he seems to have studied his art so closely that he has lost all faith in natural impulses. He has a reason for whatever he does, he has carefully argued it out and he can shield himself behind intellect and pure taste. He is always dignified, but he is lacking in spontaneity and in that power born of irresistible emotional impulse. The word 'cold' will not describe his playing, and yet the moon's beams contain more warmth, care. Elaborate thought, carefully reasoned out dynamic effects mark all his work; nothing is left to the inspiration of the moment; the effect intended is always the effect produced; the premises given all else follows with the logical exactness of a syllogism. This is the method followed by French actors, and to like or to dislike it is simply a matter of taste, of education. Mr. Cesar Thompson then is not an emotional player, he attracts attention through his rare skill, intellectual admiration reaches the point of wonder; what he does is of surpassing excellence; but the admiration aroused is cold, critical; we are never moved to that degree of enthusiasm wherein we forget the artist in the work done, wherein beauty hides skill, and emotional ecstasy raises feeling above thinking. Mr. Thompson is a rare artist, a rare solver of the most complex violin problems. The demonstration is faultless, the quod erat demonstrandum crushing in its sufficiency; but he is seemingly only a one-sided genius; his violin speaks in unimpeachable grammar, but it never reveals its soul. The marvels that are done are beyond praise, but the puzzle is why are they done at all.

The Smetana symphonic poem is programme music; it needs a descriptive preface to make it understood and an untroubled mind and strong imagination to find out what it means. Some of the audience present mistook it for Beethoven's "Lenore" overture, and consequently the work received more credit than it deserved. It tells of butchery and provokes weariness.

The programme for the next concert is Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," Lachner's Suite in D-major, op. 113, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony

The Kneisel Quartet.

The fifth Kneisel Quartet concert was given in Union Hall, on Monday evening. The programme was; Quartet in D-major, Borodine; Quartet in B-flat, major, op. 18, Beethoven; Quintet in D-minor, op. 38, H. W. Parker.

The Borodine quartet is a fascinating work; from start to finish the work holds the attention by its originality, freshness and large ideas. The first movement is delightful, both in subject and development; it is filled with melody, and, in its frank, broad treatment, has nothing in common with the over-labored refinements of modern mediocrity; it is broad, fine art throughout. The scherzo is attractive, but there is nothing of joy in its restlessness, and it leads, very naturally, to the slow movement, a most delicate and memory-haunting "notturno," overflowing with real tenderness and pathos, but always large and manly. The finale reflects the sadness of the previous movement; but the restfulness has vanished, the vivacity is that of a hashish victim; it is forced and nervous. The work is both intellectually and emotionally satisfying; there is pleasure and profit in studying its fine workmanship, delight in simply listening to its beauties.

The other novelty of the evening, Mr. Parker's quintet, has only an intellectual interest; what is said is of less importance than the manner of saying it. The workmanship is good and solid, but the ideas are weak, and, occasionally, trivial. The first movement is broadly treated, but the subject hints at commonplace; it seems to suggest, wrongly, of course, that the composes was indifferent as to what theme he selected, provided he could use it to show his technical knowledge. Then when a seemingly novel effect has been found, Mr. Parker harps on it to the point of weariness. The andante lento is attractive but not strong, and the composer seems to have reserved his invention for the finale, which is by far the best movement in the work. Skill in construction is everywhere evident, but it is in vain to look for even the smallest flash of inspiration. The quintet is careful studio work, admirable as far as it goes; but the pity is that it does not go farther.

The programme was finely played throughout. Mr. Kneisel [illegible] associates [illegible] their ra[illegible]

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1895.

A VARIETY OF CONCERTS—THE KNEISEL, THE APOLLO, THE SYMPHONY, YSAYE, ETC.

The fifth Kneisel programme, played on Monday evening in Union Hall, placed the ever welcome Beethoven quartette in B flat, opus 18, between two novelties, which were a quartette in D major by Borodine and a quintette (with a second 'cello) by H. W. Parker. All were performed to perfection, and Mr. Leo Schulz's 'cello slipped into its place in complete sympathy with the style and disposition of other instruments. The Borodine composition charmed at once by its openness of spirit and its frankness of statement. Melodious thoughts had come freely to the author's mind and he had given them out without pausing to do more than arrange them gracefully, genially and perspicuously, presenting them first for their own sakes and leaving academic formality of construction to take care of itself. Nor was the hearer ever reminded by strange figures, blunt contrasts, and unfamiliar rhythms that real Russian music was being played, which might not be recognized as such if some familiar label or trade mark were not impressed upon it. It was all music for the sake of music, and so it pleased and refreshed. Mr. Parker's quintette proved to contain good, sensible writing; but, as was said of that work of his which Mr. Whiting brought out with Mr. Adamowski, it seemed more a work of deliberation than of interior compulsion. It had well formed ideas put into proper and proportionate forms; but we could not exactly feel a purpose in it or regard it as other than a study in its particular class of composition— interesting, to be sure, but sometimes uncertain in drift and equipoise and sometimes apparently scarcely more than tentative. Indeed one occasionally thought that if Mr. Parker had been sure in his own mind that some passages would sound as they did, he would have altered them beforehand.

The features of the Thirteenth Symphony concert would undoubtedly be considered the first appearance in Boston of Mr. Cesar Thomson, who has been dividing public attention with Mr. Ysaye as a solo violinist. He is an elder man, thick set, and with a physiognomy which suggests Du Maurier's drawings of Svengali in "Trilby," although he has a far pleasanter and more reasonable face, with the expression upon it of a scholar and not of a cynic. It is a quiet, concentrated face, over which pass few changes; the beard is slightly grizzled, and the hair is thick, heavy and black. Altogether the man's appearance interests and his passionless devotion to his task commands a respectful attention wherewith will be soon blended a great admiration and much astonishment. For when they who understand something of the difficulties of violin technique hear and see him perform such feats as he executed in the last movement of the concerto which he had chosen, they realize that they have before them an executant who cannot at present be surpassed. Because he meets and conquers the most stupendous problems of execution as if he were playing a simple exercise. There is absolutely no trickery, no display to catch the eye and no intimation but that all is plain and easy and might be so for any virtuoso of approved proficiency. There is not much depth to his art, if it be fair to judge him by this one hearing, nor is there much resplendency. He does not lack animation, incisiveness, emphasis or decision, and he has often a tender and gentle tone. But it is as a philosopher and not as a poet that he renders his music, and the dramatic quality seems to be quite lacking in his style. Beautiful perfection of method and unstrained command of all complexities have their value and their influence, and Mr. Thomson will be accepted and heard gladly and appreciatively as an artist of peculiar and eminent power. He took for this occasion Goldmark's concerto in A minor, opus 28, of which the first movement is dull, labored and unfavorable for a soloist's debut; the second contains a genial sostenuto air and the third with its tremendous cadenza offers a chance for all the virtuosity which the player possesses, thus bringing in a sensation along with the conclusion.

The Symphony was Dvorak's "From the New World," a second hearing of which confirms our previous impression that this composition must be considered as only theoretically and not illustratively relevant to the life and character of America, and as typical conditions in historical development instead of suggestive of musical forms and ideas. The allegro hints at the barbaric freedom of untutored peoples in its rhythms and phrases, which are at least as Oriental as Western, and might be dropped consistently enough into a new "Lakme." The larghetto breathes the native peaceful of a primitive and unperturbed state. The scherzo is like the stirring up of irregular and vagrant forces, and the finale is an orderly confusion of diverse elements, characterized alternately by erratic excitement and prideful pomposity. The band played it all well; the wooden wind did wonders of grace and finish, and Mr. Paur actually conceded a pianissimo at the end of the larghetto.

A short symphonic poem by Smetana was the novelty of the night, and created a fairly favorable impression. It is supposed to depict an episode in a war between vengeful Amazons and guilty Man. He, in the form of a knight, is smitten with compassion for the fair and injured Sarka (whose name the music bears) and she in return summons her sister after he and his comrades have fallen asleep in bivouac, and remorselessly extirpate them.

Beethoven's second "Leonore" overture ended the concert. But although it was well played, it made comparatively little effect, for want of contrast with the heavy and engrossing music which had gone before. A light overture, preferably of the French school, would have been better and more encouraging.

For next Saturday are announced,—the overture to "Don Giovanni," a suite by Lachner and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony.

The programme book for this last concert was one of the most indiscreet and unhelpful which has yet been printed—and that is saying a good deal. About the Dvorak symphony, concerning which people would gladly have been informed, there were just three valueless lines, while upon the familiar overture were expended five pages of analytic academic details. Last year many pages were expended by the editor on reprints from the works of Berlioz; this year many are being wasted on the egotistical and inconsequential autobiographic chatter of Mr. Martin Roeder, whose manuscripts apparently do not find other access easy to printers' ink. If this gentleman's confessions and experiences had been "left in the pen" of the translator and transcriber, and something inserted about Mr. Thomson's life, education, work and success, the programme-book would have deserved well of the people who take it up expectantly from week to week. But then its chief object seems to be to tell what people do not need or desire to know and to avoid what might interest or inform them.

[84]

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 27, 1895.

CESAR THOMSON.

His First Appearance at a Symphony Concert.

A Violinist of Rare and Remarkable Qualities.

Enthusiasm Provoked by Nobility of the Performance.

The program of the 13th Symphony concert given last evening at Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95.....Dvorak
Concerto for violin in A minor, op 28....Goldmark
Overture, "Leonore," No. 2.....Beethoven
Symphonic Poem "Sarka".....Smetana

The feature of the concert was the apparition of César Thomson, who played for the first time in this city.

César Thomson, one of the most famous of violinists now living, was born in Liége, March 17, 1857. (Ysaye, by the way, was born in 1858). Mr. Thomson was first taught the violin by his father, and then he studied under Dupuis and Léonard. In 1873 he went to Italy as "Kammermusiker" to Prince Dervies, who lived in winter at Nice and in summer at Lugano. And it was in Italy and in 1877 that he took to himself a wife. Later he was concert master of Bilse's Orchestra in Berlin. At present he is first professor of the violin at the Liége Conservatory. He has played in the chief cities of Europe with overwhelming success. His first appearance in the United States was at New York in Carnegie Music Hall, Oct. 30, 1894.

CESAR THOMSON.

Mr. Thomson has the face and the bearing of a man absorbed thoroughly in his art. At first there is the thought of the ascetic. A monk's costume would not be incongruous. But mind you, in this strange and fascinating appearance there is not the slightest taint of insincerity or affectation. The man is modesty itself. He is bold only in his art. When he plays, it is as though he stood alone. There is no thought of an audience which may applaud or be cold. Erect, almost immovable, he plays with incredible authority. There is in his performance no trick of the virtuoso in the evil meaning of the word. There is no tossing of long, disheveled hair. There is no swaying of the body as though the passion of the player could not be controlled. There is no sudden pose after a series of brilliant passages, no look at the audience, as much as to say, "There! What do you think of that?" Nor at the end of the finale is there a readiness to acknowledge the applause. The man answers the call, but with the dignity of the artist who allows himself to be disturbed in a musical meditation only because he will not be rude to those he has entranced.

Nor was there one thing last evening in appearance, performance or selection that was discordant with the idea of rarest sincerity. There are many virtuosi, excellent and admirable artists, whose temperament forbids such impeccable dignity. There are a few great violinists whose dignity forbids and never fascinates. I have never heard a virtuoso who produced such an effect on an audience as did Mr. Thomson last evening by the very means that would seem fatal to success. And his triumph is the greater and the more astounding.

For, first of all, the Goldmark concerto is not of itself music to thrill or delight an audience. It was first played at a symphony concert by Mr. Kneisel, Dec. 6, 1890. The impression then made remains today. It is an eminently serious composition that is interesting in episodes rather than as a complete and organic work. In it is no sensuous, heart-melting tune. In it is no combination of dazzling bravura with piquant, ear-tickling rhythm. It would be hard to name one element of popularity in the concerto. Now consider for a moment the amazing technique of Mr. Thomson, and the number of compositions in which he could at once astound the hearer. Yet he chose for his first appearance in this town the concerto by Goldmark.

These now are the impressions after one hearing. It is an age of technique. No violinist or pianist is supposed to have a right to appear on the stage unless his technique is fully developed. But the technique of Mr. Thomson seems superhuman. The most appalling difficulties, as in his cadenza suggested by Paganini and played as an answer to the storm of applause that followed his performance of the concerto—these incredible difficulties were to him as the simplest exercises. He is something more than a wizard, although in more superstitious times he might well have been regarded as in league with Satan, who was supposed to be partial to the fiddle and fiddlers. Never was this technique used to excite wonder. In fact, the modest man appeared almost to be ashamed of his prowess. The technique was only the means of [illegible] the wishes of the composer.

His authority was absolute, yet never forbidding, never arrogant. The music made by him was free from earthly dross. There was no sensuous strain, no voluptuous suggestion. There was the purity that I found the other day in that sonata for violin and piano by Franck. To some this purity might seem coldness, and they might not brook it. But there is a music that is apart from this world, that suggests nothing of sin or passion; it is the music that hints at spiritual life when there may be no thought or recollection of bodily joy or sorrow, and such serene and noble music came last evening from the violin of César Thomson.

Never was there a phrase unduly emphasized, or thrown to the audience as a tub to a whale. To the player the concerto was one long expression of aspirations such as might have strengthened the courage of a hermit sore beset by demons in alluring or grotesque shapes; for it is impossible to even now escape from the unearthly spell thrown over the hearers by the violinist. The cadenzas seemed—mirabile dictu—to be an integral part of the work, and even the episodic character of the concerto was for the moment forgotten.

Now these things must not be lost sight of: The comparatively ungrateful nature of the concerto itself; the sublime and unaffected unconsciousness of the violinist; the chasteness of his style; the purity of his tone, which, when warm, seemed warm only with a religious fervor; the apparent concealment of technical skill; the immovability of the player. And yet such was the nobility, the grandeur, the self-abnegation of the performance that the great audience, ready to recognize the beauty and the rarity of these attributes, paid him gladly a tribute that will be memorable in the history of Music Hall.

***

The anthropological symphony of Dvorak seems like an omnium gatherum of the folk songs of all nations, rather than the one, complete, inevitable indentification of musical America. Viewed simply as music, it contains many delightful passages. The first two movements are the most satisfying; the scherzo and the finale seem somewhat monotonous, and long spun out on a second hearing.

***

The program book announced that Goldmark was born May 18, 1832. As a matter of fact he was born in 1830.

Our old friend Friedrich Smetana figured on the title page of the program book as "Bedrich" Smetana. This is accuracy with a vengeance.

PHILIP HALE.

An extra popular matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Music Hall Tuesday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock. Mrs. Melba will be the soloist. The program will include Auber's "Fra Diavolo" overture, ballet music from Delibe's "Coppelia," entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," a scherzo (new) by Goldmark, Strauss's "Southern Roses" waltz, and the overture to "Mignon." Melba will sing an air from "The Huguenots," the mad scene from "Lucia," and "Se Saran Rose," by Arditi.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Cesar Thomson, violinist, was the soloist at the Symphony concert last evening, his first appearance in this city. His selection was Karl Goldmark's concerto in A minor, an extremely difficult bit of music, but beautifully given by Mr. Thomson. Coming when the Ysaye furore is literally at its height, some comparison was unavoidable, but after the first movement, that was not to the detriment of the soloist of last night, nor could it be said that he wrested any of the well-earned laurels from M. Ysaye. There is a radical difference in the style of the two men. Mr. Thomson lacks, to some extent, Ysaye's force, his powerful tone and tone shading, but he makes up for it by wonderful brilliancy and accuracy of technique and sweetness of tone. After the first movement he seemed to warm to his task with every succeeding note, and as his beautiful work became appreciated by his hearers, they waxed more and more enthusiastic, and at the close of his selection recalled him again and again, until he responded with a brief selection, unaccompanied by the orchestra, and remarkable chiefly for the pearly staccato bowing. Mr. Thomson certainly played himself into great favor, and will be sure of a warm welcome upon his next appearance here.

After the concerto, Smetana's symphonic poem "Sarka" should have been played according to the programme, but M. Paur rose superior to the programme and played Beethoven's overture to Leonore, No. 2, which was down as the last number. When it was finished, the mystified audience hardly knew whether to sit still or get up and go home. Mr. Paur saw the difficulty and hastened to the rescue by starting the symphonic poem, the first time it has been given in Boston. It depicts an adventure of Sarka, the noblest of the mythical Bohemian Amazons, and some of the orchestral effects are almost as startling as the incidents of Sarka's story of love, betrayal, treachery and death.

The audience was unusually large, a double fringe of standing music lovers lining both sides and the rear of the hall.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 25, 1895.

NO MORE TICKET SPECULATORS.

Superintendent of Police Eldridge has been requested to detail a policeman to stop the nuisance caused by the ticket speculators who line the sidewalks in front of Music Hall, and it is probable that the patrons of the Friday afternoon Symphony rehearsals will be troubled no more by requests to purchase tickets.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
FRIDAY MORNING, JAN. 25, 1895.

SPECULATORS UNDER A BAN.

Police Stop Hawkers of Symphony Rehearsal Tickets.

Hamilton place has been freed of the presence of ticket speculators by order of Superintendent of Police Eldridge.

The Music Hall management has been greatly annoyed during the past few weeks by the speculators who have dealt in Symphony rehearsal tickets.

The police order was issued at the request of Manager Ellis, and now a policeman is stationed at Music Hall to stop anyone who tries to sell tickets.

Manager Ellis, when seen by a Post reporter last evening, said: "There have been for some time past a large number of ticket speculators hanging around outside the doors of Music Hall on Fridays soliciting patrons to buy tickets at largely advanced prices.

"The speculators have taken advantage of the fact that the Friday rehearsals are open to students and others who cannot afford the usual rate at reduced prices. The admission and second balcony tickets are bought up in small lots by the ticket speculators early in the week, so that when Friday comes the reduced price tickets are all sold and many have to be turned away on this account.

"The speculators gather on Fridays outside of Music Hall and offer the tickets at a big advance to the students and others who have been turned away.

"Tickets that sell for 50 cents at the box office have been sold for $1 and even $1.50 by the ticket speculators. This scheme of the speculators has thwarted the real object of the management in reducing prices on Fridays, which was to give an opportunity to musical students to attend the performances."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

APPEARANCE OF A NEW VIOLINIST.

Cesar Thomson a Remarkable Foil to Ysaye —Dvorak's American Symphony Becomes More Beautiful with Familiarity—Smetana's "Sarka" Has a Moral In It.

The concert of Saturday was memorable in many ways; it was of exceptional length, it presented a work in which Americans take particular interest, and it introduced a violinist who proved a remarkable foil to that other artist who has recently won such a success in Boston. Dvorak's American Symphony ("From the New World") began the programme. A second hearing of this work did not reveal any more marked national characteristics than the first, but the work becomes more beautiful with familiarity. That five-noted figure at the beginning is as good a portico to a classical work as the figure of eight notes with which Schumann began his B flat symphony.

The themes of the first movement present something of the plantation, but far more stress is laid upon development than melody, and the fragmentary character consequent upon this treatment destroys any local color. The result obtained is almost precisely like that achieved in Richard Strauss' "Italian Symphony," where, although the Neapolitan street song "Funiculi-Funicola" is the underlying theme, its treatment washes out all possible Italian flavor.

The Larghetto was beautifully played, and is certainly a masterly movement, yet its profound melancholy is by no means suggestive of the direct pathos of some of the plantation music. It is not unlike the brooding which Massé has given in some of the numbers of his "Paul and Virginia," and the music would suit better to Mauritius than to Mississippi. The delicious woodwind passages, the work on the muted violins and the pizzicato accompaniment on contrabasses were all to be commended, as was also the clarinette work in the first movement. Mr. Paur gave the shading of this with all possible refinement, and the pauses and ritenuto effects were perfectly executed.

The movement is, however, a trifle too long and would gain by condensation. The Scherzo begins with a distinct reminiscence of Beethoven's ninth symphony Scherzo, plunging at once into an octave figure of brusque rhythm. There is a Marshlike theme of some beauty as trio, and, after the conventional return of the Scherzo a Coda is added in which the horn has something to say. But one may well be disappointed that this Scherzo does not present national characteristics in a more direct manner. Here at least there was an opportunity to give the lilt of the breakdown, the rhythm of the "walk-'round," the twang of the banjo, as Dvorak himself did in the two pieces of chamber music which he founded on American melodies (and it may be said en passant, that the quintette and quartette which he evolved from Southern music are far more characteristic than this symphony), but the popular style, which might have given local color to the scherzo, was conspicuous by its absence. One might cite Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony as an example of how direct a national flavor may be given to a Scherzo, and venture to hope that Dvorak will yet take a similar view of the case and give us a Scherzo that shall be directly and unconditionally popular. He has proved, in the two compositions abovementioned, that he can do this without becoming in any way cheap or tawdry.

In the finale there is more of Wagner than of America. There are, to be sure, submerged fragments of "Yankee Doodle" and "Three Blind Mice" for those who can identify them, but there is a reminiscence of the "Tannhaeuser Overture" in the trombone theme against descending violin figures, and there is development to the very ends.

The performance of the work was a very worthy one, and Mr. Paur was called upon to bow his acknowledgments to the plaudits of the vast audience.

The debut of the violinist, Cesar Thomson, coming directly upon the heels of Ysaye's great successes, seemed to be at an unfortunate moment, for the public rarely accents two musical demigods at the same time. It is therefore gratifying to note that Thomsen's success was not a whit less pronounced than that of Ysaye. Mrs. Malaprop's comparisons would be particularly "odorous" in this instance, for there is little to compare, the two men supplement each other. It seems scarcely credible, yet it is true, that Thomson is technically the superior of Ysaye. He has not the infectious enthusiasm of the latter, but he can give the most astounding bits of bravura without turning a hair, and he gives a smooth and refined tone even in passages bristling with difficulties. It was not the best work which he chose for his first appearance, for Goldmark's violin concerto in A minor is very long and its difficulties do not impress themselves upon the auditor as in many a less ambitious work. Yet the artist carried it to entire success. Thomson must have the most phenomenal left hand in the world, for the most astounding skips, the most intricate double-stopping, the most rapid runs seemed as child's play to him. Yet he is not deficient in expression, as a noble performance of the Andante of this concerto proved. It has been rumored that Thomson has not yet won a great triumph in his American tour; this should not be the case, for no such technicist has yet appeared in our country upon the violin: if Ysaye is an approach to the Joachim of old, Thomson is certainly the Paganini of the present, and his performance of a cadenza of his own, as a response to an overwhelming encore at the close of the gypsy-like movement which closed the concerto, was the most wonderful exhibition of technical skill upon the violin that has yet been heard in Boston. Much as we dislike to see the encore nuisance creeping into the symphony concerts, we are glad that the audience was afforded a glimpse of the virtuoso in this short appendix. It was odd to find the two last numbers of the programme transposed in the order of their performance, nor is the practice to be commended; the musicians present may have recognized the transposition, but the rank and file probably took Beethoven's "Leonora Overture, No. 2," as Smetana's tone picture of revelry and murders; the trumpet-call of the governor undoubtedly became Sarka's signal to slay the Bohemians, and the pure joy of Florestan and Leonora may have meant the satisfaction of the murderers, to many of the auditors. A searching investigation into the line of thought awakened by the masquerading of Beethoven's overture as Smetana's "Sarka," and vice versa, might be a valuable contribution to musical psychology and the value of programme-music generally. Numbers must have "dilated with the wrong emotion."

The performance was a beautiful one, and one can heartily commend Mr. Paur's intelligent and brilliant reading, as well as the excellent work of the violins, the charming oboe work, and the well-shaded trumpet calls. The transposition of the numbers was probably made with a view of avoiding a boot-heel accompaniment to the overture, as it would have come at the end of a very long programme, but the fear was groundless, our audiences are becoming educated in these matters, thanks to so many good programmes, and very few left before the last notes of "Sarka."

Those who accepted the last number as the overture, must have been somewhat astounded at the rollicking revelry which took place about where the prison scene should have been, and the governor's signal as portrayed by trombone fortissimo, must have seemed rather ponderous. It will be seen that there was just enough resemblance in some points of the works to make their interchange easy on the part of those who accept analytical programmes as guide books.

Smetana's "Sarka" has the merit of being very concise. The march of the knights is a good bit of rhythmic writing, and was brilliantly played. One of the knights, a violin possibly, discovers an unfortunate clarinette tied to a tree; the clarinette shrieks and bemoans her sad fate, whereupon the knight unties her and all the strings fall into rapturous love. After this they all indulge in a wild dance (a fine bit of revelry and finely played), the piccolo setting a bad example by getting drunk, in which unfortunately all the rest follow. In trusting the clarinette the strings have leant upon a single reed, for when they were all asleep this unworthy instrument makes a long soliloquy in which she regrets that circumstances over which she has no control impel her to a very disagreeable task, and causes a horn to call her amazonian companions. These proceed to slaughter the strings with the approval of a very unscrupulous trombone. The moral is, put not your faith in clarinettes.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[85]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 28, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The thirteenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Dvorák: Symphony, No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World," opus 95.
Goldmark: Concerto for violin, in A minor, opus 28.
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Sárka." (First time.)
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 2, opus 72.
Mr. César Thomson was the violinist.

Dr. Dvorák's "American" symphony was worth while hearing again. The first performance last season left rather a vague impression on the mind, which this second hearing has made more definite. The work has moments of great beauty, of true poetic imaginativeness, and suggestive tone-painting. One cannot, however, help finding a good deal in it rather cheap-sounding, as if pushing sentiment too far in the direction of sentimentality. Like several things Dr. Dvorák has written of late years, the symphony shows traces of quick work and a certain lack of searching self-criticism; unity of style and individuality is not wanting, to be sure, but there are frequent moments in the work where the listener is at a loss to make out just what the composer is aiming at. Imaginativeness and picturesqueness play so prominent a part in it that one is insensibly led to form certain mental pictures for one's self while listening to it, pictures which are all too suddenly blurred or wiped out by what seem unaccountable freaks of the composer, passages to which the key seems wanting. This is, perhaps, one of the chief dangers of this sort of imaginative and suggestive writing; it leads one on to finding poetic and extra musical suggestions in the music in spite of one's self; and, being once thrown into this mood, one is unconsciously, or half-consciously, prone to look for such suggestions all through; the result is that an occasional passage which can be explained only on purely musical grounds seems disturbing and unintelligible because one can attribute no poetic meaning to it. Perhaps, also, in the last analysis, if the purely musical meaning of such passages were really perfectly clear, and their musical coherence with the rest plainly evident, their lack of suggestiveness would not be so uncomfortably felt. And here is where we find a want of due self-criticism and filing down on Dr. Dvorák's part; had he given his work somewhat more of clear musical coherency, we should gladly have accepted his poetical suggestions for what they were worth, and found the purely musical intelligibleness of his symphony a more than ample compensation for its frequent interuptions of the extra musical mental pictures it calls up before our imagination.

Smetana's "Sárka" (pronounced Sharka—indeed, the "noblest of the Amazons," its heroine, seems to have been a very man-eating shark) may be called a fair pendant to his "Vltava," another poem in the same cyclus, which was given last season. Smetana has a certain glibness in writing, a power of developing an idea smoothly and naturally, which contrasts agreeably with the more halting and laborious style of some of his contemporaries; he starts a subject, and the music seems to flow on easily by itself, as if in obedience to some interior impulse of its own. This is all welcome enough and takes the willing ear captive at once, especially as the idea itself is generally a pleasing one, and his orchestration is almost always clever, piquant and euphonious. Only his musical ideas, if pleasing, are seldom more than that; they are too often trivial, wanting both in musical nobility and emotional depth, and his facile, natural writing makes too much the impression of mere musical society gabble. In this "Sárka" he has narrated the blood-curdling old Czech legend with a certain brilliancy of tone-painting, but so much in the light vein of a professed society raconteur who airs his conversational graces in telling the story of some grewsome murder, that one finds no impressiveness in it. Somehow both this "Sárka" and the "Vltava" give one the impression that Smetana must have been singularly delightful in comic opera; he has the light, bright comic opera touch. But as serious music, to be taken seriously, these symphonic poems of his strike one as terribly flimsy.

It was good to hear the "Leonore" No. 2 again! How old and worn-out seems the point of view of Julius Rietz and others of his ilk, who used to say seriously that the No. 2 was to them really the greatest overture of the three! One feels far rather like listening to the late Otto Dresel, who once said, "Beethoven and old Bach always knew what they were about: whenever they took the trouble to remodel an earlier work, you may be sure that their second version was always the best." And still, if the No. 3 had never been written, what a stupendous work this No. 2 would have been! It is instructive to hear it and compare it with the later, and greater, version; but the instructiveness is accompanied with a solid artistic delight rare in such cases.

Throughout the concert the orchestra played admirably, with fire, vigor, beauty of en semble and finish.

Of Goldmark's violin concerto we can say little, what impression it made, as a composition, was so completely swallowed up by the impression made by Mr. Thomson who played it. This latter was so thoroughly unique, and as strong as it was singular. At first his playing seemed cold and nonchalant, even to the point of making one wonder whether he were showing himself in his true colors and whether he were not—as Eugen d'Albert often did on his first visit here—merely "playing off;" it seemed almost as if il se fichait du public, as if he were playing so many notes for so much pay. But this impression soon wore off, and gradually one began to feel the man's enormous earnestness. And, with his earnestness, one began to feel his immense power. Mr. Thomson strikes one as standing well-nigh alone among great performers of the present generation, at least among those we have heard here; the only one we should call his born brother in art is Eugen d'Albert, and even d'Albert goes less far than he in a certain direction. Call Thomson one-sided, if you will—and last Saturday he certainly showed only one side,—his one-sidedness is of a sort exceedingly unusual today.

The audience does not seem to exist for him; his self-concentration equals that of our own Ernst Perabo,—more can hardly be said! His whole air toward the public, his manner of accepting applause, shows not so much the modesty of a great artist as it does utter obliviousness of all save the main business in hand. One almost feels that he had quite as lief have the audience out of the way. And this buttoned-up manner of his is but a reflection of one of the most salient traits in his playing: Its complete lack of appealingness, its utter self-dependence, to put it strongly, its absolute uningratiatingness. Such things as charm, fascination, appealing tenderness, in short, all such genial means by which artists commonly invite their listeners' sympathy, seem quite unknown to him. He seems to come, not to win hearts, but to conquer and subdue. He plays like a master—in every sense of the word,—as much a master of his public as of his instrument and the music he plays; he works by sheer strength, and there is something grim in his strength. Mind you, we do not mean by this mere physical or intellectual force; far from it. It is force and depth of feeling, force of conviction, force of will; it has in it something of austerity, perhaps of pride even; for the man seems actually to disdain all arts of pleasing, no matter how musical and legitimate they may be. And he does not overate himself in this—his force is all-sufficient, it is completely subjugating. We will not say that this sort of artistic subjugation is entirely pleasant; never has a performer made us feel so small, so helpless under his sway. There is almost something demoniacal about it, something uncanny. And yet again, it is welcome, too, especially by contrast.

Of all great players we have ever heard Mr. Thomson seems the most uncompromisingly downright and straightforward; not a trick, not a single concession to the fashions of this or any age; the music, and nothing but the music, and let the audience be—somethinged. And how the man plays the music! how he holds it together with a grasp of iron, and makes a whole movement show itself as a stoutly built structure in which there is not a flaw! Such totality of conception and impression is well-nigh unparalleled. And then, such self-control! Let it not be imagined that, in saying all this, we would place the man on a pinnacle of mere cold impeccability; far from it. Impeccable he surely seems to be, his style is purity itself; but it is also infinitely more than that. His is the very largest, grandest sort of playing; if it do not take hold of you at first, the grip does come, and it takes hold very deep down indeed. When you give in, you give in all over. For one thing, it is rather a mystery to us why he chose to play the Goldmark concerto; what has this austere subduer of souls to do with the sensuous, luxurious sybarite of the "Sakuntala"? It was like Cato reciting Ovid's "Ars amandi" (pardon the anachronism!) And, upon the whole, it seems to us a mistake for great and world-famous players, when they make their first appearance with a fine orchestra to back them, to play any new concerto. What the public wants—and both naturally and legitimately—is to hear them in an undisputedly great work with which it is already familiar, to hear what they will do with the Beethoven, Mendelssohn, or Brahms concerto. It is the resident violinists whom we are tired of hearing in these things, and it is for them to lead us willingly into new fields. What we want of a great new man is to give us a new sensation in the old great things: then we can know what we have to deal with and can establish comparisons.

Of Mr. Thomson's accepting an encore, and his playing the unaccompanied bit of ground and lofty tumbling he did in response to it, we can only say that no artist, no matter how great, shows himself in a genial light when he knocks a symphony programme into a cocked hat. Mr. Paur, on the other hand, showed no little tact—the hour being late—in playing the "Leonore" overture immediately after Mr. Thomson's fireworks, so that the whole audience might get the real meat of the programme, and those who had a curiosity to hear the "Sárka" might stay on if so minded.

The next programme is: Mozart, overture to "Don Giovanni;" Lachner, suite No. 1, in D minor; Mendelssohn symphony No. 4, in A major ("Italian").

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JAN. 30, 1895.

A Popular Matinee Given by the Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Melba in Music Hall.

For the first time in several years the Symphony Orchestra gave a popular matinee, and the announcement was sufficient to fill Music Hall yesterday afternoon. Mme. Melba was the soloist, and in the selection of the programme great tact was displayed. The orchestral numbers included the overture to "Fra Diavolo," the ballet music of Delibes's "Sylvia," the entre'act from "Gwendoline," Goldsmith's new scherzo, Strauss's "Southern Roses" waltz and the overture to "Mignon."

It was a positive treat, and thoroughly delighted the large audience. It is doubtful if the "Sylvia" music has ever been so artistically rendered, notably the waltz movement and the "Pizzicati." It was here that the taste and skill of Mr. Paur were displayed to a remarkable degree.

Mme. Melba's first number was an aria from "Les Huguenots," and for an encore she sang a little song, the accompaniment for which was played by Mr. Clayton Johns. Her rendering of the mad scene from "Lucia" was the most brilliant heard in Boston in many years, and was greatly enhanced by the marvellous flute obligato of Mr. Mole. Arditi's "Se Leran Rose" was the other number given by the soloist. It is to be hoped that Manager Ellis will see fit to give another similar matinee, as the present occasion conclusively showed the desire of the public.

.....

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII. NO. 30.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1895.

Yesterday's Symphony Matinee at Music Hall—M. Ysaye's Farewell Recital.

Yesterday afternoon Music Hall contained an audience that filled every seat, every bit of available standing room, and all of the stage that was not occupied by the orchestra, the occasion being an "extra popular matinee" given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with the assistance of Mme. Melba. The programme was:

Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Scene, "O vago suol" and "A questa voce," from "Les Huguenots"....Meyerbeer
Ballet music, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Mad scene from "Lucia".....Donizetti
Entr'acte, "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Scherzo (first time).....Goldmark
Song, "Se Savan Rose".....Arditi
Waltz, "Southern Roses".....J. Strauss
Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas

As will be seen, the selections were largely of the French school, and the programme was proportionately brilliant. The hackneyed overture to "Fra Diavolo," given with the original orchestration and read in accordance with the composer's directions, sounded delightfully fresh. It was given with splendid fire and effect, and with stirring spirit, the only "out" being the lack of clearness and dash in the trumpet solo at the begining of the allegro. The selections from "Sylvia" were beautifully read and played, especially "Les Chasseresses," and the wonderfully scored and fine "Cortege de Bacchus." The latter was as fine a performance as the orchestra has given this season, the tone color being brought out with superb effect. The "Gwendoline" entr'acte, which grows on acquaintance, was exquisitely rendered. The new Goldmark scherzo, is somewhat vague and unattractive on a first hearing, and appeared to be more interesting for its piquant and elaborate instrumentation, especially as the demands it makes on the wind instruments, than for anything else. It served to show the extraordinary virtuosity of the orchestra, especially in the exceptionally exacting difficulties of the closing climax. The lovely Strauss waltz was charmingly played, and with a grace of style and a warmth of color that were fascinating. Interpreted as this music was, a waltz is not such a demoralizing thing, musically considered, despite those who profess to look down on dance tunes as something outside the pale of high art.

Mme. Melba, who was received with immense cordiality on her first appearance, sang the selection from Meyerbeer with that skill, beauty of technique and finish of style, that she has shown to be inseparable from her performances. In the more fervid movement her perfection of technique was again emphasized, and though now and then there was an unlucky lapse from truth of intonation, the effect, as a whole, was masterly in point of execution. The audience applauded it with tremendous enthusiasm, and recalled her many times with the most stormy demonstrations of pleasure, until she at last responded with M. Clayton Johns' "I Love the World," in which she was accompanied by the composer. She was not, however, heard to special advantage in this song. She had been heard here in the mad scene from "Lucia" before, when she sang it better, but it was, nevertheless, a brilliant and beautiful effort, and roused her hearers to another frenzy of applause. She was called forward over and over again, until she repeated her wonderful cadenza by way of reply. M. Mole played the flute obligato with his now familiar elegance and fluency of technique, which, by the way, he displayed with still finer results by his really extraordinary performance of the fervid flute solo in the selection from "Les Huguenots." In the Arditi waltz song Mme. Melba once more stirred her audience to the wildest enthusiasm, and it would not be content until she repeated the number. The concert was an overwhelming success. The audience was strangly cold at the outset, but it soon warmed up, and applauded the orchestra and recalled Mr. Paur with great fervor. There was every encouragement for more of these concerts of popular music by the Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Melba is to be the soloist at the Symphony rehearsal of Friday afternoon and at the concert of Saturday evening, on which occasions she will sing the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet," and Handel's "Sweet Bird."

What an audience it was that greeted Mme. Melba! Was ever Music Hall quite so jammed, and was ever the fine flower of Boston so liberally represented as in this monster gathering? For once the expression "hanging on by the eyelids" received veritable ocular demonstration, for it is not believed another human being could have squeezed into the hall and found a roosting place. Does it not pay to give such a "popular" programme when our Symphony orchestra are the players and a great singer like Melba is the soloist? Of course it does! Mr. Paur beamed and applauded as enthusiastically as anybody in the house, and in return, when the Strauss waltz was played, Melba stood in the doorway, where she clapped her hands and kissed her finger tips to Boston's proud conductor when it was all over. Now classical fanatics know how a waltz can sound when it is read as Mr. Paur read "Southern Roses"; it was a revelation, a dream of melodious beauty.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 30, 1895.

POPULAR "SYMPHONY" CONCERT.

A Delightful Program Charmingly Played by Boston's Famous Orchestra—Melba the Welcome Soloist.

The first popular concert this season by the Boston symphony orchestra was given in Music hall yesterday afternoon. It was, indeed, a popular concert, for the big hall was not nearly large enough to accommodate all who desired to attend.

Every seat and the full number of admission tickets had been sold several days before and the speculators lucky enough to obtain a bundle of tickets reaped rich harvests. A premium of $5 a seat is feported to have been paid in many instances.

It is not possible for the average mortal to understand why the management of the Symphony orchestra does not give more of these popular concerts. Several years ago there were half a dozen during the season, but since Mr Paur came here they have been exceedingly rare.

The financial success of a dozen such concerts as that of yesterday would be a certainty. The same people who delight in classical programs of the regular concerts would be overjoyed to occasionally hear a lighter class of music played in the superb manner possible only to an orchestra of such resources as the Symphony band. Then there is that immense number of music lovers who do not understand the classical symphony and who are honest enough to say so. They would all derive an immense amount of pleasure from listening to this orchestra's performance of melodious music. It would really be an act of charity for the management to give these concerts more frequently.

The program as played yesterday was as follows:

Overture, Fra Diavolo.....Auber
Aria from Les Huguenots.....Meyerbeer
Mme Melba
Ballet music, Sylvia.....Delibes
Mad scene from Lucia.....Donizetti
Mme Melba
(Flute Obligato, Mr Mole)
a Entr'acte from Gwendoline.....Chabrier
b Scherzo (new, first time).....Goldmark
Song, Se seran Rose.....Arditi
Mme Melba
Waltz, Southern Roses.....Joh Strauss
Overture, Mignon.....A Thomas

The singing of Mme Melba was naturally the most interesting feature of the concert, but there was no doubt about the instrumental numbers being heartily enjoyed, so enthusiastic and so spontaneous was the applause.

Mme Melba was in superb voice and sang with splendid spirit. She is rather slighter in figure than when she sang here last year in opera and seems to be enjoying the best of health. She was greeted with tumultuous applause, and there was an irresistible demand for an encore after each number.

Extended comment upon the work of a singer whose claim to the first position among all prime donni is so generally recognized, is quite unnecessary. The English language has no adjectives of praise which have not been used in her behalf. As a vocalist she stands alone. There are other singers whose voices may be warmer, who sing with more expression and who appeal more strongly to the heart, but none can compare with her in command of vocal technique.

She sang the grand and exacting aria from "Les Huguenots" magnificently, and for an encore gave a little song by Mr Clayton Johns, the piano accompaniment being played by the composer himself. In the flute song from "Lucia" she repeated former successes. And what more can be said? She has given this wonderful exhibition of vocal pyrotechnics many times here, and each time fairly electrified her audience. She sang it twice yesterday.

Mr Mole played the flute obligato exquisitely and well deserved the share of applause bestowed upon him. The florid waltz song by Arditi gave Mme Melba some excellent opportunities for dazzling the audience by the brilliancy of her technique, and she availed herself of them most effectively.

With one exception, all the instrumental selections were splendidly played under Mr Paur's direction. The exception was the Strauss waltz which was read by the conductor in a most original manner. So strongly did Mr Paur press his own individuality into the performance that there was no suggestion of Strauss left. This waltz is a dance, and it is surprising that Mr Paur should have tried to make it appear as anything else.

The Goldmark scherzo was heard for the first time and received much favor. It is a bright and interesting work. The ballet music was exquisitely played and a superb performance was given the beautiful "Mignon" overture.

The welcome announcement was made after yesterday's concert that manager Ellis had arranged to have Mme Melba sing at next Friday afternoon's rehearsal and Saturday night's concert by the Symphony orchestra.

---

[86]

Journal.

...DAY, JANUARY 30, 1895.

...opular Matinee of the Symphony Orchestra—The Great Success of Mme. Melba.

This was the program of the extra conert given yesterday afternoon in Music Hall by the Symphony Orchestra:

Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Aria, from "Les Huguenots".....Meyerbeer
Mrs. Melba.
Ballet music, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Mad scene from "Lucia".....Donizetti
Mrs. Melba.
Entr'acte from "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Scherzo, (new, first time).....Goldmark
Song, "Se Seran Rose".....Arditti
Mrs. Melba.
Waltz, "Southern Roses".....Joh. Strauss
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas

Truly, a delightful concert. Would that there were more concerts of such a character during the season! He that does not relish the "Fra Diavolo" overture, the "Sylvia" suite, a Strauss waltz, or the overture to "Mignon" must have been born under a squint-eyed star. The overture to "Fra Diavolo" caused only this regret: that we do not have an opportunity of hearing the charming works of the master of opéra-comique. It is "Faust," "Faust," "Faust"—or "Romeo and Juliet," that strained and diluted "Faust." When the day comes that Boston may be called truly a musical town, an opera season will not mean merely the repetition of a few familiar dramatic works. Chabrier's "Gwendoline" may be given, and the full beauty and purport of the "Entr'acte" played yesterday will then be revealed. The Scherzo by Goldmark did not make a marked impression. Goldmark is an Oriental when he is at his best, and a Scherzo is out of place under a tropic sun where all is perfumed languor. As for the "Sylvia" suite, it is a constant pleasure, and yet the numbers are but few of the brilliant pages of the ballet. The performance was admirable, except in the case of the Strauss waltz. Here the fault was in the conductor, not the players. Leaders of inferior rank and less musical knowledge would have given to the waltz the crispness, the swing, the peculiar Viennese blood.

The great audience, pleased as it was with the "Pizzicati" of Delibes, came to hear Melba, and it was rewarded richly. Perhaps she was not as complete a mistress of her art as on former occasions, for in the "Mad Scene" from "Lucia" she has sung with more crystalline purity; and yet what a pleasure it was to hear her. Her greatest triumph was in the waltz by Arditti, which she repeated in answer to an imperious demand. Mr. Molé played the flute obbligato in the "Mad Scene" with surpassing skill. Melba was blithe, debonaire, a feast to the eye, as well as to the ear. And as ever she was good-natured; so thoroughly good-natured that she sang a song by Mr. Clayton Johns.

PHILIP HALE.

NOTES.

Melba will sing at the Symphony Rehearsal and Concert of this week Handel's "Sweet Bird" (by request) and the "Mad Scene" from Thomas's "Hamlet."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, JAN. 30, 1895.

The Melba Concert.

A brilliant audience completely filled Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the occasion being the extra popular matinee by the Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Melba as the stellar attraction. The popularity of the event was clearly evidenced. The fair singer was in excellent voice, the orchestra and conductor in the best of humors, and the audience enthusiastic. Mme. Melba's numbers in detail were the familiar aria from "Les Huguenots," the mad scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor," and Arditi's waltz song of Patti fame. Vocally all three of course, were superbly rendered. Such irreproachable technique, disarms criticism. But the dramatic instinct is by no means adequate in this great artist. Seldom does one find both qualities equally balanced, and Melba, it must be admitted is no exception to the rule. This seemed especially noticeable in the mad scene from "Lucia," the supreme effort of the performance, which lacked the dramatic force one would naturally expect. For this the composer is doubtless partly responsible, however. In any case, the result was not satisfying. But the trills and other vocal exigencies were easily met. In this respect, Mme. Melba is Patti's legitimate successor, though it is doubtful if she will ever quite equal her illustrious predecessor. The flute obbligato by Mr. Molé was fully entitled to the share in the honors, which the prima donna gracefully acknowledged. An emphatic encore was generously and cheerfully met with a repetition, in part, of the number. The Meyerbeer Aria was warmly received; to which Mme. Melba replied with a winning frankness singing Clayton Johns' "I love, but the world is mine," the composer himself accompanying at the piano. There the artist's failing was observable. She is not emotional. Several of our local soprani can interpret the charming song with truer feeling. This seems hard to understand, for Melba's delightful personality suggests the very reverse of apathy. Arditi's "Se Seran Rose" was peculiarly acceptable and was willingly repeated on being redemanded.

The orchestral numbers were the overture to "Fra Diavolo," given as it can seldom be heard; the ballet music (Delibes), which seemed light and flippant coming from such an organization, despite the favorite pizzicati movement or the more pretentious "Cortege de Bacchus"; the charming entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and a new scherzo of Goldmark's—well constructed and interesting throughout—were amply compensating. Strauss' "Southern Roses" waltz, pleasing as usual, and the splendid overture to Mignon (Thomas), fittingly rendered, brought the long but enjoyable programme to its close.

...on Transcript.
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Mme. Melba, gave an extra concert in Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Auber: Overture to "Fra Diavolo."
Meyerbeer: Aria from "Les Huguenots."
Mme. Melba.
Delibes: Ballet-music from "Sylvia."
Donizetti: Mad-scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor."
Mme. Melba.
(Flute obbligato by Mr. Molé.)
Chabrier: Entr'acte from "Gwendoline."
Goldmark: Scherzo (first time).
Arditi: Waltz-song, "Se seran rose."
Mme. Melba.
Johann Strauss: Waltz, "Southern Roses."
Thomas: Overture to "Mignon."

We have been waiting—rather hopelessly, if the truth be told—for some time for the Symphony Orchestra to give a concert of light music. At last it has come, as an "extra." Auber's "Fra Diavolo" overture, Ambroise Thomas's overture to "Mignon," the Delibes ballet music, and the Strauss waltz are things which no orchestra under the sun need consider infra dig. Each of these things is admirable of its kind and its kind is both musically and historically interesting and artistically worthy. One experience yesterday afternoon was not particularly encouraging, especially as it went to confirm previous experiences of the sort; this was the comparative apathy of the audience in face of the Strauss waltz. To be sure, Mme. Melba's wonderful singing of Arditi's waltz-song coming immediately before it may have taken a good deal of the wind out of Strauss's sails; but, to hear what some people say of the general public craving for Strauss waltzes, one would hardly have thought that even Mme. Melba could blanket one of them. Another "extenuating circumstance" may be that Strauss's waltzes do not make quite their characteristic effect when played by an orchestra so largely equipped with strings. Strauss's individual, and exceedingly clever and effective, scoring is calculated for a smaller orchestra, for one in which the united wood-wind and horns forms a pretty exact dynamic counterpoise to the strings, not for a regular symphony orchestra, in which the strings are, as a body, stronger than the wind (leaving out the heavy brass). Just as a Beethoven, Mendelssohn, or Brahms symphony fails in producing its proper effect, if the wood-wind and horns outweigh the strings, so does a Strauss waltz equally fail, if the strings outweigh the lighter wind instruments; each loses its characteristic coloring and aroma. But, even making allowance for these points, it is surprising how coolly our public has on more than one occasion taken the Strauss waltzes, for which it seems so to thirst. At the summer popular concerts the first few measures of a familiar waltz are greeted with rapturous hand-clapping, but the applause at the end is cool and perfunctory as possible. Yesterday afternoon poor Strauss came in for no real enthusiasm one way or another. Is it that the public's eye for waltzes is somewhat larger than its stomach? It certainly looks like it. The orchestra played admirably all through the concert; with nicety of ensemble and shading, and with contagious fire and brilliancy.

Mme. Melba was, of course, the bait that caught all those fish that crammed the hall to overflowing. Well, her singing made it all worth while. She was in her best voice and mood, she had touched the orchestra's tender point at rehearsal—think, for instance, of a symphony orchestra at undress rehearsal, stopping short after an opera singer's cadenza to applaud it to the echo—and she and the band mutually egged each other on to do their very best. It was one of those occasions when every one is in touch. If Mme. Melba's singing of the air from the "Huguenots" was beautiful in its finished perfection, her singing of that old, old—but none the less beautiful—mad-scene in "Lucia" beggared all description. For once Mr. Molé could shake hands on level ground with a cantatrice—she could do all he could, and with just as impeccable intonation. That astonishing double cadenza was no race between voice and flute; even in the Leibnitzian "harmonia prestabilita" no finer exactness of coincidence between two forces could be imagined. And in Arditi's waltz the prima donna renewed her triumphs. The whole concert was delightful.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.
Mittwoch, 30 Januar 1895

Boston Symphonies Orchester. Unter Mitwirkung der Sängerin Miß Lillian Blauvalt wird am nächsten Montage das berühmte Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur sein viertes Orchester in dieser Saison geben. Tickets für dasselbe sind bereits jetzt bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str., zu haben. Zum Vortrag gelangen Dvoraks neue Symphonie „Aus der Neuen Welt", Arie aus „Cid" von Massenet, Suite in D moll von Lachner, Arie aus Haydn's „Schöpfung" und Arie aus „Die verkaufte Braut" von Smetana.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1895.

The program of the thirteenth Symphony Concert, given in Music Hall last evening, was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, E minor, "From the New World".....Dvorák
Concerto for violin, A minor.....Goldmark
Overture "Leonore" (No. 2).....Beethoven
Symphonic poem, "Sarka".....Smetana

Mr. César Thomson made his first appearance in Boston, and his success was overwhelming.

He played the Goldmark concerto, first produced at a Symphony concert by Mr. Kneisel December 6, 1890—a serious work, interesting in episodes rather than as a complete and organic whole. There is no sensuous, heart-melting tune in it. There is no dashing, blinding brilliancy. Indeed it is almost without an element of popularity.

Thomson seems like a self-inspecting, self-absorbed ascetic. I should not be surprised to hear that Satan had buffeted him, had promised him the technic of technics in exchange for his soul. For this man might fitly, so far as appearance goes, don the monk's garb.

The man is modesty himself. He is bold only in his art. He seems to apologize for his skill. Far from his thought is an audience that may applaud or chill the air. He stands as though he were alone, or as though he played for invisible auditors. No tossing, no swaying, no defiant tossing of carefully dishevelled hair, no moment of inspiration, no pose, just before the applauds should come in.

Musicians who have heard Thomson in Europe and in New York say that he rose last night to unimagined heights. Surely never have I heard such sustained, sublime, unearthly cantabile as in the andante of the concerto.

As for his technic, you know what he can do. Yet he is not merely the wizard, the man of the eighteenth century in league with Satan.

His tone is free from earthly dross. Its nobility is that of a man who has put aside the thought of sex; not from fear, not from fanaticism, not from indifference, but because the pure spirit is more to him than the wormy body. The music that came from his fiddle was without suggestion of passion; it was the music that hints at a life where there will be no thought or recollection of bodily joy or sorrow, or grotesque and tragic bodily desire.

The concerto is in itself comparatively ungrateful; the unconsciousness of the violinist was Olympian; the chasteness of style was virginal; there was an almost anxious concealment of amazing technical skill; the player was immovable. Yet such was the public appreciation of the nobility, the grandeur, the self-abnegation of the performance that the great audience paid him a tribute never to be forgotten by one who heard the applause, saw the illuminated faces and witnessed the shyness of the violinist, who seemed as though one disturbed in profound musical contemplation.

PHILIP HALE.

The program of the fifth Kneisel Quartet concert, given in Union Hall the evening of the 21st, was as follows: Quartet in D major, Borodine (first time); quartet in B flat major, op. 18, Beethoven; quintet in D minor, op. 38, H. W. Parker (MS., first time). The club was assisted by Mr. Schulz, 'cellist. This quartet, the second, by Borodine, is a posthumous work. Rimsky-Korsakoff and other friends found and examined it, together with "Prince Igor," the fragments of the third Symphony, some romances. Alfred Habets says that it is not likely Borodine would have allowed the publication of the romances. "Prince Igor" was finished by Rimsky-Korsakoff and Glazounoff; two movements of the third symphony were orchestrated by Glazounoff; the finale of "Mlada," an opera ballet, was orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The quartet, dedicated to Borodine's wife, who did not long survive him, seems to have been let alone. Still it seems to me that Borodine could not have been content with the finale as it now exists. For it is far inferior to the other movements. The first, an allegro moderato but alla breva, is a masterpiece. It is melodious from beginning to end, firmly knit, logical, but not sternly logical, without padding, a constant delight. As an instance of mavellously beautiful effects gained by simple means see the treatment of the pedal of fifteen or sixteen measures toward the very end. The scherzo does not fall below. Its chief theme is a species of perpetuum mobile, and there is a contrasting movement not unlike an old fashioned German slow waltz. Strange and cruelly tender is the chant of the 'cello in the "Notturno" a song repeated immediately by the first violin. In spite of my great respect for the Kneisel Quartet, I do not think that this "Notturno" received full justice in the performance. The duskiness, the perfume, the Verlainesque "mots si specieux, tout bas," I missed these; there was the publicity and the noon-light of Boston Common, with people waiting for street cars. And in all this quartet there is no trace of the howling, leaping and sweating peasants so dear to the radical Russian and used freely in scherzo or finale.

Mr. Parker's quintet contains much that is tuneful, much that is strong. But it did not leave the impression of a thoroughly coherent, finely developed work. There was too frequently straining without result, as well as the thought of the orchestra without effect gained thereby.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1895.

The Popular Matinee of the Symphony Orchestra—The Great Success of Mme. Melba.

This was the program of the extra conert given yesterday afternoon in Music Hall by the Symphony Orchestra:

Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Aria, from "Les Huguenots".....Meyerbeer
Mrs. Melba.
Ballet music, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Mad scene from "Lucia".....Donizetti
Mrs. Melba.
Entr'acte from "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Scherzo, (new, first time).....Goldmark
Song, "Se Seran Rose".....Arditti
Mrs. Melba.
Waltz, "Southern Roses".....Joh. Strauss
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas

Truly, a delightful concert. Would that there were more concerts of such a character during the season! He that does not relish the "Fra Diavolo" overture, the "Sylvia" suite, a Strauss waltz, or the overture to "Mignon" must have been born under a squint-eyed star. The overture to "Fra Diavolo" caused only this regret: that we do not have an opportunity of hearing the charming works of the master of opéra-comique. It is "Faust," "Faust," "Faust"—or "Romeo and Juliet," that strained and diluted "Faust." When the day comes that Boston may be called truly a musical town, an opera season will not mean merely the repetition of a few familiar dramatic works. Chabrier's "Gwendoline" may be given, and the full beauty and purport of the "Entr'acte" played yesterday will then be revealed. The Scherzo by Goldmark did not make a marked impression. Goldmark is an Oriental when he is at his best, and a Scherzo is out of place under a tropic sun where all is perfumed languor. As for the "Sylvia" suite, it is a constant pleasure, and yet the numbers are but few of the brilliant pages of the ballet. The performance was admirable, except in the case of the Strauss waltz. Here the fault was in the conductor, not the players. Leaders of inferior rank and less musical knowledge would have given to the waltz the crispness, the swing, the peculiar Viennese blood.

The great audience, pleased as it was with the "Pizzicati" of Delibes, came to hear Melba, and it was rewarded richly. Perhaps she was not as complete a mistress of her art as on former occasions, for in the "Mad Scene" from "Lucia" she has sung with more crystalline purity; and yet what a pleasure it was to hear her. Her greatest triumph was in the waltz by Arditti, which she repeated in answer to an imperious demand. Mr. Molé played the flute obbligato in the "Mad Scene" with surpassing skill. Melba was blithe, debonaire, a feast to the eye, as well as to the ear. And as ever she was good-natured; so thoroughly good-natured that she sang a song by Mr. Clayton Johns.

PHILIP HALE.

NOTES.

Melba will sing at the Symphony Rehearsal and Concert of this week Handel's "Sweet Bird" (by request) and the "Mad Scene" from Thomas's "Hamlet."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JAN. 30, 1895.

The Melba Concert.

A brilliant audience completely filled Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the occasion being the extra popular matinee by the Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Melba as the stellar attraction. The popularity of the event was clearly evidenced. The fair singer was in excellent voice, the orchestra and conductor in the best of humors, and the audience enthusiastic. Mme. Melba's numbers in detail were the familiar aria from "Les Huguenots," the mad scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor," and Arditi's waltz song of Patti fame. Vocally all three of course, were superbly rendered. Such irreproachable technique, disarms criticism. But the dramatic instinct is by no means adequate in this great artist. Seldom does one find both qualities equally balanced, and Melba, it must be admitted is no exception to the rule. This seemed especially noticeable in the mad scene from "Lucia," the supreme effort of the performance, which lacked the dramatic force one would naturally expect. For this the composer is doubtless partly responsible, however. In any case, the result was not satisfying. But the trills and other vocal exigencies were easily met. In this respect, Mme. Melba is Patti's legitimate successor, though it is doubtful if she will ever quite equal her illustrious predecessor. The flute obbligato by Mr. Molé was fully entitled to the share in the honors, which the prima donna gracefully acknowledged. An emphatic encore was generously and cheerfully met with a repetition, in part, of the number. The Meyerbeer Aria was warmly received; to which Mme. Melba replied with a winning frankness singing Clayton Johns' "I love, but the world is mine," the composer himself accompanying at the piano. There the artist's failing was observable. She is not emotional. Several of our local soprani can interpret the charming song with truer feeling. This seems hard to understand, for Melba's delightful personality suggests the very reverse of apathy. Arditi's "Se Seran Rose" was peculiarly acceptable and was willingly repeated on being redemanded.

The orchestral numbers were the overture to "Fra Diavolo," given as it can seldom be heard; the ballet music (Delibes), which seemed light and flippant coming from such an organization, despite the favorite pizzicati movement or the more pretentious "Cortege de Bacchus"; the charming entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and a new scherzo of Goldmark's—well constructed and interesting throughout—were amply compensating. Strauss' "Southern Roses" waltz, pleasing as usual, and the splendid overture to Mignon (Thomas), fittingly rendered, brought the long but enjoyable programme to its close.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Mme. Melba, gave an extra concert in Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Auber: Overture to "Fra Diavolo."
Meyerbeer: Aria from "Les Huguenots."
Mme. Melba.
Delibes: Ballet-music from "Sylvia."
Donizetti: Mad-scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor."
Mme. Melba.
(Flute obbligato by Mr. Molé.)
Chabrier: Entr'acte from "Gwendoline."
Goldmark: Scherzo (first time).
Arditi: Waltz-song, "Se seran rose."
Mme. Melba.
Johann Strauss: Waltz, "Southern Roses."
Thomas: Overture to "Mignon."

We have been waiting—rather hopelessly, if the truth be told—for some time for the Symphony Orchestra to give a concert of light music. At last it has come, as an "extra." Auber's "Fra Diavolo" overture, Ambroise Thomas's overture to "Mignon," the Delibes ballet music, and the Strauss waltz are things which no orchestra under the sun need consider infra dig. Each of these things is admirable of its kind and its kind is both musically and historically interesting and artistically worthy. One experience yesterday afternoon was not particularly encouraging, especially as it went to confirm previous experiences of the sort; this was the comparative apathy of the audience in face of the Strauss waltz. To be sure, Mme. Melba's wonderful singing of Arditi's waltz-song coming immediately before it may have taken a good deal of the wind out of Strauss's sails; but, to hear what some people say of the general public craving for Strauss waltzes, one would hardly have thought that even Mme. Melba could blanket one of them. Another "extenuating circumstance" may be that Strauss's waltzes do not make quite their characteristic effect when played by an orchestra so largely equipped with strings. Strauss's individual, and exceedingly clever and effective, scoring is calculated for a smaller orchestra, for one in which the united wood-wind and horns forms a pretty exact dynamic counterpoise to the strings, not for a regular symphony orchestra, in which the strings are, as a body, stronger than the wind (leaving out the heavy brass). Just as a Beethoven, Mendelssohn, or Brahms symphony fails in producing its proper effect, if the wood-wind and horns outweigh the strings, so does a Strauss waltz equally fail, if the strings outweigh the lighter wind instruments; each loses its characteristic coloring and aroma. But, even making allowance for these points, it is surprising how coolly our public has on more than one occasion taken the Strauss waltzes, for which it seems so to thirst. At the summer popular concerts the first few measures of a familiar waltz are greeted with rapturous hand-clapping, but the applause at the end is cool and perfunctory as possible. Yesterday afternoon poor Strauss came in for no real enthusiasm one way or another. Is it that the public's eye for waltzes is somewhat larger than its stomach? It certainly looks like it. The orchestra played admirably all through the concert; with nicety of ensemble and shading, and with contagious fire and brilliancy.

Mme. Melba was, of course, the bait that caught all those fish that crammed the hall to overflowing. Well, her singing made it all worth while. She was in her best voice and mood, she had touched the orchestra's tender point at rehearsal—think, for instance, of a symphony orchestra at undress rehearsal, stopping short after an opera singer's cadenza to applaud it to the echo—and she and the band mutually egged each other on to do their very best. It was one of those occasions when every one is in touch. If Mme. Melba's singing of the air from the "Huguenots" was beautiful in its finished perfection, her singing of that old, old—but none the less beautiful—mad-scene in "Lucia" beggared all description. For once Mr. Molé could shake hands on level ground with a cantatrice—she could do all he could, and with just as impeccable intonation. That astonishing double cadenza was no race between voice and flute; even in the Leibnitzian "harmonia prestabilita" no finer exactness of coincidence between two forces could be imagined. And in Arditi's waltz the prima donna renewed her triumphs. The whole concert was delightful.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Mittwoch, 30 Januar 1895

Boston Symphonies Orchester. Unter Mitwirkung der Sängerin Miß Lillian Blauvalt wird am nächsten Montage das berühmte Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur sein viertes Orchester in dieser Saison geben. Tickets für dasselbe sind bereits jetzt bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str., zu haben. Zum Vortrag gelangen Dvoraks neue Symphonie „Aus der Neuen Welt", Arie aus „Cid" von Massenet, Suite in D moll von Lachner, Arie aus Haydn's „Schöpfung" und Arie aus „Die verkaufte Braut" von Smetana.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1895.

The program of the thirteenth Symphony Concert, given in Music Hall last evening, was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, E minor, "From the New World".....Dvorák
Concerto for violin, A minor.....Goldmark
Overture "Leonore" (No. 2).....Beethoven
Symphonic poem, "Sarka".....Smetana

Mr. César Thomson made his first appearance in Boston, and his success was overwhelming.

He played the Goldmark concerto, first produced at a Symphony concert by Mr. Kneisel December 6, 1890—a serious work, interesting in episodes rather than as a complete and organic whole. There is no sensuous, heart-melting tune in it. There is no dashing, blinding brilliancy. Indeed it is almost without an element of popularity.

Thomson seems like a self-inspecting, self-absorbed ascetic. I should not be surprised to hear that Satan had buffeted him, had promised him the technic of technics in exchange for his soul. For this man might fitly, so far as appearance goes, don the monk's garb.

The man is modesty himself. He is bold only in his art. He seems to apologize for his skill. Far from his thought is an audience that may applaud or chill the air. He stands as though he were alone, or as though he played for invisible auditors. No tossing, no swaying, no defiant tossing of carefully dishevelled hair, no moment of inspiration, no pose, just before the applauds should come in.

Musicians who have heard Thomson in Europe and in New York say that he rose last night to unimagined heights. Surely never have I heard such sustained, sublime, unearthly cantabile as in the andante of the concerto.

As for his technic, you know what he can do. Yet he is not merely the wizard, the man of the eighteenth century in league with Satan.

His tone is free from earthly dross. Its nobility is that of a man who has put aside the thought of sex; not from fear, not from fanaticism, not from indifference, but because the pure spirit is more to him than the wormy body. The music that came from his fiddle was without suggestion of passion; it was the music that hints at a life where there will be no thought or recollection of bodily joy or sorrow, or grotesque and tragic bodily desire.

The concerto is in itself comparatively ungrateful; the unconsciousness of the violinist was Olympian; the chasteness of style was virginal; there was an almost anxious concealment of amazing technical skill; the player was immovable. Yet such was the public appreciation of the nobility, the grandeur, the self-abnegation of the performance that the great audience paid him a tribute never to be forgotten by one who heard the applause, saw the illuminated faces and witnessed the shyness of the violinist, who seemed as though one disturbed in profound musical contemplation.

PHILIP HALE.

The program of the fifth Kneisel Quartet concert, given in Union Hall the evening of the 21st, was as follows: Quartet in D major, Borodine (first time); quartet in B flat major, op. 18, Beethoven; quintet in D minor, op. 38, H. W. Parker (MS., first time). The club was assisted by Mr. Schulz, 'cellist. This quartet, the second, by Borodine, is a posthumous work. Rimsky-Korsakoff and other friends found and examined it, together with "Prince Igor," the fragments of the third Symphony, some romances. Alfred Habets says that it is not likely Borodine would have allowed the publication of the romances. "Prince Igor" was finished by Rimsky-Korsakoff and Glazounoff; two movements of the third symphony were orchestrated by Glazounoff; the finale of "Mlada," an opera ballet, was orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The quartet, dedicated to Borodine's wife, who did not long survive him, seems to have been let alone. Still it seems to me that Borodine could not have been content with the finale as it now exists. For it is far inferior to the other movements. The first, an allegro moderato but alla breva, is a masterpiece. It is melodious from beginning to end, firmly knit, logical, but not sternly logical, without padding, a constant delight. As an instance of mavellously beautiful effects gained by simple means see the treatment of the pedal of fifteen or sixteen measures toward the very end. The scherzo does not fall below. Its chief theme is a species of perpetuum mobile, and there is a contrasting movement not unlike an old fashioned German slow waltz. Strange and cruelly tender is the chant of the 'cello in the "Notturno" a song repeated immediately by the first violin. In spite of my great respect for the Kneisel Quartet, I do not think that this "Notturno" received full justice in the performance. The duskiness, the perfume, the Verlainesque "mots si specieux, tout bas," I missed these; there was the publicity and the noon-light of Boston Common, with people waiting for street cars. And in all this quartet there is no trace of the howling, leaping and sweating peasants so dear to the radical Russian and used freely in scherzo or finale.

Mr. Parker's quintet contains much that is tuneful, much that is strong. But it did not leave the impression of a thoroughly coherent, finely developed work. There was too frequently straining without result, as well as the thought of the orchestra without effect gained thereby.

*

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1895.

"RUSH" TICKETS AT THE SYMPHONY.

To the Editor of the Transcript: I wish to make an appeal for better management in Music Hall through the columns of your paper. Early on Monday last an admission ticket to the Symphony rehearsal was purchased by a young musician, a lady, small and delicate; and at twelve o'clock on Friday she took her place quietly in the lobby to await the opening of the doors. This seems a great waste of time, but at present is the only way to obtain a seat. When the doors were finally opened the crowd in their mad, unreasoning haste swept the young lady off her feet, throwing her violently against the door and pinning her there so she was unable to get through, until her cape was torn from her shoulders and she had been severely bruised. This I witnessed, and I wish to say that there are several ways of preventing a repetition of such a scene. One is to adopt the method of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York, and have policemen stationed in the lobby to keep the people in file in the order of their coming, and to prevent all crushing at the door. Another and still better way is to have the number of the seats on the tickets, and thus reserve them. This could be done without increase in price, and first come, first served. If one of the managers of Music Hall would buy a "rush" ticket for one of these matinée concerts he would see that some change in arrangement was needed at once. These tickets are sold at a low price to place them, presumably, within the reach of all music-lovers, who cannot afford high-priced tickets, but there are few people who have the time to stand so long in line before the concerts begin, to say nothing of the fatigue and heat, and when, after the mad rush, a seat is found the finder is unfitted to enjoy a concert. In all other cities, even those of France and Germany, where the tickets are sold for a franc and a mark, the seats are all reserved, and the purchaser of a ticket knows that there is a seat for him when he goes to claim it. Can there not be a different arrangement from the present one here?

ONE OF THE SUFFERERS.

HOME JOURNAL

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1895.

BOSTON'S PRIDE in her Symphony Orchestra has been justified this season, and never more fully than at Tuesday's matinee. From the overture, "Fra Diavolo," at the beginning, to "Mignon" at the close, the selections were rendered with that skill and perfection for which the artists are noted. The courtesies between Mr. Paur and Mme. Melba proved that professionals can appreciate each other's efforts. Mr. Paur's evident delight and enthusiastic applause when Mme. Melba sang, had its equivalent in her clapping and the kisses sent from her finger-tips when the Strauss Waltz was played.

.....

Mme. Melba's appearance had been eagerly awaited by the audience, and she was accorded an enthusiastic reception. She was in excellent voice, and sang as a first selection "O vago suol," and "A questa voce," from Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots." Her perfection of technique and the sweet quality of her voice won most tremendous applause from her delighted audience, who recalled her again and again, and was finally rewarded with M. Clayton Johns' "I love the world," in which Mme. Melba was accompanied by the composer.

....

Although she has been heard to better advantage in the mad scene from "Lucia," yet it was well received and encored most heartily, while the waltz song, "Se Savan Rose," aroused the wildest enthusiasm and had to be repeated. Her appearance was a complete triumph and her reception a perfect ovation. The "divine Melba" has once more taken Boston by storm. A large audience will undoubtedly enjoy this evening's performance.

....

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 34.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1895.

MELBA WAS IN HER ELEMENT.

Heard at Her Very Best at the Symphony Concert.

Her Singing in the Scene from "Hamlet" Delightful Beyond Description—Handel Air, "Sweet Bird," Sung with Utmost Perfection—The Orchestra Does Fine Work.

The programme for last night's concert in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was:

Overture, "Don Juan".....Mozart
Air, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
Suite in D, op. 113.....Lachner
Prelude, Variations and March.....Fugue
Ophelia's Mad Scene, "Hamlet"...A. Thomas
Symphony, "Italian".....Mendelssohn

Mme. Melba was the soloist. Every seat in the auditorium was occupied, and on the floor all the standing room was crowded. The concert was exceptionally enjoyable, after one had become accustomed to the marrow-chilling gusts of cold air that came through the swinging doors and the open transoms over them. However, comparative comfort could be obtained by those familiar with Music Hall drafts, and who retained their overcoats and turned up the collars thereof, although their heads could not be protected from the winter wind that frolicked through the corridors and made its way through the transoms.

The playing of the orchestra throughout was steadily fine. The Mozart overture was read by Mr. Paur in a masterly manner and was played very beautifully. It might be reasonably believed that the work was well known to a Symphony concert audience, but such was evidently not the case, for the programme book gave four pages of minute description, even telling of the time-honored story of the overture being composed in great haste the night before the performance, and scored for the strings and wood wind, a feat that was utterly impossible, as may be proved by any rapid copyist who attempts merely to write out the score in the time named. The Lachiner suite is a work of solid worth, and deserves a more frequent hearing than it obtains. The prelude is impressively dignified, the variations, 24 in number, of which only half were selected for performance on this occasion, are noble in style and remarkable in the fertility of invention in regard to variety of treatment, melodical and instrumental, that distinguishes them, and the fugue is large and vigorous, and may rank among the best productions in its kind that have been written since the great era of fugue passed away. The suite was splendidly read and performed. The graceful and always delightful symphony could not have had more sympathetic treatment or be given with more satisfying results than attended its interpretation by Mr. Paur and his orchestra.

Of Mme. Melba's singing it would be difficult to say anything new in the way of praise. It was of exquisite beauty of both execution and of style throughout. The Handel air was sung with the utmost perfection of technique and with a grace and refinement of phrasing and of expression that were fascinating in effect, and Mr. Mole's performance of the florid flute obligato was scarcely less beautiful. The performance roused the audience to a great pitch of enthusiasm, which was not appeased until Mme. Melba had been recalled five times. It was, however, in the scene from "Hamlet" that she was heard at her best. Here she was in her element. The music is frivolous enough, and is so conventionally operatic that it scarcely deserves a place on a Symphony concert programme, and, moreover, it is quite unmeaning without the scenic surroundings for which it was written and the stage action that should accompany it. This, however, in nowise detracts from the beauty of Mme. Melba's singing, which was delightful beyond description, and well merited the storms of applause that rewarded it and the many recalls, and the handsome floral tribute that she received.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next concert is to be given Feb. 16, and the programme is: Overture, "The Maid of Orleans," by Strube (first time); concerto for pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saens; serenade (without violins), Brahms, and overture in the Italian style, Schubert. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach is to be the soloist.

That Mme. Melba is a reigning favorite in Boston was clearly enough demonstrated Tuesday afternoon when not a seat anywhere in Music Hall, even on the steps each side of the stage, was vacant, and there were rows upon rows of men and women standing. The prima donna was in the best of spirits, overflowing with amiability and graciousness, and to our mind she never looked better in her life. Her French high necked bodice, the body of glittering steel and black network, and the sleeves of white lace and chiffon, with the black satin skirt, was immensely chic, dainty and becoming. The black toque, covered with jet, was just suited to her costume. She brought a loose bunch of pink roses in her hand as she came on to the stage, which gave a delicious bit of color to her toilet. Great clusters and baskets of superb roses were handed to her after her first song. A few of the many in the immense audience were: Mr. Montgomery Sears, who brought a number of ladies with him; Mrs. Henry C. Weston, Mr. and Mrs. Harcourt Amory, Mrs. Robert C. Hooper, Sr., Mr. Frank Zerrahn, Miss Elsie Perkins, Mrs. Apthorp, who had with her Mr. Russell Sullivan; Mr. Arthur Beebe, Miss Elizabeth Brooks, Dr. Sturgis Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Stackpole, Miss Stackpole, Mr. and Mrs. George [illegible] when she sang one of his own songs for an encore), Mr. John D. Williams and his brother, Mr. Samuel Williams, Mrs. Thacher Loring and her daughter, Mrs. J. H. Hecht, and Miss Hecht, Mrs. Paur, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mrs. H. M. Tickpor and Mrs. R. M. Field.

There was a perfect crush at the rehearsal Friday afternoon to hear Melba sing again. The admission tickets were all sold early in the week, and hundreds of women stood outside the hall doors in hopes of catching a glimpse of the prima donna as she passed in and out from her carriage. Mme. Melba wore a large flaring brimmed black hat with her pale blue and white lace gown and she looked very charming. Her recalls were so numerous she gayly exclaimed as she returned for the last time to the artist's room, quite breathless with running back and forth! "How can people ever say Boston audiences are cold, and at a rehearsal, too. I think they are the best in the world." Everybody seemed to be in the great audience, the C. P. Curtises, Mr. and Mrs. Francis Amory, Mrs. Henry C. Weston, Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Hooper, the Henry L. Higginsons, Mr. Frank Zerrahn, Mrs. James Jackson, Dr. and Mrs. Russell Sturgis, Dr. Sturgis Bigelow, Mr. Hugh Whitney, Mr. and Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. George Lewis, Mr. Frank Gray, Mr. Harry Wainwright, Mr. and Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. Fenollosa and hundreds more were there.

Melba received no more beautiful flowers last week at the Music Hall than the superb design which was handed to her last night after the concert. It was the fac simile of her own crest, artistically arranged by Galvin. It was made of violets, with a border of lilies of the valley, with the letter "M" in yellow primroses. It was sent her by Manager Charles A. Ellis and Mr. B. F. Keith.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1895.

The Fourteenth Symphony Concert in Music Hall—The First Appearance of Melba at These Concerts.

The program of the fourteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture to "Don Giovanni".....Mozart
Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro il Penseroso ed il Moderato".....Handel
Suite No. 1, in D minor, op. 113.....Lachner
Ophelie's mad scene, from "Hamlet".....Thomas
Symphony No. 4, in A major ("Italian").... Mendelssohn

The overture to "Don Giovanni" is not an effective concert number. Nor is it such a noble approach to the opera itself as is "The Magic Flute" overture to that strange medley of masonry, sublimity, buffoonery and nonsense called by some the first German opera. And yet a great deal of rubbish has been written about the meaning of this prelude to the musical story of "Don Giovanni." The first theme of the allegro has been taken as a description of the rake; a descending scale represents "the army of outraged husbands, fathers and brothers," etc., etc. It is not likely that Mozart had any such ideas in his head. An overture was necessary for the performance; and he wrote it hurriedly.

There were once three brothers named Lachner; Franz, Ignaz and Vinzenz. They had a sepbrother, Theodor. All these Lachners wrote music of respectability and varying worth. Franz died in 1890 (Jan. 20), although the compiler of the program book kept this secret locked in his breast; at least he did not print it. Vinzenz died in 1893. A heroic figure was Franz, fighting the battle against all those following the banner of Wagner. He, too, wrote operas; there are at least four; and who remembers them? He was also given to writing suites, and certainly the one played last night will preserve for him for many years respectful remembrance. It is good, honest music. There is nothing in it, perhaps, to warm the cockles or to cause one to swing the hat and leap into the air, but there are noble passages in the praeludium, and abundance of natural, flowing, delightful counterpoint in the variations. The fugue is extremely well made; but, pardon, oh ultra-conservatives, it is not altogether free from the reproach of dryness. Mr. Paur omitted the second movement of the suite and several of the variations. There was a time when such a suite would have been played in full. There will be a time when movements from symphonies—even Beethoven's—will represent to the musical public the symphonies themselves. Last evening the first movement of the Italian symphony seemed long, although it was read with painstaking care and played with spirit by the orchestra.

***

It may seem ungracious to say that the mad scene from "Hamlet" has no place in a concert-hall, especially as it was sung extremely well by that delightful singer, Melba. But at least one half of the effect is lost, when the scene is taken from the operatic stage. The decorations, the dancing peasants, the sight of the wandering, distracted Ophelia—these all accentuate or as some would say, excuse the music. That mad heroines always indulge in bravura is an old reproach against opera; but opera is an absurdity the moment a man or woman on the stage begins to sing. The opera may be by Bellini or Wagner; the absurdity is the same. I confess that if I were obliged to listen six nights out of the week to either "Sweet Bird" or Ophelia's mad scene, I would choose gladly the latter; for the tune of Handel belongs emphatically to another day and another generation although the art of a singer may clothe the skeleton of formalism in radiant beauty.

Still even in this old air Handel in the larghetto appeals to musicians and music lovers of all time. Melba sang each selection with surpassing art. In the "Sweet Bird" she was in friendly rivalry with Mr. Molé's flute, and he, too, deserves a place in pleasurable recollection. After all, it would be a delight to hear Melba sing scales, arpeggios, or merely sustain a tone. Such singers seldom visit us in these days. Let us not be finikin, let us not be foolishly hypocritical. Let us rejoice in her beautiful voice and supreme vocal art. Stormy as was the applause last evening, it was every bit deserved. I said last season that they who complained of Melba's "coldness" complained without reason. Surely last evening there was warmth, there was pathos in the voice of Ophelia.

PHILIP HALE.

American Art Journal.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 2, 1895.

The fifth Kneisel concert included two novelties, and one favorite. The latter was Beethoven's quartet in B flat, the last of the six numbers comprised in op. 18. Novelty number one was a quartet in D, by Borodin, a Russian composer who died eight years ago. It is modern in tone, and yet richly classic in structure, reminding you of some full blown flower—a dahlia, perchance. The third movement, a nocturne, is a departure from older sequence, and was so smoothly played as to make you think of wind instruments rather than strings. The other novelty was by a resident composer, H. W. Parker, director at Trinity,—a quintet in D minor, op. 38, with a long allegro; a solemn andante lento; an allegro so melodramatic in its opening that you look instinctively for a robber with his dirk emerging from the cave of staccato; but this is soon forgotten in the beauty which follows; and lastly comes the Finale, ben marcato. The concert was extremely interesting, and, brightened by the presence of leading musicians, including Ysaye and Stavenhagen, the latter staying over purposely to attend. In the last number Leo Schultz played the second cello.

A Southern kinswoman, with me at the thirteenth Symphony Concert, discovered genuine plantation melody in the last half of Dvorak's New World Symphony, though not in the first. In the closing Allegro con fuoco you say to yourself, Walpurgis Night! A negro voudoo, perhaps. For the first time Boston heard the third of the six symphonic poems composing Smetana's My Country. Sarka may be "the noblest of the Bohemian amazons," but she is a blood-thirsty young woman all the same, recalling the Bible story of Judith and Holofernes; though the music is but dimly suggestive of her direful tale. It was pleasant to hear Beethoven's second Leonora overture so soon after the more famous third. Cesar Thomson's violin was warmly welcomed in Goldmark's Concerto, op. 28. He is a noble player, though not superabounding in magnetism, and may well be elated with his Boston reception. To fill an interim of a week at the Boston, the hodge podge, invented by Gus Heene, called Rush City based upon the impossible happenings in an Oklahoma settlement, ingeniously tumbled to pieces in a cyclone. Who the mischief could ever have thought up such a medley of odds and ends; tiresome yet gay, everybody doing the unexpected, and doing it well.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 3, 1895.

MELBA THE SOLOIST.

Symphony Audience Greets Her With Great Enthusiasm.

The announcement that Mme. Melba was to be the soloist at the Symphony concert last night, was sufficient to draw even a larger audience than the week before.

Her first selection was the lovely Handel aria, "Sweet Bird," which has been heard here several times this season, and had Melba sung it later in the evening, she would doubtless have achieved better results. Her intonation was not always true, and while her execution was at times remarkably clean cut, at other points it was by no means so, which, therefore, brought the difficult portions of the aria into strong contrast. In her passages with the flute her trills were rather indefinite, and it suggested that she was attempting to trill on a third, without entire success. Most of these faults were noticeable in the earlier part of the aria, but toward the close her voice increased in strength and volume and was much truer. Later, however, when she sang the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," she was at her very best. All the previous defects had disappeared, and she gave a rendition which will long be remembered, as she gave to her high notes an absolute purity, which brought her at the close a perfect storm of applause, not to mention a number of elegant floral tributes. She was recalled some seven or eight times, and finally gestured to the audience that she had nothing more for them. A special word of praise is due Mr. Mole, who played the flute obligato in the Handel aria in exquisite fashion, and whom Melba warmly grasped by the hand at the close, and brought him forward to acknowledge with her the applause.

The rest of the programme included the overture to "Don Giovanni," the beautiful Lachner suite, with its charming variations in the third movement, ending with the spirited and popular march; and the Mendelssohn Italian symphony, with its catchy and bright fourth movement, the Saltariblo.

There will be no concert next week. The soloist for the week following will be Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, and the overture to Strube's "Jungfrau von Orleans" will be played for the first time.

[88]

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1895.

"RUSH" TICKETS AT THE SYMPHONY.

To the Editor of the Transcript: I wish to make an appeal for better management in Music Hall through the columns of your paper. Early on Monday last an admission ticket to the Symphony rehearsal was purchased by a young musician, a lady, small and delicate; and at twelve o'clock on Friday she took her place quietly in the lobby to await the opening of the doors. This seems a great waste of time, but at present is the only way to obtain a seat. When the doors were finally opened the crowd in their mad, unreasoning haste swept the young lady off her feet, throwing her violently against the door and pinning her there so she was unable to get through, until her cape was torn from her shoulders and she had been severely bruised. This I witnessed, and I wish to say that there are several ways of preventing a repetition of such a scene. One is to adopt the method of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York, and have policemen stationed in the lobby to keep the people in file in the order of their coming, and to prevent all crushing at the door. Another and still better way is to have the number of the seats on the tickets, and thus reserve them. This could be done without increase in price, and first come, first served. If one of the managers of Music Hall would buy a "rush" ticket for one of these matinée concerts he would see that some change in arrangement was needed at once. These tickets are sold at a low price to place them, presumably, within the reach of all music-lovers, who cannot afford high-priced tickets, but there are few people who have the time to stand so long in line before the concerts begin, to say nothing of the fatigue and heat, and when, after the mad rush, a seat is found the finder is unfitted to enjoy a concert. In all other cities, even those of France and Germany, where the tickets are sold for a franc and a mark, the seats are all reserved, and the purchaser of a ticket knows that there is a seat for him when he goes to claim it. Can there not be a different arrangement from the present one here? ONE OF THE SUFFERERS.

HOME JOURNAL

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1895.

BOSTON'S PRIDE in her Symphony Orchestra has been justified this season, and never more fully than at Tuesday's matinee. From the overture, "Fra Diavolo," at the beginning, to "Mignon" at the close, the selections were rendered with that skill and perfection for which the artists are noted. The courtesies between Mr. Paur and Mme. Melba proved that professionals can appreciate each other's efforts. Mr. Paur's evident delight and enthusiastic applause when Mme. Melba sang, had its equivalent in her clapping and the kisses sent from her finger-tips when the Strauss Waltz was played.

.....

Mme. Melba's appearance had been eagerly awaited by the audience, and she was accorded an enthusiastic reception. She was in excellent voice, and sang as a first selection "O vago suol," and "A questa voce," from Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots." Her perfection of technique and the sweet quality of her voice won most tremendous applause from her delighted audience, who recalled her again and again, and was finally rewarded with M. Clayton Johns' "I love the world," in which Mme. Melba was accompanied by the composer.

....

Although she has been heard to better advantage in the mad scene from "Lucia," yet it was well received and encored most heartily, while the waltz song, "Se Savan Rose," aroused the wildest enthusiasm and had to be repeated. Her appearance was a complete triumph and her reception a perfect ovation. The "divine Melba" has once more taken Boston by storm. A large audience will undoubtedly enjoy this evening's performance.

....

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 34.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1895.

MELBA WAS IN HER ELEMENT.

Heard at Her Very Best at the Symphony Concert.

Her Singing in the Scene from "Hamlet" Delightful Beyond Description—Handel Air, "Sweet Bird," Sung with Utmost Perfection—The Orchestra Does Fine Work.

The programme for last night's concert in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was:

Overture, "Don Juan".....Mozart
Air, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
Suite in D, op. 113.....Lachner
Prelude, Variations and March.....Fugue
Ophelia's Mad Scene, "Hamlet"....A. Thomas
Symphony, "Italian".....Mendelssohn

Mme. Melba was the soloist. Every seat in the auditorium was occupied, and on the floor all the standing room was crowded. The concert was exceptionally enjoyable, after one had become accustomed to the marrow-chilling gusts of cold air that came through the swinging doors and the open transoms over them. However, comparative comfort could be obtained by those familiar with Music Hall drafts, and who retained their overcoats and turned up the collars thereof, although their heads could not be protected from the winter wind that frolicked through the corridors and made its way through the transoms.

The playing of the orchestra throughout was steadily fine. The Mozart overture was read by Mr. Paur in a masterly manner and was played very beautifully. It might be reasonably believed that the work was well known to a Symphony concert audience, but such was evidently not the case, for the programme book gave four pages of minute description, even telling of the time-honored story of the overture being composed in great haste the night before the performance, and scored for the strings and wood wind, a feat that was utterly impossible, as may be proved by any rapid copyist who attempts merely to write out the score in the time named. The Lachiner suite is a work of solid worth, and deserves a more frequent hearing than it obtains. The prelude is impressively dignified, the variations, 24 in number, of which only half were selected for performance on this occasion, are noble in style and remarkable in the fertility of invention in regard to variety of treatment, melodical and instrumental, that distinguishes them, and the fugue is large and vigorous, and may rank among the best productions in its kind that have been written since the great era of fugue passed away. The suite was splendidly read and performed. The graceful and always delightful symphony could not have had more sympathetic treatment or be given with more satisfying results than attended its interpretation by Mr. Paur and his orchestra.

Of Mme. Melba's singing it would be difficult to say anything new in the way of praise. It was of exquisite beauty of both execution and of style throughout. The Handel air was sung with the utmost perfection of technique and with a grace and refinement of phrasing and of expression that were fascinating in effect, and Mr. Mole's performance of the florid flute obligato was scarcely less beautiful. The performance roused the audience to a great pitch of enthusiasm, which was not appeased until Mme. Melba had been recalled five times. It was, however, in the scene from "Hamlet" that she was heard at her best. Here she was in her element. The music is frivolous enough, and is so conventionally operatic that it scarcely deserves a place on a Symphony concert programme, and, moreover, it is quite unmeaning without the scenic surroundings for which it was written and the stage action that should accompany it. This, however, in nowise detracts from the beauty of Mme. Melba's singing, which was delightful beyond description, and well merited the storms of applause that rewarded it and the many recalls, and the handsome floral tribute that she received.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next concert is to be given Feb. 16, and the programme is: Overture, "The Maid of Orleans," by Strube (first time); concerto for pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saens; serenade (without violins), Brahms, and overture in the Italian style, Schubert. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach is to be the soloist.

That Mme. Melba is a reigning favorite in Boston was clearly enough demonstrated Tuesday afternoon when not a seat anywhere in Music Hall, even on the steps each side of the stage, was vacant, and there were rows upon rows of men and women standing. The prima donna was in the best of spirits, overflowing with amiability and graciousness, and to our mind she never looked better in her life. Her French high necked bodice, the body of glittering steel and black network, and the sleeves of white lace and chiffon, with the black satin skirt, was immensely chic, dainty and becoming. The black toque, covered with jet, was just suited to her costume. She brought a loose bunch of pink roses in her hand as she came on to the stage, which gave a delicious bit of color to her toilet. Great clusters and baskets of superb roses were handed to her after her first song. A few of the many in the immense audience were: Mr. Montgomery Sears, who brought a number of ladies with him; Mrs. Henry C. Weston, Mr. and Mrs. Harcourt Amory, Mrs. Robert C. Hooper, Sr., Mr. Frank Zerrahn, Miss Elsie Perkins, Mrs. Apthorp, who had with her Mr. Russell Sullivan; Mr. Arthur Beebe, Miss Elizabeth Brooks, Dr. Sturgis Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Stackpole, Miss Stackpole, Mr. and Mrs. George Elliott, Mr. Clayton Johns (who played the accompaniment for Mme. Melba when she sang one of his own songs for an encore), Mr. John D. Williams and his brother, Mr. Samuel Williams, Mrs. Thacher Loring and her daughter, Mrs. J. H. Hecht, and Miss Hecht, Mrs. Paur, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mrs. H. M. Ticknor and Mrs. R. M. Field.

There was a perfect crush at the rehearsal Friday afternoon to hear Melba sing again. The admission tickets were all sold early in the week, and hundreds of women stood outside the hall doors in hopes of catching a glimpse of the prima donna as she passed in and out from her carriage. Mme. Melba wore a large flaring brimmed black hat with her pale blue and white lace gown and she looked very charming. Her recalls were so numerous she gayly exclaimed as she returned for the last time to the artist's room, quite breathless with running back and forth: "How can people ever say Boston audiences are cold, and at a rehearsal, too. I think they are the best in the world." Everybody seemed to be in the great audience, the C. P. Curtises, Mr. and Mrs. Francis Amory, Mrs. Henry C. Weston, Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Hooper, the Henry L. Higginsons, Mr. Frank Zerrahn, Mrs. James Jackson, Dr. and Mrs. Russell Sturgis, Dr. Sturgis Bigelow, Mr. Hugh Whitney, Mr. and Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. George Lewis, Mr. Frank Gray, Mr. Harry Wainwright, Mr. and Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. Fenollosa and hundreds more were there.

Melba received no more beautiful flowers last week at the Music Hall than the superb design which was handed to her last night after the concert. It was the fac simile of her own crest, artistically arranged by Galvin. It was made of violets, with a border of lilies of the valley, with the letter "M" in yellow primroses. It was sent her by Manager Charles A. Ellis and Mr. B. F. Keith.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1895.

The Fourteenth Symphony Concert in Music Hall—The First Appearance of Melba at These Concerts.

The program of the fourteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture to "Don Giovanni".....Mozart
Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro il Penseroso ed il Moderato".....Handel
Suite No. 1, in D minor, op. 113.....Lachner
Ophelie's mad scene, from "Hamlet".....Thomas
Symphony No. 4, in A major ("Italian").... Mendelssohn

The overture to "Don Giovanni" is not an effective concert number. Nor is it such a noble approach to the opera itself as is "The Magic Flute" overture to that strange medley of masonry, sublimity, buffoonery and nonsense called by some the first German opera. And yet a great deal of rubbish has been written about the meaning of this prelude to the musical story of "Don Giovanni." The first theme of the allegro has been taken as a description of the rake; a descending scale represents "the army of outraged husbands, fathers and brothers," etc., etc. It is not likely that Mozart had any such ideas in his head. An overture was necessary for the performance; and he wrote it hurriedly.

There were once three brothers named Lachner; Franz, Ignaz and Vinzenz. They had a sepbrother, Theodor. All these Lachners wrote music of respectability and varying worth. Franz died in 1890 (Jan. 20), although the compiler of the program book kept this secret locked in his breast; at least he did not print it. Vinzenz died in 1893. A heroic figure was Franz, fighting the battle against all those following the banner of Wagner. He, too, wrote operas; there are at least four; and who remembers them? He was also given to writing suites, and certainly the one played last night will preserve for him for many years respectful remembrance. It is good, honest music. There is nothing in it, perhaps, to warm the cockles or to cause one to swing the hat and leap into the air, but there are noble passages in the praeludium, and abundance of natural, flowing, delightful counterpoint in the variations. The fugue is extremely well made; but, pardon, oh ultra-conservatives, it is not altogether free from the reproach of dryness. Mr. Paur omitted the second movement of the suite and several of the variations. There was a time when such a suite would have been played in full. There will be a time when movements from symphonies—even Beethoven's—will represent to the musical public the symphonies themselves. Last evening the first movement of the Italian symphony seemed long, although it was read with painstaking care and played with spirit by the orchestra.

***

It may seem ungracious to say that the mad scene from "Hamlet" has no place in a concert-hall, especially as it was sung extremely well by that delightful singer, Melba. But at least one half of the effect is lost, when the scene is taken from the operatic stage. The decorations, the dancing peasants, the sight of the wandering, distracted Ophelia—these all accentuate or as some would say, excuse the music. That mad heroines always indulge in bravura is an old reproach against opera; but opera is an absurdity the moment a man or woman on the stage begins to sing. The opera may be by Bellini or Wagner; the absurdity is the same. I confess that if I were obliged to listen six nights out of the week to either "Sweet Bird" or Ophelia's mad scene, I would choose gladly the latter; for the tune of Handel belongs emphatically to another day and another generation although the art of a singer may clothe the skeleton of formalism in radiant beauty.

Still even in this old air Handel in the larghetto appeals to musicians and music lovers of all time. Melba sang each selection with surpassing art. In the "Sweet Bird" she was in friendly rivalry with Mr. Molé's flute, and he, too, deserves a place in pleasurable recollection. After all, it would be a delight to hear Melba sing scales, arpeggios, or merely sustain a tone. Such singers seldom visit us in these days. Let us not be finikin, let us not be foolishly hypocritical. Let us rejoice in her beautiful voice and supreme vocal art. Stormy as was the applause last evening, it was every bit deserved. I said last season that they who complained of Melba's "coldness" complained without reason. Surely last evening there was warmth, there was pathos in the voice of Ophelia.

PHILIP HALE.

American Art Journal.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 2, 1895.

The fifth Kneisel concert included two novelties, and one favorite. The latter was Beethoven's quartet in B flat, the last of the six numbers comprised in op. 18. Novelty number one was a quartet in D, by Borodin, a Russian composer who died eight years ago. It is modern in tone, and yet richly classic in structure, reminding you of some full blown flower—a dahlia, perchance. The third movement, a nocturne, is a departure from older sequence, and was so smoothly played as to make you think of wind instruments rather than strings. The other novelty was by a resident composer, H. W. Parker, director at Trinity,—a quintet in D minor, op. 38, with a long allegro; a solemn andante lento; an allegro so melodramatic in its opening that you look instinctively for a robber with his dirk emerging from the cave of staccato; but this is soon forgotten in the beauty which follows; and lastly comes the Finale, ben marcato. The concert was extremely interesting, and, brightened by the presence of leading musicians, including Ysaye and Stavenhagen, the latter staying over purposely to attend. In the last number Leo Schultz played the second cello.

A Southern kinswoman, with me at the thirteenth Symphony Concert, discovered genuine plantation melody in the last half of Dvorak's New World Symphony, though not in the first. In the closing Allegro con fuoco you say to yourself, Walpurgis Night! A negro voudoo, perhaps. For the first time Boston heard the third of the six symphonic poems composing Smetana's My Country. Sarka may be "the noblest of the Bohemian amazons," but she is a blood-thirsty young woman all the same, recalling the Bible story of Judith and Holofernes; though the music is but dimly suggestive of her direful tale. It was pleasant to hear Beethoven's second Leonora overture so soon after the more famous third. Cesar Thomson's violin was warmly welcomed in Goldmark's Concerto, op. 28. He is a noble player, though not superabounding in magnetism, and may well be elated with his Boston reception. To fill an interim of a week at the Boston, the hodge podge, invented by Gus Heene, called Rush City based upon the impossible happenings in an Oklahoma settlement, ingeniously tumbled to pieces in a cyclone. Who the mischief could ever have thought up such a medley of odds and ends; tiresome yet gay, everybody doing the unexpected, and doing it well.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 3, 1895.

MELBA THE SOLOIST.

Symphony Audience Greets Her With Great Enthusiasm.

The announcement that Mme. Melba was to be the soloist at the Symphony concert last night, was sufficient to draw even a larger audience than the week before.

Her first selection was the lovely Handel aria, "Sweet Bird," which has been heard here several times this season, and had Melba sung it later in the evening, she would doubtless have achieved better results. Her intonation was not always true, and while her execution was at times remarkably clean cut, at other points it was by no means so, which, therefore, brought the difficult portions of the aria into strong contrast. In her passages with the flute her trills were rather indefinite, and it suggested that she was attempting to trill on a third, without entire success. Most of these faults were noticeable in the earlier part of the aria, but toward the close her voice increased in strength and volume and was much truer. Later, however, when she sang the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," she was at her very best. All the previous defects had disappeared, and she gave a rendition which will long be remembered, as she gave to her high notes an absolute purity, which brought her at the close a perfect storm of applause, not to mention a number of elegant floral tributes. She was recalled some seven or eight times, and finally gestured to the audience that she had nothing more for them. A special word of praise is due Mr. Mole, who played the flute obligato in the Handel aria in exquisite fashion, and whom Melba warmly grasped by the hand at the close, and brought him forward to acknowledge with her the applause.

The rest of the programme included the overture to "Don Giovanni," the beautiful Lachner suite, with its charming variations in the third movement, ending with the spirited and popular march; and the Mendelssohn Italian symphony, with its catchy and bright fourth movement, the Saltariblo.

There will be no concert next week. The soloist for the week following will be Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, and the overture to Strube's "Jungfrau von Orleans" will be played for the first time.

[88]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 3.

Symphony Orchestra Matinee.

An extra popular matinee was given by the Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, with Mme. Melba as soloist. The programme was:

Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber.
Aria, from "Les Huguenots".....Meyerbeer.
Ballet music, "Sylvia".....Delibes.
Mad Scene from "Lucia".....Donizetti.
Entr'acte, from "Gwendoline".....Chabrier.
Scherzo (new, first time).....Goldmark.
Song "Se Seran Rose".....Arditi.
Waltz, "Southern Roses".....Joh. Strauss.
Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas.

An admirable programme and faultlessly interpreted from beginning to end. The "Fra Diavolo" overture was charming; an old friend returning after a long absence, but with no evidence of antiquity, brilliant, fiery and dashing as in the old days, and receiving the finest and most sympathetic treatment under Mr. Paur's direction. The always delightful "Sylvia" ballet music was another triumph in the way of interpretation; it was perfect, to the smallest shade of meaning, polished to brilliancy, of exquisite delicacy in the "slow waltz" and the "Pizzicati," while even Mr. Paur and his orchestra never gave finer work than in the vigorous and richly-colored reading of the "Bacchus Procession." It won the heartiest and most deserved applause.

The Chabrier entr'acte reveals additional beauties by repetition; it is full of beauty and doubtless all perplexity would vanish were it heard in its proper place. The Goldmark "Scherzo" seems to be a misnomer, for it has none of the characteristics of the scherzo, properly so called; and, what is more, it is doubtful if Goldmark could do himself justice in this species of work. His imagination is not noticeable for lightness, gayety and airy grace; his genius is not stimulated by laughing gas, but by the opium pipe; he is not from Greece, but from the East, and when his muse is not dreaming under a palm tree, it is stimulated into activity by the burning of frankincense, and by the spicy odors wafted from the garden of Hafiz. Technically considered, the scherzo is a fine piece of work, but it leaves the hero cold and indifferent. As to the Strauss waltz, it was most pleasant to hear, and it would have been faultless had a little more swing and dash been given to it. It was finely read, but, for an undiscoverable reason, a portion of its subtle, nerve-thrilling essence had vanished, and the hearer forced himself to believe that he was under a spell to dance to it. When a Strauss waltz does not spontaneously arouse this feeling, the fault is not in the composer.

Of course, Mme. Melba was the particular attraction, and her mere appearance stirred the large audience into enthusiasm; but the delight she gave more than justified the anticipation. Her beautiful voice is under the guidance of a faultless method, and the music lover is sure to be rewarded with something more than mere technical excellence, vocal fireworks, lighted and exploded for their own sake. In the mad scene from "Lucia," Mme. Melba aroused the old enthusiasm. It was singing with a meaning in it; singing with warmth, passion, fine art and understanding. Her singing of the Arditi waltz song was equally satisfying, and she was compelled to repeat it in answer to the imperious enthusiasm of the audience. As another encore, Mme. Melba sang a song by Mr. Clayton Johns, and sang it without effect, and yet Mme. Melba is a great artist! This fact alone is sufficient to demonstrate the rare good-nature of the singer, and it should stimulate Mr. Clayton Johns to write a better song than that which Mme. Melba vainly attempted to immortalize. Mr. Molé's flute playing in the selection from the "Huguenots," and the obligato accompaniment to the "Lucia" scene were of the finest art quality, flawless in technique and rarely beautiful in tone and in feeling. It is to be hoped that more "extra popular" matinees will be given.

The Symphony Concert.

The following is the programme of the concert given last night in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony orchestra:

Overture "Don Giovanni".....Mozart.
Aria "Sweet Bird".....Handel.
Suite in D major op 113.....Lachner.
Mad Scene from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas.
Symphony No. 4.....Mendelssohn.

As will be seen there are no novelties in the programme, and yet the sitting and standing room of Music Hall was tested to its full capacity. The particular attraction of the evening was Mme. Melba; and it was curious to note how much deeper was the interest in the living artist, than in the works of the dead composers. The Mozart overture was simply a preparation for a special feast; the Lachner Suite a resting place for exhausted enthusiasm, and the Mendelssohn symphony as much tonic medicine to prepare the audience for facing the open air.

Hero or heroine worship is a marked characteristic of the music-lover, and in the majority of cases the worship of hero or heroine is confounded with the worship of music; the eyes not infrequently being used instead of the ears, curiosity taking the place of understanding. Carlyle would have found consolation in this fact, but from an art view-point it is somewhat discouraging. But then the love of abstract beauty of abstract art is the source of a musical Nile many have sought for and few found, and so the unfortunate majority are compelled to set up some stock or stone as a reminder, and vigorously worship it while waiting for a development of the imagination, which happy event is prophesied to occur ad Graecas kalendas. Handel in the meanwhile being confounded with his interpreter, and music with the visual impressions aroused by a pretty or ugly face and a fashionable evening robe.

Let it be hastily added, however, that Mme. Melba is an art idol worthy of the adoration she wins, she arises like an electric-charged, guiding and warning lighthouse in the fog-covered ocean of mediocrity. It immeasurably adds to her chances of art immortality that she is not a victim of technique; that this same technique has not crushed out her warmth, her understanding and her feelings, and congealed all her merits into a cold frozen trill. This is not entirely a figure of rhetoric; for example it would not be difficult to find singers who believe and practically illustrate the belief that Handel's "Sweet Bird" is a formal exercise in scale passages culminating in a flute-supported trill; a cold, dreary study for the development of the vocal chords and the burial of artistic feeling. Mme. Melba remembers that she is an artist as well as a singer, and yielding to the influence of the fiery composer, she treats us to something more valuable than a vocal iceberg. In the mad scene from "Hamlet" she reached a still higher point of excellence, rare technical skill was not wanting, but it was held sternly to its function as a means and not as the end. There were warmth, intensity of feeling, delicate contrasts, clear understanding and full expression. The skill was admirable, but it was used to intensify the emotion, and not displayed as a thing apart. The distinction cannot be too frequently or too strongly insisted on in an era of decadence wherein technique is assuming an importance that its inherent art worth will not warrant. Technique is all-important, but art exists in spite of it: it is the servant of art, and when it assumes the part of master, when it pretends that it is art, its folly should be unmasked. Mme. Melba's singing aroused a tempest of applause; she was recalled again and again, especially after the "Hamlet" selection, in which the great artist reached her highest point of excellence, an excellence that few have reached, and fewer still surpassed.

The programme for the next concert, which is to be given on Feb. 16, is: Overture, "Maid of Orleans," Strube; Concerto in G-minor for pianoforte, Saint-Saëns; Brahm's Serenade, without violins, and Schubert's Overture, Series 2, No. 5. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach is soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 3, 1895.

Mme Melba, Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

There was the usual large attendance at the symphony concert last evening. Mme Melba was again the soloist, and she received a demonstratively cordial greeting. It was the third time that she had sung with this orchestra during the week, but her reappearance many more times would be most welcome.

She is unquestionably the foremost prima donna of the day, and the opportunity of hearing her in concert has been eagerly taken advantage of by many people whose means would not permit them to attend her performances in grand opera.

The program last evening was as follows:

Overture to Don Giovanni,
Wolfgang Amadens Mozart
Scena, Sweet Bird that Shun'st the Noise of Folly, from L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato ....George Frederic Handel
(Flute obligato by Mr Charles Mole)
Suite No. 1, in D minor, op 113 .Franz Lachner
Ophelie's mad scene (act 4, scene 2), from Hamlet .....Ambrose Thomas
Symphony No. 4, in A major (Italian), op 90 .....Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy

Perhaps the highest compliment that can be paid Mme Melba is to state the fact that the oftener she is heard he greater is the pleasure derived from her singing. She was in superb voice last evening, and sang the beautiful Handel aria with exquisite effect. Her purity of tone, delicacy of phrasing, sentiment in expression and grace of execution were indescribably charming.

The brilliant scene and ballad from the opera "Hamlet" was also sung magnificently. It was given with more dramatic expression than generally characterizes the singing of this artist. Especially brilliant was her interpretation of the florid passages at the end of the ballad. The audience fairly rose to her in its enthusiasm after this number, and recalled the singer again and again.

The orchestral numbers were splendidly played, under Mr Paur's intelligent direction. The overture of Mozart's masterpiece, "Don Giovanni," was given a fine performance, and proved a very welcome selection. The Lachner suite was also listened to with much pleasure. The first movement is not particularly interesting, but the third, with its score of brilliant variations and its exquisite march, is an uncommonly entertaining writing. The playing of the violins was exceptionably good, in the long and exacting fugue of the last movement. The performance of the Mendelssohn symphony was generally praiseworthy, but certain passages, notably in the dance movement, have been given with better effect by Mr Paur's predecessors.

The orchestra will leave Boston this evening for a February itinerary, in the following cities: Philadelphia, Monday; Washington, Tuesday; Baltimore, Wednesday; New York, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday and Saturday.

The program for the rehearsal and concert, Feb 15 and 16, will be as follows:

Overture, Jungfrau von Orleans .....Strube
(First time)
Concerto for pianoforte in G minor .Saint-Saens
Serenade (without violins) .....Brahms
Overture in Italian style, series 2, No 5 Schubert
Soloist, Mrs H H A Beach

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Samstag, 2. Februar 1895.

Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Unter Mitwirkung der Sängerin Miß Lillian Blauvalt wird am nächsten Montage das berühmte Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur sein viertes Orchester in dieser Saison geben. Tickets für dasselbe sind bereits jetzt bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str., zu haben. Zum Vortrag gelangen Dvoraks neue Symphonie „Aus der Neuen Welt", Arie aus „Cid" von Massenet, Suite in D moll von Lachner, Arie aus Haydn's „Schöpfung" und Arie aus „Die verkaufte Braut" von Smetana.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 3, 1895.

THE WEEK'S GROUP OF CONCERTS—MME. MELBA, THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

The promise of hearing Melba sing from the "Huguenots," "Lucia" and the concert-waltzes of Arditi drew an enormous audience to Music Hall on Tuesday afternoon. The promise was bettered in fulfilment, for the peerless vocalist doubled the number of her appearances by adding to the first song Mr. Clayton Johns's popular "I Love and the World is Mine," and by repeating the cadenza to Lucia's mad scene and the "Se saran Rose." She was in perfect voice and spirits, held the orchestra in complete accord with her, and sang as became herself, who is now probably the first and best of living vocalists. The concert in which she was the central figure was an extra of the Symphony series, the full band under Mr. Paur took part, and the audience included hundreds of the regular Friday and Saturday attendants. A delightfully gay, spirited and picturesque reading of the "Fra Diavolo" overture—not sounding much as it used to do when Tom Comer's little handful played it in the Museum!—began the afternoon, and an excellent performance of Thomas's "Mignon" overture ended it, while between these were placed the "Sylvia" ballet music, some light French things of the time, and a Strauss waltz, which came with all its lightness and swing from under Mr. Paur's baton, but wanted something of the gentle compulsion which an enlarged wooden wind force might have given it. The audience proved by its close attention that it enjoyed every number, but it reserved its plaudits for Mme. Melba, not forgetting however to award a generous and well merited share to Mr. Mole for his participation in the intricate graces of the two opera scenes.

Of the three orchestral numbers set down for the fourteenth Symphony programme neither was new, and two were familiar acquaintances long years ago. Of these two one was Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture, which, however well suited it is to its place as prologue to the opera, and however symmetrical and reasonable in construction, does not begin a concert with much cheer in fact or in promise. The men played it well enough, but without particular grace or distinction. The other was Mendelssohn's "Italian" overture, which was put at the other end of the programme. It began rather perfunctorily and heavily, and the andante moved none too sympathetically; but the saltarello in the last movement waked up the orchestra and Mr. Paur incited them to so much speed and sonority that he obtained the exciting effect with which he apparently seeks always to end his concerts. The other number was the first suite of Lachner—that in D minor, opus 113. From this were retrenched the second or minuet movement, and about one half of the more than twenty variations which make up the third movement. It would have been about as well if the fourth movement had been spared also. Not that it has no vigor and volume enough to follow the bright, keen and almost fascinating march (with a flavor of the "Rakoczy" in it) which ends the previous movement so enliveningly; but that the orchestra came almost to loggerheads in the figure with which it opens, a variance of about half a beat between two or three of the parts producing an ugly jolting uncertainty in the progression, which it took the conductor some time to straighten out. The first movement, however, was played with potent spirit and variations, particularly those into which one or another instrument entered as a soloist, were read with discrimination and diversity of color.

The effect of these instrumental numbers was illuminated and freshened by the exquisite vocalism of Mme. Melba, who sang the ever interesting "Sweet Bird" of Handel and the mad scene of Ophelia from the "Hamlet" of Ambroise Thomas. It is a pure joy to hear such music when it falls so naturally into the singer's voice and into such accord with her disposition that there is no suggestion of calculation or effort in the placing and floating of the tone and no sense of laborious training and mechanical study in the phrasing. The perfect ease and simple fluency of Mme. Melba's method and style delight the connoisseur as much as the finished and genial qualities of her voice captivate the uncritical but still discerning among her audience. But for a certain occasional thinness in the vowel E, due, possibly, to her much exercise in the French language, her tones might all pass as perfect in formation; albeit she sometimes shows a disposition to sharpen by a trifle the pitch of an already high note. She was again, as on Tuesday, in exact company with M. Mole's flute, and her rendering of the Ophelia music, if not impassioned, had certainly more feeling than we have found in some other singers when they have been praised for their warmth of tone and sentiment.

Next week will pass without a concert, but in the succeeding week this programme will be played: Overture, "Die Jungfrau von Orleans;" Strube, being the novelty of the programme; Saint-Saens G minor pianoforte concerto, with Mrs. Beach as the soloist; a Serenade, without violins, by Brahms, and Schubert's overture, "in Italian style," series 2, No. 5.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Freitag, 1. Februar 1895.

Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Unter Mitwirkung der Sängerin Miß Lillian Blauvalt wird am nächsten Montage das berühmte Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur sein viertes Orchester in dieser Saison geben. Tickets für dasselbe sind bereits jetzt bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str., zu haben. Zum Vortrag gelangen Dvoraks neue Symphonie „Aus der Neuen Welt", Arie aus „Cid" von Massenet, Suite in D moll von Lachner, Arie aus Haydn's „Schöpfung" und Arie aus „Die verkaufte Braut" von Smetana.

[89]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 3.

Symphony Orchestra Matinee.

An extra popular matinee was given by the Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, with Mme. Melba as soloist. The programme was:

Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber.
Aria, from "Les Huguenots".....Meyerbeer.
Ballet music, "Sylvia".....Delibes.
Mad Scene from "Lucia".....Donizetti.
Entr'acte, from "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Scherzo (new, first time).....Goldmark.
Song "Se Seran Rose".....Arditi.
Waltz, "Southern Roses".....Joh. Strauss.
Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas.

An admirable programme and faultlessly interpreted from beginning to end. The "Fra Diavolo" overture was charming; an old friend returning after a long absence, but with no evidence of antiquity, brilliant, fiery and dashing as in the old days, and receiving the finest and most sympathetic treatment under Mr. Paur's direction. The always delightful "Sylvia" ballet music was another triumph in the way of interpretation; it was perfect, to the smallest shade of meaning, polished to brilliancy, of exquisite delicacy in the "slow waltz" and the "Pizzicati," while even Mr. Paur and his orchestra never gave finer work than in the vigorous and richly-colored reading of the "Bacchus Procession." It won the heartiest and most deserved applause.

The Chabrier entr'acte reveals additional beauties by repetition; it is full of beauty and doubtless all perplexity would vanish were it heard in its proper place. The Goldmark "Scherzo" seems to be a misnomer, for it has none of the characteristics of the scherzo, properly so called; and, what is more, it is doubtful if Goldmark could do himself justice in this species of work. His imagination is not noticeable for lightness, gayety and airy grace; his genius is not stimulated by laughing gas, but by the opium pipe; he is not from Greece, but from the East, and when his muse is not dreaming under a palm tree, it is stimulated into activity by the burning of frankincense, and by the spicy odors wafted from the garden of Hafiz. Technically considered, the scherzo is a fine piece of work, but it leaves the hero cold and indifferent. As to the Strauss waltz, it was most pleasant to hear, and it would have been faultless had a little more swing and dash been given to it. It was finely read, but, for an undiscoverable reason, a portion of its subtle, nerve-thrilling essence had vanished, and the hearer forced himself to believe that he was under a spell to dance to it. When a Strauss waltz does not spontaneously arouse this feeling, the fault is not in the composer.

Of course, Mme. Melba was the particular attraction, and her mere appearance stirred the large audience into enthusiasm; but the delight she gave more than justified the anticipation. Her beautiful voice is under the guidance of a faultless method, and the music lover is sure to be rewarded with something more than mere technical excellence, vocal fireworks, lighted and exploded for their own sake. In the mad scene from "Lucia," Mme. Melba aroused the old enthusiasm. It was singing with a meaning in it; singing with warmth, passion, fine art and understanding. Her singing of the Arditi waltz song was equally satisfying, and she was compelled to repeat it in answer to the imperious enthusiasm of the audience. As another encore, Mme. Melba sang a song by Mr. Clayton Johns, and sang it without effect, and yet Mme. Melba is a great artist! This fact alone is sufficient to demonstrate the rare good-nature of the singer, and it should stimulate Mr. Clayton Johns to write a better song than that which Mme. Melba vainly attempted to immortalize. Mr. Molé's flute playing in the selection from the "Huguenots," and the obligato accompaniment to the "Lucia" scene were of the finest art quality, flawless in technique and rarely beautiful in tone and in feeling. It is to be hoped that more "extra popular" matinees will be given.

The Symphony Concert.

The following is the programme of the concert given last night in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony orchestra:

Overture "Don Giovanni".....Mozart.
Aria "Sweet Bird".....Handel.
Suite in D major op 113.....Lachner.
Mad Scene from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas.
Symphony No. 8.....Mendelssohn.

As will be seen there are no novelties in the programme, and yet the sitting and standing room of Music Hall was tested to its full capacity. The particular attraction of the evening was Mme. Melba; and it was curious to note how much deeper was the interest in the living artist, than in the works of the dead composers. The Mozart overture was simply a preparation for a special feast; the Lachner Suite a resting place for exhausted enthusiasm, and the Mendelssohn symphony so much tonic medicine to prepare the audience for facing the open air.

Hero or heroine worship is a marked characteristic of the music-lover, and in the majority of cases the worship of hero or heroine is confounded with the worship of music; the eyes not infrequently being used instead of the ears, curiosity taking the place of understanding. Carlyle would have found consolation in this fact, but from an art view-point it is somewhat discouraging. But then the love of abstract beauty of abstract art is the source of a musical Nile many have sought for and few found, and so the unfortunate majority are compelled to set up some stock or stone as a reminder, and vigorously worship it while waiting for a development of the imagination, which happy event is prophesied to occur ad Graecas kalendas. Handel in the meanwhile being confounded with his interpreter, and music with the visual impressions aroused by a pretty or ugly face and a fashionable evening robe.

Let it be hastily added, however, that Mme. Melba is an art idol worthy of the adoration she wins, she arises like an electric-charged, guiding and warning lighthouse in the fog-covered ocean of mediocrity. It immeasurably adds to her chances of art immortality that she is not a victim of technique; that this same technique has not crushed out her warmth, her understanding and her feelings, and congealed all her merits into a cold frozen trill. This is not entirely a figure of rhetoric; for example it would not be difficult to find singers who believe and practically illustrate the belief that Handel's "Sweet Bird" is a formal exercise in scale passages culminating in a flute-supported trill; a cold, dreary study for the development of the vocal chords and the burial of artistic feeling. Mme. Melba remembers that she is an artist as well as a singer, and yielding to the influence of the fiery composer, she treats us to something more valuable than a vocal iceberg. In the mad scene from "Hamlet" she reached a still higher point of excellence, rare technical skill was not wanting, but it was held sternly to its function as a means and not as the end. There were warmth, intensity of feeling, delicate contrasts, clear understanding and full expression. The skill was admirable, but it was used to intensify the emotion, and not displayed as a thing apart. The distinction cannot be too frequently or too strongly insisted on in an era of decadence wherein technique is assuming an importance that its inherent art worth will not warrant. Technique is all-important, but art exists in spite of it: it is the servant of art, and when it assumes the part of master, when it pretends that it is art, its folly should be unmasked. Mme. Melba's singing aroused a tempest of applause; she was recalled again and again, especially after the "Hamlet" selection, in which the great artist reached her highest point of excellence, an excellence that few have reached, and fewer still surpassed.

The programme for the next concert, which is to be given on Feb. 16, is: Overture, "Maid of Orleans," Strube; Concerto in G minor for pianoforte, Saint-Saëns; Brahm's Serenade, without violins, and Schubert's Overture, Series 2, No. 5. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach is soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 3, 1895.

Mme Melba, Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

There was the usual large attendance at the symphony concert last evening. Mme Melba was again the soloist, and she received a demonstratively cordial greeting. It was the third time that she had sung with this orchestra during the week, but her reappearance many more times would be most welcome.

She is unquestionably the foremost prima donna of the day, and the opportunity of hearing her in concert has been eagerly taken advantage of by many people whose means would not permit them to attend her performances in grand opera.

The program last evening was as follows:

Overture to Don Giovanni, Wolfgang Amadens Mozart
Scena, Sweet Bird that Shun'st the Noise of Folly, from L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato ....George Frederic Handel
(Flute obligato by Mr Charles Mole)
Suite No. 1, in D minor, op 113 .Franz Lachner
Ophelie's mad scene (act 4, scene 2), from Hamlet .....Ambrose Thomas
Symphony No. 4, in A major (Italian), op 90 .....Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy

Perhaps the highest compliment that can be paid Mme Melba is to state the fact that the oftener she is heard he greater is the pleasure derived from her singing. She was in superb voice last evening, and sang the beautiful Handel aria with exquisite effect. Her purity of tone, delicacy of phrasing, sentiment in expression and grace of execution were indescribably charming.

The brilliant scene and ballad from the opera "Hamlet" was also sung magnificently. It was given with more dramatic expression than generally characterizes the singing of this artist. Especially brilliant was her interpretation of the florid passages at the end of the ballad. The audience fairly rose to her in its enthusiasm after this number, and recalled the singer again and again.

The orchestral numbers were splendidly played, under Mr Paur's intelligent direction. The overture of Mozart's masterpiece, "Don Giovanni," was given a fine performance, and proved a very welcome selection. The Lachner suite was also listened to with much pleasure. The first movement is not particularly interesting, but the third, with its score of brilliant variations and its exquisite march, is an uncommonly entertaining writing. The playing of the violins was exceptionably good, in the long and exacting fugue of the last movement. The performance of the Mendelssohn symphony was generally praiseworthy, but certain passages, notably in the dance movement, have been given with better effect by Mr Paur's predecessors.

The orchestra will leave Boston this evening for a February itinerary, in the following cities: Philadelphia, Monday; Washington, Tuesday; Baltimore, Wednesday; New York, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday and Saturday.

The program for the rehearsal and concert, Feb 15 and 16, will be as follows:

Overture, Jungfrau von Orleans .....Strube
(First time)
Concerto for pianoforte in G minor .Saint-Saens
Serenade (without violins) .....Brahms
Overture in Italian style, series 2, No 5 Schubert

Soloist, Mrs H H A Beach

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Samstag, 2. Februar 1895.

Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Unter Mitwirkung der Sängerin Miß Lillian Blauvalt wird am nächsten Montage das berühmte Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur sein viertes Orchester in dieser Saison geben. Tickets für dasselbe sind bereits jetzt bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str., zu haben. Zum Vortrag gelangen Dvoraks neue Symphonie „Aus der Neuen Welt", Arie aus „Cid" von Massenet, Suite in D moll von Lachner, Arie aus Haydn's „Schöpfung" und Arie aus „Die verkaufte Braut" von Smetana.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 3, 1895.

THE WEEK'S GROUP OF CONCERTS—MME. MELBA, THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

The promise of hearing Melba sing from the "Huguenots," "Lucia" and the concert-waltzes of Arditi drew an enormous audience to Music Hall on Tuesday afternoon. The promise was bettered in fufilment, for the peerless vocalist doubled the number of her appearances by adding to the first song Mr. Clayton Johns's popular "I Love and the World is Mine," and by repeating the cadenza to Lucia's mad scene and the "Se saran Rose." She was in perfect voice and spirits, held the orchestra in complete accord with her, and sang as became herself, who is now probably the first and best of living vocalists. The concert in which she was the central figure was an extra of the Symphony series, the full band under Mr. Paur took part, and the audience included hundreds of the regular Friday and Saturday attendants. A delightfully gay, spirited and picturesque reading of the "Fra Diavolo" overture—not sounding much as it used to do when Tom Comer's little handful played it in the Museum!—began the afternoon, and an excellent performance of Thomas's "Mignon" overture ended it, while between these were placed the "Sylvia" ballet music, some light French things of the time, and a Strauss waltz, which came with all its lightness and swing from under Mr. Paur's baton, but wanted something of the gentle compulsion which an enlarged wooden wind force might have given it. The audience proved by its close attention that it enjoyed every number, but it reserved its plaudits for Mme. Melba, not forgetting however to award a generous and well merited share to Mr. Mole for his participation in the intricate graces of the two opera scenes.

Of the three orchestral numbers set down for the fourteenth Symphony programme neither was new, and two were familiar acquaintances long years ago. Of these two one was Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture, which, however well suited it is to its place as prologue to the opera, and however symmetrical and reasonable in construction, does not begin a concert with much cheer in fact or in promise. The men played it well enough, but without particular grace or distinction. The other was Mendelssohn's "Italian" overture, which was put at the other end of the programme. It began rather perfunctorily and heavily, and the andante moved none too sympathetically; but the saltarello in the last movement waked up the orchestra and Mr. Paur incited them to so much speed and sonority that he obtained the exciting effect with which he apparently seeks always to end his concerts. The other number was the first suite of Lachner—that in D minor, opus 113. From this were retrenched the second or minuet movement, and about one half of the more than twenty variations which make up the third movement. It would have been about as well if the fourth movement had been spared also. Not that it has no vigor and volume enough to follow the bright, keen and almost fascinating march (with a flavor of the "Rakoczy" in it) which ends the previous movement so enliveningly; but that the orchestra came almost to loggerheads in the figure with which it opens, a variance of about half a beat between two or three of the parts producing an ugly jolting uncertainty in the progression, which it took the conductor some time to straighten out. The first movement, however, was played with potent spirit and variations, particularly those into which one or another instrument entered as a soloist, were read with discrimination and diversity of color.

The effect of these instrumental numbers was illuminated and freshened by the exquisite vocalism of Mme. Melba, who sang the ever interesting "Sweet Bird" of Handel and the mad scene of Ophelia from the "Hamlet" of Ambroise Thomas. It is a pure joy to hear such music when it falls so naturally into the singer's voice and into such accord with her disposition that there is no suggestion of calculation or effort in the placing and floating of the tone and no sense of laborious training and mechanical study in the phrasing. The perfect ease and simple fluency of Mme. Melba's method and style delight the connoisseur as much as the finished and genial qualities of her voice captivate the uncritical but still discerning among her audience. But for a certain occasional thinness in the vowel E, due, possibly, to her much exercise in the French language, her tones might all pass as perfect in formation; albeit she sometimes shows a disposition to sharpen by a trifle the pitch of an already high note. She was again, as on Tuesday, in exact company with M. Mole's flute, and her rendering of the Ophelia music, if not impassioned, had certainly more feeling than we have found in some other singers when they have been praised for their warmth of tone and sentiment.

Next week will pass without a concert, but in the succeeding week this programme will be played: Overture, "Die Jungfrau von Orleans;" Strube, being the novelty of the programme; Saint-Saens G minor pianoforte concerto, with Mrs. Beach as the soloist; a Serenade, without violins, by Brahms, and Schubert's overture, "in Italian style," series 2, No. 5.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Freitag, 1. Februar 1895.

Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Unter Mitwirkung der Sängerin Miß Lillian Blauvalt wird am nächsten Montage das berühmte Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur sein viertes Orchester in dieser Saison geben. Tickets für dasselbe sind bereits jetzt bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str., zu haben. Zum Vortrag gelangen Dvoraks neue Symphonie „Aus der Neuen Welt", Arie aus „Cid" von Massenet, Suite in D moll von Lachner, Arie aus Haydn's „Schöpfung" und Arie aus „Die verkaufte Braut" von Smetana.

[89]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 4, 1895

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Field Night in Music Hall Caused by Mme. Melba's Appearance.

It was a field night on Saturday at Music Hall, and such an audience has rarely gathered, even at the symphony concerts. Undoubtedly it was Melba who caused the unwonted throng, but it was a most hopeful sign to note that it was not the singer alone, for there was no exodus after her singing was concluded, but standees and all remained to the very end of the symphony which followed her last number. If any proof were needed that Boston is advancing musically it could be found in this significant fact: and to this may be added the statement that the instrumental number which achieved the greatest popular success was a fugue!

The programme began with the Don Juan overture, which received a perfect performance. The clear-cut sonata-movement form which Mo art employed in his overtures never seems to interfere with a dramatic representation of emotions, and such works as the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," "The Magic Flute," or this present overture, ought always to stand as lessons to those young composers who think that they cannot express romance and emotion without first upsetting musical form. The work was technically difficult in Mozart's day; it is an easy task for the orchestra of the present.

The incomparable Melba followed this number. The greeting she received was courteous but not enthusiastic, for it was a symphony audience, not ready to bubble over at the outset, as is the case at the popular "miscellaneous" concert. Her opening aria was Handel's "Sweet Bird." Of all the numerous birds in the musical poultry yard, this is one of the best. Of course all these birds have flute accompaniment, and all possess a certain conventionality of floriture, but as this served to display the very best points of Mme. Melba's wonderful vocal technique, no one was disposed to carp at the artificiality of the musical construction. A year ago this sentence was printed in these columns,—"Not in this generation has better vocalization been heard than that which Melba conquered her audience at the matinee on Saturday. One can compare her only with Patti in her prime." The opinion can be reiterated today. The timbre of the voice is still as pure and delicate, the true voix blanche, the staccato effects are still as clear and crisp as the most exacting critic could wish, and the ease with which the passages in highest register are taken is phenomenal. In one point, however, a slight deterioration was noticeable, the trill, although rapid and flexible enough, was not true in intonation. This was brought the more into prominence because the flute obligato set the model which the voice imitated, and the flatting was marked. The aria, which has the conventional repetition of its whole first part at the close (how patient our forefathers were in the matter of "Da Capo"!) was ended by Melba with a D in alt which was pure as crystal, and evinced not the slightest effort. That Melba is the greatest coloratur singer of the world today is scarcely a matter of doubt. At the end of the aria the enthusiasm burst forth in a torrent. Recall followed recall and the ovation was deserved. Mr. Molé, who played the flute obligato, also deserved a share in the triumph. The number which Melba sang later in the concert was equally successful. It was the mad-scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." Mental alienation on the operatic stage is always attended with much vocal exibility. The symptoms are the same in the cases of Linda di Chamounix, Lucia di Lammermoor, Dinorah, and all the rest. When the disease sets in the prognosis may be given as follows: The hair will become loose and flow down the back; register very high, with a strong tendency to staccato; the patient will probably relapse into trilling every few minutes, and these attacks will leave the voice beating at over 700 notes to the minute; chromatics may supervene, and the case will probably culminate in great popular enthusiasm and floral tributes. All of these symptoms, except the flowing hair, were present in the attack of mania of Saturday, with the addition, as this was a case of French insanity, of strong reminiscences of "Io son Titania" from "Mignon." The number is frightfully unequal; at times there is a good degree of dramatic intensity, and a well-developed orchestral treatment, and at others the border-line of abject triviality is crossed. One does not enjoy a Frenchman's version of Shakespeare either upon the dramatic or operatic stage, and this setting is by that Thomas who turned the "Tempest" into a ballet, and caused Ferdinand and Miranda to dance all their love-scenes.

The introduction of a Swedish folk-song into the Danish subject was doubtless held to be good local coloring by Thomas, but he would have done better to have introduced the actual Shakesperian music into Ophelia's mad-scene, since it is still in existence, well-authenticated, and sung by Miss Terry whenever she appears in the character. Mme. Melba was at her best in this number, her trill was truer, her chromatic passages wonderful, her enunciation a model of clearness, and there was a breadth and power that one does not often get from a coloratur singer. The enthusiasm at the close knew no bounds and there were seven or eight recalls, but the rule against encores remained unbroken.

The orchestral numbers were not altogether eclipsed by this abnormal excitement. The excellent performance of the instrumental numbers was adequately recognized and Mr. Paur was forced to acknowledge the popular applause more than once. The suite in D minor by Lachner was a conspicuous success. Franz Lachner was the suite maker of modern times; in this field of orchestral work he had no rival, and this particular one in D minor is one of the strongest compositions in suite form which the world possesses. One may thank Mr. Paur, not only for bringing Franz Lachner upon the symphony programme of today, but for a performance that revealed all his solid worth. The execution of the Praeludium promised much, and the promise was well kept. The variations had many points of excellence, all the departments of the orchestra winning new laurels, especially the first violin and the clarinette. The counterpoint was clear in construction and equally clear in performance.

The March which followed is a blood relation of the march in Raff's "Lenore" symphony, at least in its first phrase, and it was given with a heartiness and swing popular response was emphatic. But the fugue was the great success of this work. What an attractive subject and what a showy countersubject it has! It reminds in its melodic construction of the subject which Bach used in his fugue in E flat (No. 1, second book of the "Well-tempered Clavichord") that fugue which so inspired Mozart that he took the fugato of his "Magic Flute" overture from it; not that Lachner's work follows the notes of the Bach number, but it has the melodic character, the moderate length, the general style of this subject. There has not been such orchestral fugue-playing in Boston for years as in this number; it was the perfection of balance and clearness, and everything up to the majesty of the coda was performed as if it had been upon a solo instrument. And to hear a vast audience growing enthusiastic over a fugue was almost to doubt one's senses.

For once the symphony came last on the programme. The Italian symphony by Mendelssohn would have been considered a very great work if he had not composed the Scotch. Clear shape, excellent development (especially of a most simple three-noted figure) and fine orchestration, are the merits of the first movement, but the second outweighs it because of its melodic directness. The chief theme of this slow movement is the perfection of a viola theme, for the viola is the instrument which best portrays brooding melancholy or pensive sadness, and these elements are in almost every measure here. Per contra the scherzo falls decidedly below the scherzo of the Scotch symphony, but its trio (there is no trio to the Scotch scherzo) is most beautiful; here the horns played better than we have heard them this season, and carried the movement to great success.

The final Saltarello was given with a delicacy and grace which Mr. Paur has not always received sufficient credit for. The violins deserve especial mention for the dainty manner in which they gave their rapid triplets, and the skipping character which forms so essential an element in the Saltarello was omnipresent. And thus ended one of the great musical successes of the present season.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE MUSICAL NEWS
A MONTHLY REVIEW OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS
VOL. I. NUMBER 5.
February, 1895.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 25, 1895.—The past month has been one of unusual activity in local musical circles. The most important event was the third of a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, January 9. It was advertised as a Wagnerian Feast, and truly it was—twelve numbers, the entire program, of the Bayreuth master's compositions. It was a daring thing to do, but it was done, and done successfully, which fact is a high commentary on the musical culture of Washington. Metzerott's Hall was packed with the elite of the city, and the attention and appreciation would have put to blush an entire audience of masters. The soloists on this occasion were Frl. Elsa Kutschera and Herr Anton Schott. It was Frl. Kutschera's first appearance in Washington, and the impression her powerful, full voiced soprano made was highly complimentary. Herr Schott is an old favorite here and never fails of an ovation whenever he appears. His rendition of Walther's Preislied from "Die Meistersinger" was magnificent; his masterful Wagnerian tenor voice was exhibited in wonderful brilliancy.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Overture to "Don Giovanni."
Handel: Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato."
Lachner: Three movements from Suite No. 1, in D minor, opus 113.
Thomas: Ophélie's Mad-Scene from "Hamlet."
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 4, in A major ("Italian"), opus 90.

Mme. Melba was the singer.

Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture is a work one does not often hear at concerts; and when one does hear it one wonders why it is so seldom played. To be sure, the overture, in its original form, ends out of the principal key, and with a half-cadence, at that—to connect it with the first number of the opera; and the faked-up ending in D major, written by we know not whom, which is usually played at concerts is trivial and unworthy of the rest of the work as possible. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why conductors fight so shy of the overture for concert purposes. It seems to us, however, that this objection is rather a trivial one nowadays. We are now so accustomed to things beginning in one key and ending in another that we could well tolerate this unacademic proceeding in a man like Mozart; why not give the overture in its true shape, soft final half-cadence and all? It would sound admirably well, and we should not lose that master-stroke, the sudden plunge of all the strings and wood-wind upon C-natural, against the resounding D's of the brass and kettle-drums, which is cut out in the present concert version. And, if the conductor's conscience should prick him too savagely for letting a piece begin in D minor and end in F major, he might salve the wound by letting the next number on the programme begin in F major. In truth, this overture is a masterpiece that one cannot afford to slight; it is a work of the finest genius throughout, and it were well to hear it oftener than we have for the last twenty years or so. It was admirably played last Saturday, with due delicacy, fire, and brilliancy. That little "laughing" of the first violins in the first theme requires, to be sure, the bowing of an Ysaÿe or a Thomson to do it full justice; but our excellent first violins did it better than one hears it done nine times out of ten. The alternation between legato and staccato might have been more strongly marked, but it was perceptible, as it was.

One wonders a little at Mr. Paur's making the selections he did from Lachner's once popular suite. The Praeludium and the closing fugue are the purest Kapellmeistermusik, and are dead as a door nail today; if we are to listen to purely contrapuntal writing, let it be by some great master who lived in a contrapuntal age, and wrote contrapuntally as he breathed—because he could not help it. What attempts men like Lachner made to keep the fugue form alive are really but so many nails in its coffin. Of all elements in music, ungarnished respectability is the most tiresome. In the Variations, on the other hand, there is much that is exceedingly beautiful; at some points in them the composer rises almost to the point of genius, and the March, too, is lively and pleasant to hear. Mr. Paur cut the Variations heroically, omitting also more than half of the March, together with the whole of the Trio. We should be sorry to see these Variations drop wholly out of the repertory; but we think it would be far better to give them as a number by themselves, with fewer cuts and with the March entire. The suite was excellently well played.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony is an old friend, whom one delights to meet and greet. Only in the slow movement do we find an occasional dull moment and a touch of the less genial side of Mendelssohn; but how beautifully and refreshingly that second theme comes in after the mournful crooning of the "Pilgrims' March." And, by the way, does the designation "Pilgrims' March," which used to be current, come from Mendelssohn himself or from some other poetically inclined person—suggested perhaps by the "Marche des Pélerins" in Berlioz's "Harold"? Then the Trio of the Minuet, with its interlocking horns and bassoons, is a stroke of genius like few. The symphony was admirably played and produced a superb impression. With works like these Mendelssohn can not die for good and all.

Mme. Melba was in splendid voice and fairly outdid herself. Both in Handel's "Sweet Bird," where she and Mr. Molé vied together in agility, beauty of tone and purity of intonation, and in the mad scene from Ambrose Thomas's "Hamlet," her singing was perfection itself and something more besides. What a peculiar piece of work that mad scene is, by the way! As a piece of literary and musical composition, it may long seek its fellow. It is by no means devoid of beauty, only one is tormented with the puzzling doubt, which was really the maddest of the lot poor Ophélie or M. Thomas or MM. Barbier & Carré? But about Mme. Melba's singing there is no doubt at all; it was superb at every point, the singing of a great artist.

Baltimore Life
BALTIMORE, MD., FEBRUARY 2, 1895

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts announced for the season will occur at Music Hall on Wednesday evening next. Director Paur has arranged an admirable program for the occasion. The chief orchestral number is the Symphony "From The New World" by Dr. Antoine Dvorak, the eminent Bohemian composer, a work which has created a most profound impression in New York and Boston because of its noble musical treatment of American melodies. It is the first great symphonic work composed in this country and it will be its first rendition here by the Boston Orchestra. Mr. T. Adamowski, who is to be the soloist at this concert, will perform Bruch's Violin Concerto in G minor, and the remainder of the program includes overture "Lenore No. 2," Beethoven's Symphonic Poem, Le Rouet d' Omphale" Saint Saens, and overture, "Carnival," "Romaine," Berloiz.

MADAME PAUR'S RECITAL.

Unusual interest is being evinced in our musical circles in the piano recital to be given by Mme. Emil Paur, at Sutro Hall, next Tuesday afternoon. Madame Paur is the wife of the distinguished director of the Boston Somphany Orchestra, and like him holds a solid position in the musical world of classic compositions. She is described as possessing unusual wealth of fancy, picturesqueness of imagination and delicacy of manipulation, and, although not claiming to be a star player, impresses all who hear with the accuracy of her work and original methods. Her recitals in New York, Brooklyn, Boston and some other cities, were attended by crowded and brilliant audiences, and the press criticisms passed upon her were of the most favoroble character. The programme of Madame Paur's recital here will be comprised of selections from the works of such composers of Chapin, Rubinstein, Mendelssohn, Schuman and others of like eminence, and the occasion will be one highly educational, enjoyable and instructive.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 4, 1895

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Field Night in Music Hall Caused by Mme. Melba's Appearance.

It was a field night on Saturday at Music Hall, and such an audience has rarely gathered, even at the symphony concerts. Undoubtedly it was Melba who caused the unwonted throng, but it was a most hopeful sign to note that it was not the singer alone, for there was no exodus after her singing was concluded, but standees and all remained to the very end of the symphony which followed her last number. If any proof were needed that Boston is advancing musically it could be found in this significant fact: and to this may be added the statement that the instrumental number which achieved the greatest popular success was a fugue!

The programme began with the Don Juan overture, which received a perfect performance. The clear-cut sonata-movement form which Mo art employed in his overtures never seems to interfere with a dramatic representation of emotions, and such works as the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," "The Magic Flute," or this present overture, ought always to stand as lessons to those young composers who think that they cannot express romance and emotion without first upsetting musical form. The work was technically difficult in Mozart's day; it is an easy task for the orchestra of the present.

The incomparable Melba followed this number. The greeting she received was courteous but not enthusiastic, for it was a symphony audience, not ready to b bole over at the outset, as is the case at the popular "miscellaneous" concert Her opening aria was Handel's "Sweet Bird." Of all the numerous birds in the musical poultry yard, this is one of the est. Of course all these birds have flute accompaniment, and all possess a certain conventionality of florriture, but as this served to display the very best points of Mme. Melba's wonderful vocal technique, no one was disposed to carp at the artificiality of the musical construction. A year ago this sentence was printed in these columns,—"Not in this generation has better vocalization been heard than that which Melba conquered her audience at the matinee on Saturday. One can compare her only with Patti in her prime." The opinion can be reiterated today. The timbre of the voice is still as pure and delicate, the true voix blanche, the staccato effects are still as clear and crisp as the most exacting critic could wish, and the ease with which the passages in highest register are taken is phenomenal. In one point, however, a slight deterioration was noticeable, the trill, although rapid and flexible enough, was not true in intonation. This was brought the more into prominence because the flute obbligato set the model which the voice imitated, and the flatting was marked. The aria, which has the conventional repetition of its whole first part at the close (how patient our forefathers were in the matter of "Da Capo"!) was ended by Melba with a D in alt which was pure as crystal, and evinced not the slightest effort. That Melba is the greatest coloratur singer of the world today is scarcely a matter of doubt. At the end of the aria the enthusiasm burst forth in a torrent. Recall followed recall and the ovation was deserved. Mr. Molé, who played the flute obbligato, also deserved a share in the triumph. The number which Melba sang later in the concert was equally successful. It was the mad-scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." Mental alienation on the operatic stage is always attended with much vocal exibility. The symptoms are the same in the cases of Linda di Chamounix, Lucia di Lammermoor, Dinorah, and all the rest. When the disease sets in the prognosis may be given as follows: The hair will become loose and flow down the back; register very high, with a strong tendency to staccato; the patient will probably relapse into trilling every few minutes, and these attacks will leave the voice beating at over 300 notes to the minute; chromatics may supervene, and the case will probably culminate in great popular enthusiasm and floral tributes. All of these symptoms, except the flowing hair, were present in the attack of mania of Saturday, with the addition, as this was a case of French insanity, of strong reminiscences of "Io son Titania" from "Mignon." The number is frightfully unequal; at times there is a good degree of dramatic intensity, and a well-developed orchestral treatment, and at others the border-line of abject triviality is crossed. One does not enjoy a Frenchman's version of Shakespeare either upon the dramatic or operatic stage, and this setting is by that Thomas who tur ed the "Tempest" into a ballet, and caused Ferdinand and Miranda to dance all their love-scenes.

The introduction of a Swedish folk-song into the Danish subject was doubtless held to be good local coloring by Thomas, but he would have done better to have introduced the actual Shakesperian music into Ophelia's mad-scene, since it is still in existence, well-authenticated, and sung by Miss Terry whenever she appears in the character. Mme. Melba was at her best in this number, her trill was truer, her chromatic passages wonderful, her enunciation a model of clearness, and there was a breadth and power that one does not often get from a coloratur singer. The enthusiasm at the close knew no bounds and there were seven or eight recalls, but the rule against encores remained unbroken.

The orchestral numbers were not altogether eclipsed by this abnormal excitement. The excellent performance of the instrumental numbers was adequately recognized and Mr. Paur was forced to acknowledge the popular applause more than once. The suite in D minor by Lachner was a conspicuous success. Franz Lachner was the suite maker of modern times; in this field of orchestral work he had no rival, and this particular one in D minor is one of the strongest compositions in suite form which the world possesses. One may thank Mr. Paur, not only for bringing Franz Lachner upon the symphony programme of today, but for a performance that revealed all his solid worth. The execution of the Praeludium promised much, and the promise was well kept. The variations had many points of excellence, all the departments of the orchestra winning new laurels, especially the first violin and the clarinette. The counterpoint was clear in construction and equally clear in performance.

The March which followed is a blood relation of the march in Raff's "Lenore" symphony, at least in its first phrase, and it was given with a heartiness and swing that carried every auditor along and the popular recognition was emphatic. But the fugue was the great success of this work. What an attractive subject and what a showy countersub ect it has!! It reminds in its melodic construction of the subject which Bach used in his fugue in E flat (No. 7, second book of the "Well-tempered Clavichord") that fugue which so inspired Mozart that he took the fugato of his "Magic Flute" overture from it; not that Lachner's work follows the notes of the Bach number, but it has the me odic character, the moderate length, the general style of t is subject. There has not been such orchestral fugue-playing in Boston for years as in this number; it was the perfection of balance and clearness, and everything up to the majesty of the coda was per ormed as if it had been upon a solo instrument. And to hear a vast audience growing enthusiastic over a fugue was almost to doubt one's senses.

For once the symphony came last on the programme. The Italian symphony by Mendelssohn would have been considered a very great work if he had not composed the Scotch. Clear shape, excellent development (especially of a most simple three-noted figure) and fine orchestration, are the merits of the first movement, but the second outweighs it because of its melodic directness. The chief theme of this slow movement is the perfection of a viola theme, for the viola is the i strument which best portrays brooding melancholy or pensive sadness, and these elements are in almost every measure he e. Per contra the scherzo falls decidedly below the scherzo of the Scotch symphony, but its trio (there is no trio to the Scotch scherzo) is most beautiful; here the horns played better than we have heard them this season, and carried the movement to great success.

The final Saltarello was given with a delicacy and grace which Mr. Paur has not always received sufficient cred t for. The violins deserve especial mention for the dainty manner in which they gave their rapid triplets, and the skipping c aracter which forms so essential an element in the Saltarello was omnipresent. And thus ended one of the great musical successes of the present season.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE MUSICAL NEWS
A MONTHLY REVIEW OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.
VOL. I. NUMBER 5.
February, 1895.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 25, 1895.—The past month has been one of unusual activity in local musical circles. The most important event was the third of a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, January 9. It was advertised as a Wagnerian Feast, and truly it was—twelve numbers, the entire program, of the Bayreuth master's compositions. It was a daring thing to do, but it was done, and done successfully, which fact is a high commentary on the musical culture of Washington. Metzerott's Hall was packed with the elite of the city, and the attention and appreciation would have put to blush an entire audience of masters. The soloists on this occasion were Frl. Elsa Kutschera and Herr Anton Schott. It was Frl. Kutschera's first appearance in Washington, and the impression her powerful, full voiced soprano made was highly complimentary. Herr Schott is an old favorite here and never fails of an ovation whenever he appears. His rendition of Walther's Preislied from "Die Meistersinger" was magnificent; his masterful Wagnerian tenor voice was exhibited in wonderful brilliancy.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Overture to "Don Giovanni."
Handel: Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato."
Lachner: Three movements from Suite No. 1, in D minor, opus 113.
Thomas: Ophélie's Mad-Scene from "Hamlet."
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 4, in A major ("Italian"), opus 90.

Mme. Melba was the singer.

Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture is a work one does not often hear at concerts; and when one does hear it one wonders why it is so seldom played. To be sure, the overture, in its original form, ends out of the principal key, and with a half-cadence, at that—to connect it with the first number of the opera; and the faked-up ending in D major, written by we know not whom, which is usually played at concerts is trivial and unworthy of the rest of the work as possible. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why conductors fight so shy of the overture for concert purposes. It seems to us, however, that this objection is rather a trivial one nowadays. We are now so accustomed to things beginning in one key and ending in another that we could well tolerate this unacademic proceeding in a man like Mozart; why not give the overture in its true shape, soft final half-cadence and all? It would sound admirably well, and we should not lose that master-stroke, the sudden plunge of all the strings and wood-wind upon C-natural, against the resounding D's of the brass and kettle-drums, which is cut out in the present concert version. And, if the conductor's conscience should prick him too savagely for letting a piece begin in D minor and end in F major, he might salve the wound by letting the next number on the programme begin in F major. In truth, this overture is a masterpiece that one cannot afford to slight; it is a work of the finest genius throughout, and it were well to hear it oftener than we have for the last twenty years or so. It was admirably played last Saturday, with due delicacy, fire, and brilliancy. That little "laughing" of the first violins in the first theme requires, to be sure, the bowing of an Ysaÿe or a Thomson to do it full justice; but our excellent first violins did it better than one hears it done nine times out of ten. The alternation between legato and staccato might have been more strongly marked, but it was perceptible, as it was.

One wonders a little at Mr. Paur's making the selections he did from Lachner's once popular suite. The Praeludium and the closing fugue are the purest Kapellmeistermusik, and are dead as a door nail today; if we are to listen to purely contrapuntal writing, let it be by some great master who lived in a contrapuntal age, and wrote contrapuntally as he breathed—because he could not help it. What attempts men like Lachner made to keep the fugue form alive are really but so many nails in its coffin. Of all elements in music, ungarnished respectability is the most tiresome. In the Variations, on the other hand, there is much that is exceedingly beautiful; at some points in them the composer rises almost to the point of genius, and the March, too, is lively and pleasant to hear. Mr. Paur cut the Variations heroically, omitting also more than half of the March, together with the whole of the Trio. We should be sorry to see these Variations drop wholly out of the repertory; but we think it would be far better to give them as a number by themselves, with fewer cuts and with the March entire. The suite was excellently well played.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony is an old friend, whom one delights to meet and greet. Only in the slow movement do we find an occasional dull moment and a touch of the less genial side of Mendelssohn; but how beautifully and refreshingly that second theme comes in after the mournful crooning of the "Pilgrims' March." And, by the way, does the designation "Pilgrims' March," which used to be current, come from Mendelssohn himself or from some other poetically inclined person—suggested perhaps by the "Marche des Pélerins" in Berlioz's "Harold"? Then the Trio of the Minuet, with its interlocking horns and bassoons, is a stroke of genius like few. The symphony was admirably played and produced a superb impression. With works like these Mendelssohn can not die for good and all.

Mme. Melba was in splendid voice and fairly outdid herself. Both in Handel's "Sweet Bird," where she and Mr. Molé vied together in agility, beauty of tone and purity of intonation, and in the mad scene from Ambrose Thomas's "Hamlet," her singing was perfection itself and something more besides. What a peculiar piece of work that mad scene is, by the way! As a piece of literary and musical composition, it may long seek its fellow. It is by no means devoid of beauty, only one is tormented with the puzzling doubt, which was really the maddest of the lot poor Ophélie or M. Thomas or MM. Barbier & Carré? But about Mme. Melba's singing there is no doubt at all; it was superb at every point, the singing of a great artist.

Baltimore Life
BALTIMORE, MD., FEBRUARY 2, 1895

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts announced for the season will occur at Music Hall on Wednesday evening next. Director Paur has arranged an admirable program for the occasion. The chief orchestral number is the Symphony "From The New World" by Dr. Antoine Dvorak, the eminent Bohemian composer, a work which has created a most profound impression in New York and Boston because of its noble musical treatment of American melodies. It is the first great symphonic work composed in this country and it will be its first rendition here by the Boston Orchestra. Mr. T. Adamowski, who is to be the soloist at this concert, will perform Bruch's Violin Concerto in G minor, and the remainder of the program includes overture "Lenore No. 2," Beethoven's Symphonic Poem, Le Rouet d' Omphale" Saint Seans, and overture, "Carnival," "Romaine," Berloiz.

MADAME PAUR'S RECITAL.

Unusual interest is being evinced in our musical circles in the piano recital to be given by Mme. Emil Paur, at Sutro Hall, next Tuesday afternoon. Madame Paur is the wife of the distinguished director of the Boston Somphany Orchestra, and like him holds a solid position in the musical world of classic compositions. She is described as possessing unusual wealth of fancy, picturesqueness of imagination and delicacy of manipulation, and, although not claiming to be a star player, impresses all who hear with the accuracy of her work and original methods. Her recitals in New York, Brooklyn, Boston and some other cities, were attended by crowded and brilliant audiences, and the press criticisms passed upon her were of the most favoroble character. The programme of Madame Paur's recital here will be comprised of selections from the works of such composers of Chapin, Rubinstein, Mendelssohn, Schuman and others of like eminence, and the occasion will be one highly educational, enjoyable and instructive.

...ESS.—TUESDAY

...UARY 5, 1895

...STON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

...vorak's Symphony from the Folk Song of the New World.

The fourth concert of the Boston Sym... Orchestra last night at the ...demy of Music followed in excellence ...se which have been already heard ...e.

The programme was an interesting one ...nd ingeniously constructed, resembling a wreath in which the exotic Slavonic dominated the beginning, re-echoed at the end, and was held together and supported in the middle by the strict fugal German form of the Lachner suite, lightened and varied by Handel's eternally beautiful "With Verdure Clad" and the fine aria from Massenet's "Cid."

The novelty and the piece of the evening around which the others were grouped was Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in E Minor, "From the New World," which he has composed since he arrived in this country, and in which he seeks to express a national American music. With the comprehension of genius, he has sought and found his inspiration in the only, primeval, world music this country has, touching in its depths the foundation of all music, to expression of the emotions. The master has blended the airs together in such ...utiful modern form that no one is ...e to recognize a special air, ...t the feeling remains of all the airs in ...e. The larghetto was particularly ...essing and held the audience spellbound with the delicate pathos of certain movements. Miss Blauvelt, who has had all her training at the Conservatory in New York, gave great satisfaction with her numbers and was recalled five or six times as an assurance of the pleasure she had given. Her voice is of sweet, fine quality, and it led the orchestra in quite a remarkable way in some strains of the Massenet aria. She has an overplus of tremolo, which amounts at times to a shiver, in her sustained notes, but in passages where her voice was forced to pass more rapidly it was clear and bell-like, showing that this defect of her otherwise fine training could be removed.

Mr. Paur has established himself in Philadelphia as a successful leader and programme-maker, to judge from the applause which greeted him at the beginning and end of the concert.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Delightful Program at the Academy Last Night.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night was one of the most delightful of the season. The program included Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Lachner's suite in D minor, and Smetana's overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut" for orchestra, and Massenet's aria "Pleurez mes yeux," from "Le Cid," and "With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation," sung by Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.

The Dvorak symphony grows on one by repetition. The production last night with a larger orchestra, and one admirably adapted to its style, served to confirm what was said in these columns on the occasion of its first production here last fall. While strictly symphonic in general outlines, the introduction at times of irrelevant themes for bizarre effect weakens the unity of the composition. It is, however, replete with musical beauty, and though the themes are largely superficial, they are worked out in excellent style, and in spite of the florid character of much of it there is much that is substantial, and it is likely to be a permanent addition to works of its class. Negro melodies and Indian dances are scarcely themes for a symphony which should characterize the best presentation of the Western world, but the symphony is not intended to be fundamental in its descriptions, and as far as is goes, it is quite satisfactory.

The Lachner suite grew in interest from the start, the march being spirited and the fugue a masterly piece of work. It is some years since this work, so varied in its scope, has been produced here, and its former popularity seems entirely justified. The overture was played with spirit.

Mme. Blauvelt was in excellent voice and received deserved applause. The aria from "The Creation" was sung unusually well.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 5, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The leading feature at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music was Dvorak's symphony in E minor, "From the New World," which has already been heard here this season, but which it was interesting to hear again. The rehearing does not materially change the opinion already expressed of it, that it contains some very beautiful music, written with large knowledge and bright invention, though it neither gains nor loses in interest or value from the title or from Dr. Dvorak's labored explanation of it. The themes are avowedly and obviously suggested from what we recognize as "plantation melodies," but their treatment in the symphony, except where it is intentionally "descriptive," bears no relation to anything characteristic either of the plantation or of America. It is at least as much Bohemian as American. And so thought to be. The character of a composition is not determined by its themes, but by the artistic personality of the composer, and it is not as American or as Bohemian that we are to consider this symphony, but as music. It was admirably played, and Mr. Paur made the most ...of its varied effects. A suite by Lachner ...overture by Smetana, who was the master ...Dvorak, were included in the programme. ...Miss Blauvelt sang the familiar aria from ..."Cid" and the perenniel "With Verdure

...ruary ...

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The so-called "American Symphony" of the brilliant, but erratic, Antoun Dvorak was the principal feature of the programme presented last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This was the second performance of this much-discussed work in Philadelphia, and, although the interpretation of Leader Paur was in a measure an improvement upon that of Seidl, it cannot be said that the composition improves to any great degree upon further acquaintance. In fact, the second hearing caused its defects to be more obtrusive than they were in the first, although it cannot be denied that the Symphony possesses many real beauties, that it is brilliantly arranged in many passages, while the "Scherzo" is in Dvorak's happiest and most effective vein. That he has sufficiently idealized the plantation melody to make his effort a noteworthy one may be regarded as a fact; but to offer the symphony, in its entirety, as a fitting embodiment of that which is characteristically American in music must surely open Dvorak to the charge of being considered somewhat audacious. But the interpretation, and not the symphony itself, was under consideration last night, and the orchestra certainly played with rare spirit, precision and effect. It was an instrumental treat. The intricate scoring presented no difficulties which were not overcome, while all the peculiar Dvorak "colorings" were given in a manner that would surely have won the approval of the composer himself if he had been present. The soloist of the evening was that charming singer, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, whose unusually sweet and admirably-trained voice was heard to great advantage in a selection from "Le Cid," and in "With Verdure Clad," from Hadyn's "Creation." Miss Blauvelt sings with uncommon accuracy and with rare expression. Both her numbers were enthusiastically applauded. The orchestra gave great delight by a particularly effective performance of Lachner's suite in D minor, and the concert closed with the exuberant musical fireworks of the Smetana overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut."

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1895.

The Symphony orchestra, assisted by Mrs. Melba, gave a popular matinée on the 29th ult, in Music Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Aria from "Les Huguenots".....Meyerbeer
Mrs. Melba.
Ballet Music, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Mad scene from "Lucia".....Donizetti
Mrs. Melba.
(Flute obligato, Mr. Mole.)
Entr'acte from "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Scherzo (new, first time).....Goldmark
Song, "Se seran Rose".....Arditi
Mrs. Melba.
Waltz, "Southern Roses".....Joh. Strauss
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomes

There was a great audience that listened with comparative coolness to the orchestral selections, although they were for the most part finely played, and waxed enthusiastic over Melba. Even popular, unpretentious concerts are considered severely by some of our alleged music lovers. Witness the case of the Boston "Advertiser," whose reviewer, in Mr. Elson's absence, rebuked sternly the "flippancy" of poor Delibe's "Sylvia." "O unfortunate, O sudden and unexpected ill; what contrarious accident, what squinteyed starre is it that hath robbed this Gentleman of his wonted mirth? and not of that alone, but of it (which is worse) his wits?"

Perhaps you do not care for the overture to "Fra Diavolo." But it brings back to me agreeable recollections of the opera, of dashing bandits, of Zerlinas that have ravished the vision by undressing as they thought themselves alone. Was it not that ineffable prig, Mendelssohn, who objected to dear, charming Zerlina's song, "Oui, c'es demain"? Alas, I have not seen "Fra Diavolo" for a dozen years, when your old friend, Gudehus, played the "Marquis bandit" in Dresden. Even now I hear him in the quintet in the first act, where he exults in the presence of "la charmante Milady."

Would that they gave now those operas grave and gay that delighted famous men and our fathers that begot us. But the circumstances attending should be fit. "Don Giovanni" should be played in a theatre no larger than our Park, with a small orchestra, and you so near the stage, my dear Mrs. Porphyry, that you feel the magnetic influence of the rake-helly Don and sigh because Mr. Porphyry is bald and given to long stories about commercial projects. Nothing is more dreary, more desolate, more sleep-compelling than a respectable performance of this opera by Mozart in a vast room.

Do you remember how Thackeray once wrote about music in "The Newcomes"? Articles have been strung together about "Browning and Music" and "Walt Whitman and Music." There is a formidable book, "Ruskin on Music" which suggests Ruskin sitting on the great majority of music; how would "I Pagliacci" or "Mala Vita" hit him? Thackeray describes young Ridley, a sickly lad of eighteen, listening in a little room, to a little old woman playing under a gas lamp on the jingling keys of an old piano.

As she plays "Don Juan" Zerlina comes tripping over the meadows, and "Masetto" after her, with a crowd of peasants and maidens, and they sing the sweetest of all music, and the heart beats with happiness, and kindness and pleasure. Piano, pianissimo! the city is hushed. The towers of the great cathedral rise in the distance, its spires lighted by the broad moon. The statues in the moonlit place cast long shadows athwart the pavement; but the fountain in the midst is dressed out like "Cinderella" for the night, and sings and wears a crest of diamonds. That great sombre street * * * . It is Fancy street—Poetry street—Imagination street—the street where lovely ladies look from balconies, where cavaliers strike mandolins and draw swords and engage; where long processions pass, and venerable hermits with long beards bless the kneeling people; where the rude soldiery, swaggering through the place with flags and halberts, and fife and dance, seize the slim waists of the daughters of the people, and bid the pifferari play to their dancing. Blow, bagpipes, a storm of harmony! become trumpets, trombones, ophicleides, fiddles and bassoons! Fire, guns! Sound, tocsins! Shout, people! Louder, shriller and sweeter than all, sing, thou ravishing heroine! And see, on his cream colored charger "Massaniello" prances in, and "Fra Diavolo" leaps down the balcony, carabine in hand, and "Sir Huon of Bordeaux" sails up to the quay with the "Sultan's daughter of Babylon."

I suppose our friend Mr. Howells would call this all poor stuff and shake his head.

The scherzo by Goldmark was not played perhaps with the conviction that is the result of indefatigable rehearsal, and yet the impression made was that the piece was not altogether worthy of such rehearsal. Certainly the scherzo seemed a rather cumbrous machine. The suite from "Sylvia" was played superbly. The waltz by Strauss was without the peculiar Straussian pulse.

Melba was heard to best advantage in the waltz by Arditi, although in portions of the scene from "Lucia" she displayed brilliantly her voice and art. After the air from "The Huguenots," the air of "Marguerite de Valois," which was comparatively ineffective, she was applauded loudly, and she sang a song by Mr. Clayton Johns, of Boston, Mass.

Why did she sing this song by Mr. Johns? Several reasons are given. Some say that one night in Paris she awoke suddenly from sound sleep and, striking the headboard with clenched fist, cried aloud, "My fame is not complete until I sing a song by Mr. Johns in Boston." I find it difficult to believe this rumor. Nor am I wholly persuaded to share the opinion of those who say that Melba is so infatuated with the song itself that she proposes to introduce it in "Semiramide."

If she does thus enlarge that terrible opera, I hope she will practice the song diligently so that she can make an effect with it. Others say that as Mr. Adamowski is to Melba, so is Mr. Johns to Mr. Adamowski; hence the singing of the song. But I suppose the simple explanation is this: Mr. Adamowski probably said, "Johns is a nice fellow and he writes songs. It would please him beyond measure if you sang one of them." And Melba in her infinite good nature sang one. But oh delightful singer, woman that makest credible to the people of these degenerate days the tales told of Italian singers of the golden age, the inhabitants of Boston and suburban towns did not crowd Music Hall to hear you sing that artless ditty!

* * *

The program of the fourteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Don Giovanni".....Mozart
"Sweet Bird".....Händel
Mrs. Melba.
Suite No. 1, D minor.....Lachner
"Ophelia's" mad scene, "Hamlet".....Thomas
Mrs. Melba.
Symphony No. 4, A major.....Mendelssohn

So far as the orchestral numbers were concerned the concert was comparatively dull. The overture to "Don Giovanni" is an ineffective concert number, and the "Italian" symphony provokes only moderate rapture. Mr. Paur omitted the second movement of Lachner's suite and several of the variations. The other variations were played brilliantly enough, but there was roughness at the beginning of the fugue. A masterly piece of work this same fugue, and a good deal of a bore. Yet one cannot but respect the contrapuntal facility of the composer and his grave and serious purpose.

Melba was in excellent voice and her performance deserved the uproarious applause as well as the apparently innumerable recalls that followed. I prefer the madness of Lucia to that of Ophelia, the daughter of Polonius and the Lady Anne, the poor girl "fished out of the sluice," as Jules Laforgue has it. Without the landscape and the dancing peasants the music of Thomas seems cold and insincere.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will give the last concert but one of its series at the Metropolitan Opera House next Thursday evening. A notable feature will be a concerto for violoncello composed by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, a member of the orchestra, several of whose works have been performed with success in Boston this season. The program is as follows: Symphony in F major, No. 8, Beethoven; aria, "O, ruddier than the cherry," from "Acis and Galatea," Händel; concerto for violoncello, Loeffler; aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; overture, "Carneval," Dvorák. Mr. Watkin Mills, the English baritone, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, will be the solo artists.

Melba sang in Boston last week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall and drew one of the largest houses of the season, long before the beginning of the concert the "standing room only" sign being displayed. Melba has received a number of offers to appear in concerts all over the country, but her previous engagements prevent her from accepting any. The great prima donna will sail for Europe at the close of the opera season. She has made arrangements to appear in London with the Sir Augustus Harris Opera Company early in May.

THE PHILADELPHIA PRESS.—TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1895

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

Dvorak's Symphony from the Folk Song of the New World.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music followed in excellence those which have been already heard here.

The programme was an interesting one and ingeniously constructed, resembling a wreath in which the exotic Slavonic dominated the beginning, re-echoed at the end, and was held together and supported in the middle by the strict fugal German form of the Lachner suite, lightened and varied by Handel's eternally beautiful "With Verdure Clad" and the fine aria from Massenet's "Cid."

The novelty and the piece of the evening around which the others were grouped was Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in E Minor, "From the New World," which he has composed since he arrived in this country, and in which he seeks to express a national American music. With the comprehension of genius, he has sought and found his inspiration in the only, primeval, world music this country has, touching in its depths the foundation of all music, to expression of the emotions. The master has blended the airs together in such skillful modern form that no one is able to recognize a special air, but the feeling remains of all the airs in one. The larghetto was particularly pleasing and held the audience spellbound with the delicate pathos of certain movements. Miss Blauvelt, who has had all her training at the Conservatory in New York, gave great satisfaction with her numbers and was recalled five or six times as an assurance of the pleasure she had given. Her voice is of sweet, fine quality, and it led the orchestra in quite a remarkable way in some strains of the Massenet aria. She has an overplus of tremolo, which amounts at times to a shiver, in her sustained notes, but in passages where her voice was forced to pass more rapidly it was clear and bell-like, showing that this defect of her otherwise fine training could be removed.

Mr. Pauer has established himself in Philadelphia as a successful leader and programme-maker, to judge from the applause which greeted him at the beginning and end of the concert.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Delightful Program at the Academy Last Night.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night was one of the most delightful of the season. The program included Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Lachner's suite in D minor, and Smetana's overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut" for orchestra, and Massenet's aria "Pleurez mes yeux," from "Le Cid," and "With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation," sung by Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.

The Dvorak symphony grows on one by repetition. The production last night with a larger orchestra, and one admirably adapted to its style, served to confirm what was said in these columns on the occasion of its first prduction here last fall. While strictly symphonic in general outlines, the introduction at times of irrelevant themes for bizarre effect weakens the unity of the composition. It is, however, replete with musical beauty, and though the themes are largely superficial, they are worked out in excellent style, and in spite of the florid character of much of it there is much that is substantial, and it is likely to be a permanent addition to works of its class. Negro melodies and Indian dances are scarcely themes for a symphony which should characterize the best presentation of the Western world, but the symphony is not intended to be fundamental in its descriptions, and as far as is goes, it is quite satisfactory.

The Lachner suite grew in interest from the start, the march being spirited and the fugue a masterly piece of work. It is some years since this work, so varied in its scope, has been produced here, and its former popularity seems entirely justified. The overture was played with spirit.

Mme. Blauvelt was in excellent voice and received deserved applause. The aria from "The Creation" was sung unusually well.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 5, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The leading feature at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music was Dvorak's symphony in E minor, "From the New World," which has already been heard here this season, but which it was interesting to hear again. The rehearing does not materially change the opinion already expressed of it, that it contains some very beautiful music, written with large knowledge and bright invention, though it neither gains nor loses in interest or value from the title or from Dr. Dvorak's labored explanation of it. The themes are avowedly and obviously imitated from what we recognize as "plantation melodies," but their treatment in the symphony, except where it is intentionally "descriptive," bears no relation to anything characteristic either of the plantation or of America. It is at least as much Bohemian as American. And so it ought to be. The character of a composition is not determined by its themes, but by the artistic personality of the composer, and it is not as American or as Bohemian that we are to consider this symphony, but as music. It was admirably played, and Mr. Paur made the most possible of its varied effects. A suite by Lachner and an overture by Smetana, who was the master of Dvorak, were included in the programme, and Miss Blauvelt sang the familiar aria from "Le Cid" and the perenniel "With Verdure

---

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, February 5, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The so-called "American Symphony" of the brilliant, but erratic, Antonin Dvorak was the principal feature of the programme presented last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This was the second performance of this much-discussed work in Philadelphia, and, although the interpretation of Leader Paur was in a measure an improvement upon that of Seidl, it cannot be said that the composition improves to any great degree upon further acquaintance. In fact, the second hearing caused its defects to be more obtrusive than they were in the first, although it cannot be denied that the Symphony possesses many real beauties, that it is brilliantly arranged in many passages, while the "Scherzo" is in Dvorak's happiest and most effective vein. That he has sufficiently idealized the plantation melody to make his effort a noteworthy one may be regarded as a fact; but to offer the symphony, in its entirety, as a fitting embodiment of that which is characteristically American in music must surely open Dvorak to the charge of being considered somewhat audacious. But the interpretation, and not the symphony itself, was under consideration last night, and the orchestra certainly played with rare spirit, precision and effect. It was an instrumental treat. The intricate scoring presented no difficulties which were not overcome, while all the peculiar Dvorak "colorings" were given in a manner that would surely have won the approval of the composer himself if he had been present. The soloist of the evening was that charming singer, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, whose unusually sweet and admirably-trained voice was heard to great advantage in a selection from "Le Cid," and in "With Verdure Clad," from Hadyn's "Creation." Miss Blauvelt sings with uncommon accuracy and with rare expression. Both her numbers were enthusiastically applauded. The orchestra gave great delight by a particularly effective performance of Lachner's suite in D minor, and the concert closed with the exuberant musical fireworks of the Smetana overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut."

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1895.

The Symphony orchestra, assisted by Mrs. Melba, gave a popular matinée on the 29th ult, in Music Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture, "Fra Diavolo"..... Auber
Aria from "Les Huguenots"..... Meyerbeer
Mrs. Melba.
Ballet Music, "Sylvia"..... Delibes
Mad scene from "Lucia"..... Donizetti
Mrs. Melba.
(Flute obligato, Mr. Mole.)
Entr'acte from "Gwendoline"..... Chabrier
Scherzo (new, first time)..... Goldmark
Song, "Se seran Rose"..... Arditi
Mrs. Melba.
Waltz, "Southern Roses"..... Joh. Strauss
Overture, "Mignon"..... Thomes

There was a great audience that listened with comparative coolness to the orchestral selections, although they were for the most part finely played, and waxed enthusiastic over Melba. Even popular, unpretentious concerts are considered severely by some of our alleged music lovers. Witness the case of the Boston "Advertiser," whose reviewer, in Mr. Elson's absence, rebuked sternly the "flippancy" of poor Delibe's "Sylvia." "O unfortunate, O sudden and unexpected ill; what contrarious accident, what squinteyd starre is it that hath robbed this Gentleman of his wonted mirth? and not of that alone, but of it (which is worse) his wits?"

Perhaps you do not care for the overture to "Fra Diavolo." But it brings back to me agreeable recollections of the opera, of dashing bandits, of Zerlinas that have ravished the vision by undressing as they thought themselves alone. Was it not that ineffable prig, Mendelssohn, who objected to dear, charming Zerlina's song, "Oui, c'es demain"? Alas, I have not seen "Fra Diavolo" for a dozen years, when your old friend, Gudehus, played the "Marquis bandit" in Dresden. Even now I hear him in the quintet in the first act, where he exults in the presence of "la charmante Milady."

Would that they gave now those operas grave and gay that delighted famous men and our fathers that begot us. But the circumstances attending should be fit. "Don Giovanni" should be played in a theatre no larger than our Park, with a small orchestra, and you so near the stage, my dear Mrs. Porphyry, that you feel the magnetic influence of the rake-helly Don and sigh because Mr. Porphyry is bald and given to long stories about commercial projects. Nothing is more dreary, more desolate, more sleep-compelling than a respectable performance of this opera by Mozart in a vast room.

Do you remember how Thackeray once wrote about music in "The Newcomes"? Articles have been strung together about "Browning and Music" and "Walt Whitman and Music." There is a formidable book, "Ruskin on Music" which suggests Ruskin sitting on the great majority of music; how would "I Pagliacci" or "Mala Vita" hit him? Thackeray describes young Ridley, a sickly lad of eighteen, listening in a little room, to a little old woman playing under a gas lamp on the jingling keys of an old piano.

As she plays "Don Juan" Zerlina comes tripping over the meadows, and "Masetto" after her, with a crowd of peasants and maidens, and they sing the sweetest of all music, and the heart beats with happiness, and kindness and pleasure. Piano, pianissimo! the city is hushed. The towers of the great cathedral rise in the distance, its spires lighted by the broad moon. The statues in the moonlit place cast long shadows athwart the pavement; but the fountain in the midst is dressed out like "Cinderella" for the night, and sings and wears a crest of diamonds. That great sombre street * * * . It is Fancy street—Poetry street—Imagination street—the street where lovely ladies look from balconies, where cavaliers strike mandolins and draw swords and engage; where long processions pass, and venerable hermits with long beards bless the kneeling people; where the rude soldiery, swaggering through the place with flags and halberts, and fife and dance, seize the slim waists of the daughters of the people, and bid the pifferari play to their dancing. Blow, bagpipes, a storm of harmony! become trumpets, trombones, ophicleides, fiddles and bassoons! Fire, guns! Sound, tocsins! Shout, people! Louder, shriller and sweeter than all, sing, thou ravishing heroine! And see, on his cream colored charger "Massaniello" prances in, and "Fra Diavolo" leaps down the balcony, carabine in hand, and "Sir Huon of Bordeaux" sails up to the quay with the "Sultan's daughter of Babylon."

I suppose our friend Mr. Howells would call this all poor stuff and shake his head.

The scherzo by Goldmark was not played perhaps with the conviction that is the result of indefatigable rehearsal, and yet the impression made was that the piece was not altogether worthy of such rehearsal. Certainly the scherzo seemed a rather cumbrous machine. The suite from "Sylvia" was played superbly. The waltz by Strauss was without the peculiar Straussian pulse.

Melba was heard to best advantage in the waltz by Arditi, although in portions of the scene from "Lucia" she displayed brilliantly her voice and art. After the air from "The Huguenots," the air of "Marguerite de Valois," which was comparatively ineffective, she was applauded loudly, and she sang a song by Mr. Clayton Johns, of Boston, Mass.

Why did she sing this song by Mr. Johns? Several reasons are given. Some say that one night in Paris she awoke suddenly from sound sleep and, striking the headboard with clenched fist, cried aloud, "My fame is not complete until I sing a song by Mr. Johns in Boston." I find it difficult to believe this rumor. Nor am I wholly persuaded to share the opinion of those who say that Melba is so infatuated with the song itself that she proposes to introduce it in "Semiramide."

If she does thus enlarge that terrible opera, I hope she will practice the song diligently so that she can make an effect with it. Others say that as Mr. Adamowski is to Melba, so is Mr. Johns to Mr. Adamowski; hence the singing of the song. But I suppose the simple explanation is this: Mr. Adamowski probably said, "Johns is a nice fellow and he writes songs. It would please him beyond measure if you sang one of them." And Melba in her infinite good nature sang one. But oh delightful singer, woman that makest credible to the people of these degenerate days the tales told of Italian singers of the golden age, the inhabitants of Boston and suburban towns did not crowd Music Hall to hear you sing that artless ditty!

* * *

The program of the fourteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Don Giovanni"..... Mozart
"Sweet Bird"..... Händel
Mrs. Melba.
Suite No. 1, D minor..... Lachner
"Ophelia's" mad scene, "Hamlet"..... Thomas
Mrs. Melba.
Symphony No. 4, A major..... Mendelssohn

So far as the orchestral numbers were concerned the concert was comparatively dull. The overture to "Don Giovanni" is an ineffective concert number, and the "Italian" symphony provokes only moderate rapture. Mr. Paur omitted the second movement of Lachner's suite and several of the variations. The other variations were played brilliantly enough, but there was roughness at the beginning of the fugue. A masterly piece of work this same fugue, and a good deal of a bore. Yet one cannot but respect the contrapuntal facility of the composer and his grave and serious purpose.

Melba was in excellent voice and her performance deserved the uproarious applause as well as the apparently innumerable recalls that followed. I prefer the madness of Lucia to that of Ophelia, the daughter of Polonius and the Lady Anne, the poor girl "fished out of the sluice," as Jules Laforgue has it. Without the landscape and the dancing peasants the music of Thomas seems cold and insincere.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will give the last concert but one of its series at the Metropolitan Opera House next Thursday evening. A notable feature will be a concerto for violoncello composed by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, a member of the orchestra, several of whose works have been performed with success in Boston this season. The program is as follows: Symphony in F major, No. 8, Beethoven; aria, "O, ruddier than the cherry," from "Acis and Galatea," Händel; concerto for violoncello, Loeffler; aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; overture, "Carneval," Dvorák. Mr. Watkin Mills, the English baritone, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, will be the solo artists.

Melba sang in Boston last week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall and drew one of the largest houses of the season, long before the beginning of the concert the "standing room only" sign being displayed. Melba has received a number of offers to appear in concerts all over the country, but her previous engagements prevent her from accepting any. The great prima donna will sail for Europe at the close of the opera season. She has made arrangements to appear in London with the Sir Augustus Harris Opera Company early in May.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 9, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place at the Academy of Music to-night. The so called rehearsal, or matinee performance, of the programme occurred yesterday, and was heard by too few people, though the biting weather, the stoppage of traffic and the continuance of the railroad strike doubtless had something to do with the lack of attendance. A fine programme was offered, and it was splendidly given, for after all there is no such orchestra in the world as this one, and no such lack of appreciation of it in any city as in Brooklyn. It was mostly music that had been heard before, and some of it recently. Three of the important numbers were played and sung here within the present season. The longest was the "New World" symphony of Dvorak. Without casting the slightest discredit on Mr. Seidl, who has played it twice, it is manifest that an orchestra half as large again as his, and in constant practice under one leader will give a better technical performance than he could. There is a volume of tone in this band, a smoothness of the strings, a richness and pliancy that can only be obtained by numbers and by constant training under a single leadership. Mr. Paur in his reading of this interesting and beautiful symphony does not differ in any radical way from Mr. Seidl, who indeed may have come closer to the author's meaning, since he has the advantage of association with Dr. Dvorak, and if the work was more winning or impressive than it was before it may be placed to the credit of the band. Mr. Paur's reading is on the whole more dramatic, and his effects are more pronounced. It is unnecessary and it would be vain to specify the differences in detail. Every leader who is a leader—for the fact implies personality—must infuse something of himself into his work not matter how faithfully he tries to interpret a piece. These tokens of the personal element are usually slight. A violin passage is accented here; the 'cellos are made to play a passage legato there; a certain run is accelerated; a movement is taken at a slightly different tempo; the cornets are liberated or restrained in a single note. Yesterday the only conspicuous variant on the Seidl reading was in the license enjoyed by the drummer. The intrinsic worth of this symphony grows on rehearing, but its American character does not develop to any marked degree. If one likes, he may fancy that there is an echo of negro melody in the first adagio and that a Sioux war dance may have suggested the dominant motive in the scherzo. For our own sake we could wish that anything so fine had come out of America as the plaintive song of the English horn in the larghetto—a division of the symphony that one would be justified in braving zero weather to hear. The concluding allegro, with its hint of "Yankee Doodle," and its Donnybrook fair circumstance—for how could this symphony be American if it had not a smack of Irish in it?—ended the work with a lifting and enjoying rattle.

Part of an orchestral suite by Lachner may be said to be the introduction of that writer to a Brooklyn audience. It opens with a kind of perpetuum mobile for strings which is enlivening, has no little of the spirit and even suggests the form of Bach. The freshness and youth of it are delightful. The set of variations might become terrible if Mr. Paur did not, in mercy, cut out most of them. Variations are nearly obsolete, anyhow, except in the Wagner operas. As there are no less than twenty-three variations in Lachner's suite, it follows that there would be a good deal of suffering if they were all played. The variations lead into a march that is remarkably like the one in Spohr's "Consecration of Sound." After that comes a fugue which it is hard to believe could be played by any other orchestra as it was played by this one yesterday. It was as impetuous and irresistible as the rush of a locomotive, and in it the drill of the strings was demonstrated to a wonderful degree. Smetana's jolly overture to "The Sold Bride" was the closing piece, and that, too, was played with wonderful speed and spirit. It is a fresh note of personality and grateful if only for that reason.

One of the violoncello players had a solo. It was Leo Schulz, who sits beside Mr. Schroeder, the recognized leader of the 'cello choir. He is a young man who appears to take life and art seriously, who plays intellectually and, to a less degree, emotionally. He had the Schumann 'cello concerto, which a small man in art would be sure to make dry and uninteresting, but which Mr. Schulz rendered with a readiness and command that made it an almost fervid utterance. He is no sentimentalist, but he has a sympathetic understanding of the meaning of every phrase and interprets it correctly. At first his tone was a trifle impure, perhaps through nervousness, but the effect of this soon passed and he soon gained authority and a nervous force that carried the piece to a brilliant finish. It was pleasing to see that the members of the orchestra are free from the jealousy that is too often charged against musicians and that everybody knows to be indulged by singers. Instead of glaring at him with hate and envy as he went to his place on the platform and sneeringly criticising his performance behind their hands, the musicians gave him an unanimous "ratta" and applauded him as sincerely when he had finished.

The other soloist was Carlotta Desvignes, who is practically a new comer, and who made her surprise the more agreeable for that reason. She has a rather low soprano that is not as yet quite even in all registers, though it is of agreeable quality, in spite of a slight dryness of the extreme lower notes and a hint of shrillness in the extreme upper ones. She dangerously forces her voice now and then in the access of artistic emotion, for she has that useful and admirable gift. She feels the music that she sings, and intends that her hearers shall feel it, too. Her vocal scope is wide, her training has been good, albeit she must guard against further encouragement of the vibrato, and the natural quality of her voice is rich and musical. As she is young it is in order to congratulate her on a future, as well as on a present. Her numbers yesterday were the "Weep, weep, my eyes!" What an injunction! from Massenet's "Cid" and the more musical and enjoyable air from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah." The concert as a whole was artistic, varied and delightful. It is hoped that an audience worthy of the city will hear it this evening.

The New-York Times.

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, FEB. 8, 1895.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Fourth Concert of the Season at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening in the presence of an audience that must have been composed of enthusiastic admirers of the organization, for no others would have gone out last night. The programme embraced the services of two soloists, one of whom was wholly unnecessary. The list of compositions comprised Beethoven's eighth symphony, which has been much in evidence of late, the air "Ruddier Than a Cherry," from Handel's "Acis and Galatea"; C. M. Loeffler's "Fantastic Concerto," for violin and orchestra; the "Madamina" song of Leporello from "Don Giovanni," and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

The performance of the eighth symphony was of the kind that neither gods nor men tolerate. It was a dismal and disheartening exhibition of mediocrity, and it made one wonder why so many men should come all the way from Boston in such weather to play so stupidly. But it is necessary to remember that Emil Paur was conducting, and that accounts for a good deal. If the Boston Symphony Orchestra continues to improve under this conductor as it has been doing, it will, in the course of time, play almost as well as Mr. Seidl's Sunday evening concert orchestra. It may be added that Mr. Paur's reading of the eighth symphony took the allegretto scherzando slowly and the tempo di menuetto fast. And it should be said further that in his reading of the Dvorak "Carnival" overture he atoned for many shortcomings. The work was given with spirit, color, and intelligence in the treatment of its details.

Mr. Watkin Mills, basso, sang "Ruddier Than a Cherry" in a square-cut, staccato style that reminded the hearer of a xylophone solo. Why this gentleman selected "Madamina" for his second number he alone knows. It was a celebrated Frenchman who said, "Audacity! Audacity! Always audacity!" But not even audacity could make Mr. W. Mills successful with that aria on the stage that recently held Edouard de Reszke. Mr. Mills is an Englishman, and is excessively popular in his own country. Steamers sail for Liverpool and Southampton several times each week, and the rates of passage are reasonable.

Mr. Loeffler has well named his concerto for 'cello and orchestra "fantastic." It is a rhapsody, an impromptu for orchestra, with 'cello accompaniment, an instrumental landscape with the figure—or, as Carlyle might put it, the eidolon—of a 'cello in the centre, or a color scheme, with 'cello priming; but it is not a concerto. It has no form. It has no thematic development. It is an impressionist picture in tones. It is splendidly scored, and it has warmth, body, elan, spirit. But is is inchoate. It is not without fascination, but it is the fascination of a disembodied spirit. Mr. Loeffler has no business to introduce Maeterlinckism into music. Perhaps he was playing a huge joke on us. Anyhow, he gave Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the solo 'cellist of the orchestra, an opportunity to exhibit his beautiful tone and fine technic. Maybe that is all we poor Gothamites have a right to expect from the Bostonians.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave last evening the fourth concert of this season in the Metropolitan. Its programme was by no means either an elaborate or an ambitious one. It was neither heavy, nor light, nor long, since at least the audience was dismissed before half past 9 o'clock, but it was certainly broad, for it embraced a wide range of composers of the most varied degrees of talent and the widest differences in thought. First came Beethoven's crystal-bright Eighth Symphony, that wonderful hour of purest sunshine in the darkest days of the deaf master. The orchestra played it with a quaint grace and daintiness that suited its delicate phrases admirably. These phrases are the expression of the cheerfulness which can only come to a soul that has suffered deeply—the calm, timid, humble joy of one who has been so crushed and frightened by sorrow that he scarcely dares to trust himself either to hope or to rejoice.

Haendel was represented on the programme by the air from "Acis and Galatea," sung by Mr. Watkin Mills, "O Ruddier than the Cherry," and Mozart by the Leporello air from "Don Giovanni," also given by Mr. Mills. This last, though an excellent choice in many regards, was somewhat dwarfed and at a disadvantage from the inevitable comparison felt between this cold concert rendering and Edouard de Reszke's unctuous acting version. We are quite willing to accord Mr. Mills all due credit for a generally satisfactory performance in tone and in taste, but after all his singing of the air was in contrast to what we have lately heard in opera, that of a young pupil as against a great and mature master. Mr. Mills sang the Handel air with remarkable precision and really most admirably. There was but a small audience present in the Metropolitan and it was of a cold temper; nevertheless it accorded Mr. Mills the largest share of its expressed approval.

Of real interest was found Mr. C. M. Loeffler's "Fantastic Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra" played with consummate skill and a fine musicianly reserve by Mr. Alwin Schroeder. The concerto affords one of the best possible opportunities for the display of brilliant playing, for it is full of difficulties. But better than that, it is charming as music and most attractive and varied both in form and orchestration. It is in manuscript, like all of Mr. Loeffler's compositions, since up to the present he has published nothing.

A sextet of his was performed last year by Kneisel in one of his quartet evenings. Last year a composition for violin and orchestra was done with much éclat in Boston and will probably be heard here next season. Mr. Loeffler shows a freedom in instrumentation and a cleverness in invention that are most creditable. His concerto was thoroughly enjoyed by all listeners. The concert closed with Dvorak's brilliant "Carnival Overture." These show the man of genius, as all his writing does.

The Washington Post

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1895.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra is one attraction that can always overcome the effect of the weather whatever it is, consequently Metzerott Hall was well filled last evening in spite of the cold. The programme of the fourth concert, while not so varied as others of the season, embraced four noble numbers of great interest and introduced a piano soloist who, although a Washingtonian, was before this season comparatively unknown in this city. But after her performance last evening Mrs. Ernest Lent will no longer be a pianist without honor in her own land. On the contrary, she will be ranked among our foremost artistes.

The first composer on the programme was that king of classicists, Beethoven, but he was represented by his seldom played symphony No. 8, in F major, which exhibits his genius in a light quite different from the accepted idea. It was not the ponderous, somber Beethoven, the John Milton of music, who wrote this spirited, almost rollicking symphony; at least he was in the mood for "L'Allegro" rather than "Penseroso." It is quaint, melodious, and humorous—the master musician in sportive mood playing on the sunny crests of those waves of harmony he knew so well how to create, but never sinking into the gloomy depths between. The rendition of the orchestra was worthy the composition and in keeping with its spirit.

The second number was Rubenstein's splendid concerto No. 4, in D minor, for piano and orchestra. This has always been considered one of the most trying tests of what in sportive phraseology would be termed the staying powers of a pianist, and the idea of a woman's attempting it was somewhat startling at first. At the last Philharmonic Club concert Mrs. Lent gave proof of her remarkable strength in the great "Rhapsodie Hongroise" of Liszt, but las evening she surpassed herself and surprised herself. Her technique is unexceptional and her tone-producing power shone even in contrast with the great orchestra. The concerto in itself is a striking and beautiful composition. After a brief orchestral prelude the piano presents the theme, which is accentuated at intervals by the strings and wood wind in counter phrases. Then the orchestra carries the theme, while the pianist fairly embroiders it with variations—runs, trills, and cadenzas in broken time. There is considerable variety in the three movements, and the whole works up to a splendid climax, which, with the difficult work gone before, tests the full powers of a pianist. But Mrs. Lent came through it triumphantly and was liberally rewarded with flowers and applause..

The third number, Franz Lachner's suite No. 1, in D minor, was a rather old-fashioned composition, and, aside from its lively prelude and spirited march, was principally of interest as a study in counterpart. But it formed a strong contrast to Dvorak's brilliant "Carnival" overture, which was played for the first time in Washington, and won great applause. It is full of rich coloring, dramatic and descriptive, echoing the laughter of the merry-makers and anon the plaintive strains of the pipes and harp—altogether a vivid and inspiriting tone picture of the carnival in some Italian city. It formed a fitting conclusion to the programme and sent the auditors out into the night with bounding pulse to brave the cold.

New-York Daily Tribune

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra could measure last evening the high esteem in which it is held by the musical people of this city from the size of the audience that gathered to hear its fourth concert in the Metropolitan Opera House. That so many of its friends braved the storm and submitted to the inconveniences of interrupted traffic was a compliment not to be lightly weighed; the more that the programme in itself was not one that could attract by reason of its novelty. Both Beethoven's eighth symphony and Dvorák's Carnival overture had been heard here lately, and Mr. Paur's reading of the symphony could scarcely arouse to enthusiasm. It suffered from the anxious overelaboration, the artificiality of phrasing to which the Boston conductor seems to be becoming more and more addicted. The Dvorák overture, on the contrary, was read and played with a splendid spirit and a pulsating energy that could scarcely be surpassed.

The noteworthy feature of the concert was a new concerto for 'cello, by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, one of the distinguished first violins of the orchestra. Previous compositions of his that have been heard here, especially his lovely sextet played by the Kneisel Quartet, have proved him to be a musician of original and delicate fancy and high technical attainment; and while the concerto did not reveal itself as the equal of the best he has done, it has nevertheless many qualities of extraordinary interest. Chief among these is the richness and power of its orchestration; indeed, it is in the general effect of its color and its significance in the depiction of moods that it shines, rather than in the pregnancy and logical development of its themes. Mr. Loeffler has absolved himself, perhaps, from too much responsibility in this respect by the title "fantastic" that he has affixed to his composition. The solo part is a grateful one for the performer, and exploits as well as any concerto can be expected to exploit technical proficiency upon an instrument that lends itself the least of any to such proceedings. It was played by Mr. Schroeder with the power and brilliancy and absolute certainty that his hearers have learned to expect of him. He and Mr. Loeffler were several times compelled to bow their acknowledgments of the enthusiastic applause bestowed upon both the performer and the composition.

Mr. Watkin Mills also contributed two bass airs: "Oh, Ruddier than the Cherry," from Handel's "Acis and Galatea," and Leporello's "Madamina" song from "Don Giovanni." He has a rich and flexible bass voice and sings in a manly and musical, if somewhat dry, style. It would be interesting to know why he elected to brave comparisons by giving the aria from "Don Giovanni" from the very stage where it has been several times heard this winter from the greatest of Leporellos, and with the dramatic surroundings which can alone give it its proper effect.

Baltimore American

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1895.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Last But One of the Series of Concerts Delightfully Given.

The last but one of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at the Music Hall. As usual, a large and fashionable audience was in attendance, and enjoyed a delightful evening. The program was well arranged and very interesting. Dvordak's symphony, "From the New World," opened last night's program, and it was delightfully played. Mr. Paur is so thoroughly en rapport with Dvorak and infuses so much of his personal enthusiasm into his orchestra, that the symphony was given with a delightful warmth. The opening movement—adagio and allegro molto, in E minor—was given with delicate appreciation of light and shade. This movement is beautiful, and would immortalize Dvorak if this were his only composition. The charming larghetto, in D flat major, was enthusiastically received, and it merited the applause. If it can be said that the orchestra excelled itself, it was in this movement. The scherzo and trio and allegro were given with unexpected dash and verve.

At the close of the symphony Mr. Paur was compelled to bow in response to the loudly-expressed delight of the audience. Dvorak has used the native melodies with magnificent effect, and one fairly tingles with hope and patriotic fervor.

The G minor violin concerto is the best-known of Bruch's works for this instrument, and was a most effective medium for Mr. Adamowski's skill. It has been a long time since Baltimoreans have heard this clever violinist in solo at these concerts, and he was welcomed with enthusiasm. He is still the same delightful artist, and played the beautiful concerto with fine tone and considerable virtuosity, and was honored with a recall.

The second "Lenore" overture of Beethoven received a careful, forceful reading, and was followed by Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale." This number was probably the most successful on the program with the audience, who were delighted with its charming piquancy. It is Saint-Saens in every note, full of daintiness and charm. The concert closed with a brilliant performance of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven, Mozart, Handel and Dvorak figured on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening, yet it was Loeffler's music (a cello concerto) which many people had come to hear.

Think of it!

Beethoven, Mozart, Handel, Dvorak and—Loeffler.

Who is Loeffler?

Echo answered Who, until a tall, blond and embarrassed young man rose from the ranks of the orchestra and timidly bowed his acknowledgment of much applause.

A violinist, then, and, well—decidedly not without talent. He calls it a fantastic concerto, this cello composition of his. A good title, too, because it is in a sense rather formless. But there is music in what he says, particularly in the first half—the cadenza later on is really hideous—and the young man is uncannily precocious in his knowledge of orchestration. Loeffler sounded decidedly more imposing after Mr. Schroeder had spoken for him than it did before the concert.

I did not like the eighth symphony as read by Mr. Paur. Strange, arbitrary tempi, and yet an old fashioned, tiresome interpretation, and technically far from good, the bass being most obstreperous and trying to the ear.

Mr. Watkin Mills in an archaic aria, by Handel, and a Leporello song, revealed himself as one of those singers who voice seem too high and too low for everything they attempt. A rather ligneous style, too, is not calculated to make one forget his vocal limitations.

Dvorak's Carnival overture, a magnificent tone painting, full of life and rhythmic splendor, should be oftener heard.

It was decidedly the most stirring feature of a rather listless entertainment.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, THURSDAY, FEB. 7, 1895.

"FROM THE NEW WORLD."

Dvorak's Symphony Performed by the Boston Orchestra.

Dvorak's new symphony, "From the New World," was the leading number at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Music Hall.

The symphony was heard in Baltimore earlier in the present season, when it was performed by the Seidl Orchestra, but it was given in some respects, a better rendering, chiefly as regards finish and smoothness. The rich harmonies and massive symphonic treatment, resting on quaint negro melodies and rhythms, were strongly emphasized by the vigorous performance under Emil Paur's direction.

Other orchestral numbers were Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 2, in C major; "Le Rouet d'Omphale," symphonic poem by Saint-Saens, and the overture, "Carnaval Romain," by Berlioz.

Timotheo Adamowski, one of the finest violinists of the orchestra and leader of the Adamowski Quartette, was the soloist and played Bruch's G minor concerto for violin. Adamowski is very popular in Baltimore and he was warmly applauded. He has a pure and exquisite tone and a style that, while not remarkable for depth or force, is refined and thoroughly musical.

[92]

...NDAY HERALD
...EBRUARY 10.

...ueer Ideas Aired in Symphony Programme Books.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

The programme books of the Boston Symphony concerts are becoming more and more incomprehensible. Their compiler seems to be inspired by a resolve to make them anything and everything but what they should be. Much space has been given in them of late to a local teacher of singing, who, under the guise of reminiscences, contrives to set forth a series of the most ingenuous puffs of himself. As a business move on the part of the singing teacher in question, it is a brilliant idea; but as it is dull reading, and of no interest whatever to the symphony audiences in general, it is not easy to understand why it should take up so many pages in the programmes, unless, indeed, to provide material for those advertisers who wish their advertisements to stand next to reading matter.

The most remarkable contributions in these books, however, are the excerpts, to which are signed a variety of names, which, judging by the ear-marks of the excerpts themselves, are merely pseudonyms of the compiler. One of these, by an imaginary Diogenes Cavafiaschetto, sets forth on its career of inanity thus: "Forms are everything, and yet nothing. They are the outside of something. But there never was an outside without an inside; neither was there ever an inside without an outside." After drivelling along at this rate for a few lines, the Diogenes in disguise propounds this weighty reflection: "To be sure, there are some recognizable forms with no more in them than there is outside; the quasi-sphere of a child's balloon, for instance, which only a nursery maid's credulity believes to be filled with a different gas from that we breathe." As a masterly exemplification of a non sequitur, this is worthy a whole forest of laurels, but what does it all mean and why such twaddle in symphony programme books? There cannot possibly be as much inside a child's balloon as there is outside it. In fact, nothing, even the famous Heidelberg tun can be made to hold as much as there is outside it. The lesser cannot contain the greater. As for there never being an inside without an outside, and never an outside without an inside, what will the compiler say to the polyp which, on being turned inside out, accommodates itself to the new order of things, and continues to live in ease and comfort, and as if unconscious that its inside had become its outside and its outside its inside? And why inform an audience "that a visible and tangible sphere is not necessarily hollow—that is filled with aeriform matter—neither is the symphonic form unavoidably without solid contents?" What are the "solid contents" of a symphonic form, as contrasted with the "aeriform matter" in a hollow sphere? To paraphrase a line of Dryden's the compiler "Bungles as he writes, for want of thought."

Presently Diogenes changes to Fungolfactor Scriblerus and asks: "Tell me, now, honestly; can you recognize a negro whom you have seen only once? can you tell one Japanese or Chinaman from another?" Of course it depends very much on circumstances; if one negro is tall and another one is short; if one Chinaman is lean and another one is fat; if one Japanese is aggressively bandy-legged and another one is not, and so on, there will be no difficulty in recognizing that the one is not the other. If, on the other hand, the resemblances are so close that no distinction can be made between them, there will be some trouble in regard to recognition under the circumstances stated. But why propound these conundrums in a programme book, unless with mirthful intent; and if mirth be intended, why not make that purpose clear?

Then Fungolfactor gives way to Montgomery Bullycarp as Diogenes made place for Fungolfactor, and Montgomery, after expressing his belief that "the time may come when the musical dragonman may find it to his best advantage to earn his living by being paid to move on," he retires in favor of John Smith, who chronicles fatuously the following typical bit of programme wit: "Philenus: 'I'm dead tired of solid music once a week, week in and week out, all the season through!' Malvoglio: 'Ah! but think how tired of it the poor devils who play it must be!'" Now, if instead of "music" in the first phrase we substitute "silliness," and in the second phrase "read" for "play," a far more pointed truth would apply to the programme books as at present conducted.

Since the season opened, the "illustrious" compiler has been fascinated by the thought of cavorting through the pages of the programme in disguise, and he has masqueraded under the aliases, Giovanni Cieloscopo, Hans Schwartemag and Jean Guillepin, in addition to those already given, and invariably as the parent of exasperatingly frequent stupidities. There is a fable by Aesop that points out the danger of assuming a disguise without maintaining a discreet vocal silence. It is true that the programme books are a gratuity, that one is not obliged to read them, and that it is somewhat ungrateful to look a gift horse—or a gift mule, or a gift ass, for that matter—in the mouth. Still there is no reason why they should not be well edited, why the selections should not be wisely made, nor why the quality of the reading matter should not, as the rule, be kept up to instead of below the intelligence of the cultivated audiences for whose information or entertainment they are supposed to be prepared. Even in matters of fact, there are repeated blunders in regard to names and dates, and the faults of omission are almost as serious as are the faults of commission. In any case, let us have no more of autobiographical puffery, and the callous inanities of Fungolfactor, Bullycarp, Cavafiaschetto & Co.

Have you ever seen the rush of the ...ent ticket holders at a Symphony re...sal? It is always a tear, but there are ...days when some great artist is to be ... soloist, that human nature outdoes ... at Music Hall. Last Friday was ...ng, as there was to be no con... Saturday night, but the week be... fore the exhibition transcended anything that has been experienced by that well worn temple of music. Why the place did not fall to pieces under this attack of hundreds of men and women bound to reach that upper balcony was simply good fortune, if not a compliment to the original builders. By 11:30 A. M. entrances to both doors were packed to the street, and there these ardent patrons and students of the divine art remained until Mr. Comee gave the signal for the doors to be opened. As the crowd was close to them the backward pressure must have dislocated a few ribs, but that seemed no hindrance to the agility of the legs which bore the mass helter-skelter, pang, bang, up the stairways, laughing, screaming and dropping programmes and overshoes as it went. A charge of cavalry was nothing to the noise, and certainly it speaks well for the physical condition of this portion of our inhabitants that no one fell in a fit, or had heart failure after arriving at the top of those long flights. It is through Mr. Higginson's generous determination to give the music students here a chance to improve themselves that this "rush" system is permitted. If the public chooses to show its usual seeking-to-get-there-first spirit by standing for hours and thus madly running for seats, it is neither the business of Music Hall managers to prevent them, nor of Mr. Higginson to make it any more easy than he has done at a great loss to his own pocket to furnish "reserved" places in the second balcony at the rehearsals. Twenty-five cents to hear Melba sing is well worth a day's waiting and devil-seek-the-hindmost climb at the end of it.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 9, 1895.

When, on a snowy weekday afternoon, three thousand people, men and women together, crowd Music Hall to repletion, occupying every coign of sitting and standing room, there must be some strong magnet. In this case it was Melba. To be sure the Symphony orchestra was there, with a round of light selection played with little heart, yet very delightful to hear—the Fra Diavolo and Mignon overtures, the Sylvia ballet music, the entr'acte from Chabrier's Gwendoline, a Strauss Waltz, and a new Goldmark Scherzo for the first time; but people came to hear Melba.

She sang thrice, or really six times, repeating entire Arditi's Rose Waltz, and also the cadenza from the Lucia mad scene; and after the Huguenot aria she did a graceful thing in giving for an encore "I love, and the world is mine" by Clayton Johns, with its composer at the piano, whom she compelled to receive his share of the applause; though it must be acknowledged that we have heard this song better sung by artists of less celebrity. A wonderful singer though, striking high notes without the apparent quiver of a nerve, and soaring so powerfully through florid passages, and with such distinct brilliancy, that you are in doubt whether you are hearing Melba, or the flute or violin background. The variety in her tones, even with the self-same notes, is equally remarkable. Why will women continue the ugly practice of singing with their hats on?

Her name also drew an unwonted crowd to the fourteenth Symphony Concerts the same week, when the program otherwise was not remarkable.

Baltimore Life.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY
BALTIMORE, MD., FEBRUARY 9, 1895.

The fourth concert, season '94-'5, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at new Music Hall, on Wednesday evening last. The program was a most excellent one and included the following numbers: Symphony from the "New World," by Dvorak; Concerto for violin, in G minor, by Bruch; Overture, "Lenore" No. 2, by Beethoven; Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d,Omphale," by Saint Saens; Overture, "Carnival Romaine," by Berloiz. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist and his numbers were warmly applauded. The fifth and last concert this season takes place, Wednesday evening, March 13.

The first Piano Recital in this city by Mme. Emil Paur, wife of the distinguished director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place at Sutro Hall on last Tuesday afternoon, and was attended by many music-lovers of our city. The program included selections from the works of Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms and other famous composers and the skill in which they were interpreted by Mme. Paur showed that she is a thorough artist.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.,

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1895.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fourth Concert Last Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, when the leading feature on the programme was Dvorak's beautiful symphony in E minor, op. 95, somewhat fantastically entitled "From the New World." This fine composition was first played here by the New York Symphony Orchestra a few weeks ago, and a second hearing does not suggest any abatement of the enthusiastic warmth with which it was then commented upon. It is lovely music, imaginative and melodious, full of poetry and passion, glowing with color, suffused with feeling and throbbing in every part with a heartfelt and comunicative emotion. The larghetto in particular is a dream of delight, as exquisite a poem, as charming a picture in sound, as the pastoral symphony of Beethoven, which, however, is much less subjective, or as that mysteriously fascinating andante cantabile of Tschaikowsky, which was played in the Academy at Miss Bundy's concert the other day. The symphony was sympathetically interpreted under Mr. Paur's direction, but it may be questioned whether the pianissimo of the slow movement was not a little overdone. The music seems intended to suggest the hush of a summer evening, when many sounds combine to make a silence, and only the song of the bird is distinctly audible. It was therefore right for Mr. Paur to keep the accompaniments down, and let the reed obligato dominate the scheme, but there were moments when it was necessary to strain the attention to hear the orchestra at all. That was carrying refinement too far. The other orchestral numbers were Lachner's interesting suite in D minor and a very strong and stirring overture by Smetana. Miss Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist. Her voice, though sweet, is very pale and small, and her manner essentially undramatic, so that her delivery of the "Pleurez, mes yeux," from Massenet's "Cid," was less than satisfying, but she sang Haydn's old aria "With Verdure Clad" very nicely indeed, with refinement, good taste, correct expression and facile execution. She was much applauded, much more so indedd than the orchestra itself, which may or may not be thought to speak well for the appreciative judgment of the audience. The fifth and last of these concerts will take place on March 11.

PUBLIC LEDGER—PHILADELPHIA,

...k of the ...ler, ...yor's ... ...n th...

FEBRUARY 5, 1895.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

If the detection of flaws be one of the functions of musical criticism, then to review a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by no means an easy task, for whatever the listeners may think of a certain number on a particular programme, there is never any doubt as to the admirable playing of the men under Mr. Paur's direction. There may occasionally arise some question depending entirely on the individual taste or opinion of the most musicianly inclined members of the audience, but, be that as it may, one can always depend on a thoroughly artistic treatment of whatever the orchestra may undertake. In past seasons the work of the participants was brought to a state of actual over-refinement by the daintily constituted Nikisch, who often seemed afraid to countenance an allowably picturesque or striking effect, but Mr. Paur is happily free from this negative fault, and his forces are all the more subject to praise in consequence.

Thus it happens that in noticing last evening's Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, given under the usual auspices of a very large house, little or nothing could be said of the execution of the programme itself that would not be uninteresting repetition. Constant commendation would degenerate into monotony. It is only just, however, to mention the really exquisite presentation of Dr. Dvorak's No. 8 E minor symphony, "From the New World," a work which was exploited in this city last autumn by the Seidl Orchestra. It certainly grows in charm on a rehearing—this is more than could be said in behalf of every modern symphony—and the beauty of its adagio and the fanciful, elusive-like qualities of the larghetto, not to speak of the other movements, made a fine impression. As has before been poiated out, the composition is a little vague in so far as the so-called themes from negro plantation music are concerned, but, whether it be called "From the New World" or "From the Old World," it is one of the most melodic and welcome of Dr. Dvorak's contributions.

The remaining instrumental numbers comprised three movements from Lachner's No. 1 suite (D minor) and Smetana's "Die Ver Kaufte Braut" overture. The latter was so dashingly characteristic of Czech verve, and had such a barbaric effectiveness that it closed the concert with considerable éclat. The soloist was Miss Lillian Blauvelt, the soprano, who had every reason to be pleased with the warmth of her reception. She imparted unusual finish and attractiveness to an aria from Massenet's "Cid" (Pleurez! pleurez, mes yeux."), and was no less enthusiastically applauded for her singing of the lovely "With Verdure Clad."

[93]

SUNDAY HERALD
FEBRUARY 10.

Queer Ideas Aired in Symphony Programme Books.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

The programme books of the Boston Symphony concerts are becoming more and more incomprehensible. Their compiler seems to be inspired by a resolve to make them anything and everything but what they should be. Much space has been given in them of late to a local teacher of singing, who, under the guise of reminiscences, contrives to set forth a series of the most ingenuous puffs of himself. As a business move on the part of the singing teacher in question, it is a brilliant idea; but as it is dull reading, and of no interest whatever to the symphony audiences in general, it is not easy to understand why it should take up so many pages in the programmes, unless, indeed, to provide material for those advertisers who wish their advertisements to stand next to reading matter.

The most remarkable contributions in these books, however, are the excerpts, to which are signed a variety of names, which, judging by the ear-marks of the excerpts themselves, are merely pseudonyms of the compiler. One of these, by an imaginary Diogenes Gavaflaschetto, sets forth on its career of inanity thus: "Forms are everything, and yet nothing. They are the outside of something. But there never was an outside without an inside; neither was there ever an inside without an outside." After drivelling along at this rate for a few lines, the Diogenes in disguise propounds this weighty reflection: "To be sure, there are some recognizable forms with no more in them than there is outside; the quasi-sphere of a child's balloon, for instance, which only a nursery maid's credulity believes to be filled with a different gas from that we breathe." As a masterly exemplification of a non sequitur, this is worthy a whole forest of laurels, but what does it all mean and why such twaddle in symphony programme books? There cannot possibly be as much inside a child's balloon as there is outside it. In fact, nothing, even the famous Heidelberg tun can be made to hold as much as there is outside it. The lesser cannot contain the greater. As for there never being an inside without an outside, and never an outside without an inside, what will the compiler say to the polyp which, on being turned inside out, accommodates itself to the new order of things, and continues to live in ease and comfort, and as if unconscious that its inside had become its outside and its outside its inside? And why inform an audience "that a visible and tangible sphere is not necessarily hollow—that is filled with aeriform matter—neither is the symphonic form unavoidably without solid contents?" What are the "solid contents" of a symphonic form, as contrasted with the "aeriform matter" in a hollow sphere? To paraphrase a line of Dryden's the compiler "Bungles as he writes, for want of thought."

Presently Diogenes changes to Fungolfactor Scriblerus and asks: "Tell me, now, honestly; can you recognize a negro whom you have seen only once? can you tell one Japanese or Chinaman from another?" Of course it depends very much on circumstances; if one negro is tall and another one is short; if one Chinaman is lean and another one is fat; if one Japanese is aggressively bandy-legged and another one is not, and so on, there will be no difficulty in recognizing that the one is not the other. If, on the other hand, the resemblances are so close that no distinction can be made between them, there will be some trouble in regard to recognition under the circumstances stated. But why propound these conundrums in a programme book, unless with mirthful intent; and if mirth be intended, why not make that purpose clear?

Then Fungolfactor gives way to Montgomery Bullycarp as Diogenes made place for Fungolfactor, and Montgomery, after expressing his belief that "the time may come when the musical dragonman may find it to his best advantage to earn his living by being paid to move on," he retires in favor of John Smith, who chronicles fatuously the following typical bit of programme wit: "Philenus: 'I'm dead tired of solid music once a week, week in and week out, all the season through!' Malvoglio: 'Ah! but think how tired of it the poor devils who play it must be!'" Now, if instead of "music" in the first phrase we substitute "silliness," and in the second phrase "read" for "play," a far more pointed truth would apply to the programme books as at present conducted.

Since the season opened, the "illustrious" compiler has been fascinated by the thought of cavorting through the pages of the programme in disguise, and he has masqueraded under the aliases, Giovanni Cieloscopo, Hans Schwartemag and Jean Guillepin, in addition to those already given, and invariably as the parent of exasperatingly frequent stupidities. There is a fable by Aesop that points out the danger of assuming a disguise without maintaining a discreet vocal silence. It is true that the programme books are a gratuity, that one is not obliged to read them, and that it is somewhat ungrateful to look a gift horse—or a gift mule, or a gift ass, for that matter—in the mouth. Still there is no reason why they should not be well edited, why the selections should not be wisely made, nor why the quality of the reading matter should not, as the rule, be kept up to instead of below the intelligence of the cultivated audiences for whose information or entertainment they are supposed to be prepared. Even in matters of fact, there are repeated blunders in regard to names and dates, and the faults of omission are almost as serious as are the faults of commission. In any case, let us have no more of autobiographical puffery, and the callous inanities of Fungolfactor, Bullycarp, Cavanaschetto & Co.

Have you ever seen the rush of the [illegible] ticket holders at a Symphony rehearsal? It is always a tear, but there are Fridays when some great artist is to be the soloist, that human nature outdoes itself at Music Hall. Last Friday was a let-up, as there was to be no concert Saturday night, but the week before the exhibition transcended anything that has been experienced by that well worn temple of music. Why the place did not fall to pieces under this attack of hundreds of men and women bound to reach that upper balcony was simply good fortune, if not a compliment to the original builders. By 11:30 A. M. entrances to both doors were packed to the street, and there these ardent patrons and students of the divine art remained until Mr. Comee gave the signal for the doors to be opened. As the crowd was close to them the backward pressure must have dislocated a few ribs, but that seemed no hindrance to the agility of the legs which bore the mass helter-skelter, bang, bang, up the stairways, laughing, screaming and dropping programmes and overshoes as it went. A charge of cavalry was nothing to the noise, and certainly it speaks well for the physical condition of this portion of our inhabitants that no one fell in a fit, or had heart failure after arriving at the top of those long flights. It is through Mr. Higginson's generous determination to give the music students here a chance to improve themselves that this "rush" system is permitted. If the public chooses to show its usual seeking-to-get-there-first spirit by standing for hours and thus madly running for seats, it is neither the business of Music Hall managers to prevent them, nor of Mr. Higginson to make it any more easy than he has done at a great loss to his own pocket to furnish "reserved" places in the second balcony at the rehearsals. Twenty-five cents to hear Melba sing is well worth a day's waiting and devil-seek-the-hindmost climb at the end of it.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 9, 1895.

When, on a snowy weekday afternoon, three thousand people, men and women together, crowd Music Hall to repletion, occupying every coign of sitting and standing room, there must be some strong magnet. In this case it was Melba. To be sure the Symphony orchestra was there, with a round of light selection played with little heart, yet very delightful to hear—the Fra Diavolo and Mignon overtures, the Sylvia ballet music, the entr'acte from Chabrier's Gwendoline, a Strauss Waltz, and a new Goldmark Scherzo for the first time; but people came to hear Melba.

She sang thrice, or really six times, repeating entire Arditi's Rose Waltz, and also the cadenza from the Lucia mad scene; and after the Huguenot aria she did a graceful thing in giving for an encore "I love, and the world is mine" by Clayton Johns, with its composer at the piano, whom she compelled to receive his share of the applause; though it must be acknowledged that we have heard this song better sung by artists of less celebrity. A wonderful singer though, striking high notes without the apparent quiver of a nerve, and soaring so powerfully through florid passages, and with such distinct brilliancy, that you are in doubt whether you are hearing Melba, or the flute or violin background. The variety in her tones, even with the self-same notes, is equally remarkable. Why will women continue the ugly practice of singing with their hats on?

Her name also drew an unwonted crowd to the fourteenth Symphony Concerts the same week, when the program otherwise was not remarkable.

Baltimore Life.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY

BALTIMORE, MD., FEBRUARY 9, 1895.

The fourth concert, season '94-'5, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at new Music Hall, on Wednesday evening last. The program was a most excellent one and included the following numbers: Symphony from the "New World," by Dvorak; Concerto for violin, in G minor, by Bruch; Overture, "Lenore" No. 2, by Beethoven; Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d,Omphale," by Saint Saens; Overture, "Carnival Romaine," by Berloiz. Mr, T. Adamowski was the soloist and his numbers were warmly applauded. The fifth and last concert this season takes place, Wednesday evening, March 13.

The first Piano Recital in this city by Mme. Emil Paur, wife of the distinguished director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place at Sutro Hall on last Tuesday afternoon, and was attended by many music-lovers of our city. The program included selections from the works of Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms and other famous composers and the skill in which they were interpreted by Mme. Paur showed that she is a thorough artist.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.,

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1895.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fourth Concert Last Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, when the leading feature on the programme was Dvorak's beautiful symphony in E minor, op. 95, somewhat fantastically entitled "From the New World." This fine composition was first played here by the New York Symphony Orchestra a few weeks ago, and a second hearing does not suggest any abatement of the enthusiastic warmth with which it was then commented upon. It is lovely music, imaginative and melodious, full of poetry and passion, glowing with color, suffused with feeling and throbbing in every part with a heartfelt and comunicative emotion. The larghetto in particular is a dream of delight, as exquisite a poem, as charming a picture in sound, as the pastoral symphony of Beethoven, which, however, is much less subjective, or as that mysteriously fascinating andante cantabile of Tschaikowsky, which was played in the Academy at Miss Bundy's concert the other day. The symphony was sympathetically interpreted under Mr. Paur's direction, but it may be questioned whether the pianissimo of the slow movement was not a little overdone. The music seems intended to suggest the hush of a summer evening, when many sounds combine to make a silence, and only the song of the bird is distinctly audible. It was therefore right for Mr. Paur to keep the accompaniments down, and let the reed obligato dominate the scheme, but there were moments when it was necessary to strain the attention to hear the orchestra at all. That was carrying refinement too far. The other orchestral numbers were Lachner's interesting suite in D minor and a very strong and stirring overture by Smetana. Miss Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist. Her voice, though sweet, is very pale and small, and her manner essentially undramatic, so that her delivery of the "Pleurez, mes yeux," from Massenet's "Cid," was less than satisfying, but she sang Haydn's old aria "With Verdure Clad" very nicely indeed, with refinement, good taste, correct expression and facile execution. She was much applauded, much more so indedd than the orchestra itself, which may or may not be thought to speak well for the appreciative judgment of the audience. The fifth and last of these concerts will take place on March 11.

PUBLIC LEDGER-PHILADELPHIA,

[illegible]ck of the [illegible]ller, Phe[illegible]yor's [illegible]n th[illegible] FEBRUARY 5, 1895.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

If the detection of flaws be one of the functions of musical criticism, then to review a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by no means an easy task, for whatever the listeners may think of a certain number on a particular programme, there is never any doubt as to the admirable playing of the men under Mr. Paur's direction. There may occasionally arise some question depending entirely on the individual taste or opinion of the most musicianly inclined members of the audience, but, be that as it may, one can always depend on a thoroughly artistic treatment of whatever the orchestra may undertake. In past seasons the work of the participants was brought to a state of actual over-refinement by the daintily constituted Nikisch, who often seemed afraid to countenance an allowably picturesque or striking effect, but Mr. Paur is happily free from this negative fault, and his forces are all the more subject to praise in consequence.

Thus it happens that in noticing last evening's Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, given under the usual auspices of a very large house, little or nothing could be said of the execution of the programme itself that would not be uninteresting repetition. Constant commendation would degenerate into monotony. It is only just, however, to mention the really exquisite presentation of Dr. Dvorak's No. 8 E minor symphony, "From the New World," a work which was exploited in this city last autumn by the Seidl Orchestra. It certainly grows in charm on a rehearing—this is more than could be said in behalf of every modern symphony—and the beauty of its adagio and the fanciful, elusive-like qualities of the larghetto, not to speak of the other movements, made a fine impression. As has before been pointed out, the composition is a little vague in so far as the so-called themes from negro plantation music are concerned, but, whether it be called "From the New World" or "From the Old World," it is one of the most melodic and welcome of Dr. Dvorak's contributions.

The remaining instrumental numbers comprised three movements from Lachner's No. 1 suite (D minor) and Smetana's "Die Ver Kaufte Braut" overture. The latter was so dashingly characteristic of Czech verve, and had such a barbaric effectiveness that it closed the concert with considerable éclat. The soloist was Miss Lillian Blauvelt, the soprano, who had every reason to be pleased with the warmth of her reception. She imparted unusual finish and attractiveness to an aria from Massenet's "Cid" (Pleurez! pleurez, mes yeux"), and was no less enthusiastically applauded for her singing of the lovely "With Verdure Clad."

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 13,

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played to rather poor houses on Friday afternoon and Saturday night. It is humiliating that such an orchestra should not be able to gather better houses when Mr. Seidl with one not as large by twenty or thirty men, and not so well drilled, fills the house to the top gallery. The strike and the cold weather had a bad effect, no doubt, on the concerts of the Boston orchestra, but that is no explanation of the neglect the orchestra has suffered here since it succeeded Thomas. It is a wonder that Mr. Ellis has not thought of some scheme to increase the popularity of his band, such as experienced theatrical managers resort to. He could give away town lots in Florida or Nebraska, he could serve ice cream between the numbers, he could have Marshall P. Wilder come out and speak pieces and tell stories, he could give stereopticon illustrations of what the public ought to imagine while listening to Wager, Berlioz, Saint-Saëns or any other descriptive writer, and he could play music that would be understood by everybody—such things as Mr. Innes' "Trip to the World's Fair," and Professor Peterschen's "Torchlight Parade Before Election," or "The Forge in the Forest," which is very popular in the theatres, because a real anvil is used and paper is burned in a joint of stovepipe to show that the forge is going before the blacksmith engages in morning prayer—of course there must be a prayer, and there is one even in Innes' pictures of a trip to Chicago, the musicians of his band being the ones who are represented as engaging in it!

Mr. Paur gave us a really beautiful performance of Dvorák's "From the New World" symphony. It was the third performance of the work in Brooklyn and by long odds the best. It had more vigor than even the Seidl interpretation, and, though you might not think it or Mr. Paur, it had more emotion. A rehearing of it brings new convictions of its permanence, but it is still hard to see in what respects it differs from Dvorák's work that was done under home influences. The negro and Indian themes, if we can accept them as such, might be mere accidents, like the accident that made Schumann use "Oh, Susanna, Comin' Down the Hill" as the motive for the scherzo in his Third symphony. That is the most American thing in European music, though it was not intended to be American, of course. The Lachner suite, with a charitable omission of about fifteen of the twenty-three variations and the "Bartered Bride" overture were played with an abounding spirit.

Miss Carlotta Desvignes, a young and very earnest woman, in criticisable clothing and dramatic manner, sang the "Weep, weep, my eyes," from Massenet's "The Cid," and an air from Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah." There are so many feeble and ugly things in the Massenet piece that Saint-Saën's showed most fair after it. Miss Desvignes has a musical voice that she forces, curiously, into unmusical effects at times, but the foundation is good, and, as she seems a young woman of understanding and energy, she will make her way through the world, I'll warrant.

The other soloist was Mr. Leo Schulz. This young man is familiar to all patrons of the orchestra, because he sits in the front rank of the 'cellists, beside Mr. Schroeder, and is always very solemn. He suggests a mixture of Henry Irving and a German parish priest. He is an industrious and conscientious performer on the 'cello, and in the Schumann 'cello concerto he was a grateful relief from the usual exhibitive and flamboyant artist who thinks more of his virtuosity than he does of his music, and more of his audience than of his art. An occasional dryness of tone and lack of smoothness was perhaps to be expected in a style that had so much energy and command in it. While he was playing I noticed that his forehead had grown up to the top of his head, and, strange as it may seem, every 'cello player in the band had a forehead of the same kind. Notice it when it comes here again. The influence of 'cello playing on hair is something that the capillary specialists of the future will do well to consider. The next appearances of the orchestra are set down for March 15 and 16.

On Saturday afternoon the Kneisel Quartet gave another concert in Wissner Hall, which was quietly delightful and which drew out a good audience. Sgambati's quartet in D flat major, Beethoven's quartet in G major and Edward Schuett's quartet for violin, viola, 'cello and piano were the numbers. The Schuett piece was new. It was light and pure in its intention, unsensational but musicianly in form and was expressively performed with the aid of Mr. Arthur Whiting, who is a pianist of no exceeding brilliancy but of a faithfulness and readiness that are worth more in the long run. At the next concert Mrs. Rive-King will be the soloist, and the quartet will also make an appearance in the Institute concert course.

And, speaking of pianists, Mrs. Paur gave her second recital in Historical Hall on Thursday. Her audience was rather unexpectedly large, and it listened to her with respect, but she never stirred it, and her readings were marked by a cold correctness and lack of emotion. She does a good educational work, no doubt, especially among girl students, who seem to form a goodly part of her audiences, for she is a safe, conservative player, and would commit no artistic fault, but as time goes on it becomes evident that she will never set the East River on fire—while it is so full of ice.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR offered us rather a light musical bill of fare at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Thursday night in the Metropolitan Opera House. This was the program:

Symphony, No. 8, in F major, op. 93.....Beethoven
Aria, "O ruddier than the cherry," from "Acis and Galatea".....Händel
Fantastic Concerto for violoncello and orchestra (MS.)..C. M. Loeffler
Allegro, D major.
Adagio, B flat major.
Allegro, D major.
Theme Russe: Poco allegretto, D major.
Presto, D major (first time).
Leporello's song from "Don Giovanni".....Mozart
Overture, "Carnival".....Dvorák

The novelty of the evening proved a delightful one. We have several times referred to Mr. Loeffler's marked ability and the very modern trend of his music. While in no sense experimental, this concerto, or more properly suite, gives one the impression of a haphazard impromptu in form and color, although, as in Claude Monet, the color scheme dominates. It is an impressionistic work, but the composer's delicate faculty of selection has enabled him to disengage his motives so that in the luminous haze of his orchestration we are able to define and detach their linked meanings. The concerto is not interrupted by eloquent pauses, it is not organic, it can hardly be called symphonic. Fantasy it is crowded with, as a Hoffman word picture, and the solo part is not selfish or dominating. There is a touch of the South in the first allegro, and the poco allegretto is Slavonic. At times Mr. Loeffler's manipulation of masses suggests Tschaikowsky. He too is fond of melting turquoise and the fire in the opal. The variant of the Theme Russe was masterly; the adagio heartfelt. We heartily congratulate this modest young man and hope that New York will have the pleasure of hearing him play his concertante for violin and orchestra. The part for the solo instrument in this concerto is difficult and not always thankful. The cadenza bristles like a hedge fence. The work is the most significant since Victor Herbert's 'cello concerto, which, let it be said without reservation, ranks easily with Saint-Saëns and Lalo's concertos for the same instrument.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder played the solo with complete mastery of its emotional and mechanical content. It was genuinely legitimate 'cello playing and he fairly won the applause that followed. The composer, too, had to bow his acknowledgments.

The Beethoven symphony was clearly played, without any deviation from traditional tempi. The excerpt from Dr. Dvorák's triple overture was brilliantly read by Mr. Paur. Mr. Watkin Mills, an English basso, who has earned much distinction abroad, made a hit with the Händel aria, which he sang with finish, his enunciation being excellent. The Mozart air was not so satisfactory for it needs the mise en scène of the operatic stage. Mr. Mills was warmly applauded, and this is the simple history of a very nice and brief concert on a very stormy evening in February.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its second concert of this last series on Friday evening in Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall. The première of "Samson et Delila" at the Metropolitan enticed away a host of eclectics. The weather was also bad, yet a fair attendance assembled notwithstanding, and was nobly rewarded by a performance of superlative merit. The program was composed of Haydn's D major quartet, op. 64, No. 5; Mozart's quartet in C major and the Beethoven quartet in E minor, op. 59, No. 2. The sunny, limpid gaiety of Haydn made an apt opening for a night of chill snow and bitter blasts. The quartet threw themselves into it with gusto, and gave the menuetto and vivace in particular with a spirit and glow that sent the blood sparkling through the veins. Mr. Kneisel distinguished himself in the vivace. But then they all distinguished themselves; and in so perfect an ensemble it is almost mistaken to make exceptions. The andante cantabile of the Mozart number was a marvel of purity and sentiment. The program worked through a crescendo of epochs and the spirit of the quartet expanded in accordance until Beethoven received his usual scholarly and sonorous treatment at their hands. It was a fine concert—the acme of enjoyment for chamber music lovers. The next and final concert will take place at this same hall on Friday evening, March 15.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 44.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1895

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA STORY.

Of Herr Paur, Julie Wyman and a Grand Piano.

Within Fifteen Minutes of Concert Time and the Piano, Where?—A Combination of Circumstances and Chance—No Monotony in the Tour—The Home Excitement.

It is in the days when the Symphony orchestra is a-journeying that it makes anecdotes to be stored up as history of the organization by those who take more interest in the accidents and humorous incidents in which the body of musicians figure than they do in the artistic achievements.

If the historian of the orchestra travelled with it when it went on a tour he could write up very many amusing things about the individual members of his pet musical body which would make very diverting reading for the Symphony orchestra girl—who is a feature of Boston life not to be overlooked by any one who wants to know "Boston as she is"—but he could also secure some very good anecdotes which show in what a tender light the management look on the orchestra, and in what an indulgent manner its conductor is viewed, as if, indeed, he were a superior being, who must have the moon if he asked for it, and at least be made to believe that he has it, or is to have it.

When the orchestra is "at home" it is almost impossible for the unexpected to happen. The vigilant lookout matches for its constant watchfulness the discipline in the tower down in the Union station. But when the orchestra is a-journeying—well, that is another story.

It takes the tact of a diplomat to keep every one happy, and with his dignity preserved, and it takes the nerve of a bridge jumper to meet on call the demands or desires of the conductor without letting him see even a hair turn in evidence of his having set a hard task.

Not one of the thousands of people who listen to the orchestra when it is on tour ever guesses of the discipline and the watchfulness required to secure that smoothness and apparent repose in orchestra and men. The things that happen and are concealed from the audience would fill a book. Here is one which all symphony orchestra patrons will appreciate.

It was at Philadelphia, not long ago, and Mrs. Julia Wyman was the soloist. It had been decided that to save the singer the trouble of coming over to Boston to rehearse she should meet them in Philadelphia and run over her songs with the orchestra in the half-hour before the doors were thrown open, the musicians being called for that purpose at 7 o'clock.

The orchestra is very popular in Philadelphia, and the sale of rush seats is always about like that here when Melba or Ysaye are the soloists. It is the custom to open the doors at 7:30 o'clock to admit the rushers. It is the habit of Fred Comee, the assistant manager of the orchestra, to saunter over to the hall at about 7:25 o'clock, see that everything is all right—that the hall is there, the lights and heat in place—and then order the doors open.

On this evening, with the fact that the house was to be tremendous, aiding a good dinner to digest, he pursued his usual habit. He found a great crowd outside. The officer in charge said to him: "You must open these doors at once, the crowd is blocking the street." "All right," was Comee's reply, "just let me see that everything is serene."

He went into the hall. There he found Paur bathed in perspiration, Mrs. Wyman nearly in hysterics, and the orchestra with a general air of demoralization. The orchestra parts of Mrs. Wyman's songs were so bad that they could not be used. "I must have a piano," was the conductor's demand.

It is the etiquette of the manager never to contradict the conductor—just before a concert. So Comee smiled reassuringly, just as if he had been asked for the time. Indeed, he put his hand into his pocket as if about to say, "Have a piano with me," but he only replied, "All right, Mr. Paur."

Calmness cleared the air. The orchestra filed off the stage to the artist's room, Mrs. Wyman went to wipe her eyes—and probably to powder her nose—and the assistant manager ordered the doors open, as if all was right, and then he started on a run for the hotel to find Ellis. He was just dressing. "Paur wants a piano," exclaimed Comee, explaining about the orchestral parts.

Nothing phases Ellis. His immaculate shirt front never even crackled, and not a hair came out of place. "All right," was his only reply, as he got into his coat.

It was then 7:40 o'clock. The concert began at 8. In the natural course of the programme, at 8:15 Mrs. Wyman would be on the stage, and there must be a piano or she would have to sing unaccompanied. Everything was closed up. There was no piano in the building [illegible]

At quarter before 8 Comee and Ellis were back in the hall, allowing Mr. Paur to infer, from their manner, that the piano was right at their heels, and explaining to the man who makes their announcements from the stage, when there were any to be made, that he was to go out after the overture and announce that as the orchestral parts to Mrs. Wyman's songs had not arrived, the singer would appear after, instead of before, the symphony, and sing with a piano accompaniment.

Just opposite the hall there was a club, and some one about the hall knew that the club had bought a new piano, which had just been put in. They rushed over there. There were two men in the club, both equally willing to lend the piano, but both equally without authority to do any such thing. That settled that.

They jumped into a cab, with the piano, for all they could see, a hundred miles away, and Mrs. Wyman's song coming nearer and nearer. They told the driver to go like mad to Steinway's, hoping to find some one there. The Jehu started, at a great pace, in the wrong direction, but they even felt it would be a loss of time to stop him and turn him about, and just at that moment behold there was another piano ware room. It was lighted up. In the doorway stood one of the firm, and—on a dray in front of the building was a grand piano, which half a dozen men were just preparing to move into the shop.

In a flash they tumbled out of the cab, and rushed up to the piano man, and almost sooner than it takes to tell it that piano, which had just come in from out of town, was turned about and headed for the hall.

The overture was within two minutes of its finale, when 10 men lugged the big wooden music box into the corridor, and, at the conclusion, it was quietly put on to the platform, wheeled into place, and Mrs. Wyman, accompanied by Zach, came on in her proper place in the programme, sung her songs, and no one in the audience knew what a rush at fate the managers had taken, or how near the programme had been to being upset.

It is true that the piano was shockingly out of tune, but Mr. Paur had what he asked for, a piano, as easily, so far as he could see, as if he had wanted the evening paper. He had not stipulated for a "good" piano, or one in tune, he had just asked for a plain piano, and he got it.

It is incidents of this sort that relieve the travelling of the Symphony orchestra of monotony, and prevent its managers from taking on a superabundance of flesh.

The same result is effected in town by the exactions of the audience, and that mad rush on Friday afternoons, a feature of the Symphony concerts that would leave the rehearsal quite barren of excitement, if the attempt to put a stop to it was successful.

If any one wants to study human nature he ought just to take Mr. Comee's place there when the assistant manager cheerfully helps out the door tender at that perilous point at the foot of the first flight of stairs, some pleasant afternoon when a great soloist is here. The women who wait there two hours know what they are waiting for—it's the sublime chance of having the best seat in the upper balcony at admission price. They know what a rush it is, and some of them get just as mad every week, but luckily there is an hour of rest up there before the concert begins, and those who get seats have recovered their tempers long before the orchestra comes in.

If you ask any one concerned with the management of the Symphony concerts what they think of the advisability of reserving those seats up there he will laugh and assure you that that would make the patrons of the rush seats just as mad as hornets. There are only 466 seats up there, and double that number of rushers have an equal chance of getting one of those seats, and that hope does not die as long as there is an empty seat; but 400 people would be as mad as March hares, however mad that may be, if they were told "seats are all sold." They like the risk and the tricks they do to circumvent one another, and the trained skill which some girls, who have occupied those rush seats for years, acquire, is well worth study.

They want fair play, however, and they make it very nasty for those who play false. For example, there was a man in the orchestra who had a very clever way of saving a seat for one of his family. He used to go in the artists' entrance and go up in the balcony and sit down, having told his daughter or wife, or whoever it was who came, just where to find him, and then when she arrived he would give up the seat. This worked beautifully until some one who always rushed for the seats near him began to suspect that this first arrival did not rush up the stairway with the rest of the crowd, and found out who he was and complained of him. This is only one of several tricks of that sort, but they never go long undetected.

The woman who gets the good seat is usually the girl who does not lose her temper or her wind, who looks on the rush as unpleasant but necessary, a few moments' discomfort for a much desired reward. She has but one idea—to get through the crowd, dash up the two flights of stairs, find a seat, and rest until she gets over the scramble, and she is usually calm and happy by the time the concert begins. She wastes no time scolding other people. Indeed, she does not bother about them, looking on it as a fair fight, but no favor.

The woman who usually gets hurt and gets left is the bad tempered one, who is not used to the rush. She usually begins by trying to shake the door keeper in her anger, and in endeavoring to stem the stampede to her gait she gets left, gets wraps torn off, and while she is wasting her breath and getting palpitation by trying to run up stairs and scold all the time, all the seats are taken, and then she wastes more breath going down stairs to complain to the helpless manager.

The Symphony scrambler—and she has came to stay, in spite of scolders, scoffers, and angry people—who gets along best is she of happy disposition, who accepts things without trying to improve them, makes the best of established conditions, and even takes her turn at standing with a cheerful complacency, simply saying, "Well, it's a good deal for the money if I have to stand," and she enjoys herself.

She is the same girl that you will see standing two weeks from now, in that long line of admission ticket holders at the door of our improvised opera house [illegible] Huntington avenue, waiting for the doors to open, and who, even after two or three hours of waiting in the street will be able to lean over from her good vantage ground up aloft, and applaud with a vigor that seems to have grown with her waiting. She has a keenness of enjoyment which those in the fashionable seats below may well envy her, for it cannot be purchased like a seat coupon by the season ticket holders. It is indeed the compensation of those who make some sacrifices to secure their pleasures.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 17, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach as Soloist Given a Most Cordial Reception.

With a single exception, the Symphony concert of last night was as classical as anyone might desire, even though that one form, the symphony itself, was missing from the programme. As it was, the concert was made up of a couple of overtures, a concerto for piano, a Brahms serenade, a fragmentary bit from Beethoven's music to "Egmont," and a march.

Really the most important number of the evening was the overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," composed by Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra. The overture has, in its orchestration, much that is very ambitious, and only in a few places is there any trace of the novice. It opens with a pretty pastoral melody, with a soft blending of muted violins, violas and horns, following which come the flutes, oboes and clarinets, in charming passages oft repeated. As the overture progresses its strength is intensified until some strongly dramatic passages are brought boldly to the front. The overture is founded on a simple theme, which constantly recurs in new and novel forms. The composition was well received, and a further hearing will be awaited with interest of this modest composer, whom Conductor Paur insisted should come forward and bow his acknowledgments.

Mrs. Beach's playing in Saint-Saens's concerto in G minor was delightful. From the first note, she played with firmness, decision and real enthusiasm. The concerto has three movements, the second of which is a graceful scherzo, and which the soloist read in beautiful style, rousing her audience to considerable enthusiasm. At the close of the concerto Mrs. Beach was given several recalls, and was the recipient of several floral offerings.

The Brahms serenade for small orchestra was referred to on the programme as "without violins," but if the second violins were missing, the first were very much in evidence. The programme also forgot to state that this was the first time it was played at these concerts. It is a very dignified composition, and follows the sonata form quite closely in its fine movements, the second of which is a scherzo, lively and playful. Following this came a curious juxtaposition, in the shape of Clarchen's death, from Beethoven's music to Goethe's "Egmont," and the Turkish march from the "Ruins of Athens," by the same composer. The first is very short, and painfully mournful. However, it was most intelligently read by Mr. Paur's musicians. The Turkish march, with its bizarre effects, has been heard here before, and is thoroughly martial and full of fire. The Schubert overture in D major, although new, had a bad place on the programme, coming at the end. It is especially free from intricate development, and is tuneful in a large degree. The concert next week contains no novelties, and is made up of compositions by Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1895.

The Fifteenth Symphony Concert in Music Hall—First Production of Gustav Strube's Overture, "The Maid of Orleans."

This was the program of the Symphony concert last evening, under Mr. Paur's direction:

Overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," in F major (MS.), first time.....Strube
Concerto for piano No. 2, in G minor..Saint-Saens
Serenade for small orchestra (without violins) in A major, Op. 16.....Brahms
(a) Clarchen's death, from "Edgmont."
(b) Turkish march, from "The Ruins of Athens."
Beethoven
Overture in the Italian style in D major, first time.....Schubert

The program-book gives this information concerning Mr. Strube: "Gustav Strube was born at Ballenstedt, a little town in Anhalt, not far from Halberstadt, on March 3, 1867, and is still living in Boston. His father was town musician in his native place, and it was from him that he got his first musical instruction. Afterward Strube studied four years at the Conservatorium in Leipzig; the violin under Adolf Brodsky, the pianoforte under Alois Keckendorf, and composition under Karl Reinecke and Salomon Jadassohn. After leaving the institution, he went to Mannheim, where he was engaged as teacher at the Conservatory. In 1891 he came to the United States, and has been since then one of the first violins in the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The story of the neurotic, hysterical Maid of Orleans has appealed to many makers of music. There are 15 operas that bear her name, and among the composers of them are Verdi, Tschaikowsky and Balfe. There are ballets, pantomimes, cantatas, and a piano sonata. There is Moszkowsky's symphonic poem; there are Thadewaldt's "Symphonische Illustrationen." Gounod and Godard wrote music for French tragedies of which the Maid was the heroine. Much music has been written for Schiller's play. The music at the first production in Berlin (1801) was by B. A. Weber. Among the composers of more modern incidental music are Leopold Damrosch (1857), Bruch (1859), and Södermann.

***

Mr. Strube's overture is fresh and interesting. It is pictorial without vulgarity or sensationalism. With the title given and a knowledge of Schiller's tragedy, the hearer is reminded by the music of scenes in a romantic life. The pastoral episode, the call to arms, the fierce conflict, the figure of the maid, her death; these are all defined clearly, and often ingeniously. There is respect for form throughout as becomes a pupil of Salomon Jadassohn, yet this respect does not strangle the fancy. There are many skillful strokes that it would be a pleasure to describe; noticeable, for instance, is the modulation with its instrumental dress that ushers in the reappearance of the second theme (clarinet) of the allegro. The closing measures should be rescored. As the final chord now stands, the effect is one of vague unpleasantness.

Mr. Strube may well plume himself on his success. This overture is creditable to him, and the audience evidently liked it.

***

The serenade of Brahms is for the most part a dull and dreary thing. Some may claim that the absence of violins may bring about the melancholy result, and quote knowingly the one-act opera of Méhul ("Uthal"), in which the composer substituted violas for violins in order to gain color. (This opera, by the way, was revived this season in Munich, where it was voted a bore.) But the monotony in this serenade is one of thought rather than dress. Then the first movement and the adagio are so spun out; they are longer than a Russian night or novel. Let us commit blasphemy and be done with it; the serenade is a weariness to the flesh and the spirit.

***

The peculiar charm of Mrs. Beach as a pianist was not felt in her performance of the concerto by Saint-Saëns. The work demands a player of greater authority, breadth and passion. In the first movement her technique was not flawless, and the rhythm was not always sharply marked. 'Twas in the scherzo that she appeared at her best; here her touch was appropriately crisp, and her performance fluent and clear. Yet, in the scherzo the piano chords that introduce the brilliant strain for the 'celios should have been declaimed with greater brilliancy and dash. This concerto is a man's concerto, and the man must have temperament as well as elegance and fluency.

***

The other pieces on the program do not call for comment.

Mr. Apthorp, the compiler of the program book, says on page 590: "The real facts are, however, that, although florid figural ornamentation is very characteristic of Turkish melody, any so strongly marked and snappy rhythm as that of this march is quite foreign to Turkish music; and, as for the big drum and cymbals, the Turks never used them at all. The cymbals are essentially an Hebrew instrument."

Other writers, and they are men of authority, do not agree with Mr. Apthorp. It is true that the Turks had little or no music before the time of Amurath IV., and the conquest of Bagdad, 1638. The Turks then learned about music from the Persians. Before the introduction of European music into Turkey, the Turkish military bands used both drums and cymbals. They used little drums, and a drum three feet long called the "daul," which was beaten on one end by a big stick, on the other by a little stick. The band varied with the rank of the officer in command. A pacha of three tails was allowed two pair of cymbals. (See Kastner's "Manuel General de Musique Militaire," Paris, 1848, pp. 146, 147.)

Nor are the cymbals "essentially an Hebrew instrument." The Hebrews did not receive the cymbals from the Egyptians, but from the Assyrians, who delighted in all manner of musical noises.

PHILIP HALE.

The Musical Courier of the 13th published this entertaining sketch of that excellent 'cellist and musician, Mr. Schulz of the Symphony Orchestra. The occasion was the last concert of the Boston orchestra in Brooklyn: "The other soloist was Mr. Leo Schulz. This young man is familiar to all patrons of the orchestra, because he sits in the front rank of the 'cellists, beside Mr. Schroeder, and is always very solemn. He suggests a mixture of Henry Irving and a German parish priest. He is an industrious and conscientious performer on the 'cello, and in the Schumann 'cello concerto he was a grateful relief from the usual exhibitive and flamboyant artist who thinks more of his virtuosity than he does of his music, and more of his audience than of his art. An occasional dryness of tone and lack of smoothness was perhaps to be expected in a style that had so much energy and command in it. While he was playing I noticed that his forehead had grown up to the top of his head, and, strange as it may seem, every 'cello player in the band had a forehead of the same kind. Notice it when it comes here again. The influence of 'cello playing on hair is something that the capillary specialists of the future will do well to consider."

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Herald.
SUNDAY, FEB. 17, 1895.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

Repertory of the First Week of the Grand Opera Season.

Last Week of "Dr Syntax"—Concerts Tonight—Coming Events.

The program of the Symphony orchestra concert, last night, presented unusual attractions. There were two pieces played for the first time by the orchestra in Boston, and Mrs Beach was soloist of the occasion.

The concert began with Gustav Strube's "Overture to Shiller's Maid of Orleans, in F major." Herr Staube is a very accomplished musician, who plays one of the first violins in the Symphony orchestra, and his composition proved one of sustained and dignified merit. The main body of the overture is redolent with delicate phrasing and the themes are expressive and melodious. It is somewhat elaborate in its development, but the ending is highly dramatic and extremely effective. It afforded the orchestra opportunities for excellent work, and the reading of it elucidates the best features of the composition, which was received by the audience with prolonged applause.

Mrs Beach played Camille Saint Saens concerto for pianoforte in G major, accompanied by the orchestra. In the first part she displayed great skill in the execution and remarkable appreciation of the spirit of the composition. The sudden transitions from extremely rapid figures to slow tempos was performed by her with great force and she interpreted the theme with considerable delicacy and charm.

The second movement afforded great scope, both for the orchestra's excellent work and Mrs Beach's skill on the pianoforte. The dainty theme did not suffer at her nimble playing, and in its development, where she alternates with the orchestra, she displayed remarkable techneque.

The brilliant passage work of the third movement, executed by a wonderful rushing over the scale, the recalling of the first and second themes, and the elucidation of the melody was performed by Mrs Beach with striking effect. She was enthusiastically applauded and recalled by the appreciative audience.

Brahms is always a favorite at the symphony concerts, and his "Serenade for Small Orchestra," which was played last night was thoroughly enjoyable. Mr Paue's interpretation elicited the most delicate and the strongest features of the piece, and the orchestra's work was brilliant, effective and strikingly impressive. The grace with which the fourth movement was given and the charm with which the fifth movement was rendered threw in relief all the rhythm and fascinating theme of the composition.

"Clarchen's Death" and "The Turkish March," by Beethoven, followed by Franz Schubert's "Overture in the Italian Style," concluded the concert.

This overture which was played last night for the first time in Boston is in Italian style because it has no second movement. The whole overture is based on the development of one melody. The themes are simple, but the development of the second theme in F major is somewhat elaborate. The third part is very much like the first, only the second theme is in B flat major. It affords scope for brilliant work for the violins and the wind instruments, and the orchestra availed itself of the opportunity.

The next rehearsal will be given Thursday afternoon instead of Friday. The program for this and the Saturday evening concert will be as follows: Concerto grosso, Handel; symphony No. 12, in B flat, Haydn; overture, "Entfuhrung aus dem Serail," Mozart; overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; Centennial March, Wagner.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 48.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mrs. Beach the Soloist—Mr. Strube's Overture a Pleasing Surprise.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, was:

Overture to Schiller's "Jungfrau von Orleans," op. 8 (MS. first time).....Strube
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, op. 22.....Saint-Saens
Serenade for small orchestra, in A major, op. 16.....Brahms
Clarchen's Death, from "Egmont," op. 84.....Beethoven
Marcia alla Turca, from "Die Ruinen von Athen," op. 113.....Beethoven
Overture in the Italian style, in D major.....Schubert

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the soloist. Mr. Strube's overture was a genuine and a pleasurable surprise. The composer is a young man, not yet 30 years of age, and is one of the first violins in the Symphony orchestra. The overture is manifestly an attempt to paint the more striking moments of Schiller's tragedy, and may perhaps be classed as programme music; but the work is perfectly clear as music, pure and simple, and would be listened to with unbroken interest, and present no obstacle to a perfect understanding of it as such, if it were presented as a concert overture and without any other title. Though in the extreme modern school, as far as harmonic and orchestral treatment is concerned, it is quite regular in form. The themes are strong, well chosen and artistically contrasted, the second subject, delivered by the clarinet, being of extreme melodic beauty and tender grace of sentiment. The overture is pervaded by a fine and healthy vigor, has an independent individuality and a marked originality, is strong in dramatic feeling and impressive in power. The instrumentation is rich and clear, and shows a thorough knowledge of the resources of modern orchestration. The instruments are used with a perfect acquaintance with their respective distinguishing qualities, and always with a keen musicianly discretion. There is no overcrowding of the score, and even in the stormiest moments of the work the effect is never blurred. There are many charming and brilliant passages for the wood wind, and the brass is used in a masterly manner. In the "working out" there is some very clever contrapuntal treatment of the leading themes. The overture is brimful of talent of the best order, and is abundant in high promise. It was thoughtfully read by Mr. Paur, to whom, by the way, it is dedicated, and was splendidly played. At the close there was a spontaneous outburst of applause, and the young composer was recalled twice from his place in the orchestra to come forward and bow his acknowledgments, a compliment that was wholly deserved.

The Brahms Serenade, in five movements, has some charming moments in the opening movement, and the brief scherzo is bright, but for the rest the work is indescribably dull and dreary. It may be freely conceded that it is well made music, but it is labored in style, diffuse, abstruse and barren of anything that appeals successfully or pleasingly to the emotions. As a serenade it is better calculated to inspire sleep than to keep one awake. Despite the admirable manner in which it was interpreted and played, it fell flat.

Mrs. Beach, who was received with great cordiality, performed the familiar Saint-Saens concerto. The work made exactions on her physical powers which were not fully met in the opening movement, and to which she responded with still less success in the finale. In the more fiery moments of the latter she was least happy, and was at times barely audible. In the scherzo, however, she was heard with delightful results. This was played with a fine and delicate grace of technique and a keenly artistic sympathy with the spirit of the music. Here Mrs. Beach was heard at her very best in regard to both style and execution. The applause that followed her performance was very enthusiastic, and she was obliged to respond to three vigorous recalls, in each of which she was presented with some handsome masses of flowers.

It was announced on the programmes that the Schubert Italian overture was given for the first time at these concerts on this occasion. The statement was erroneous, for the work was played during the season of 1883-84, under Mr. Henschel.

The selections for the next concert are: Concerto Grosso, Handel; Symphony No. 12, B-flat, Hayden; Overture, "The Escape from the Seraglio," Mozart; Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; "Centennial March," Wagner. The public rehearsal will be held on Thursday, Friday being a holiday.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 17.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night the fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall. The following is the programme:

Overture, "Maid of Orleans" (M. S.).....Gustave Strube
Concerto for Pianoforte, G-minor, No. 2.....Saint Saëns
Serenade, A-major, op. 15.....Brahms
Claercheins Death, "Egmont" } .....Beethoven
Turkish March, "Ruins of Athens" }
Overture in the Italian style.....Schubert

The soloist of the evening was Mrs. H. Beach and high prise is due her for her interpretation of the Saint-Saëns concerto. In the first place Mrs. Beach is an artist by instinct and as a consequence no work falls below the high art level in her hands. Then her naturally sound taste has been reinforced by the most intelligent study, and though it may happen now and then, that one may not agree with her interpretation, it is impossible to doubt her intelligence. Technically there is nothing to find fault with. Mrs. Beach's skill is fully equal to all the demands made upon it, her educated fingers are capable of expressing all shades of meaning, with all shades of power, and if the high grade of excellence is not always maintained, it is due to the lack of physical endurance, and not the lack of skill. The first movement of the concerto was played with feeling and brilliancy, here and elsewhere the rapid passages were played with clearness and rare equality of touch. The second movement was given with dainty grace and refinement of expression, and with a fine appreciation of its airy gayety. The technical work was of the best. The third movement was artistically interpreted but was somewhat lacking in dash and in brilliancy, the spirited work of the orchestra the more strongly emphasizing these defects, which were due not to lack of taste but to lack of power and physical endurance. The taste was faultless, the technical work admirable, and the enthusiastic applause well merited.

The overture by Mr. G. Strube, of the Symphony Orchestra is an excellently imagined work; it is dramatic and somewhat spasmodic, but it is worked out in the true artistic spirit, with talent supported by knowledge. It is suave, majestic and fiery by turns, and yet it is lacking in artistic self-reserve, all that has been thought and imagined has been elaborately set down, and there is no suggestion of that reserved power which distinguishes genius as opposed to talent. The work is strong, notwithstanding, and with a tender vein of poetical fancy running through it. It is so excellent in quality that it arouses a curiosity to hear the other works of the composer.

The Brahms serenade is in the master's genial mood. The first movement is particularly fascinating, with at times a dainty delicacy that seems foreign to the large and impatient touch of this master. Does the scherzo hint that Brahms is occasionally human enough to be trivial? The work was played with fine effect, the elaborate third movement being especially noteworthy for the clearness and unerring skill with which it was interpreted.

The programme for the next concert includes Handel's Concerto Grosso; Haydn's Symphony, No. 12; Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio;" Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House;" and Wagner's Centennial March.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 18, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

"THE MAID OF ORLEANS," BY GUSTAV STRUBE.

A Composition of More Than Ordinary Merit—Mrs. Beach, as Pianist, Confirms the Promise of Her Earlier Work—A Mixture of Schools and Styles in the Programme.

The concert of Saturday presented the greatest mixture of schools and styles of composition that could be gathered upon a programme of moderate length, and it may be doubted whether even a musical gourmand could digest all of the courses. The opening number was an overture by a young member of our orchestra, and unless all signs fail, the best composer within its ranks. The overture to "The Maid of Orleans," by Gustav Strube, is a composition of more than ordinary merit. Although it leans too heavily in the Wagnerian direction of strong dramatic effect and free polyphony, there is a good degree of symmetry in its themes and their treatment, and the orchestral colors are laid on with a firm hand. It is of course military from the very first, and the horn call in the first measures of the introduction gives intimation of what the auditor is to expect. It must be remembered that Schiller's picture of the Maid of Orleans (which this work represents) swerves as far from historical fidelity on the one side as Shakespeare's does on the other; in this presentation of the subject we have the Maid triumphant at the last, dying in the moment of victory, saving by her heroism the French king and army, and uttering as last blissful thought, the words,—

"Hinauf—Hinauf—die Erde flieht zu-rueck—
Kurz ist der Schmerz, und ewig ist die
Freude."

Therefore the apotheosis of the finale is well justified by the poet. The pastoral touches, which Mr. Strube has given in excellent scoring, are in good contrast with the military themes and their treatment, and the melancholy theme of the introduction might well be the farewell which Johanna takes of her peaceful fields in the early scenes of the tragedy. In some of these pastoral touches one finds a slight flavor of "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried." Trumpets, trombones, piccolo, and even tambour militaire one finds in full measure in the warlike scenes, and the boldest of contrasts, particularly the sudden drop from a sforzando tutti into a delicate solo. The return of themes at the close is not clear, at all events at a single hearing, since thematic development seems to extend to the very coda. Summing up this work one can say that the composer has good musical ideas, much ability in scoring, and decided dramatic instinct, but a trifle less of "Sound and Fury," a clarified style, would be an added advantage. The public gave much applause and the composer was twice obliged to bow his acknowledgments.

Then came St. Saens' G minor concerto with Mrs. H. H. A. Beach at the piano. It is a pleasure to state that the pianist who gave such great promise in her childhood has not retrograded. In the first movement her shading ran to extremes and there seemed to be but few gradations between forte and piano, but some of this fault must be placed upon the composer rather than upon the executant, and the ensemble was generally excellent. Mrs. Beach made a great success in the second movement, a dainty Scherzando, in which her crisp, demi-staccato style suited the composition admirably, and the scale-work was as clear as crystal. The orchestra deserves credit too, for such a perfect ensemble, such balance against the soloist, and such delicacy of shading can seldom be heard.

In the final Saltarello there was also some commendable playing both by soloist and orchestra. The difficult chord skips were made with absolute surety, and there was some fine octave work in the solo part. Several recalls and a large floral tribute rewarded the artist at the conclusion of the concerto. Now followed Brahms' Serenade, Op. 16, the one without violins. The ablest critics abroad go into raptures about this work, but it is not one which will ever become very popular; it is remarkably chaste in style, has much beauty of themes and excellent development, but it is and remains "musicians' music," and there is a certain phlegmatic reserve about it which would scarcely seem to lead to enthusiasm.

It represents both the young and the mature Brahms (just as the "Faust" overture is representative of two epochs in Wagner's development), for although written in Bonn in 1860, it was retired by the composer and finally issued in a revised form in Vienna in 1875. The discarding of the violins was not a new idea; about a hundred years ago Napoleon Bonaparte consulted Mehul on the possibility of writing an opera without violins, and the result was "Uthal," in which nothing higher than the viola appears in the string orchestra. Brahms himself made a more legitimate use of this same device in the funeral march of his greatest work, the German Requiem, for the viola is the instrument which best pictures brooding sorrow, or melancholy (the English horn gives the same effect in the wind-tones), and here the prominence of this instrument was well chosen. But in this Serenade the absence of violins gives a too continuous solemnity; one feels as Gretry did at the performance of "Uthal" when he cried out, "I would give a thousand francs for one violin tone!"

Yet one must thank Mr. Paur for presenting this work and for giving it so well. If one were to be guided only by public appreciation at such highly educational concerts, one might give an endless round of Auber, "Tabasco" marches, or "Pizzicati" of Delibes; such a composition, of world-wide fame, must needs be heard, whether it is entirely relished or not, and we are not sure but that the public might not "first endure, then pity, then embrace."

The first movement was very beautiful in its serious calm, an effect which Brahms more than any other composer manages to impart to his allegro forms. Here the bassoons did some praiseworthy work. The Scherzi are, and it was probably the knowledge of this shortcoming which led to his eventually superseding the Scherzo with the Intermezzo. The Adagio is one of the strong movements and is a fine picture of gentle melancholy; by itself it would probably charm more than in the Serenade, for it paints gray upon gray in its present position. The final Rondo was also interesting and masterly, although a plaintive countertheme forbade a complete estcape from sad solemnity. There was some excellent flute-playing in the marchlike ending, and the oboes did artistic service in almost every movement, for they are made especially prominent by Brahms in this work.

Now (for a change!) came a melancholy tone-picture, the portrayal of Claerchen's death, by Beethoven. One does not weep copiously over Goethe's heroine, for after reading Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic," one feels as skeptical about her as Betsy Prig about Mrs Harris. The number was excellently performed, however, and the stationary tone (organ-point) upon the horn reminded of a similar effect upon the same instrument in the trio of the scherzo of the seventh symphony. After adding this tinge of black to the various shades of gray that had preceded, there came Oriental revelry in the shape of Beethoven's "Turkish March," which is about as genuine as our confectioner's Turkish fig paste, but, authenticity aside, is an attractive rhythm to tap one's feet to, and which naturally evoked more applause than the whole of Brahms' serenade.

The final number of this sedate programme landed the auditor in the borderland between humor and puerility. One can understand the fact that some critics held Schubert's "Overture in Italian Style," in D, to be a parody of the lightness of Rossini, for some of the themes are dressed out in an amount of fluting that goes beyond legitimate costume. Flute and oboe and oboe and flute interchanged in tunes that had a simpering simplicity, that sounded exasperating after all the dark dignity of sorrow that had gone before; it was as if one had endeavored to enliven a funeral with a comic recitation. But it was excellently played, and served to show that Mr. Paur can win his successes in widely differing schools, he has a versatility which has not yet received due acknowledgment. And so the musical banquet which had begun with roast beef ended with a thin soup, but nobody went away hungry.

Louis C. Elson.

[96]

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, FEB. 17, 1895.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

Repertory of the First Week of the Grand Opera Season.

Last Week of "Dr Syntax"—Concerts Tonight—Coming Events.

The program of the Symphony orchestra concert, last night, presented unusual attractions. There were two pieces played for the first time by the orchestra in Boston, and Mrs Beach was soloist of the occasion.

The concert began with Gustav Strube's "Overture to Shiller's Maid of Orleans, in F major." Herr Staube is a very accomplished musician, who plays one of the first violins in the Symphony orchestra, and his composition proved one of sustained and dignified merit. The main body of the overture is redolent with delicate phrasing and the themes are expressive and melodious. It is somewhat elaborate in its development, but the ending is highly dramatic and extremely effective. It afforded the orchestra opportunities for excellent work, and the reading of it elucidates the best features of the composition, which was received by the audience with prolonged applause.

Mrs Beach played Camille Saint Saens concerto for pianoforte in G major, accompanied by the orchestra. In the first part she displayed great skill in the execution and remarkable appreciation of the spirit of the composition. The sudden transitions from extremely rapid figures to slow tempos was performed by her with great force and she interpreted the theme with considerable delicacy and charm.

The second movement afforded great scope, both for the orchestra's excellent work and Mrs Beach's skill on the pianoforte. The dainty theme did not suffer at her nimble playing, and in its development, where she alternates with the orchestra, she displayed remarkable techneque.

The brilliant passage work of the third movement, executed by a wonderful rushing over the scale, the recalling of the first and second themes, and the elucidation of the melody was performed by Mrs Beach with striking effect. She was enthusiastically applauded and recalled by the appreciative audience.

Brahms is always a favorite at the symphony concerts, and his "Serenade for Small Orchestra," which was played last night was thoroughly enjoyable. Mr Paue's interpretation elicited the most delicate and the strongest features of the piece, and the orchestra's work was brilliant, effective and strikingly impressive. The grace with which the fourth movement was given and the charm with which the fifth movement was rendered threw in relief all the rhythm and fascinating theme of the composition.

"Clarchen's Death" and "The Turkish March," by Beethoven, followed by Franz Schubert's "Overture in the Italian Style," concluded the concert.

This overture which was played last night for the first time in Boston is in Italian style because it has no second movement. The whole overture is based on the development of one melody. The themes are simple, but the development of the second theme in F major is somewhat elaborate. The third part is very much like the first, only the second theme is in B flat major. It affords scope for brilliant work for the violins and the wind instruments, and the orchestra availed itself of the opportunity.

The next rehearsal will be given Thursday afternoon instead of Friday. The program for this and the Saturday evening concert will be as follows: Concerto grosso, Handel; symphony No. 12, in B flat, Haydn; overture, "Entfuhrung aus dem Serall," Mozart; overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; Centennial March, Wagner.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 48.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mrs. Beach the Soloist—Mr. Strube's Overture a Pleasing Surprise.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, was:

Overture to Schiller's "Jungfrau von Orleans," op. 8 (MS. first time).....Strube
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, op. 22.....Saint-Saens
Serenade for small orchestra, in A major, op. 16.....Brahms
Clarchen's Death, from "Egmont," op. 84.....Beethoven
Marcia alla Turca, from "Die Ruinen von Athen," op. 113.....Beethoven
Overture in the Italian style, in D major.....Schubert

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the soloist. Mr. Strube's overture was a genuine and a pleasurable surprise. The composer is a young man, not yet 30 years of age, and is one of the first violins in the Symphony orchestra. The overture is manifestly an attempt to paint the more striking moments of Schiller's tragedy, and may perhaps be classed as programme music; but the work is perfectly clear as music, pure and simple, and would be listened to with unbroken interest, and present no obstacle to a perfect understanding of it as such, if it were presented as a concert overture and without any other title. Though in the extreme modern school, as far as harmonic and orchestral treatment is concerned, it is quite regular in form. The themes are strong, well chosen and artistically contrasted, the second subject, delivered by the clarinet, being of extreme melodic beauty and tender grace of sentiment. The overture is pervaded by a fine and healthy vigor, has an independent individuality and a marked originality, is strong in dramatic feeling and impressive in power. The instrumentation is rich and clear, and shows a thorough knowledge of the resources of modern orchestration. The instruments are used with a perfect acquaintance with their respective distinguishing qualities, and always with a keen musicianly discretion. There is no overcrowding of the score, and even in the stormiest moments of the work the effect is never blurred. There are many charming and brilliant passages for the wood wind, and the brass is used in a masterly manner. In the "working out" there is some very clever contrapuntal treatment of the leading themes. The overture is brimful of talent of the best order, and is abundant in high promise. It was thoughtfully read by Mr. Paur, to whom, by the way, it is dedicated, and was splendidly played. At the close there was a spontaneous outburst of applause, and the young composer was recalled twice from his place in the orchestra to come forward and bow his acknowledgments, a compliment that was wholly deserved.

The Brahms Serenade, in five movements, has some charming moments in the opening movement, and the brief scherzo is bright, but for the rest the work is indescribably dull and dreary. It may be freely conceded that it is well made music, but it is labored in style, diffuse, abstruse and barren of anything that appeals successfully or pleasingly to the emotions. As a serenade it is better calculated to inspire sleep than to keep one awake. Despite the admirable manner in which it was interpreted and played, it fell flat.

Mrs. Beach, who was received with great cordiality, performed the familiar Saint-Saens concerto. The work made exactions on her physical powers which were not fully met in the opening movement, and to which she responded with still less success in the finale. In the more fiery moments of the latter she was least happy, and was at times barely audible. In the scherzo, however, she was heard with delightful results. This was played with a fine and delicate grace of technique and a keenly artistic sympathy with the spirit of the music. Here Mrs. Beach was heard at her very best in regard to both style and execution. The applause that followed her performance was very enthusiastic, and she was obliged to respond to three vigorous recalls, in each of which she was presented with some handsome masses of flowers.

It was announced on the programmes that the Schubert Italian overture was given for the first time at these concerts on this occasion. The statement was erroneous, for the work was played during the season of 1883-84, under Mr. Henschel.

The selections for the next concert are: Concerto Grosso, Handel; Symphony No. 12, B-flat, Hayden; Overture, "The Escape from the Seraglio," Mozart; Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; "Centennial March," Wagner. The public rehearsal will be held on Thursday, Friday being a holiday.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 17.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night the fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall. The following is the programme:

Overture, "Maid of Orleans" (M. S.)....Gustave Strube
Concerto for Pianoforte, G-minor, No. 2....Saint Saëns
Serenade, A-major, op. 15.....Brahms
Claercheins Death, "Egmont" } .....Beethoven
Turkish March, "Ruins of Athens" }
Overture in the Italian style.....Schubert

The soloist of the evening was Mrs. H. Beach and high prise is due her for her interpretation of the Saint-Saëns concerto. In the first place Mrs. Beach is an artist by instinct and as a consequence no work falls below the high art level in her hands. Then her naturally sound taste has been reinforced by the most intelligent study, and though it may happen now and then, that one may not agree with her interpretation, it is impossible to doubt her intelligence. Technically there is nothing to find fault with. Mrs. Beach's skill is fully equal to all the demands made upon it, her educated fingers are capable of expressing all shades of meaning, with all shades of power, and if the high grade of excellence is not always maintained, it is due to the lack of physical endurance, and not the lack of skill. The first movement of the concerto was played with feeling and brilliancy, here and elsewhere the rapid passages were played with clearness and rare equality of touch. The second movement was given with dainty grace and refinement of expression, and with a fine appreciation of its airy gayety. The technical work was of the best. The third movement was artistically interpreted but was somewhat lacking in dash and in brilliancy, the spirited work of the orchestra the more strongly emphasizing these defects, which were due not to lack of taste but to lack of power and physical endurance. The taste was faultless, the technical work admirable, and the enthusiastic applause well merited.

The overture by Mr. G. Strube, of the Symphony Orchestra is an excellently imagined work; it is dramatic and somewhat spasmodic, but it is worked out in the true artistic spirit, with talent supported by knowledge. It is suave, majestic and fiery by turns, and yet it is lacking in artistic self-reserve, all that has been thought and imagined has been elaborately set down, and there is no suggestion of that reserved power which distinguishes genius as opposed to talent. The work is strong, notwithstanding, and with a tender vein of poetical fancy running through it. It is so excellent in quality that it arouses a curiosity to hear the other works of the composer.

The Brahms serenade is in the master's genial mood. The first movement is particularly fascinating, with at times a dainty delicacy that seems foreign to the large and impatient touch of this master. Does the scherzo hint that Brahms is occasionally human enough to be trivial? The work was played with fine effect, the elaborate third movement being especially noteworthy for the clearness and unerring skill with which it was interpreted.

The programme for the next concert includes Handel's Concerto Grosso; Haydn's Symphony, No. 12; Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio;" Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House;" and Wagner's Centennial March.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 18, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

"THE MAID OF ORLEANS," BY GUSTAV STRUBE.

A Composition of More Than Ordinary Merit—Mrs. Beach, as Pianist, Confirms the Promise of Her Earlier Work—A Mixture of Schools and Styles in the Programme.

The concert of Saturday presented the greatest mixture of schools and styles of composition that could be gathered upon a programme of moderate length, and it may be doubted whether even a musical gourmand could digest all of the courses. The opening number was an overture by a young member of our orchestra, and unless all signs fail, the best composer within its ranks. The overture to "The Maid of Orleans," by Gustav Strube, is a composition of more than ordinary merit. Although it leans too heavily in the Wagnerian direction of strong dramatic effect and free polyphony, there is a good degree of symmetry in its themes and their treatment, and the orchestral colors are laid on with a firm hand. It is of course military from the very first, and the horn call in the first measures of the introduction gives intimation of what the auditor is to expect. It must be remembered that Schiller's picture of the Maid of Orleans (which this work represents) swerves as far from historical fidelity on the one side as Shakespeare's does on the other; in this presentation of the subject we have the Maid triumphant at the last, dying in the moment of victory, saving by her heroism the French king and army, and uttering as last blissful thought, the words,—

"Hinauf—Hinauf—die Erde flieht zurueck—Kurz ist der Schmerz, und ewig ist die Freude."

Therefore the apotheosis of the finale is well justified by the poet. The pastoral touches, which Mr. Strube has given in excellent scoring, are in good contrast with the military themes and their treatment, and the melancholy theme of the introduction might well be the farewell which Johanna takes of her peaceful fields in the early scenes of the tragedy. In some of these pastoral touches one finds a slight flavor of "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried." Trumpets, trombones, piccolo, and even tambour militaire one finds in full measure in the warlike scenes, and the boldest of contrasts, particularly the sudden drop from a sforzando tutti into a delicate solo. The return of themes at the close is not clear, at all events at a single hearing, since thematic development seems to extend to the very coda. Summing up this work one can say that the composer has good musical ideas, much ability in scoring, and decided dramatic instinct, but a trifle less of "Sound and Fury," a clarified style, would be an added advantage. The public gave much applause and the composer was twice obliged to bow his acknowledgments.

Then came St. Saens' G minor concerto with Mrs. H. H. A. Beach at the piano. It is a pleasure to state that the pianist who gave such great promise in her childhood has not retrograded. In the first movement her shading ran to extremes and there seemed to be but few gradations between forte and piano, but some of this fault must be placed upon the composer rather than upon the executant, and the ensemble was generally excellent. Mrs. Beach made a great success in the second movement, a dainty Scherzando, in which her crisp, demi-staccato style suited the composition admirably, and the scale-work was as clear as crystal. The orchestra deserves credit too, for such a perfect ensemble, such balance against the soloist, and such delicacy of shading can seldom be heard.

In the final Saltarello there was also some commendable playing both by soloist and orchestra. The difficult chord skips were made with absolute surety, and there was some fine octave work in the solo part. Several recalls and a large floral tribute rewarded the artist at the conclusion of the concerto. Now followed Brahms' Serenade, Op. 16, the one without violins. The ablest critics abroad go into raptures about this work, but it is not one which will ever become very popular; it is remarkably chaste in style, has much beauty of themes and excellent development, but it is and remains "musicians' music," and there is a certain phlegmatic reserve about it which would scarcely seem to lead to enthusiasm.

It represents both the young and the mature Brahms (just as the "Faust" overture is representative of two epochs in Wagner's development), for although written in Bonn in 1860, it was retired by the composer and finally issued in a revised form in Vienna in 1875. The discarding of the violins was not a new idea: about a hundred years ago Napoleon Bonaparte consulted Mehul on the possibility of writing an opera without violins, and the result was "Uthal," in which nothing higher than the viola appears in the string orchestra. Brahms himself made a more legitimate use of this same device in the funeral march of his greatest work, the German Requiem, for the viola is the instrument which best pictures brooding sorrow, or melancholy (the English horn gives the same effect in the wind-tones), and here the prominence of this instrument was well chosen. But in this Serenade the absence of violins gives a too continuous solemnity: one feels as Gretry did at the performance of "Uthal" when he cried out, "I would give a thousand francs for one violin tone!"

Yet one must thank Mr. Paur for presenting this work and for giving it so well. If one were to be guided only by public appreciation at such highly educational concerts, one might give an endless round of Auber, "Tabasco" marches, or "Pizzicati" of Delibes; such a composition, of world-wide fame, must needs be heard, whether it is entirely relished or not, and we are not sure but that the public might not "first endure, then pity, then embrace."

The first movement was very beautiful in its serious calm, an effect which Brahms more than any other composer manages to impart to his allegro forms. Here the bassoons did some praiseworthy work. The Scherzi are, and it was probably the knowledge of this shortcoming which led to his eventually superseding the Scherzo with the Intermezzo. The Adagio is one of the strong movements and is a fine picture of gentle melancholy; by itself it would probably charm more than in the Serenade, for it paints gray upon gray in its present position. The final Rondo was also interesting and masterly, although a plaintive countertheme forbade a complete escape from sad solemnity. There was some excellent flute-playing in the marchlike ending, and the oboes did artistic service in almost every movement, for they are made especially prominent by Brahms in this work.

Now (for a change!) came a melancholy tone-picture, the portrayal of Claerchen's death, by Beethoven. One does not weep copiously over Goethe's heroine, for after reading Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic," one feels as skeptical about her as Betsy Prig about Mrs Harris. The number was excellently performed, however, and the stationary tone (organ-point) upon the horn reminded of a similar effect upon the same instrument in the trio of the scherzo of the seventh symphony. After adding this tinge of black to the various shades of gray that had preceded, there came Oriental revelry in the shape of Beethoven's "Turkish March," which is about as genuine as our confectioner's Turkish fig paste, but, authenticity aside, is an attractive rhythm to tap one's feet to, and which naturally evoked more applause than the whole of Brahms' serenade.

The final number of this sedate programme landed the auditor in the borderland between humor and puerility. One can understand the fact that some critics held Schubert's "Overture in Italian Style," in D, to be a parody of the lightness of Rossini, for some of the themes are dressed out in an amount of fluting that goes beyond legitimate costume. Flute and oboe and oboe and flute interchanged in tunes that had a simpering simplicity, that sounded exasperating after all the dark dignity of sorrow that had gone before; it was as if one had endeavored to enliven a funeral with a comic recitation. But it was excellently played, and served to show that Mr. Paur can with his successes in widely differing schools, he has a versatility which has not yet received due acknowledgment.

And so the musical banquet which had begun with roast beef ended with a thin soup, but nobody went away hungry.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[96]

...Transcript
...DAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1895.

...Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Gustav Strube: Overture to Schiller's "Jungfrau von Orleans," opus 8 (MS.) (First time.)

Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 22.

Brahms: Serenade for Small Orchestra, in A major, opus 16.

Beethoven: a) Clärchens Tod, from "Egmont," opus 84.
b) Marcia alla Turca, from "Die Ruinen von Athen, opus 113.

Schubert: Overture in the Italian Style, in D major. (First time.)

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the pianist.

With the "Jungfrau von Orleans" overture Mr. Strube, for four years one of the first violins in the Symphony Orchestra, made his first bow here as a composer. He was educated in the Leipzig school, being a pupil of Reinecke and Jadassohn; but in this overture he makes a step well out of the circle of his school influences. The overture is essentially a modern work, in feeling, style, and aim; there is not a little of "storm and stress" in it, not a little of physical violence even. But, even at the first hearing, one gets the impression that the young composer knows remarkably well whither he is going and walks his chosen path with very firm step. There are many moments of genuine beauty in the work, some few of real power. Now and then a rather over-naïf turn in the harmony, a melodic phrase not wholly above the commonplace, may strike the ear; but, as a whole, the overture shows true force of feeling, coherency of expression, and a sense for musical beauty. In a word, it shows real talent. In the matter of orchestration, Mr. Strube seems already just on the verge of mastership. The score is full of experiments which remind one of things one has seen in the scores of many an older hand; things one has found to look very tempting on the written or printed page, but which sound very much like anything else you please; the difference with these experiments of Mr. Strube's is, however, that they always sound well, individual, and seem really worth while. Indeed, the scoring of this overture has a certain individual aroma almost throughout; it is not the scoring du premier venu who has studied the art to good purpose. That the overture is a work to stand we will not say; but it is a good earnest of the talent of a young man from whom not a little may be expected.

The performance of Brahms's serenade was a fiasco from beginning to end. Seldom have we seen an audience so bored, and, we will add, legitimately bored. We were bored ourselves, if you come to that. And this was all the more annoying because the work is essentially beautiful and ought, by rights, to bore nobody. This serenade for small orchestra (without violins) is really a magnified piece of chamber music; the wind instruments occupy the foreground nearly throughout, the mass of violas, 'celli and double basses seldom rising above the level of an accompaniment. To put the thing upon an orchestral basis is to do it great wrong: in a large hall the absence of the violins soon becomes well-nigh intolerable; the orchestra has no cutting edge. And this was made all the worse by Mr. Paur's incomprehensibly more than doubling the ranks of the violas; there were twenty-one of them last Saturday evening—where the instruments came from, Heaven knows! It was like putting a double-wide mourning-edge upon the work. Let almost anyone who found the serenade dull and tedious on Saturday only hear it given, say in Bumstead Hall, with a normal mass of strings, and we think he will find pretty bright sunlight where all was November darkness before. And then, too, to give this serenade immediately after the immensely brilliant and telling orchestration of the Saint-Saëns concerto! It was like Mendelssohn's bringing out one of Schumann's symphonies in Leipzig immediately after Rossini's overture to "Guillaume Tell."

From this point the programme became more and more incomprehensible. What has "Clärchens Tod," that exquisite little violet of homely pathos, to do all by itself on a symphony programme? And then to follow it up with the Turkish March! It was almost a desecration; all one could think of was a miniature parody of a military funeral: sober sadness up to the grave, and rollicking jollity all the way home! The Schubert overture, too, was a mistake. It is a work to play through at a rehearsal, perhaps before a dozen or so of invited guests, and then lay aside; to parade it at a concert is to do the composer an injustice. All those ill-combined little scraps of themes which Schubert afterwards used to infinitely better purpose in other works seem pathetically comic here:—the phrase from "Rosamunde" in the introduction, and that terrible little hint in the coda at the glorious stretto of the first movement of the C major symphony. Of course there are movements of charm in the piece, it would not be Schubert's otherwise; but it is one of those works which the composer himself is the first to wish forgotten.

Saint-Saëns's G minor concerto still well maintains its place in the front rank of modern pianoforte concertos. Mrs. Beach played it very beautifully indeed: with an effectiveness that went far to pardon a certain feminine excessiveness in the employment of means. Few persons, for instance, can believe in the enormously slow tempo she took in the contrapuntal introduction to the first movement; it passed all rational bounds. And yet, in a certain sense, it paid: her playing of just this movement was particularly fine and impressive, finished down to the smallest details, yet well subordinating every detail to the total impression. She carries the movement through with conspicuous strength and coherency, with infinite artistic savoir faire; all that can be said on the other side is that one feels that the movement can be made to tell just as strongly with a less lavish outlay of means. Mrs. Beach's playing of the second movement was capital at every point. The third movement she takes at a far more moderate pace than the composer does: with gratifying results as far as clearness goes, but to the loss of a good deal of the effect. To hear Saint-Saëns himself play this movement is, as the Germans say, "to lose sight and hearing!" But, even at her slower tempo, there was no lack of real vim and vigor of accent. Upon the whole, we think Mrs. Beach has never done anything quite so fine yet as her playing of this concerto. She was rightfully recalled after the close.

The next programme is: Handel, concerto grosso in G minor; Haydn, symphony No. 12 (B. & H.), in B-flat major; Mozart, overture to "Die Entführung aus dem Serail;" Beethoven, overture to "Die Weihe des Hauses;" Wagner, Centennial March. The public rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, February 21, Friday being a holiday.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 17, 1895.

There were good things, considered individually, on the fifteenth Symphony programme, but the general effect of the concert was monotonous and dull.

The one real beauty of the occasion was Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's performance of Saint-Saens's second, or G minor, pianoforte concerto. She could hardly have chosen anything better calculated to show her development in the one particular in which her playing has hitherto seemed limited and restricted. To those who did not know the natural modesty and instinctive reserve which, united to her refined taste, have operated to hold her back from anything like display or abandon, her playing must sometimes have appeared so quiet in its emphasis and color as to come pretty near to being phlegmatic—certainly it was passionless. But in this bright, fanciful, merry and almost sportive work, Mrs. Beach advanced into a new manner, and her rendering—large, firm and strong in the unsustained introduction—was elsewhere light, dainty, lively, spirited and almost coquettish in its touch and turn. Nor were the broader and warmer passages confined or cold. Therefore the whole concerto had an appropriately animated, cheery, gay and entertaining presentation. Mrs. Beach's tone was always pure and sweet and the more difficult technicalities—for Saint Saens never forgets to give his player's virtuosity a chance—were clear and commanding in her execution.

The concert began with a new "Maid of Orleans" overture by Mr. Gustave Strube, who sits in the fifth row of the first violins and has a certain pleasant reputation as player, teacher and composer. In the programme-book was one of those descriptions which fall into the "letter which killeth" category and ignore the spirit which giveth life. It told grimly how the music looks on paper, but it gave no clew as to what traits in the life of Joan of Arc or what episodes in her career had vitalized the author's thought to the point of composition. The overture might be roughly described as contrasting passages of etherial mildness against others of almost unmitigated ferocity, concluded by a brief strain of aspirant piety. Therefore it may be assumed that Mr. Strube intended to suggest in due sequence Joan's dreamy loneliness in De Quincey's "deep pastoral solitudes," the rumors of wars, the still almost unbroken quietude, the rush and crush of battle, the horror of fate and the placidity of death. If the performance was consistent with the author's ideas—and the reading which we heard on Friday afternoon seemed rather hitch-y, uncertain in attack and over-noisy in the combative portions,—his notions are better than his command of the means of their expression. The roaring fortissimi of all the brass, the rattle of three snare drums and the unrestrained demonstrativeness of kettle-drums and cymbals too often overcame even the most vigorous exertions of the rest of the band and pushed vehemence too nearly into noise. The overture has tunefulness and solid harmony; but it is excessive at times, and there are oddities of figure and of progression which give more shock than satisfaction in their sudden apparition. Yet the work shows thought and ability and gives encouraging promise.

The rest of the programme (for the concerto was the second number) went on without distinction, without enthusiasm and almost without interest. Its third number was that Serenade of Brahms for which the orchestra is compressed and tranquillized by the elimination of the violins. This makes a quaint and generally genial combination; but before the five movements are all done one feels as if this serenade would have exercised rather a soporific than an awakening influence. It is very melodious and gentle throughout, and one can be grateful to Brahms for having at any rate made no display of learning (although his art and skill are traceable throughout) and for having allowed sentiment to carry it over intellect.

Next Mr. Paur put, as a continuation of the still small voicings, Beethoven's "Death of Clarchen," from "Egmont," and followed this with the familiar "Turkish March." As this brought at last a bit of life and sparkle, it would have been well to stop the concert there. But no; another overture must needs be added—one of the two which Schubert wrote "in the Italian style." By that may be understood a short work with a calm slow tune to begin with and a neat fast one to wind up with, both supported on simple accompaniments and ending with a few mildly assertive measures. This was set down as a novelty, but people did not appear to care much about it, although they admitted its tuneful prettiness and fluency.

The orchestra generally played thoughtfully and discriminatingly, Mr. Strube was called out and complimented, and the programme-book—apparently under the delusion that the ingenious self-puffery of its editor's admired music teacher is one of those good things of which one cannot have too much—actually reprinted the very pages of egotism which were published and criticised a week ago!

The programme for next Saturday night is an extraordinary one. It stands thus in the announcement: Handel's "Concerto Grosso;" Haydn's twelfth symphony in B flat; two overtures—Mozart's "Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House;" Wagner's "Centennial" march. Isn't that a dainty dish to set before a king?

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVII., NO. 50.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1895.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

Sixth in the Series at Union Hall—A Fine Performance.

The sixth in the current series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet took place in Union Hall last night. The programme was:

Quartet, D minor (op. posth.).....Schubert
Quintet (first time).....C. M. Loeffler
Septet (for strings and wind).....Beethoven

In the quintet Mr. William Craft assisted, and in the septet Mr. Leon Portean, clarinet, Mr. Albert Hacke Barthy, horn, Mr. Herman Litke, bassoon, and Mr. Emil Golde, contrabasso. There was a very large audience in attendance and it was exceptionally appreciative and enthusiastic in its applause through the concert. The Schubert quartet was exquisitely performed and in a spirit wholly in sympathy with the music. The work is long drawn out, especially in the first movement, which narrowly escapes becoming tiresome in spite of its beauty. The andante, with its strong suggestion of the allegretto con moto of Beethoven's symphony in A, was charmingly read and won a hearty round of applause; and the finale was given with fine vigor and variety of tone color. The quartet seems to have been written while the composer was strongly under the influence of Beethoven, for in the last movement that composer is again recalled by its principal subject, which bears a close resemblance to that of the finale of the Kreutzer Sonata.

Mr. Loeffler's quintet, which is in one movement, and is arranged for the unusual combination, three violins, a viola and a 'cello, is a work of equal force and originality. One may always expect something unconventional and piquant from Mr. Loeffler, and these qualities are prominent in this composition. It begins in a calm vein, with a theme that is almost pastoral in its quietness, but it speedily takes a more fiery and romantic turn, and revels in rhythmical and melodic eccentricities, while its interest is steadily sustained. In common with all the music by the composer that has been heard here, it has a striking individuality that is quite his own. He is notably felicitous in his skill in finding new combinations, and there are many exceedingly ingenious and effective passages, in which the tone color produced is as novel as it is impressive. The work is complicated, but is smoothly and clearly written, and it never loses its hold on the attention. There is a particularly fine moment after the "working out," where the violin and 'cello begin an impassioned conversation, and though the quintet is in the most advanced modern spirit, it shows no signs of labor, but has all the effect of spontaneity in conception and treatment. On the other hand, its design is not quite discoverable on a single hearing.

There appear to be too many episodes that are not well joined to the main design, and the result is somewhat fragmentary, suggesting at times a rhapsodic improvisation. A better acquaintance with a work that is so original and so far out of the beaten track would probably remove this impression. Be that as it may, the quintet is a masterly bit of musicianship, and well sustains the reputation that Mr. Loeffler has deservedly won by his fine 'cello concerto and his brilliant and unique divertissements for the violin. It was played con amore, and was applauded with great fervor, the artist being recalled, and the composer, who was seated in the hall, being compelled to rise in his place and bow his acknowledgments. The familiar Beethoven sextet was splendidly read and played, the warm, smooth and lovely tone of Mr. Portean being heard with fascinating results in the slow movement. It is possibly something very like heresy to write it, much more to believe it, but this work, despite its wealth of graceful melody and delightful effects, seems to have become thoroughly enveloped in an atmosphere of old fashion, and to have become almost quaint. It is a good old fashion, unquestionably, but it is depressing, nevertheless, to associate this especial phase of it with anything bearing the name of Beethoven. The seventh concert will take place Monday, March 18.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, FEB. 19, 1895.

Kneisel Quartet.

A Boston musical audience seldom shows as much enthusiasm as was exhibited at the Kneisel quartet concert last night in Union hall. The concert was a specially attractive one and the audience even larger than usual.

There were only three numbers on the program, but every one of the three was interesting. First came the splendid Schubert quartet in D minor, which is superb at all times and was never played better, it is safe to say, than it was last night. The andante movement was perfect and the presto almost as good. The audience was so much pleased with the performance that Messrs Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroder were twice recalled.

The next number was played last night for the first time. It was the long-expected quintet by Mr Loeffler for three violins, viola and cello. Mr William Krafft of the Symphony orchestra played the third violin part.

Mr Loeffler was unfortunate in having his quintet heard immediately after the beautiful Schubert composition, but the audience was prepared to listen with favor and did so. Although there is but one movement to the quintet it contains material enough for a much longer composition, in fact the most severe criticism is that it contains too much material. Still it is well worth a hearing. The performers were recalled, and Mr Loeffler, who was in the audience, bowed his acknowledgments for the applause.

The Beethoven septet for violin, viola, clarinet, horn, bassoon, cello and double bass completed the program. The players were Messrs Kneisel, Svecenski, Pourtau, Hackebarth, Litke, Schroeder and Golde. It is enough to say that the performance was all that could be desired.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 19, 1895.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

It is a misnomer to entitle the Kneisel concert, given in Union Hall last night, a "quartette" concert, for the organization grew from a quartette in the first number to a quintette in the second and a septette in the final work. It was, however, a red-letter occasion altogether, for Beethoven's Septette has never had so perfect a performance in this city.

It is not the most attractive work in the world to the present writer, for it belongs to Beethoven's first period, and the composer has not thrown off the Haydn style wholly in its measures, but it is brimful of difficulties, and to hear it played without blemish is the event of a lifetime.

Beethoven seems to have vented all his spleen on the horn in this work, and the rapid passages for this instrument in the trio of the minuet are almost impossible; yet Mr. Hackebarth played them clearly, and there was not a palpable slip in the horn part from beginning to end. The clarinette is also given much prominence all through the work, and Mr. Pourtau won new laurels by his clear playing. This artist has a purity of tone and a delicacy of shading that ranks him with the greatest in this field.

The contrabass is given much of the florid work which Beethoven afterwards continued in the fourth and fifth symphonies. Its pizzicato in the finale is also impressive. In all these points Mr. Golde was sure and effective.

The bassoon is not so prominent as the instruments above named, yet in the adagio cantabile it does some important work, and Mr. Lipke gave a smoother tone than is usual on this awkward instrument. Beethoven generally uses the bassoon when he is in a jesting mood, but there are no bassoon jokes in this work as there are in the sixth and eighth symphonies. Of course the strings played well, and it was a pleasure to find Mr. Kneisel's tone on that magnificent violin that he has acquired, broad enough to balance against the augmented forces. And now, since the Beethoven septette has been so well conquered, by all means let us have the Hummel septette, which is not inferior to it.

Next to this great performance, the interest centred in a new quintette by Mr. C. M. Loeffler. It was in a single movement, and was peculiar both in its shape and in the combination used—three violins against viola and violoncello. It seemed to outline three movements, or rather, after a beautiful intermezzo there came a partial recapitulation of themes, but in its strong contrasts and in its somewhat continuous development, it suggested the sonata(?) and symphonic vein of Liszt and Schumann. There was a thoroughly Slavonic flavor to some of the themes, and more than one Russian folk-dance was indicated.

Mr. Loeffler is at his best in such chamber-music, for he leads his voices easily and he develops his themes interestingly. A beautiful use of pastoral organpoint is made towards the latter part of the work, and the interest is sustained throughout.

The concert began with Schubert's D minor quartette. The first movement was not especially well played, but the andante, with its reminiscences of Schubert's own "Der Tod und das Maedchen," and its beautiful variations, was finely given, and the finale went with exceptional spirit. Continuous enthusiasm marked the public appreciation of the concert.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1895.

Mr. Loeffler's Quintet Produced at a Kneisel Quartet Concert—The Second and Last Recital of Mrs. Elene Eaton.

The program of the sixth Kneisel Concert included Schubert's D minor quartet (op. posth); C. M. Loeffler's Quintet in one movement for 3 violins, viola and 'cello (MS. First time); and Beethoven's Septet. The club was assisted in the quintet by Mr. Krafft; in the septet by Messrs. Pourtau, Hackebarth, Litke, and Golde.

The rigid conservative might say of Mr. Loeffler's new composition, "Why quintet, when there is only one movement?" but such criticism would be carping and false. A quintet is a composition for five instruments or for five voices, accompanied or unaccompanied; it may be in 13 movements or in one movement. The very fact that there is but one movement is a welcome relief in these days when so many music-makers flog unwilling Pegasus to plod his weary way through four; and compel him to trot in sonata form, to walk seriously, to be skittish, and finally to galop.

If you ask what this piece by Mr. Loeffler means, the answer is, "The meaning is what you find in it."

Mr. Loeffler is a musician of fine fancy and exquisite taste. He has a highly developed sense of tonal color, and he chooses unexpected and original nuances. His music is never purely decorative. Neither is it program-music in the common acceptation of the phrase. Dearer to him is the form of expression than the thought itself. Not that his music is without substantial thought—far from it; but his hatred of the conventional terms, the "I take my pen in hand" and "Yours truly," is as marked as that of Chopin for a matter-of-fact modulation or a commonplace cadence.

The set rules and ordinances fret Mr. Loeffler. It is as though he said, "Nearly everything has been done in formal fashion. Music, today, when it is absolute, must give, first of all, impressions of tonal color." And in this strange and fascinating quintet it is not so much the opening with its masterly simplicity, not so much the wild, sad theme that suggests Russia—indeed, it may be a memory of a folk-song, for all I know—as it is the delightfully fresh and original treatment. Progressions that when analyzed might seem hair-raising, as arranged for the instruments give the ear a new pleasure. There is a sense of foreign tonality that hints to the hearer the future possibilities of music.

Is this quintet vague, a panorama of singularly colored episodes? Some may so regard it, and yet find in it delight. To me it is much more. It is music that takes one away from the routine of life, the petty cares and annoyances, the shiftings, the deceits. The melancholy of the strains is not pessimistic. There is no dismal attempt at dismal profundity. The hearer for a time is in a new world; he thinks new thoughts; he forgets players and surroundings. In a word Mr. Loeffler has composed music.

***

The performance was admirable, and those assisting gave genuine assistance. To hear Beethoven's Septet played by such artists causes one to forget the purely academic nature of portions of the work. The time will come—may it come soon!—when only the second movement [illegible] serve in concert halls, the majority of [illegible] quartet of Schubert.

[97]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Gustav Strube: Overture to Schiller's "Jungfrau von Orleans," opus 8 (MS.) (First time.)

Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 22.

Brahms: Serenade for Small Orchestra, in A major, opus 16.

Beethoven: a) Clärchens Tod, from "Egmont," opus 84.
b) Marcia alla Turca, from "Die Ruinen von Athen, opus 113.

Schubert: Overture in the Italian Style, in D major. (First time.)

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the pianist.

With the "Jungfrau von Orleans" overture Mr. Strube, for four years one of the first violins in the Symphony Orchestra, made his first bow here as a composer. He was educated in the Leipzig school, being a pupil of Reinecke and Jadassohn; but in this overture he makes a step well out of the circle of his school influences. The overture is essentially a modern work, in feeling, style, and aim; there is not a little of "storm and stress" in it, not a little of physical violence even. But, even at the first hearing, one gets the impression that the young composer knows remarkably well whither he is going and walks his chosen path with very firm step. There are many moments of genuine beauty in the work, some few of real power. Now and then a rather over-naïf turn in the harmony, a melodic phrase not wholly above the commonplace, may strike the ear; but, as a whole, the overture shows true force of feeling, coherency of expression, and a sense for musical beauty. In a word, it shows real talent. In the matter of orchestration, Mr. Strube seems already just on the verge of mastership. The score is full of experiments which remind one of things one has seen in the scores of many an older hand; things one has found to look very tempting on the written or printed page, but which sound very much like anything else you please; the difference with these experiments of Mr. Strube's is, however, that they always sound well, individual, and seem really worth while. Indeed, the scoring of this overture has a certain individual aroma almost throughout; it is not the scoring du premier venu who has studied the art to good purpose. That the overture is a work to stand we will not say; but it is a good earnest of the talent of a young man from whom not a little may be expected.

The performance of Brahms's serenade was a fiasco from beginning to end. Seldom have we seen an audience so bored, and, we will add, legitimately bored. We were bored ourselves, if you come to that. And this was all the more annoying because the work is essentially beautiful and ought, by rights, to bore nobody. This serenade for small orchestra (without violins) is really a magnified piece of chamber music; the wind instruments occupy the foreground nearly throughout, the mass of violas, 'cellis and double basses seldom rising above the level of an accompaniment. To put the thing upon an orchestral basis is to do it great wrong; in a large hall the absence of the violins soon becomes well-nigh intolerable; the orchestra has no cutting edge. And this was made all the worse by Mr. Paur's incomprehensibly more than doubling the ranks of the violas; there were twenty-one of them last Saturday evening—where the instruments came from, Heaven knows! It was like putting a double-wide mourning-edge upon the work. Let almost anyone who found the serenade dull and tedious on Saturday only hear it given, say in Bumstead Hall, with a normal mass of strings, and we think he will find pretty bright sunlight where all was November darkness before. And then, too, to give this serenade immediately after the immensely brilliant and telling orchestration of the Saint-Saens concerto! It was like Mendelssohn's bringing out one of Schumann's symphonies in Leipzig immediately after Rossini's overture to "Guillaume Tell."

From this point the programme became more and more incomprehensible. What has "Clärchens Tod," that exquisite little violet of homely pathos, to do all by itself on a symphony programme? And then to follow it up with the Turkish March! It was almost a desecration; all one could think of was a minature parody of a military funeral: sober sadness up to the grave, and rollicking jollity all the way home! The Schubert overture, too, was a mistake. It is a work to play through at a rehearsal, perhaps before a dozen or so of invited guests, and then lay aside; to parade it at a concert is to do the composer an injustice. All those ill-combined little scraps of themes which Schubert afterwards used to infinitely better purpose in other works seem pathetically comic here:—the phrase from "Rosamunde" in the introduction, and that terrible little hint in the coda at the glorious stretto of the first movement of the C major symphony. Of course there are movements of charm in the piece, it would not be Schubert's otherwise; but it is one of those works which the composer himself is the first to wish forgotten.

Saint-Saëns's G minor concerto still well maintains its place in the front rank of modern pianoforte concertos. Mrs. Beach played it very beautifully indeed; with an effectiveness that went far to pardon a certain feminine excessiveness in the employment of means. Few persons, for instance, can believe in the enormously slow tempo she took in the contrapuntal introduction to the first movement; it passed all rational bounds. And yet, in a certain sense, it paid; her playing of just this movement was particularly fine and impressive, finished down to the smallest details, yet well subordinating every detail to the total impression. She carries the movement through with conspicuous strength and coherency, with infinite artistic savoir faire; all that can be said on the other side is that one feels that the movement can be made to tell just as strongly with a less lavish outlay of means. Mrs. Beach's playing of the second movement was capital at every point. The third movement she takes at a far more moderate pace than the composer does: with gratifying results as far as clearness goes, but to the loss of a good deal of the effect. To hear Saint-Saëns himself play this movement is, as the Germans say, "to lose sight and hearing!" But, even at her slower tempo, there was no lack of real vim and vigor of accent. Upon the whole, we think Mrs. Beach has never done anything quite so fine yet as her playing of this concerto. She was repeatedly recalled after the close.

The next programme is: Handel, concerto grosso in G minor; Haydn, symphony No. 12 (B. & H.), in B-flat major; Mozart, overture to "Die Entführung aus dem Serail;" Beethoven, overture to "Die Weihe des Hauses;" Wagner, Centennial March. The public rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, February 21, Friday being a holiday.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 17, 1895.

There were good things, considered individually, on the fifteenth Symphony programme, but the general effect of the concert was monotonous and dull.

The one real beauty of the occasion was Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's performance of Saint-Saens's second, or G minor, pianoforte concerto. She could hardly have chosen anything better calculated to show her development in the one particular in which her playing has hitherto seemed limited and restricted. To those who did not know the natural modesty and instinctive reserve which, united to her refined taste, have operated to hold her back from anything like display or abandon, her playing must sometimes have appeared so quiet in its emphasis and color as to come pretty near to being phlegmatic—certainly it was passionless. But in this bright, fanciful, merry and almost sportive work, Mrs. Beach advanced into a new manner, and her rendering—large, firm and strong in the unsustained introduction—was elsewhere light, dainty, lively, spirited and almost coquettish in its touch and turn. Nor were the broader and warmer passages confined or cold. Therefore the whole concerto had an appropriately animated, cheery, gay and entertaining presentation. Mrs. Beach's tone was always pure and sweet and the more difficult technicalities—for Saint Saens never forgets to give his player's virtuosity a chance—were clear and commanding in her execution.

The concert began with a new "Maid of Orleans" overture by Mr. Gustave Strube, who sits in the fifth row of the first violins and has a certain pleasant reputation as player, teacher and composer. In the programme-book was one of those descriptions which fall into the "letter which killeth" category and ignore the spirit which giveth life. It told grimly how the music looks on paper, but it gave no clew as to what traits in the life of Joan of Arc or what episodes in her career had vitalized the author's thought to the point of composition. The overture might be roughly described as contrasting passages of etherial mildness against others of almost unmitigated ferocity, concluded by a brief strain of aspirant piety. Therefore it may be assumed that Mr. Strube intended to suggest in due sequence Joan's dreamy loneliness in De Quincey's "deep pastoral solitudes," the rumors of wars, the still almost unbroken quietude, the rush and crush of battle, the horror of fate and the placidity of death. If the performance was consistent with the author's ideas—and the reading which we heard on Friday afternoon seemed rather hitch-y, uncertain in attack and over-noisy in the combative portions,—his notions are better than his command of the means of their expression. The roaring fortissimi of all the brass, the rattle of three snare drums and the unrestrained demonstrativeness of kettle-drums and cymbals too often overcame even the most vigorous exertions of the rest of the band and pushed vehemence too nearly into noise. The overture has tunefulness and solid harmony; but it is excessive at times, and there are oddities of figure and of progression which give more shock than satisfaction in their sudden apparition. Yet the work shows thought and ability and gives encouraging promise.

The rest of the programme (for the concerto was the second number) went on without distinction, without enthusiasm and almost without interest. Its third number was that Serenade of Brahms for which the orchestra is compressed and tranquillized by the elimination of the violins. This makes a quaint and generally genial combination; but before the five movements are all done one feels as if this serenade would have exercised rather a soporific than an awakening influence. It is very melodious and gentle throughout, and one can be grateful to Brahms for having at any rate made no display of learning (although his art and skill are traceable throughout) and for having allowed sentiment to carry it over intellect.

Next Mr. Paur put, as a continuation of the still small voicings, Beethoven's "Death of Clarchen," from "Egmont," and followed this with the familiar "Turkish March." As this brought at last a bit of life and sparkle, it would have been well to stop the concert there. But no, another overture must needs be added—one of the two which Schubert wrote "in the Italian style." By that may be understood a short work with a calm slow tune to begin with and a neat fast one to wind up with, both supported on simple accompaniments and ending with a few mildly assertive measures. This was set down as a novelty, but people did not appear to care much about it, although they admitted its tuneful prettiness and fluency.

The orchestra generally played thoughtfully and discriminatingly, Mr. Strube was called out and complimented, and the programme-book--apparently under the delusion that the ingenious self-puffery of its editor's admired music teacher is one of those good things of which one cannot have too much—actually reprinted the very pages of egotism which were published and criticised a week ago!

The programme for next Saturday night is an extraordinary one. It stands thus in the announcement: Handel's "Concerto Grosso;" Haydn's twelfth symphony in B flat; two overtures—Mozart's "Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House;" Wagner's "Centennial" march. Isn't that a dainty dish to set before a king?

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVII., NO. 50.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1895.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

Sixth in the Series at Union Hall—A Fine Performance.

The sixth in the current series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet took place in Union Hall last night. The programme was:

Quartet, D minor (op. posth.).....Schubert
Quintet (first time).....C. M. Loeffler
Septet (for strings and wind).....Beethoven

In the quintet Mr. William Craft assisted, and in the septet Mr. Leon Portean, clarinet, Mr. Albert Hacke Barthy, horn, Mr. Herman Litke, bassoon, and Mr. Emil Golde, contrabasso. There was a very large audience in attendance and it was exceptionally appreciative and enthusiastic in its applause through the concert. The Schubert quartet was exquisitely performed and in a spirit wholly in sympathy with the music. The work is long drawn out, especially in the first movement, which narrowly escapes becoming tiresome in spite of its beauty. The andante, with its strong suggestion of the allegretto con moto of Beethoven's symphony in A, was charmingly read and won a hearty round of applause; and the finale was given with fine vigor and variety of tone color. The quartet seems to have been written while the composer was strongly under the influence of Beethoven, for in the last movement that composer is again recalled by its principal subject, which bears a close resemblance to that of the finale of the Kreutzer Sonata.

Mr. Loeffler's quintet, which is in one movement, and is arranged for the unusual combination, three violins, a viola and a 'cello, is a work of equal force and originality. One may always expect something unconventional and piquant from Mr. Loeffler, and these qualities are prominent in this composition. It begins in a calm vein, with a theme that is almost pastoral in its quietness, but it speedily takes a more fiery and romantic turn, and revels in rhythmical and melodic eccentricities, while its interest is steadily sustained. In common with all the music by the composer that has been heard here, it has a striking individuality that is quite his own. He is notably felicitous in his skill in finding new combinations, and there are many exceedingly ingenious and effective passages, in which the tone color produced is as novel as it is impressive. The work is complicated, but is smoothly and clearly written, and it never loses its hold on the attention. There is a particularly fine moment after the "working out," where the violin and 'cello begin an impassioned conversation, and though the quintet is in the most advanced modern spirit, it shows no signs of labor, but has all the effect of spontaneity in conception and treatment. On the other hand, its design is not quite discoverable on a single hearing.

There appear to be too many episodes that are not well joined to the main design, and the result is somewhat fragmentary, suggesting at times a rhapsodic improvisation. A better acquaintance with a work that is so original and so far out of the beaten track would probably remove this impression. Be that as it may, the quintet is a masterly bit of musicianship, and well sustains the reputation that Mr. Loeffler has deservedly won by his fine 'cello concerto and his brilliant and unique divertissements for the violin. It was played con amore, and was applauded with great fervor, the artist being recalled, and the composer, who was seated in the hall, being compelled to rise in his place and bow his acknowledgments. The familiar Beethoven sextet was splendidly read and played, the warm, smooth and lovely tone of Mr. Portean being heard with fascinating results in the slow movement. It is possibly something very like heresy to write it, much more to believe it, but this work, despite its wealth of graceful melody and delightful effects, seems to have become thoroughly enveloped in an atmosphere of old fashion, and to have become almost quaint. It is a good old fashion, unquestionably, but it is depressing, nevertheless, to associate this especial phase of it with anything bearing the name of Beethoven. The seventh concert will take place Monday, March 18.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, FEB. 19, 1895.

Kneisel Quartet.

A Boston musical audience seldom shows as much enthusiasm as was exhibited at the Kneisel quartet concert last night in Union hall. The concert was a specially attractive one and the audience even larger than usual.

There were only three numbers on the program, but every one of the three was interesting. First came the splendid Schubert quartet in D minor, which is superb at all times and was never played better, it is safe to say, than it was last night. The andante movement was perfect and the presto almost as good. The audience was so much pleased with the performance that Messrs Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroder were twice recalled.

The next number was played last night for the first time. It was the long-expected quintet by Mr Loeffler for three violins, viola and cello. Mr William Krafft of the Symphony orchestra played the third violin part.

Mr Loeffler was unfortunate in having his quintet heard immediately after the beautiful Schubert composition, but the audience was prepared to listen with favor and did so. Although there is but one movement to the quintet it contains material enough for a much longer composition, in fact the most severe criticism is that it contains too much material. Still it is well worth a hearing. The performers were recalled, and Mr Loeffler, who was in the audience, bowed his acknowledgments for the applause.

The Beethoven septet for violin, viola, clarinet, horn, bassoon, cello and double bass completed the program. The players were Messrs Kneisel, Svecenski, Pourtau, Hackebarth, Litke, Schroeder and Golde. It is enough to say that the performance was all that could be desired.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 19, 1895.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

It is a misnomer to entitle the Kneisel concert, given in Union Hall last night, a "quartette" concert, for the organization grew from a quartette in the first number to a quintette in the second and a septette in the final work. It was, however, a red-letter occasion altogether, for Beethoven's Septette has never had so perfect a performance in this city.

It is not the most attractive work in the world to the present writer, for it belongs to Beethoven's first period, and the composer has not thrown off the Haydn style wholly in its measures, but it is brimful of difficulties, and to hear it played without blemish is the event of a lifetime.

Beethoven seems to have vented all his spleen on the horn in this work, and the rapid passages for this instrument in the trio of the minuet are almost impossible; yet Mr. Hackebarth played them clearly, and there was not a palpable slip in the horn part from beginning to end. The clarinette is also given much prominence all through the work, and Mr. Pourtau won new laurels by his clear playing. This artist has a purity of tone and a delicacy of shading that ranks him with the greatest in this field.

The contrabass is given much of the florid work which Beethoven afterwards continued in the fourth and fifth symphonies. Its pizzicato in the finale is also impressive. In all these points Mr. Golde was sure and effective.

The bassoon is not so prominent as the instruments above named, yet in the adagio cantabile it does some important work, and Mr. Lipke gave a smoother tone than is usual on this awkward instrument. Beethoven generally uses the bassoon when he is in a jesting mood, but there are no bassoon jokes in this work as there are in the sixth and eighth symphonies. Of course the strings played well, and it was a pleasure to find Mr. Kneisel's tone on that magnificent violin that he has acquired, broad enough to balance against the augmented forces. And now, since the Beethoven septette has been so well conquered, by all means let us have the Hummel septette, which is not inferior to it.

Next to this great performance, the interest centred in a new quintette by Mr. C. M. Loeffler. It was in a single movement, and was peculiar both in its shape and in the combination used—three violins against viola and violoncello. It seemed to outline three movements, or rather, after a beautiful intermezzo there came a partial recapitulation of themes, but in its strong contrasts and in its somewhat continuous development, it suggested the sonata(?) and symphonic vein of Liszt and Schumann. There was a thoroughly Slavonic flavor to some of the themes, and more than one Russian folk-dance was indicated.

Mr. Loeffler is at his best in such chamber-music, for he leads his voices easily and he develops his themes interestingly. A beautiful use of pastoral organpoint is made towards the latter part of the work, and the interest is sustained throughout.

The concert began with Schubert's D minor quartette. The first movement was not especially well played, but the andante, with its reminiscences of Schubert's own "Der Tod und das Maedchen," and its beautiful variations, was finely given, and the finale went with exceptional spirit. Continuous enthusiasm marked the public appreciation of the concert.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1895.

Mr. Loeffler's Quintet Produced at a Kneisel Quartet Concert—The Second and Last Recital of Mrs. Elene Eaton.

The program of the sixth Kneisel Concert included Schubert's D minor quartet (op. posth); C. M. Loeffler's Quintet in one movement for 3 violins, viola and 'cello (MS. First time); and Beethoven's Septet. The club was assisted in the quintet by Mr. Krafft; in the septet by Messrs. Pourtau, Hackebarth, Litke, and Golde.

The rigid conservative might say of Mr. Loeffler's new composition, "Why quintet, when there is only one movement?" but such criticism would be carping and false. A quintet is a composition for five instruments or for five voices, accompanied or unaccompanied; it may be in 13 movements or in one movement. The very fact that there is but one movement is a welcome relief in these days when so many music-makers flog unwilling Pegasus to plod his weary way through four; and compel him to trot in sonata form, to walk seriously, to be skittish, and finally to galop.

If you ask what this piece by Mr. Loeffler means, the answer is, "The meaning is what you find in it."

Mr. Loeffler is a musician of fine fancy and exquisite taste. He has a highly developed sense of tonal color, and he chooses unexpected and original nuances. His music is never purely decorative. Neither is it program-music in the common acceptation of the phrase. Dearer to him is the form of expression than the thought itself. Not that his music is without substantial thought—far from it; but his hatred of the conventional terms, the "I take my pen in hand" and "Yours truly," is as marked as that of Chopin for a matter-of-fact modulation or a commonplace cadence.

The set rules and ordinances fret Mr. Loeffler. It is as though he said, "Nearly everything has been done in formal fashion. Music, today, when it is absolute, must give, first of all, impressions of tonal color." And in this strange and fascinating quintet it is not so much the opening with its masterly simplicity, not so much the wild, sad theme that suggests Russia—indeed, it may be a memory of a folk-song, for all I know—as it is the delightfully fresh and original treatment. Progressions that when analyzed might seem hair-raising, as arranged for the instruments give the ear a new pleasure. There is a sense of foreign tonality that hints to the hearer the future possibilities of music.

Is this quintet vague, a panorama of singularly colored episodes? Some may so regard it, and yet find in it delight. To me it is much more. It is music that takes one away from the routine of life, the petty cares and annoyances, the shiftings, the deceits. The melancholy of the strains is not pessimistic. There is no dismal attempt at dismal profundity. The hearer for a time is in a new world; he thinks new thoughts; he forgets players and surroundings. In a word Mr. Loeffler has composed music.

***

The performance was admirable, and those assisting gave genuine assistance. To hear Beethoven's Septet played by such artists causes one to forget the purely academic nature of portions of the work. The time will come—may it come soon—when only the second movement will preserve in concert halls the memory of the D minor quartet of Schubert.

[97]

INCOMPLETE

...Democratic Paper
...NEW ENGLAND.

...TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 19, 1895.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

At Union Hall last evening the Kneisel Quartet gave its sixth concert before an audience of the usual size and brilliance. The programme was one of the best that has been offered, and perhaps of particular interest because of a quintet by C. M. Loeffler for three violins, viola and 'cello, one of the movements being played for the first time.

The composition is of more than ordinary merit and was received with enthusiasm, in which the later movement shared. Beethoven's septet was magnificently rendered, and much praise is due to the artists for their work. The assisting artists were Krofft, Pourtan, Hackeburth, Litke and Golde. The next concert will be on Monday, March 18.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1895.

Union Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. William Krafft, Mr. Léon Pourtau, Mr. Albert Hackebarth, Mr. Herman Litke, and Mr. Emil Golde, gave the sixth concert of this, its tenth season in Union Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Schubert: Quartet in D minor (posthumous).
C. M. Loeffler: Quintet in one movement, for three violins, viola, and 'cello (MS.). (First time.)
Beethoven: Septet for violin, viola, clarinet, horn, bassoon, 'cello and double bass, in E-flat major, opus 20.

The Schubert quartet was splendidly played, the Finale going with especial perfection of ensemble and vigor of accent.

That it would take much more than a single hearing to give one any adequate understanding of Mr. Loeffler's new quintet was evident enough, long before the movement was over. For one thing, one could almost have sworn to its authorship, even had it been kept a secret, as is the custom at first performances in France. The work is ear-marked "Loeffler" on every page; there can be no manner of doubt about its individuality. This was the first definite impression we got from it; the second and last was that it was, perhaps, the most exquisite piece of string-writing, as such, that we had ever heard. In the matter of ear-delighting euphony, in the way the composer has made all his five instruments sound their very sweetest and best, individually and collectively, the work seems almost unparalleled. It well-nigh passed belief that such a variety of exquisite tone-color could be drawn from five stringed instruments. The plan of writing for three violins and one viola (instead of two violins and two violas) is new, as far as we know; it has much to say for itself à priori, and Mr. Loeffler has certainly made it pay unspeakably well. What other impression we got from the work was exceedingly vague, even a little bewildering. Mr. Loeffler's well-known liking for exotic turns of melody and unusual effects of modal harmony shows itself here as plainly as ever; only we were constantly in doubt as to the true animus of the thing. Some of those old modal progressions may affect one in very different ways: either by a certain solemn impressiveness, or again by mere quaintness and oddness. In the same way, those curious Slavic turns of melody may seem extremely racy and expressive, or merely queer and verging on the comic, according to circumstances. And we own that we were constantly in doubt as to the composer's point of view: was he pouring out his whole soul, as in parts of the sextet, or was he revelling in some clever, geistreich musical jeu d'esprit? Was the work true poetry, or only the perfection of vers de société? We could not tell. Every time we tried to put salt upon the bird's tail, it wagged its tail out of the way. Only, of one thing we were tolerably sure: there was really something there which escaped us; the work seemed to have some real meaning, though precisely what it was we could by no means make out. Music that is merely superficial and trivial makes a very different first impression. Moreover, we could not help the feeling that the composer himself knew perfectly well what he was saying, and really had something to say. Let us hear the movement again and again, and then we may have something to say about it, too. It was played to perfection.

How many years is it since Beethoven's septet has been played here in public? It seems a good many. Mr. Kneisel's plan of giving only four movements strikes us as admirable. The work contains the regular four movements of the fully developed sonata form, and the two intercalated movements, lovely though they be, always seemed to us to detract from the total impression, both by loosening the form and by making the work too long. The only question in our mind is just which movements it is best to choose. About the first Allegro, the Adagio cantabile, and the final Presto there can be no doubt; they must stand. It seems equally plain that the Andante con Variazioni should go. Remains to be considered what shall stand as the third movement; shall it be the Tempo di Menuetto, or the Scherzo: Allegro molto vivace? Mr. Kneisel chose the former; but we must say we should have preferred the latter. Delightful as the Minuet is, we think the Scherzo more piquant, racy, and better fitted for the place. To be sure, it necessitates the clarinet-player's shifting to the little E-flat clarinet; but that is a minor matter. Still the Minuet is beautiful music, and fits well into the four-movement sonata scheme; only we had rather miss it than miss the Scherzo. But what an admirable work of genius this sextet is! It has as much life in it now as it had fifty years ago. It was superbly played. Mr. Pourtau outdid himself in beauty of tone and perfect grace of phrasing; and, if we mention him specially, it is because the clarinet has the most prominent single part in the work. But all the others did admirably, and the great composition was shown forth in all its wondrous beauty. It was an hour to be long remembered.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1895.

THE program of the fifteenth Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Overture to Schiller's Jungfrau von Orleans, op. 3.....Strube
(MS., first time.)
Concerto for piano, No. 2, in G minor, op. 22.....Saint-Saëns
Serenade for small orchestra, in A major, op. 16.....Brahms
Clärchen's Death, from Egmont, op. 84 .....Beethoven
Marcia alla Turca, from Die Ruinen von Athen, op. 113
Overture in the Italian style, in D major.....Schubert

The program book gave this information about Mr. Strube:

Gustav Strube was born at Ballenstedt, a little town in Anhalt, not far from Halberstadt, on March 3, 1867, and is still living in Boston. His father was town musician in his native place, and it was from him that he got his first musical instruction. Afterward Strube studied four years at the Conservatorium in Leipsic: the violin under Adolf Brodsky, the piano under Alois Keckendorf, and composition under Karl Reinecke and Salomon Jadassohn. After leaving the institution, he went to Mannheim, where he was engaged as teacher at the Conservatory. In 1891 he came to the United States, and has been since then one of the first violins in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Mr. Strube's overture is entitled The Maid of Orleans. How many musical crimes have been committed in thy name, oh, maid of mystic visions and fiery death!

There are the operas: Das Mädchen von Orleans, Volckert, Vienna, 1817; Johanna d'Arc, Hoven (pseudonym of von Püttlingen), Vienna, 1840; Die Jungfrau von Orleans, Langert, Coburg, 1860; Die Jungfrau von Orleans, Reznicek, Prague, 1887; Jeanne d'Arc à Orleans, Kreutzer, Paris, 1790; also by Carafa, Paris, 1821; Jeanne d'Arc, Beaulieu, Paris, 1853; also by Duprez, Paris, 1865, and Mermet, Paris, 1876; Giovanna d'Arco, Andreozzi, 1789; also by Vacca, Venice, 1827; Pacini, Milan, 1830, and by Verdi, Milan, 1845; Joan of Arc, Balfe, London, 1837. Tschaikowsky wrote a Russian opera on this same subject, produced in St. Petersburg, 1881.

There are these ballets: Joan of Arc, Reeve, London, 1798; Giovanni d'Arco, by Brambilla, Lichtenthal and Vigano, Milan, 1821: Johanna d'Arc, by Von Gallenberg, Vienna, 1821.

Widor wrote the music for a pantomime, Jeanne d'Arc, produced in Paris, 1890.

Gounod wrote the music for Barbier's tragedy, Jeanne d'Arc, Paris, 1873.

Godard wrote the music for Faber's tragedy, Jeanne d'Arc, Paris, 1891.

There are cantatas: Joan d'Arc, by Lee, Hamburg, 1860; Joan of Arc, Gaul, Birmingham, 1887.

Sterndale Bennett wrote a piano sonata entitled The Maid of Orleans.

Then there is Moszkowski's Symphonic poem, Johanna d'Arc, produced in Berlin in 1877. There are the Symphonische Illustrationen to Schiller's tragedy, Jungfrau von Orleans, by Thadewaldt, produced in Dresden, 1886.

Schiller's tragedy has been supplied with incidental music by B. A. Weber, Berlin, 1801 (the first performance of the tragedy); Destouches, Weimar, 1803; G. A. Schneider, Berlin, 1825; Max Seifriz (first in complete form in Stuttgart, 1872); Leopold Damrosch, Weimar, 1857; Max Bruch, Cologne, 1859, and Södermann.

Overtures by Karl Wagner about 1820, Darmstadt; Moscheles, London, 1835; J. Klein, Cologne, 1843–4; Pierson, Leipsic, 1870.

Coronation marches by H. Geisler, Mair, von Oertzen.

The scene Lebt wohl, ihr Berge, by Zumsteeg, Reichardt, Bornhardt, von Wickede. The monologue Die Waffen ruhn, by Schulz, Reichardt and Andreas Romberg.

Ouf!

* * *

The overture of Mr. Strube is pictorial; and yet he shows respect for form. Given the title and a knowledge of Schiller's tragedy and the hearer can recognize easily the pastoral maidenhood, the foreign invasion, the shock of arms, the exalted maid—to-day she would be regarded as a neurotic, an hysterical who might easily be a pyromaniac or a kleptomaniac—the death according to Schiller. Mr. Strube's music is for the most part fresh and interesting. He is never pedantic for pedantry's sake, and the work shows considerable imagination. It is perhaps a little diffuse, and the last measures might be re-scored with advantage. The work, dedicated to Mr. Paur, was well received by the audience.

* * *

The other numbers of the concert do not demand attention. The serenade by Brahms tried the endurance of the confirmed Brahmsites; to the unregenerate it was an unmitigated bore. The concerto by Saint-Säens is a work beyond the graceful flight of Mrs. Blach. The concert as a whole was dull.

But look at the program of last week Saturday: Händel, Concerto Grosso; Haydn, symphony No. 12, in B flat; Mozart, overture, Entführung aus dem Serail; Beethoven, overture, Dedication of the House; Wagner, Centennial March. Come, come, Mr. Paur, this will never do! Even the people of Leipsic fare better.

[98]

...DAY, FEB. ...1895.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

M. Cesar Thomson Met with a Warm Reception Last Evening.

There was a large attendance last night at the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the extra auditors being drawn out by the announcement of Cesar Thomson, the famous Belgian violin virtuoso, as the soloist for the occasion. Mr. Thomson's tour in this country has been a series of uninterrupted musical triumphs. Though possessed of a towering reputation abroad, he came here—so far, at least, as the general public was concerned—comparatively unheralded and unknown. Hhe has won his way entirely on his artistic merits, without the aid of any clap-trap in the way of advertising or romance—invested personality, and in face of a strong rival attraction in the person of his fellow-artist and countryman, Ysaye. There has been absolutely no attempt at discussion or dissection of his abilities, so complete has been the recognition of his marvellous mastery of that king of solo instruments, the violin. So that it was quite to be expected that the regular symphony audience would be largely increased last night, and the only wonder is that a vacant seat was to be found in Infantry Hall.

M. CESAR THOMSON.

The programme was an interesting one, and, though somewhat longer than the average, was of such pleasant variety and contrast and so thoroughly well performed that the enjoyment of the listeners was sustained to the very end. The numbers were as follows:

Symphony in G major, No. 13....Josef Haydn
1. Adagio (G major).
Allegro (G major).
2. Largo (D major).
3. Menuetto: Allegretto (G major).
Trio (G major).
4. Finale: Allegro con spirato (G major).
Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin, in A minor, op. 28.....
.....Karl Goldmark
1. Allegro moderato (A minor).
2. Air: Andante (G major).
3. Moderato (A minor).
Allegretto (A minor).
"L'Arlesienne," orchestral suite, No. 1....
.....Georges Bizet
1. Prelude: Allegro deciso; tempo di marcia (C minor).
Andante molto (A-flat major).
Un peu moins lent (C major).
2. Minuetto: Allegro giocoso (E-flat major).
3. Adagietto: Adagio (F major).
4. Carillon: Allegretto moderato (E major).
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," in A major, op. 9.....Hector Berlioz

The symphony by Haydn, which opened the concert, is full of freshness, vigor and tunefulness, like all the works of that great master. He was not only the creator of the orchestral symphony—or rather the adapter of the sonata form to symphonic requirements—but also by far the most voluminous composer of that class of works who has ever lived. One cannot help wondering if there is not something well worth the hearing among the 150 symphonies he is said to have composed (it is certain that the number exceeds 120) aside from the dozen or so that are commonly found on our concert programmes. For none of the great composers excel him in the evenly good quality of his work. Whatever he wrote was, if not of greatest scope or deepest meaning, at least never trivial; his fount of melody never ran dry, and his mastery of musical form and his skill in instrumentation were of the highest order. The symphony played last night is a fair, though by no means the best, example of his style, and, like many others, betrays his fondness for the string orchestra, upon which the weight of the work is put. As for its performance, it was unexceptionable, save that it may be said that Mr. Paur's fondness for extreme dynamic effects does not fit in with Haydn's music so well as with that of the modern school. A brilliant rendering of Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture followed, after which came forward to play the man whom the musical contingent had honored by turning out for once in full force.

Goldmark's A-minor concerto, which Mr. Thomson selected for his number, cannot be said to rank with the greatest half dozen concertos for the violin, either for its general musical worth or for pleasing opportunities afforded the virtuoso. It is difficult enough, without doubt; it calls for abounding technic, but even the tours de force are not of a sort to impress the listener with the relieved sense of mighty obstacles safely and skillfully surmounted. The second movement is by far the best, with its fine contrast of broadly flowing cantilena and lively melody; here, too, the orchestration does not so often tend to submerge the solo violin as in the first and the final movements. Mr. Thomson revealed himself at once as a complete master of his instrument. Rumors preceded him to this country that although he was undeniably a player of astounding technical ability, he lacked something of the warmth and grace that belong to a truly great artist. It is hard to see where any such criticism would hold. If one allows himself to be influenced by the personal appearance of the man, his quiet demeanor and utter lack of all "staginess," that impassive face ever hovering over the violin some such idea might be suggested. But a closer attention to the marvellous things he is doing with the instrument tell another story. Not only is there absolute accuracy and flawless purity in every tone, but a nicety of expression, a subtlety of nuance and a wealth of meaning that call for as great admiration as the quiet ease with which he surmounts every technical difficulty. Mr. Thompson is, in every sense of the word, a great artist, and, as those who have heard him play extended programmes know, at home in all schools. He was most enthusiastically received, and forced to bow his acknowledgements repeatedly at the close of the concerto.

The remaining numbers of the programme were charming in themselves and delightfully played by the orchestra, which was certainly on its mettle last evening. The final concert for this season takes place on the evening of

...WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1895.

THAT NEW MUSIC HALL.

Its Stockholders Meet in Bumstead Hall and Decide to Let Matters Remain as They Are for the Present—Officers Elected.

An extremely small proportion of the stockholders of the new Boston Music Hall attended the annual meeting at noon today in Bumstead Hall, and the rows of empty chairs seemed to indicate that the interest with which the project was inaugurated had largely died away. After Colonel Henry L. Higginson, the president of the company, had called the meeting to order, the record of the last meeting and the report of the treasurer were read by Charles E. Cotting, the clerk and treasurer of the corporation. His statement of the finances of the company has already been published. In reply to the questions asked about various items by Charles P. Curtis, Mr. Cotting gave, by means of the treasurer's books, a detailed statement of how the various expenses were incurred. Among the items mentioned by him were $2000 paid to McKim, Mead & White, the architects, as a commission, and $2600 paid to T. Dennie Boardman for securing subscriptions.

The report of the subscription committee was read by Edward W. Hooper. He stated that of 406 subscribers 385 had paid all that was asked of them by the committee; 363 persons had paid in $207,450, of which $200,000 had been issued in stock and the balance of $7450 deposited in the Merchants' National Bank. One person who had subscribed $10,000 had paid nothing as yet, although it was stated that a payment was to be made shortly. Another person, who had subscribed $2500, was dead, and his heirs were only willing to pay $1000. A third person, who had subscribed $1000, refused to make any payment, on the ground that the old Music Hall had not been taken for the purposes of the transit commission, and that therefore the need of a new hall was not pressing. In all twenty-one persons had failed to pay anything on account of their subscriptions, and some of these declined to do so for the reason assigned by the $1000 subscriber already mentioned. Mr. Hooper suggested that the directors were uncertain how to act with regard to these recalcitrant subscribers. Mr. Curtis moved that the directors should be instructed to follow the advice of counsel in regard to these unpaid subscriptions, and the motion was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Hooper then said that an expression of views as to the future course to be taken by the company was desirable. There were three courses that could be followed: One was to go ahead and build the new hall; but this was open to serious objection so long as the old hall remained standing. It was probable that a new hall, under such conditions, would not clear even its running expenses. Another course was to wind up the affairs of the corporation as speedily as possible. The third course was to allow matters to remain in the same position that they were in now.

Colonel Higginson said that at the time the ground for a new Music Hall was bought, it was felt that such a purchase was necessary, as the outlook was that, unless such a step were taken Boston would be without any hall. Tremont Temple had been burned; and in the opinion of those best calculated to know about the matter, the old Music Hall was soon to be taken to make way for an elevated railroad. The site secured for the new Music Hall was an excellent one; the property was valuable and was increasing in value; there had already been a slight increase, and the prospect was that there would be a much greater increase, enough to pay a fair interest on the investment if it ever became desirable to sell the land. He was, therefore, in favor of allowing the project to remain as it was at the present time. Mr. Curtis and others present concurred in this view of the matter, and the election of officers was then proceeded with and resulted as follows: Treasurer and clerk, Charles E. Cotting; directors, Henry L. Higginson, Edward W. Hooper, Henry F. Sears, William S. Bigelow and Charles E. Cotting.

INCOMPLETE

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 19, 1895.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

At Union Hall last evening the Kneisel Quartet gave its sixth concert before an audience of the usual size and brilliance.

The programme was one of the best that has been offered, and perhaps of particular interest because of a quintet by C. M. Loeffler for three violins, viola and 'cello, one of the movements being played for the first time.

The composition is of more than ordinary merit and was received with enthusiasm, in which the later movement shared. Beethoven's septet was magnificently rendered, and much praise is due to the artists for their work. The assisting artists were Krofft, Pourtan, Hackebarth, Litke and Golde. The next concert will be on Monday, March 18.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1895.

Union Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. William Krafft, Mr. Léon Pourtau, Mr. Albert Hackebarth, Mr. Herman Litke, and Mr. Emil Golde, gave the sixth concert of this, its tenth season in Union Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Schubert: Quartet in D minor (posthumous).
C. M. Loeffler: Quintet (in one movement, for three violins, viola, and 'cello (MS.). (First time.)
Beethoven: Septet for violin, viola, clarinet, horn, bassoon, 'cello and double bass, in E-flat major, opus 20.

The Schubert quartet was splendidly played, the Finale going with especial perfection of ensemble and vigor of accent.

That it would take much more than a single hearing to give one any adequate understanding of Mr. Loeffler's new quintet was evident enough, long before the movement was over. For one thing, one could almost have sworn to its authorship, even had it been kept a secret, as is the custom at first performances in France. The work is ear-marked "Loeffler" on every page; there can be no manner of doubt about its individuality. This was the first definite impression we got from it; the second and last was that it was, perhaps, the most exquisite piece of string-writing, as such, that we had ever heard. In the matter of ear-delighting euphony, in the way the composer has made all his five instruments sound their very sweetest and best, individually and collectively, the work seems almost unparalleled. It well-nigh passed belief that such a variety of exquisite tone-color could be drawn from five stringed instruments. The plan of writing for three violins and one viola (instead of two violins and two violas) is new, as far as we know; it has much to say for itself à priori, and Mr. Loeffler has certainly made it pay unspeakably well. What other impression we got from the work was exceedingly vague, even a little bewildering. Mr. Loeffler's well-known liking for exotic turns of melody and unusual effects of modal harmony shows itself here as plainly as ever; only we were constantly in doubt as to the true animus of the thing. Some of those old modal progressions may affect one in very different ways: either by a certain solemn impressiveness, or again by mere quaintness and oddness. In the same way, those curious Slavic turns of melody may seem extremely racy and expressive, or merely queer and verging on the comic, according to circumstances. And we own that we were constantly in doubt as to the composer's point of view: was he pouring out his whole soul, as in parts of the sextet, or was he revelling in some clever, geistreich musical jeu d'esprit? Was the work true poetry, or only the perfection of vers de société? We could not tell. Every time we tried to put salt upon the bird's tail, it wagged its tail out of the way. Only, of one thing we were tolerably sure: there was really something there which escaped us; the work seemed to have some real meaning, though precisely what it was we could by no means make out. Music that is merely superficial and trivial makes a very different first impression. Moreover, we could not help the feeling that the composer himself knew perfectly well what he was saying, and really had something to say. Let us hear the movement again and again, and then we may have something to say about it, too. It was played to perfection.

How many years is it since Beethoven's septet has been played here in public? It seems a good many. Mr. Kneisel's plan of giving only four movements strikes us as admirable. The work contains the regular four movements of the fully developed sonata form, and the two intercalated movements, lovely though they be, always seemed to us to detract from the total impression, both by loosening the form and by making the work too long. The only question in our mind is just which movements it is best to choose. About the first Allegro, the Adagio cantabile, and the final Presto there can be no doubt; they must stand. It seems equally plain that the Andante con Variazioni should go. Remains to be considered what shall stand as the third movement; shall it be the Tempo di Menuetto, or the Scherzo: Allegro molto vivace? Mr. Kneisel chose the former; but we must say we should have preferred the latter. Delightful as the Minuet is, we think the Scherzo more piquant, racy, and better fitted for the place. To be sure, it necessitates the clarinet-player's shifting to the little E-flat carinet; but that is a minor matter. Still the Minuet is beautiful music, and fits well into the four-movement sonata scheme; only we had rather miss it than miss the Scherzo. But what an admirable work of genius this sextet is! It has as much life in it now as it had fifty years ago. It was superbly played. Mr. Pourtau outdid himself in beauty of tone and perfect grace of phrasing; and, if we mention him specially, it is because the clarinet has the most prominent single part in the work. But all the others did admirably, and the great composition was shown forth in all its wondrous beauty. It was an hour to be long remembered.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1895.

THE program of the fifteenth Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Overture to Schiller's Jungfrau von Orleans, op. 8.....Strube
(MS., first time.)
Concerto for piano, No. 2, in G minor, op. 22.....Saint-Saëns
Serenade for small orchestra, in A major, op. 16.....Brahms
Clärchen's Death, from Egmont, op. 84 .....} ...Beethoven
Marcia alla Turca, from Die Ruinen von Athen, op. 113 }
Overture in the Italian style, in D major.....Schubert

The program book gave this information about Mr. Strube:

Gustav Strube was born at Ballenstedt, a little town in Anhalt, not far from Halberstadt, on March 3, 1867, and is still living in Boston. His father was town musician in his native place, and it was from him that he got his first musical instruction. Afterward Strube studied four years at the Conservatorium in Leipsic: the violin under Adolf Brodsky, the piano under Alois Keckendorf, and composition under Karl Reinecke and Salomon Jadassohn. After leaving the institution, he went to Mannheim, where he was engaged as teacher at the Conservatory. In 1891 he came to the United States, and has been since then one of the first violins in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Mr. Strube's overture is entitled The Maid of Orleans. How many musical crimes have been committed in thy name, oh, maid of mystic visions and fiery death!

There are the operas: Das Mädchen von Orleans, Volckert, Vienna, 1817; Johanna d'Arc, Hoven (pseudonym of von Püttlingen), Vienna, 1840; Die Jungfrau von Orleans, Langert, Coburg, 1860; Die Jungfrau von Orleans, Reznicek, Prague, 1887; Jeanne d'Arc à Orleans, Kreutzer, Paris, 1790; also by Carafa, Paris, 1821; Jeanne d'Arc, Beaulieu, Paris, 1853; also by Duprez, Paris, 1865, and Mermet, Paris, 1876; Giovanna d'Arco, Andreozzi, 1789; also by Vacca, Venice, 1827; Pacini, Milan, 1830, and by Verdi, Milan, 1845; Joan of Arc, Balfe, London, 1837. Tschaikowsky wrote a Russian opera on this same subject, produced in St. Petersburg, 1881.

There are these ballets: Joan of Arc, Reeve, London, 1798; Giovanni d'Arco, by Brambilla, Lichtenthal and Vigano, Milan, 1821: Johanna d'Arc, by Von Gallenberg, Vienna, 1821.

Widor wrote the music for a pantomime, Jeanne d'Arc, produced in Paris, 1890.

Gounod wrote the music for Barbier's tragedy, Jeanne d'Arc, Paris, 1873.

Godard wrote the music for Faber's tragedy, Jeanne d'Arc, Paris, 1891.

There are cantatas: Joan d'Arc, by Lee, Hamburg, 1860; Joan of Arc, Gaul, Birmingham, 1887.

Sterndale Bennett wrote a piano sonata entitled The Maid of Orleans.

Then there is Moszkowski's Symphonic poem, Johanna d'Arc, produced in Berlin in 1877. There are the Symphonische Illustrationen to Schiller's tragedy, Jungfrau von Orleans, by Thadewaldt, produced in Dresden, 1886.

Schiller's tragedy has been supplied with incidental music by B. A. Weber, Berlin, 1801 (the first performance of the tragedy); Destouches, Weimar, 1803; G. A. Schneider, Berlin, 1825; Max Seifriz (first in complete form in Stuttgart, 1872); Leopold Damrosch, Weimar, 1857; Max Bruch, Cologne, 1859, and Södermann.

Overtures by Karl Wagner about 1820, Darmstadt; Moscheles, London, 1835; J. Klein, Cologne, 1843-4; Pierson, Leipsic, 1870.

Coronation marches by H. Geisler, Mair, von Oertzen.

The scene Lebt wohl, ihr Berge, by Zumsteeg, Reichardt, Bornhardt, von Wickede. The monologue Die Waffen ruhn, by Schulz, Reichardt and Andreas Romberg.

Ouf!

* * *

The overture of Mr. Strube is pictorial; and yet he shows respect for form. Given the title and a knowledge of Schiller's tragedy and the hearer can recognize easily the pastoral maidenhood, the foreign invasion, the shock of arms, the exalted maid—to-day she would be regarded as a neurotic, an hysterical who might easily be a pyromaniac or a kleptomaniac—the death according to Schiller. Mr. Strube's music is for the most part fresh and interesting. He is never pedantic for pedantry's sake, and the work shows considerable imagination. It is perhaps a little diffuse, and the last measures might be re-scored with advantage. The work, dedicated to Mr. Paur, was well received by the audience.

* * *

The other numbers of the concert do not demand attention. The serenade by Brahms tried the endurance of the confirmed Brahmsites; to the unregenerate it was an unmitigated bore. The concerto by Saint-Säens is a work beyond the graceful flight of Mrs. Blach. The concert as a whole was dull.

But look at the program of last week Saturday: Händel, Concerto Grosso; Haydn, symphony No. 12, in B flat; Mozart, overture, Entführung aus dem Serail; Beethoven, overture, Dedication of the House; Wagner, Centennial March. Come, come, Mr. Paur, this will never do! Even the people of Leipsic fare better.

[98]

PROVIDENCE [illegible]

THURSDAY, FEBR[illegible]21, 1895.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

M. Cesar Thomson Met with a Warm Reception Last Evening.

There was a large attendance last night at the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the extra auditors being drawn out by the announcement of Cesar Thomson, the famous Belgian violin virtuoso, as the soloist for the occasion. Mr. Thomson's tour in this country has been a series of uninterrupted musical triumphs. Though possessed of a towering reputation abroad, he came here—so far, at least, as the general public was concerned—comparatively unheralded and unknown. Hhe has won his way entirely on his artistic merits, without the aid of any clap-trap in the way of advertising or romance—invested personality, and in face of a strong rival attraction in the person of his fellow-artist and countryman, Ysaye. There has been absolutely no attempt at discussion or dissection of his abilities, so complete has been the recognition of his marvellous mastery of that king of solo instruments, the violin. So that it was quite to be expected that the regular symphony audience would be largely increased last night, and the only wonder is that a vacant seat was to be found in Infantry Hall.

M. CESAR THOMSON.

The programme was an interesting one, and, though somewhat longer than the average, was of such pleasant variety and contrast and so thoroughly well performed that the enjoyment of the listeners was sustained to the very end. The numbers were as follows:

Symphony in G major, No. 13....Josef Haydn
1. Adagio (G major).
Allegro (G major).
2. Largo (D major).
3. Menuetto; Allegretto (G major).
Trio (G major).
4. Finale: Allegro con spirato (G major).
Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin, in A minor, op. 28.....
.....Karl Goldmark
1. Allegro moderato (A minor).
2. Air: Andante (G major).
3. Moderato (A minor).
Allegretto (A minor).
"L'Arlesienne," orchestral suite, No. 1....
.....Georges Bizet
1. Prelude: Allegro deciso; tempo di marcia (C minor).
Andante molto (A-flat major).
Un peu moins lent (C major).
2. Minuetto: Allegro giocoso (E-flat major).
3. Adagietto: Adagio (F major).
4. Carillon: Allegretto moderato (E major).
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," in A major, op. 9.....Hector Berlioz

The symphony by Haydn, which opened the concert, is full of freshness, vigor and tunefulness, like all the works of that great master. He was not only the creator of the orchestral symphony—or rather the adapter of the sonata form to symphonic requirements—but also by far the most voluminous composer of that class of works who has ever lived. One cannot help wondering if there is not something well worth the hearing among the 150 symphonies he is said to have composed (it is certain that the number exceeds 120) aside from the dozen or so that are commonly found on our concert programmes. For none of the great composers excel him in the evenly good quality of his work. Whatever he wrote was, if not of greatest scope or deepest meaning, at least never trivial; his fount of melody never ran dry, and his mastery of musical form and his skill in instrumentation were of the highest order. The symphony played last night is a fair, though by no means the best, example of his style, and, like many others, betrays his fondness for the string orchestra, upon which the weight of the work is put. As for its performance, it was unexceptionable, save that it may be said that Mr. Paur's fondness for extreme dynamic effects does not fit in with Haydn's music so well as with that of the modern school. A brilliant rendering of Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture followed, after which came forward to play the man whom the musical contingent had honored by turning out for once in full force.

Goldmark's A-minor concerto, which Mr. Thomson selected for his number, cannot be said to rank with the greatest half dozen concertos for the violin, either for its general musical worth or for pleasing opportunities afforded the virtuoso. It is difficult enough, without doubt; it calls for abounding technic, but even the tours de force are not of a sort to impress the listener with the relieved sense of mighty obstacles safely and skillfully surmounted. The second movement is by far the best, with its fine contrast of broadly flowing cantilena and lively melody; here, too, the orchestration does not so often tend to submerge the solo violin as in the first and the final movements. Mr. Thomson revealed himself at once as a complete master of his instrument. Rumors preceded him to this country that although he was undeniably a player of astounding technical ability, he lacked something of the warmth and grace that belong to a truly great artist. It is hard to see where any such criticism would hold. If one allows himself to be influenced by the personal appearance of the man, his quiet demeanor and utter lack of all "staginess," that impassive face ever hovering over the violin some such idea might be suggested. But a closer attention to the marvellous things he is doing with the instrument tell another story. Not only is there absolute accuracy and flawless purity in every tone, but a nicety of expression, a subtlety of nuance and a wealth of meaning that call for as great admiration as the quiet ease with which he surmounts every technical difficulty. Mr. Thompson is, in every sense of the word, a great artist, and, as those who have heard him play extended programmes know, at home in all schools. He was most enthusiastically received, and forced to bow his acknowledgements repeatedly at the close of the concerto.

The remaining numbers of the programme were charming in themselves and delightfully played by the orchestra, which was certainly on its mettle last evening. The final concert for this season takes place on the evening of [illegible]

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1895.

THAT NEW MUSIC HALL.

Its Stockholders Meet in Bumstead Hall and Decide to Let Matters Remain as They Are for the Present—Officers Elected.

An extremely small proportion of the stockholders of the new Boston Music Hall attended the annual meeting at noon today in Bumstead Hall, and the rows of empty chairs seemed to indicate that the interest with which the project was inaugurated had largely died away. After Colonel Henry L. Higginson, the president of the company, had called the meeting to order, the record of the last meeting and the report of the treasurer were read by Charles E. Cotting, the clerk and treasurer of the corporation. His statement of the finances of the company has already been published. In reply to the questions asked about various items by Charles P. Curtis, Mr. Cotting gave, by means of the treasurer's books, a detailed statement of how the various expenses were incurred. Among the items mentioned by him were $2000 paid to McKim, Mead & White, the architects, as a commission, and $2600 paid to T. Dennie Boardman for securing subscriptions.

The report of the subscription committee was read by Edward W. Hooper. He stated that of 406 subscribers 385 had paid all that was asked of them by the committee; 363 persons had paid in $207,450, of which $200,000 had been issued in stock and the balance of $7450 deposited in the Merchants' National Bank. One person who had subscribed $10,000 had paid nothing as yet, although it was stated that a payment was to be made shortly. Another person, who had subscribed $2500, was dead, and his heirs were only willing to pay $1000. A third person, who had subscribed $1000, refused to make any payment, on the ground that the old Music Hall had not been taken for the purposes of the transit commission, and that therefore the need of a new hall was not pressing. In all twenty-one persons had failed to pay anything on account of their subscriptions, and some of these declined to do so for the reason assigned by the $1000 subscriber already mentioned. Mr. Hooper suggested that the directors were uncertain how to act with regard to these recalcitrant subscribers. Mr. Curtis moved that the directors should be instructed to follow the advice of counsel in regard to these unpaid subscriptions, and the motion was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Hooper then said that an expression of views as to the future course to be taken by the company was desirable. There were three courses that could be followed: One was to go ahead and build the new hall; but this was open to serious objection so long as the old hall remained standing. It was probable that a new hall, under such conditions, would not clear even its running expenses. Another course was to wind up the affairs of the corporation as speedily as possible. The third course was to allow matters to remain in the same position that they were in now.

Colonel Higginson said that at the time the ground for a new Music Hall was bought, it was felt that such a purchase was necessary, as the outlook was that, unless such a step were taken Boston would be without any hall. Tremont Temple had been burned; and in the opinion of those best calculated to know about the matter, the old Music Hall was soon to be taken to make way for an elevated railroad. The site secured for the new Music Hall was an excellent one; the property was valuable and was increasing in value; there had already been a slight increase, and the prospect was that there would be a much greater increase, enough to pay a fair interest on the investment if it ever became desirable to sell the land. He was, therefore, in favor of allowing the project to remain as it was at the present time. Mr. Curtis and others present concurred in this view of the matter, and the election of officers was then proceeded with and resulted as follows: Treasurer and clerk, Charles E. Cotting; directors, Henry L. Higginson, Edward W. Hooper, Henry F. Sears, William S. Bigelow and Charles E. Cotting.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.,

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1895.

STORY OF A GRAND PIANO

It Happened at the Academy of Music in February Last.

ON A BOSTON SYMPHONY NIGHT

The Sudden Demand by Which Manager Ellis and Mr. Comee Were Confronted and How They Managed to Satisfy It.

(From the Boston Herald.)

It was at Philadelphia, not long ago, and Mrs. Julia Wyman was the soloist. It had been decided that to save the singer the trouble of coming over to Boston to rehearse she should meet them in Philadelphia, and run over her songs with the orchestra in the half-hour before the doors were thrown open, the musicians being called for that purpose at seven o'clock.

The orchestra is very popular in Philadelphia, and the sale of rush seats is always about like that here when Melba or Ysaye are the soloists. It is the custom to open the doors at 7.30 o'clock to admit the rushers. It is the habit of Fred Comee, the assistant manager of the orchestra, to saunter over to the hall at about 7.25 o'clock, see that everything is all right—that the hall is there, the lights and heat in place—and then order the doors open.

On this evening, with the fact that the house was to be tremendous, aiding a good dinner to digest, he pursued his usual habit. He found a great crowd outside. The officer in charge said to him: "You must open these doors at once; the crowd is blocking the street." "All right," was Comee's reply, "just let me see that everything is serene."

He went into the hall. There he found Paur bathed in perspiration, Mrs. Wyman nearly in hysterics, and the orchestra with a general air of demoralization. The orchestra parts of Mrs. Wyman's songs were so bad that they could not be used. "I must have a piano," was the conductor's demand.

It is the etiquette of the manager never to contradict the conductor—just before a concert. So Comee smiled reassuringly, just as if he had been asked for the time. Indeed, he put his hand into his pocket as if about to say "Have a piano with me," but he only replied, "All right, Mr. Paur."

Calmness cleared the air. The orchestra filed off the stage to the artist's room, Mrs. Wyman went to wipe her eyes—and probably to powder her nose—and the assistant manager ordered the doors open, as if all was right, and then he started on a run for the hotel to find Ellis. He was just dressing. "Paur wants a piano," exclaimed Comee, explaining about the orchestral parts.

Nothing phases Ellis. His immaculate shirt front never even crackled, and not a hair came out of place. "All right," was his only reply, as he got into his coat.

It was then 7.40 o'clock. The concert began at 8. In the natural course of the programme, at 8.15, Mrs. Wyman would be on the stage, and there must be a piano or she would have to sing unaccompanied. Everything was closed up. There was no piano in the building where the hall was.

At quarter before eight Comee and Ellis were back in the hall, allowing Mr. Paur to infer from their manner that the piano was right at their heels, and explaining to the man who makes their announcements from the stage, when there were any to be made, that he was to go out after the overture and announce that as the orchestral parts to Mrs. Wyman's songs had not arrived, the singer would appear after instead of before the symphony, and sing with a piano accompaniment.

Just opposite the hall there was a club, and some about the hall knew that the club had bought a new piano, which had just been put in. They rushed over there. There were two men in the club, both equally willing to lend the piano, but both equally without authority to do any such thing. That settled that.

They jumped into a cab, with the piano, for all they could see, a hundred miles away, and Mrs. Wyman's song coming nearer and nearer. They told the driver to go like mad to Steinway's, hoping to find some one there. The Jehu started, at a great pace, in the wrong direction, but they even felt it would be a loss of time to stop him and turn him about, and just at that moment behold there was another piano wareroom. It was lighted up. In the doorway stood one of the firm, and—on a dray in front of the building was a grand piano, which half a dozen men were just preparing to move into the shop.

In a flash they tumbled out of the cab and rushed up to the piano man, and almost sooner than it takes to tell it that piano, which had just come in from out of town, was turned about and headed for the hall.

The overture was within two minutes of its finale, when ten men lugged the big wooden music box into the corridor, and, at the conclusion, it was quietly put on the platform, wheeled into place, and Mrs. Wyman, accompanied by Zach, came on in her proper turn in the programme, sung her songs, and no one in the audience knew a rush at fate the managers had had, how near the programme had come to being unset[illegible]

[illegible] Paur had wanted to be asked for a piano, as easily as far as he could see, as if he had wanted the evening paper. He had not stipulated for a "good" piano, or one in tune, but he had just asked for a plain piano, and he got it.

It is incidents of this sort that relieve the travelling of the Symphony Orchestra of monotony, and prevent its managers from taking on a superabundance of flesh.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1895.

NEW MUSIC HALL.

Its Stockholders Meet in Bumstead Hall and Decide to Let Matters Remain as They Are for the Present—Officers Elected.

An extremely small proportion of the stockholders of the new Boston Music Hall attended the annual meeting Wednesday in Bumstead Hall, and the rows of empty chairs seemed to indicate that the interest with which the project was inaugurated had largely died away. After Col. Henry L. Higginson, the President of the company, had called the meeting to order, the record of the last meeting and the report of the Treasurer were read by Charles E. Cotting, the Clerk and Treasurer of the corporation. His statement of the finances of the company has already been published.

In reply to the questions asked about various items by Charles P. Curtis, Mr. Cotting gave by means of the Treasurer's books, a detailed statement of how the various expenses were incurred. Among the items mentioned by him were $2000 paid to McKim, Mead & White, the architects, as a commission, and $2600 paid to T. Dennie Boardman for securing subscriptions.

The report of the Subscription Committee was read by Edward S. Hooper. He stated that of 406 subscribers 385 had paid all that was asked of them by the committee; 363 persons had paid in $207,450, of which $200,000 had been issued in stock and the balance of $7450 deposited in the Merchants' National Bank. One person who had subscribed $10,000 had paid nothing as yet, although it was stated that a payment was to be made shortly.

Col. Higginson said that at the time the ground for a new Music Hall was bought, it was felt that such a purchase was necessary, as the outlook was that, unless such a step were taken Boston would be without any hall. Tremont Temple had been burned; and in the opinion of those best calculated to know about the matter, the old Music Hall was soon to be taken to make way for an elevated railroad.

The site secured for the new Music Hall was an excellent one; the property was valuable and was increasing in value; there had already been a slight increase, and the prospect was that there would be a much greater increase, enough to pay a fair interest on the investment if it ever became desirable to sell the land. He was, therefore, in favor of allowing the project to remain as it was at the present time.

Mr. Curtis and others present concurred in this view of the matter, and the election of officers was then proceeded with and resulted as follows: Treasurer and Clerk, Charles E. Cotting; Directors, Henry L. Higginson, Edward W. Hooper, Henry F. Sears, William S. Bigelow and Charles E. Cotting.

The Telegram.

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

PROVIDENCE TELEGRAM PUB. CO.,

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Cesar Thomson, Violinist, Heartily Greeted at Infantry Hall.

The fifth in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Infantry hall last evening was attended by an audience that nearly filled the big enclosure. It was small wonder, however, for the great Belgian violin virtuoso, Cesar Thomson, was the soloist. His triumphal march from success to success, from city to city, throughout the country had been heralded, and the music-loving people of Providence awaited eagerly his advent.

The applause given Mr. Thomson was hearty and spontaneous, elicited by the master touch of the divinely-inspired musician. Strains magic, sweet, delicate, weird and powerful held the listeners in a spell, to awaken into a gradual thunder of applause, for the magnetism of such music could not be dispelled abruptly.

Mr. Thomson was obliged to bow acknowledgments to evidences of well-merited admiration three times.

The orchestral selections were rendered in the usual excellent way of the Boston Symphony.

The program was:

Josef Haydn.....Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Hartel, No. 13.)
Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Fingal's Cave"
Karl Goldmark.....Concerto for violin, in A minor, op. 28
Georges Bizet.....
"L'Arlesienne," Orchestral Suite, No. 1
Hector Berlioz.....Overture,
"The Roman Carnival," in A major, op. 9

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, Feb. 23, 1895.

MRS. BEACH AT THE SYMPHONY.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's appearance at the Symphony concert is always an event of interest to Boston music-lovers, as well as to all who feel a local pride in the attainments of a woman who has made for herself such a reputation as a player and as a composer as Mrs. Beach has. Saint-Saens' is in the front rank of modern piano-forte concertos; and Mrs. Beach played it with fire, understanding and breadth of sympathy. Indeed, one critic—and that the best and most exacting musical critic in town—says she has never done anything quite so fine, in the way of piano-playing, as her performance of this concerto. In the Scherzo, especially, she played with a remarkably fine and delicate grace of technique, and a keen and artistic sympathy with the composer.

As Miss Amy Marcy Cheney, Mrs. Beach gave wondeful promise, it will be remembered, but a few short years ago. This promise, contrary to the rule with prodigies, has been more than fulfilled. Not only has Mrs. Beach taken the front rank as a pianist, but she is generally admitted to be the first woman composer in America, her work partaking of a solidity and breadth, of a deep musical intelligence and harmonious sympathy, equalled by few of the sterner sex,—where the world has been in the habit of looking for great composers. As Mrs. Beach is only 27 years old even yet, it may be confidently expected that she will not fully reach the height of her powers for years to come. And the world may yet cease to sigh for a woman-composer who shall equal the old masters of music and song.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1895.

The Dull Program of the Sixteenth Symphony Concert—Repertoire of the Second Week of the Opera.

The program of the sixteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Concerto Grosso No. 6, in G minor.....Handel
Symphony in B flat major (B. & H. No. 12).....Haydn
Overture, "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail,".....Mozart
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Centennial March.....Wagner

Neither the program nor the performance calls for extended comment. The program was dull, and apparently thrown together at random. The performance was generally perfunctory. The minuet of the symphony was played in a logy fashion, and in the march there was an occasional absence of precision.

Why in the world should the people of Boston be invited at this late day to hear the dismal failure, the one great and complete failure of Wagner. Mr. Apthorp tells us in his infinite wisdom that the full title of this march is "Grosser Festmarsch, zur Eröffnung der hundertjährigen Gedenkfeier der Unabhängigkeits-Erklärung der vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika." The music sounds like the title, only it is magnified a hundred fold.

Mr. Paur does not seem to be aware that in other countries orchestral leaders of repute are producing constantly novelties of interest. If he should examine thoughtfully the numbers of the Signale as they come, and also the programs prepared by a man in Chicago whose name is Theodore Thomas he might gain valuable ideas concerning the present condition of music in Europe and the United States. It is well to be conservative; but the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should not shy at a new composition because he has not heard of the composer. It is his duty to examine compositions that have been played in Berlin, Brussels, Paris and St. Petersburg, and, if he regards them as worthy, to produce them here before they are old and worn as a garment.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday [illegible]

SUNDAY, FEB. 24, 1895.

Symphony Concert.

The opening number of the 16th symphony program was Handel's concerto in G minor, written for strings. Throughout the fine movements the harmonious team work of the orchestra was admirably shown, especially in the portions of the concerto in which the various contingents played in unison. The passages in second movement were delightfully given, and in the third the rhythm of the "snap" was carefully observed and sharply produced.

The complex, brilliant passages for the first violin, were skilfully played by Mr Kneisel. In the rapid tempo of the closing movement the violins were very smooth. The staccoto chords running through the whole concerto were notably even and true, the cellos and basses producing the organ effects which, according to the original score, was intended by Handel.

In the Haydn symphony in B flat major the themes by the first violins made a dainty contrasting harmony with the resonant background of the other instruments of the orchestra, and the fantasia was one of the best portions of the work. The color effects in the second movement were admirably brought out by the use of drums and muted trumpets. The finale was given with characteristic lightness and dash.

The Mozart overture to "The Elopement from the Seraglio" was beautifully interpreted, in fact the orchestra seemed to take delight in playing it. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, with its fantastic sarabande figures and fortissimo passages, was effectively given, and Wagner's "Centennial March," which closes the program, was played with the requisite vigor and solemnity.

At the rehearsal and concert this week Mr Alwin Schroeder, cellist, will be the soloist. The program will be as follows: Foote, symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini;" Paine, "An Island Fantasy," solo for cello; Dvorak, "Waldesruhe;" Klengel, capriccio; Beethoven, symphony No. 2; Liazt-Doppler, Hungarian rhapsody No. 2.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 55.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Historical Programme—Wagner an Incongruous Element.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall were:

Concerto Grosso, No. 6, G minor.....Handel
Symphony, B-flat, Peters, No. 6.....Haydn
Overture, "The Elopement from the Seraglio.....Mozart
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
"Centennial March".....Wagner

This was, perhaps, not one of Mr. Paur's most felicitous examples of his skill in programme making. It was probably intended to be historical in interest, if it may be judged by the chronological arrangements of the composers, but from the Handel concerto to the Haydn symphony is a very long step, and from Beethoven's noble overture to Wagner's weak and utterly unimpressive march, the leap is immeasurable. Viewing the programme in a historical aspect, there is a steady growth from Handel to Beethoven, and a painful retrogression from Beethoven to Wagner. This is doubtless true as a mere matter of fact, and it may have been Mr. Paur's intention to emphasize it as he has done, but it was scarcely fair to the close of the 19th century to typify it by one of the most uninspired and uninspiring marches to which ever eminent composer boldly affixed his name. However, with the exception of this march, the concert consisted of pure music, and sounded better than it looked. It was, on the whole, refreshing for once to have so large an instalment of works of this order, in an exceptionally active musical season, in the course of which we have had so much of the feverish, unrestful and overlabored music of the new school. It is well now and then to descend from stilts and to walk with a firm foothold.

The Handel concerto is bright, and despite the quaint antiquity that marks much of it is remarkably fresh. The lurid movement, a larghetto, is delightful in its vivacity, and the fourth movement, an allegro, has a fascinating brilliancy, while the finale is a striking example of the composer's skill, the movement being in three-part contrapuntal writing, and wonderfully full and solid in effect. The concerto was perfectly played throughout and with a complete absence of that stiffness and formality with which it is the custom to interpret Handel's music. Haydn's genial and sunny symphony is the best of the master's efforts in its order. Mr. Paur is always happy in dealing with Haydn and Mozart, and his reading of this work was no exception to the rule. It was wholly admirable in regard to tempi, spirit and expression, and it was faultlessly and beautifully played from beginning to end. The Mozart overture is very seldom performed, but it well deserves a more frequent hearing than is accorded it. Here again both the reading and the playing were without blemish and were finely in sympathy with the sentiment of the music, the charming andante being given with especial warmth and delicacy; every point in the lovely instrumentation being brought out with clearness and delightful effect.

The matchless Beethoven overture has rarely had so strong, so intelligent and so impressive a rendering as it received at Mr. Paur's hands on this occasion. It was given with a broad, dignified emphasis, and in its more impressive moments with splendid brilliancy, while the glorious coda was worked up with masterly skill. A hearty round of applause rewarded the performance. In fact, the applause was very cordial through the whole concert. Mr. Paur made all it was possible to make of the Wagner march. He read it carefully and with all the effect of which it is capable, and it was brilliantly played by the orchestra; but he could present the work in no more interesting aspect than pertains to it as massive instrumentation wasted on feeble ideas and leading to nowhere in particular, except a sensational noisiness at the close.

The programme for the concert is: Symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," A. Foote; "An Island Fantasy," J. K. Paine; "Waldesruhe," for 'cello, Dvorak; caprices for 'cello, Klengel; symphony No. 2, Beethoven; Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, Liszt-Dopple. Mr. Alvin Schroeder is the soloist.

---

[99]

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1895.

STORY OF A GRAND PIANO

It Happened at the Academy of Music in February Last.

ON A BOSTON SYMPHONY NIGHT

The Sudden Demand by Which Manager Ellis and Mr. Comee Were Confronted and How They Managed to Satisfy It.

(From the Boston Herald.)

It was at Philadelphia, not long ago, and Mrs. Julia Wyman was the soloist. It had been decided that to save the singer the trouble of coming over to Boston to rehearse she should meet them in Philadelphia, and run over her songs with the orchestra in the half-hour before the doors were thrown open, the musicians being called for that purpose at seven o'clock.

The orchestra is very popular in Philadelphia, and the sale of rush seats is always about like that here when Melba or Ysaye are the soloists. It is the custom to open the doors at 7.30 o'clock to admit the rushers. It is the habit of Fred Comee, the assistant manager of the orchestra, to saunter over to the hall at about 7.25 o'clock, see that everything is all right—that the hall is there, the lights and heat in place—and then order the doors open.

On this evening, with the fact that the house was to be tremendous, aiding a good dinner to digest, he pursued his usual habit. He found a great crowd outside. The officer in charge said to him: "You must open these doors at once; the crowd is blocking the street." "Al right," was Comee's reply, "just let me see that everything is serene."

He went into the hall. There he found Paur bathed in perspiration, Mrs. Wyman nearly in hysterics, and the orchestra with a general air of demoralization. The orchestra parts of Mrs. Wyman's songs were so bad that they could not be used. "I must have a piano," was the conductor's demand.

It is the etiquette of the manager never to contradict the conductor—just before a concert. So Comee smiled reassuringly, just as if he had been asked for the time. Indeed, he put his hand into his pocket as if about to say "Have a piano with me," but he only replied, "All right, Mr. Paur."

Calmness cleared the air. The orchestra filed off the stage to the artist's room, Mrs. Wyman went to wipe her eyes—and probably to powder her nose—and the assistant manager ordered the doors open, as if all was right, and then he started on a run for the hotel to find Ellis. He was just dressing. "Paur wants a piano," exclaimed Comee, explaining about the orchestral parts.

Nothing phases Ellis. His immaculate shirt front never even crackled, and not a hair came out of place. "All right," was his only reply, as he got into his coat.

It was then 7.40 o'clock. The concert began at 8. In the natural course of the programme, at 8.15, Mrs. Wyman would be on the stage, and there must be a piano or she would have to sing unaccompanied. Everything was closed up. There was no piano in the building where the hall was.

At quarter before eight Comee and Ellis were back in the hall, allowing Mr. Paur to infer from their manner that the piano was right at their heels, and explaining to the man who makes their announcements from the stage, when there were any to be made, that he was to go out after the overture and announce that as the orchestral parts to Mrs. Wyman's songs had not arrived, the singer would appear after instead of before the symphony, and sing with a piano accompaniment.

Just opposite the hall there was a club, and some about the hall knew that the club had bought a new piano, which had just been put in. They rushed over there. There were two men in the club, both equally willing to lend the piano, but both equally without authority to do any such thing. That settled that.

They jumped into a cab, with the piano, for all they could see, a hundred miles away, and Mrs. Wyman's song coming nearer and nearer. They told the driver to go like mad to Steinway's, hoping to find some one there. The Jehu started, at a great pace, in the wrong direction, but they even felt it would be a loss of time to stop him and turn him about, and just at that moment behold there was another piano wareroom, It was lighted up. In the dorway stood one of the firm, and—on a dray in front of the building was a grand piano, which half a dozen men were just preparing to move into the shop.

In a flash they tumbled out of the cab and rushed up to the piano man, and almost sooner than it takes to tell it that piano, which had just come in from out of town, was turned about and headed for the hall.

The overture was within two minutes of its finale, when ten men lugged the big wooden music box into the corridor, and, at the conclusion, it was quietly put on the platform, wheeled into place, and Mrs. Wyman, accompanied by Zach, came on in her proper place in the programme, sung her songs, and no one in the audience knew what a rush at fate the managers had taken, or how near the programme had [illegible] being upset.

It is true that the piano was shockingly out of tune, but Mr. Paur had what he asked for, a piano, as easily, so far as he could see, as if he had wanted the evening paper. He had not stipulated for a "good" piano, or one in tune, but he had just asked for a plain piano, and he got it.

It is incidents of this sort that relieve the travelling of the Symphony Orchestra of monotony, and prevent its managers from taking on a superabundance of flesh.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1895.

NEW MUSIC HALL.

Its Stockholders Meet In Bumstead Hall and Decide to Let Matters Remain as They Are for the Present—Officers Elected.

An extremely small proportion of the stockholders of the new Boston Music Hall attended the annual meeting Wednesday in Bumstead Hall, and the rows of empty chairs seemed to indicate that the interest with which the project was inaugurated had largely died away. After Col. Henry L. Higginson, the President of the company, had called the meeting to order, the record of the last meeting and the report of the Treasurer were read by Charles E. Cotting, the Clerk and Treasurer of the corporation. His statement of the finances of the company has already been published.

In reply to the questions asked about various items by Charles P. Curtis, Mr. Cotting gave by means of the Treasurer's books, a detailed statement of how the various expenses were incurred. Among the items mentioned by him were $2000 paid to McKim, Mead & White, the architects, as a commission, and $2600 paid to T. Dennie Boardman for securing subscriptions.

The report of the Subscription Committee was read by Edward S. Hooper. He stated that of 406 subscribers 385 had paid all that was asked of them by the committee; 363 persons had paid in $207,450, of which $200,000 had been issued in stock and the balance of $7450 deposited in the Merchants' National Bank. One person who had subscribed $10,000 had paid nothing as yet, although it was stated that a payment was to be made shortly.

Col. Higginson said that at the time the ground for a new Music Hall was bought, it was felt that such a purchase was necessary, as the outlook was that, unless such a step were taken Boston would be without any hall. Tremont Temple had been burned; and in the opinion of those best calculated to know about the matter, the old Music Hall was soon to be taken to make way for an elevated railroad.

The site secured for the new Music Hall was an excellent one; the property was valuable and was increasing in value; there had already been a slight increase, and the prospect was that there would be a much greater increase, enough to pay a fair interest on the investment if it ever became desirable to sell the land. He was, therefore, in favor of allowing the project to remain as it was at the present time.

Mr. Curtis and others present concurred in this view of the matter, and the election of officers was then proceeded with and resulted as follows: Treasurer and Clerk, Charles E. Cotting; Directors, Henry L. Higginson, Edward W. Hooper, Henry F. Sears, William S. Bigelow and Charles E. Cotting.

The Telegram.

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

PROVIDENCE TELEGRAM PUB. CO.,

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Cesar Thomson, Violinist, Heartily Greeted at Infantry Hall.

The fifth in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Infantry hall last evening was attended by an audience that nearly filled the big enclosure. It was small wonder, however, for the great Belgian violin virtuoso, Cesar Thomson, was the soloist. His triumphal march from success to success, from city to city, throughout the country had been heralded, and the music-loving people of Providence awaited eagerly his advent.

The applause given Mr. Thomson was hearty and spontaneous, elicited by the master touch of the divinely-inspired musician. Strains magic, sweet, delicate, weird and powerful held the listeners in a spell, to awaken into a gradual thunder of applause, for the magnetism of such music could not be dispelled abruptly.

Mr. Thomson was obliged to bow acknowledgments to evidences of well-merited admiration three times.

The orchestral selections were rendered in the usual excellent way of the Boston Symphony.

The program was:

Josef Haydn.....Symphony in G major
.....(Breitkopf & Hartel, No. 13.)
Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Fingal's Cave"
Karl Goldmark.....
.....Concerto for violin, in A minor, op. 28
Georges Bizet.....
....."L'Arlesienne," Orchestral Suite, No. 1
Hector Berlioz.....Overture,
"The Roman Carnival," in A major, op. 9

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, Feb. 23, 1895.

MRS. BEACH AT THE SYMPHONY.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's appearance at the Symphony concert is always an event of interest to Boston music-lovers, as well as to all who feel a local pride in the attainments of a woman who has made for herself such a reputation as a player and as a composer as Mrs. Beach has. Saint-Saens' is in the front rank of modern piano-forte concertos; and Mrs. Beach played it with fire, understanding and breadth of sympathy. Indeed, one critic—and that the best and most exacting musical critic in town—says she has never done anything quite so fine, in the way of piano-playing, as her performance of this concerto. In the Scherzo, especially, she played with a remarkably fine and delicate grace of technique, and a keen and artistic sympathy with the composer.

As Miss Amy Marcy Cheney, Mrs. Beach gave wondeful promise, it will be remembered, but a few short years ago. This promise, contrary to the rule with prodigies, has been more than fulfilled. Not only has Mrs. Beach taken the front rank as a pianist, but she is generally admitted to be the first woman composer in America, her work partaking of a solidity and breadth, of a deep musical intelligence and harmonious sympathy, equalled by few of the sterner sex,—where the world has been in the habit of looking for great composers. As Mrs. Beach is only 27 years old even yet, it may be confidently expected that she will not fully reach the height of her powers for years to come. And the world may yet cease to sigh for a woman-composer who shall equal the old masters of music and song.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1895.

The Dull Program of the Sixteenth Symphony Concert—Repertoire of the Second Week of the Opera.

The program of the sixteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Concerto Grosso No. 6, in G minor.....Handel
Symphony in B flat major (B. & H. No. 12)
.....Haydn
Overture, "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail,"
.....Mozart
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Centennial March.....Wagner

Neither the program nor the performance calls for extended comment. The program was dull, and apparently thrown together at random. The performance was generally perfunctory. The minuet of the symphony was played in a logy fashion, and in the march there was an occasional absence of precision.

Why in the world should the people of Boston be invited at this late day to hear the dismal failure, the one great and complete failure of Wagner. Mr. Apthorp tells us in his infinite wisdom that the full title of this march is "Grosser Festmarsch. zur Eröffnung der hundertjährigen Gedenkfeier der Unabhängigkeits-Erklärung der vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika." The music sounds like the title, only it is magnified a hundred fold.

Mr. Paur does not seem to be aware that in other countries orchestral leaders of repute are producing constantly novelties of interest. If he should examine thoughtfully the numbers of the Signale as they come, and also the programs prepared by a man in Chicago whose name is Theodore Thomas he might gain valuable ideas concerning the present condition of music in Europe and the United States. It is well to be conservative; but the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should not shy at a new composition because he has not heard of the composer. It is his duty to examine compositions that have been played in Berlin, Brussels, Paris and St. Petersburg, and, if he regards them as worthy, to produce them here before they are old and worn as a garment.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 24, 1895.

Symphony Concert.

The opening number of the 16th symphony program was Handel's concerto in G minor, written for strings. Throughout the fine movements the harmonious team work of the orchestra was admirably shown, especially in the portions of the concerto in which the various contingents played in unison. The passages in second movement were delightfully given, and in the third the rhythm of the "snap" was carefully observed and sharply produced.

The complex, brilliant passages for the first violin, were skilfully played by Mr Kneisel. In the rapid tempo of the closing movement the violins were very smooth. The staccoto chords running through the whole concerto were notably even and true, the cellos and basses producing the organ effects which, according to the original score, was intended by Handel.

In the Haydn symphony in B flat major the themes by the first violins made a dainty contrasting harmony with the resonant background of the other instruments of the orchestra, and the fantasia was one of the best portions of the work. The color effects in the second movement were admirably brought out by the use of drums and muted trumpets. The finale was given with characteristic lightness and dash.

The Mozart overture to "The Elopement from the Seraglio" was beautifully interpreted, in fact the orchestra seemed to take delight in playing it. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, with its fantastic sarabande figures and fortissimo passages, was effectively given, and Wagner's "Centennial March," which closes the program, was played with the requisite vigor and solemnity.

At the rehearsal and concert this week Mr Alwin Schroeder, cellist, will be the soloist. The program will be as follows: Foote, symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini;" Paine, "An Island Fantasy," solo for cello; Dvorak, "Waldesruhe;" Klengel, capriccio; Beethoven, symphony No. 2; Liszt-Doppler, Hungarian rhapsody No. 2.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.

VOL. XCVII., NO. 55.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Historical Programme—Wagner an Incongruous Element.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall were:

Concerto Grosse, No. 6, G minor.....Handel
Symphony, B-flat, Peters, No. 6.....Haydn
Overture, "The Elopement from the Seraglio.....Mozart
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
"Centennial March".....Wagner

This was, perhaps, not one of Mr. Paur's most felicitous examples of his skill in programme making. It was probably intended to be historical in interest, if it may be judged by the chronological arrangements of the composers, but from the Handel concerto to the Haydn symphony is a very long step, and from Beethoven's noble overture to Wagner's weak and utterly unimpressive march, the leap is immeasurable. Viewing the programme in a historical aspect, there is a steady growth from Handel to Beethoven, and a painful retrogression from Beethoven to Wagner. This is doubtless true as a mere matter of fact, and it may have been Mr. Paur's intention to emphasize it as he has done, but it was scarcely fair to the close of the 19th century to typify it by one of the most uninspired and uninspiring marches to which ever eminent composer boldly affixed his name. However, with the exception of this march, the concert consisted of pure music, and sounded better than it looked. It was, on the whole, refreshing for once to have so large an instalment of works of this order, in an exceptionally active musical season, in the course of which we have had so much of the feverish, unrestful and overlabored music of the new school. It is well now and then to descend from stilts and to walk with a firm foothold.

The Handel concerto is bright, and despite the quaint antiquity that marks much of it is remarkably fresh. The lurid movement, a larghetto, is delightful in its vivacity, and the fourth movement, an allegro, has a fascinating brilliancy, while the finale is a striking example of the composer's skill, the movement being in three-part contrapuntal writing, and wonderfully full and solid in effect. The concerto was perfectly played throughout and with a complete absence of that stiffness and formality with which it is the custom to interpret Handel's music. Haydn's genial and sunny symphony is the best of the master's efforts in its order. Mr. Paur is always happy in dealing with Haydn and Mozart, and his reading of this work was no exception to the rule. It was wholly admirable in regard to tempi, spirit and expression, and it was faultlessly and beautifully played from beginning to end. The Mozart overture is very seldom performed, but it well deserves a more frequent hearing than is accorded it. Here again both the reading and the playing were without blemish and were finely in sympathy with the sentiment of the music, the charming andante being given with especial warmth and delicacy, every point in the lovely instrumentation being brought out with clearness and delightful effect.

The matchless Beethoven overture has rarely had so strong, so intelligent and so impressive a rendering as it received at Mr. Paur's hands on this occasion. It was given with a broad, dignified emphasis, and in its more impressive moments with splendid brilliancy, while the glorious coda was worked up with masterly skill. A hearty round of applause rewarded the performance. In fact, the applause was very cordial through the whole concert. Mr. Paur made all it was possible to make of the Wagner march. He read it carefully and with all the effect of which it is capable, and it was brilliantly played by the orchestra; but he could present the work in no more interesting aspect than pertains to it as massive instrumentation wasted on feeble ideas and leading to nowhere in particular, except a sensational noisiness at the close.

The programme for the concert is: Symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," A. Foote; "An Island Fantasy," J. K. Paine; "Waldesruhe," for 'cello, Dvorak; caprices for 'cello, Klengel; symphony No. 2, Beethoven; Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, Liszt-Dopple. Mr. Alvin Schroeder is the soloist.

THE WAY THEY TRAVEL.

Members of the Symphony Orchestra on the Road.

Their Route—How They Pair off—On the Train and at the Hotel—Their Ways of Killing Time—Card Playing—Their Clientele in Other Cities—A Few Anecdotes.

There is a silent power behind the throne in the management of all such affairs for the big orchestra, Mr. Charles A. Ellis, by whom all the detail for the business of the tours are arranged to be carried into effect by Mr. Fred R. Comee, his assistant manager, who accompanies the orchestra and attends to the carrying out of the details Mr. Ellis has developed. The merest glance at the matter will show the most casual thinker what a might of detail there is taking over 80 musicians with their instruments, music and baggage from Boston to Washington and return, and give by the way six concerts from Saturday to Saturday. Yet so nicely has the plan of the tour been laid out that the entire company travels as if each were by himself, with the utmost comfort and without a hitch, the itinerary, which is printed and given out to each man before starting, being adhered to with an exactness that is little short of remarkable.

Usually the orchestra leaves the Providence station Sunday on the train that starts at 7:30 in the evening, although on their last trip, owing to the Handel and Haydn concert, they left at midnight on that day. They travel in three sleepers which are specially reserved for them, though attached to the regular train. The assigning of the berths is all done by Comee, who, of course, considers very carefully the personal preferences of the men. This requires no end of tact, and only a long association with the orchestra could enable a man to attend to this simple detail and make no blunder. In the early days of the orchestra Mr. Comee put together in one section two men who had not spoken for three months, and travellers can appreciate the awkwardness of such an arrangement. But today Comee has too good a run of the orchestra and its affairs to make a break of that sort.

As in every organization where men are thrown much together, they pair off in a way, and settle into groups. This has to be known by the assistant manager, who governs himself accordingly. Tim Adamowski and his brother Joe, who live together in town, always travel together. But while there are two Loefflers, two Heindls and two Kneisels in the orchestra, the Adamowskis are the only brothers that pair off. Among the couples that travel as pals are Louis Svecenski and Otto Roth, Zach and Grunberg, Moldauer and Fiedler. In assigning the berths each of these pair of men is given a section, and they settle among themselves the upper and lower berth question, it usually being a turn about and turn matter.

Ever since the Boston Symphony orchestra became an institution here it has been a sort of pet with Boston's finest. Music lovers have made a sort of fetish of the organization, and fetisicism in the form of Symphony concert attendance has been as smart as it has been popular. Since, therefore, everything from the personal habits to the personal follies of the individual members of the orchestra has been alike interesting to the violet bedecked girl who sits in the bepremiumed seats below stairs, and the equally pretty and much enthusiastic girl who rushes for the best seat up aloft, it is not unlikely that many may take a great interest in the way in which the orchestra travels when three or four times each season it leaves Boston with a Saturday night that seems all out of shape owing to a lack of Symphony concert.

The southern trip, the only one they make now, the western trip being a thing of the past, is always about the same in its details. They go through direct to Philadelphia, with that inevitable hiatus, two hours in New York on the morning of Monday from 7 to 9 o'clock, arriving there at 11:23. They go at once to the Continental Hotel. They give a concert at the Academy of Music Monday evening, and leave at 10 minutes of 8 Tuesday morning for Baltimore, where they arrive at 10:15, and put up at the Carrollton. They remain in Baltimore two days, as they give the Washington concerts from that city, never having put up at the capital since some years ago they received rather shabby treatment from one of the houses during a tremendous influx of tourists. The Baltimore & Ohio railroad puts a special train at their service, and they make the run between the two cities in 50 minutes, and are made so comfortable at the Carrollton that it is much more convenient and attractive than staying in Washington. Their Washington concert is usually given on Tuesday evening. Their train from Baltimore leaves at 6 o'clock, and after the concert returns at 10:40, so that before 11 o'clock they are sitting down to their hearty supper at the Carrollton again. Their Baltimore concert is given at the new Music Hall, one of the handsomest in the country, on Wednesday, and the next morning, that's Thursday, they leave for New York at 10 minutes of 8, where they arrive at five minutes of 1, and go directly to the Park Avenue Hotel, where they have always stopped. They give a concert that evening, Thursday, at the Metropolitan Opera House, and on the following day they give a public rehearsal at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn at 3 P. M., and a concert at the same place Saturday evening concludes the course. They leave New York Saturday midnight express, and arrive Sunday morning.

Mr. Paur, who cannot stand the night travel, always starts ahead of the orchestra and travels to New York in the daytime, returning on Sunday.

The daytime travel of the orchestra is made in two day coaches, one for the smokers, and one for the non-smokers, and a special baggage car is always attached to the train in which they go. The handling of their baggage is no small item of the travel. Mr. Neil Patterson attends to all this for Mr. Ellis, and the system by which it is done is so admirable that there is never any confusion. All the orchestra instruments travel in the baggage car in Mr. Patterson's care, and the itinerary always states at what time hotel and theatre baggage must be ready, and if any of the men fail to be prompt in this matter, why they move their baggage at their own expense. About one-half the men carry trunks, and the rest "live in a valise," as the saying is. Usually there are about 120 pieces of baggage to handle. Of course if any of the orchestra men have solos on the programmes given while on tour they carry their own special instruments, and those they do not trust out of their own hands.

While the orchestra as a body stops at the Park Avenue, the Continental and the Carrollton, there are individual members of the orchestra who prefer to go somewhere else, in which case they are allowed an expense account equal to what it costs to pay the bills of the other men, who, as the saying is, "go to the hotel with Comee." For istance, Loeffler always stops at Hotel Martin, down in University place, while in New York. Several of the other men have some foreign hotel to which they are attached, and to which they always go, although most of the men prefer to have all that bother taken off their hands, and to go along with the majority.

This housing of the orchestra is very easily done. The list is sent on ahead to the hotel, and the rooms are assigned, the names entered on the register before they arrive, so that when they get there they simply walk up to the desk, look on the register, get their number and ask for their keyes. The men room together in about the same grouping that they travel, each man having a separate bed.

Apart from this personally conducted style of travel, each man is an independent person. He eats and sleeps as he pleases, and occupies the time not devoted to travel or concerts exactly as he likes. On the train nine-tenths of the men play cards. As there are 13 nationalities in the orchestra, there is a great variety in the games, although the favorite American game, poker, is very generally known. One or two French and German games press it hard. For this card playing the men break up into groups, and those groups will hang together for many seasons. As an example of how persistently this playing is kept up, take the score of one group who played together for three seasons. In '91 and '92 they played 2754 points in whist, and the winning pair was 12 points ahead at the end of the trip. This was on the western trip, and on their arrival in Fall River, on their return, they were even, the 12 points being made between Fall River and Boston. In '92 and '93 they played 4084 points, the winners being 216 points ahead. In '93 and '94 the score was 3414, with the winners 222 points ahead.

Of course many of the men read, and some of it is said to be very solid reading, too, and there is chess playing groups. Their days are spent very much as other men travelling would spend them. Some of the boys do a little sight seeing, some of them practise and some of them sleep. In Philadelphia it is very oddly noted that there is hardly a man who does not drift into Wanamaker's and buy something. It has become an an almost universal habit of the men to do this, even if it's not more than a necktie they get. In most of the cities many of them have friends or admirers, and there is some entertaining of a mild sort done.

The concerts when on the road are really more brilliant to look at than they are, because of the halls in which they are given are infinitely handsomer than Music Hall, and full dress is much more usual. For example, the Academy of Music in Philadelphia seats 3000 people, 600 more than our Music Hall, and it is always packed, the "rush" faction there being as energetic as it is in Boston. The new Music Hall at Baltimore is very handsome, and seats 2700, and there the orchestra has a clientele as loyal as its Boston following, the same people coming year in and year out. In Washington Mrs. Cleveland has a box always, although this year she has not occupied it. The Russian legation always occupied a box, and all the most famous of the diplomatic set are always in the audience, which is full dress, a very brilliant sight.

As a rule the men enjoy the trips. They like the change, and for the credit of the orchestra and for Boston it is worth noting that they are not viewed as "show people" by either the railroads or the hotels, while such is the sentiment of the body that it is doubtful if anything irregular could happen. The honor of the orchestra as a body is dead set against anything of the sort, and it would take a bold man to brave the sentiment of the men as an organization.

Many of the men have their little quips and quirks, but they are usually of an inoffensive sort, for which no one suffers. One, the first violinist, for example, is invariably late. It is said that so common is this habit that Comee as he paces the platform awaiting his men is often heard to say to the conductor as he sees the violinist enter the gate, "Well, you may go ahead. We are all here." Occasionally the man gets left, and has to travel on behind the orchestra at his own expense.

The assistant manager always laughs when anything is said of the men being left. It recalls a telegram which he once received at Wilmington, as the orchestra travelled homeward from Baltimore. It read, "Me and Hoyer is left." "I often wondered," said Comee, "why they sent that. I knew it almost as soon as they did. Did they expect me to put back for them, or to go back and personally conduct them on the next train. Goodness knows."

The touring has its excitements, like that recently told of the Julie Wyman experience in Philadelphia. Probably the most exciting time was their experience the year of the great blizzard. That w[illegible] Boston on the usual train, 7:30 P. M., and only got as far as East Douglas, where they remained until 6 the next night, when they were pulled back to town, and the entire trip given up. It was very lucky for their comfort that Comee had been so afraid that they might be snowed up during the night that, without saying a word to any one, he sent up to Parker's and bought 200 sandwiches, and at the station he bought all the apples and doughnuts he could find and had them packed away. They only got 40 miles when they were snowbound, and the next morning when they woke the snow was over the tops of the cars. They spent all that day shovelling snow by turns to assist the trainmen and get out of their snow bank.

An amusing experience that is still the subject of laughter was the suggestion made to the conductor at—well never mind the place—they probably know better by this time—that if the orchestra were to play from the station to the hotel they would probably have a much bigger house at night.

There is a funny story, which at the time of its happening was told from Maine to Florida. But that was six years ago, and it was so good that it may bear repeating, and even if it is not new to many Symphony orchestra followers, they may enjoy a revival of laughter over it. It was when Charlie Behr was in the orchestra, and they gave a concert at Lowell. The Opera House there is situated very much as the Tremont is here, that is, you go into the lobby, pass the ticket office, and turn round to approach the auditorium. The stage door is up an alley off another street from the main entrance and quite a little distance from it. Behr only played in the overture of the programme given, and after that was free to go where he pleased. It was the custom of the theatre, as in most one night places, to bill the next night's attraction as soon as tonight's audience was in, that having the advantage of catching the eyes of the audience coming out. The Symphony orchestra four-sheet posters were up on the bill boards at the entrance of the theatre at 8 o'clock. At 8:15 the Cleveland's minstrels, which were coming the next evening had their paper up.

Behr left the stage, went out the stage door, and, wondering what he would do with himself until the concert was over, strolled up the street, turned a corner and walked down the main street. Soon he came to the brilliantly lighted front of a theatre. He read the posters at the door. "Cleveland's minstrels." That suited him. He went in, bought a ticket, and sauntered into the auditorium. He took a look at the stage, and thought to himself, "Well, that's the queerest minstrel circle I ever saw. All white faces." Then he looked at the middle man—Gerricke, and he bolted back to the box office and demanded his money. Comee was in the back of the office counting up the house. The ticket man called out to him: "Mr. Comee, here's one of your men wants his money back."

"What's that?"

"One of your men asking for his money back. Oh, well, come and see for yourself."

Comee went into the front of the office, and there was Behr. He tumbled at once, and when he had a pause in his laughter he said: "Charlie, if you leave your 50 cents, I'll never tell of this, but if you take it away, I can't promise."

"Oh, confound it," said Behr, "you'll tell it anyway. Give me my 50 cents," and he got it.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 24, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the sixteenth Symphony concert last night was of well-varied nature and of a genial brightness, but the occasion was principally interesting in showing how rather ordinary numbers may be revivified by brilliancy of execution.

Handel's concerto grosso No. 6, in G minor, entirely for strings, was first heard and its breadth and seriousness, with the more vivacious fourth and fifth movements, were quietly heard, as if the audience was not yet in touch with the excellent accuracy of Conductor Paur's men.

Handel's symphony in B flat major was more closely followed and its occasional brusqueness and peculiar coloring, with its saucy finale, were brilliantly given.

The overture to "The Elopement From the Seraglio," in C major, by Mozart, has all the color and form of German romantic opera. It was the first of its kind in which Italian opera bouffe and the spoken dialogue of the German singspiel were united. Its chief merit is a little episodic passage, andante in C minor, in which the instrumentalization is very beautiful.

Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," op. 84, perhaps as well illustrated the methods of the composer as any work that could have been chosen, and if the statue of Beethoven, as it looked down upon his interpreters, could have spoken, it must have applauded the rendition.

The "Centennial March" of Wagner's, in G major, was the final number. It was composed for the Centennial exhibition in Philadelphia in 1876 and is based on the free development of two principal themes, one being subsidiary and having a constant repetition of the ascending triplet. Its gorgeous force and coloring were given with superb effect and the power and training of the orchestra were very well exhibited.

BOSTON HERALD

— THURSDAY.

FEBRUARY 21, 1895

[100]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 24.

The Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall, last night. The programme was:

Concerto, Grosso, No. 6.....Handel
Symphony, B flat, major.....Haydn
Overture, "Elopement from the Seraglio"..Mozart
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Centennial March.....Wagner

This is a good specimen of the kindergarten species of programme; at first glance it informs symphony concert patrons that they are to be instructed; and if they find pleasure it must be on their own account. It is a programme arranged according to chronology; and the earnest student is given the opportunity of tracing the development of music from the rude beginnings of a Handel to the massive profundities of a Wagner. A kindergarten programme, however, should be typical as well as chronological, typical of the composer and the era, and it should be also special. The average student, ignorant of the tricks of programme making, will find it difficult to detect the steps through which a concerto became a centennial march, or by what means evolution exalted a symphony into an overture. A chronological programme should keep to one species of art work; this not only allows the student to detect the advance or the degeneration of the art species in question, but it will add to that general dulness which seems to be the object of the majority of modern programmes.

Mr. Paur deserves credit for not attempting to over modernize that "dear old thief," Handel, though he would have been more than human if he had entirely resisted the desire. Handel is always modernized nowadays, whether in his songs, his oratorios, or his instrumental works. His simple dignity and majesty no longer appeal to us; the manna he offers us is without savor; for our modern palates have been stimulated by sulphuric acid and so he must be seasoned up to suit our taste.

The Symphony calls for no comment at this late date, but perhaps it may be pertinent to ask: Can we imagine "papa" Haydn leading his own work, with the perspiration of superfluous energy streaming down his face? Would he have asked for sombre energy when he could have obtained sweet grace, and would he have sought for thunder when the benign sunshine was streaming around him, and the midsummer breeze was dimpling the water? Was there a nervous restlessness in his vivacity, and did his fancy hurry him along headlong until he was out of breath?

It is somewhat puzzling to discover the theory by which the Wagner march was tagged on the end of the programme; it has no relation to what went before, and it is not a rare specimen of the composer's genius. It is interesting as showing what Wagner could do in an emergency, and it served its purpose. The official programme prints a criticism on this march, taken from the Atlantic Monthly for July, 1876. The critic says, "After playing over the march some half dozen times, we must candidly admit that we greatly enjoyed it. We find it neither monotonous nor dry, but full of fire, dignity and energy." Some half-dozen times? The critic has earned the right to praise.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," Foote; "An Island Fantasy," Paine; "Waldesruhe," Dvorak; Capriccio Klenzel; Symphony No. 2, Beethoven; Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, Liszt-Dopple. The soloist will be Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its sixth concert of the season at Union Hall, on Monday evening. The programme was:

Quartet D-minor (op-posth).....Schubert
Quintet (first time).....C. M. Loeffler
Septet.....Beethoven

Mr. Loeffler's quintet was the novelty of the evening, and while it puzzled many it delighted all. For Mr. Loeffler is always original; the path trodden hard and level by the feet of the old masters delights him not; he does not care to travel over it, even though immortal fame awaits him at the journey's end. He prefers to strike out a new path for himself, through jungles of wait-a-bit thorns, through hollows crowded with blackberry bushes, and up the aisles of slippery mountains. The slips, slides and bruises amount to nothing provided something in the way of novelty is to be reached. Unfortunately the enthusiastic who shall follow after Mr. Loeffler will be disappointed; from the hillock top of Mr. Loeffler's originality there will be seen no happy promised land, but a bewildering chaos lighted up by prismatic colors from an artificial sun.

Mr. Loeffler has a poetic imagination and rare ingenuity in discovering novel instrumental effects; but he has a horror of form and of rules generally. He is a worker in dainty mosaics, although he has nothing to tell; he uses the little fragments of glass for their color, and the finished work is color without form; beautiful in effect, charming in harmonies and in contrasts, but with a great deal that must be taken for granted. The most cheerful of composers is Mr. Leoffler; he has no theories, and he does not trouble his hearers with abstruse ideas. His violins, viola and 'cello play certain notes and indulge in certain combinations, but they are not working towards any definite end or travelling along any predetermined line; they mean everything or nothing, not from what is said or done, but according to the mood of the hearer. Did Mr. Loeffler intend anything in particular? Who can read into the mind of the cheerful composer who stands in the cool shadows of the trees, staring out at the sunlighted country beyond, while fitfully playing on his Pan's pipe! Is he thinking deeply, or whistling as he stands, for want of thought? Given a smear of paint and a Michel Angelo and the eye of the artist will divine glorious pictures in the accidental juxtaposition of colors, while the average man will see simply a smear of paint.

The cheerfully placid end of the century composer always receives more praise or dispraise than he deserves. To some he is the rarest of rare geniuses, to others he is a clever charlatan, whereas, in reality, he is simply the experimentalist whose ideal is novelty for its own sake, and who seeks for novelty through happy chance, and not through the imperious dictates of inspiration. Mr. Loeffler's quintette is charming; it is unlike everything but the other compositions of Mr. Loeffler; it shows the learned and clever musician who reaches simplicity through unwearied labor, who imitates sentiment so closely that it requires a comparison with the old composers to detect the difference. It is dainty, graceful, fresh music, of a particular kind, and if one is willing to accept the kind without criticism, then surely it is music which will have much to say in the future, though just now it is laboring to learn its own language, and to discover its own meaning and so simply expresses itself in a cheerful and most pleasant infant babble.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 24, 1895.

THE THOMSON MATINEE, THE SYMPHONY, THE KNEISEL, ETC.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartette series fell upon last Monday and was given in the usual place, Union Hall, before a very large and evidently much gratified audience. The programme was notable for interesting and uncommon character, although only one of the three numbers which composed it was a new one. It began with Schubert's pleasant posthumous quintette in D minor, all of which is agreeable enough to the ear, and makes a good preface to more serious music, but has of its own only one movement—the andante—which rises toward eminence and commands actual admiration. The end came with Beethoven's ever beautiful septette, in which Messrs. Pourtau, Litke and Hackebarth added the clarinet, bassoon and horn to the quartette of strings. Not quite all of the movements,—of which so many, and particularly the lightest ones, breathe the same pure, genial, transparent spirit which enlightened Mozart's music in its best and brightest moods,—were played, but all which were chosen were read with delightful tone and fine proportion, not even the full sonority of the horn overpowering its associates in its sallies. Much the same praise may be given to the rendering of the Schubert, although there the first violin was at times too much in evidence and the middle parts not quite obvious enough.

Between these numbers was placed a new quintette (with a third violin) in a single movement of about a dozen minutes in length, which was played from the manuscript of its author, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, whom the audience complimented heartily when it was ended, as the Quartette had previously complimented him by adopting it. Mr. Loeffler is one who cares more for music pure and simple than for reasoned harmonies and methodical constructions. Even when he has given a definite title to something and has therefore promised as it were to demonstrate a posed proposition, he lets his fancy wander and establishes his thesis rather by suggestion than by argument. So in this new work one is led on rather through the captivation of the ear than by the deduction of the brain. For in this new composition, the ingenious plan of scoring is so wide as to provide for a solo voice, a responsive or decorative second and three others for the harmonious accompaniment. By this method new devices and effects are attained and many unaccustomed pleasures are given. For the chief purpose of the quintette seems to give pleasure and to allure the hearer to follow along a wandering path which has no appointed goal in view, and indeed rather rounds about upon itself and presents at the completion of its course much the same outlook which was greeted when it began. The opening is almost in the arioso vein, soft, smooth, light-footed, and yet lingering; thence the movement goes on with steps that vary a little in speed and length and energy, while now one and now another of the five companions leads in the march or in the intercourse that enlivens it, each change seeming to come as of itself and with no forced connection from what has preceded. Occasionally all hurry along abreast or all exclaim together; but generally the temper is sweet and quiet, the thought serene, the progress equable and the geniality impartially attendant upon all. One listens as easily and happily as to a fairy tale, and one is glad to have heard a quarter of an hour of absolute music, written for the consolation of the nerves and not for the stimulation of the reason.

Mr. Paur evidently had a profitable second thought about his sixteenth Symphony programme, for he substituted a dramatic Beethoven overture for a rather academic one, making the sequence of his five numbers—all without soloists—to stand thus: The sixth Concerto Grosso (in G minor) of Handel; the symphony in B-flat major by Haydn; Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio" and Beethoven's "Eg[illegible]" overtures; Wagner's "Centennial" marc[illegible]

Just what M[illegible]r intends to elucidate or to effect by some o[illegible] combinations, one would like to know. Possibly this one may have been meant to illustrate the development of orchestral structure and scheme of color along certain lines. For one found this progression in it: The Handel concerto, depending solely upon the strings for its enunciation of thought, its emphasis, its contrasts and its retentive influence upon pleasurable attention; the symphony score, made more keen by the addition of the flutes and oboes, more imperative because of the trumpets, and more gravely sonorous by reason of the bassoons, horns and kettledrums; the Mozart overture expanding further with the clarinets, piccolo and various instruments of percussion; the Beethoven overture using virtually the same general disposition, but adding two more horns and massing at times all the more serious elements into mighty chords, out of which break beautiful and tender obbligati; the Wagner march, almost riotous in its recourse to nearly all possible instruments, and certainly including every family in its agglomeration of extra drums, trumpets, wooden wind, cymbals, gong, bass-tuba, etc., upon the fullest complement of the usual modern orchestra, so that one misses from it almost nothing but the glockenspiel, saxophone and harp.

There is too some broadening and deepening of spirit through the first four numbers. The Handel implies little more than the desire to give a facile pleasure; the Haydn appeals more sparklingly to quicker chords; the Mozart has its touches of romance and sentiment, while the Beethoven evokes the grander moods of passion, pathos, tragedy and imperiousness. As for the Wagner, in which musical noise reaches its acme, one hardly knows how to consider it, although it has now been played for almost twenty years. Even the editor of the programme-book can find nothing to replace his own somewhat vacillating opinion expressed long ago when the text of it was first published. One is sometimes inclined to wonder if it ought to be accepted seriously as a complimentary tribute to the genius of the United States, or whether it should be taken as a bold exposition of that notion which Europe is so apt to hold about the American people—that it is bombastic, vain-glorious, loud-mouthed, demonstrative, insistent, rampant and still partly savage in its ignorance of art and refinement and in its attachment to the pompous, exuberant and superficial. One who is so disposed can find all this suggested in the march, and can interpret its more subdued episodes as significant of the occasional silencing of those fabulous American proclivities by the serene and high-poised dignities of older and wiser nations. Be that as it may, the march is a striking—and pretty near stunning—exemplification of what Wagner could do in the way of pomp, grandiosity and a certain sort of stateliness, when he had only a few ideas and carte blanche as to instruments.

In performance the programme—which was unusually short—was better than its promise, being more entertaining in itself than might have been expected, and almost unexceptionally well directed and played throughout.

For the next concert this programme is announced: Arthur Foote's prologue to "Francesca da Rimini;" Professor Paine's "Island Fantasy;" violoncello solos from Dvorak and Kleugel, for Mr. Schroeder; Beethoven's second symphony; Doppler's orchestral arrangement of Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

A STRONG DOSE OF EDUCATIONAL MUSIC.

Conductor Paur's Commendable Reading of Hadyn—Beethoven's Egmont Overture Overshadows the Mozart Overture—Wagner's Curious Centennial March.

A programme beginning with Handel's Concerto Grosso, continuing with a Haydn symphony, Mozart's overture to "Die Entfuehrung," Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, and ending with Wagner's Centennial March, may be called ultra-educational, but thanks to a magnificent performance, it sounded much better than it reads, and it had the merit of being very short. Nevertheless too much of the educational upon a single programme is not to be commended; it would be wiser to sugar-coat the pill with a little of the modern school, for after all we are not to be blamed for being most in sympathy with our own generation.

The Concerto Grosso for string orchestra is not a work which can arouse enthusiasm at this end of the 19th century, although it is well-constructed in the contrapuntal school of its time. The fugue was given with much clearness and good balance, and the musette, although lacking the continuous drone-bass which is generally characteristic of this movement, was rustic and genial in flavor; altogether the work was a good example of the early style of writing. Mr. Paur is to be commended for his treatment of Haydn; he never makes that composer seem trivial or periwigged, but gives to his measures something of manly power and dignity that is not always present in the readings of other conductors. The symphony in B flat, No. 6 of Peters' edition, is one of the most attractive of Haydn's set written for the London orchestra. The development of the chief theme of the first movement is interesting and the coda is beautiful. In the Adagio our Homer nods a bit, and there is a good deal more of the suaviter in modo than the fortiter in re in the number. Yet one may doubt whether any of the modern composers who have decried the necessity of tune could write such straightforward melody if they tried never so hard. The Minuet was rather conventional in its chief part, but the trio was delightfully melodious and was played in a flawless manner. The whole tendency of this age is against repetition in music and therefore the Haydn Rondos with their half dozen reappearances of the chief theme become prolix to our ears (it is not too much to say that every style of Rondo is likely to be discarded by the composer of classical works of the future), but the graceful dallyings with the first figure in the coda were given with a daintiness that deserves all praise, it was an exhibition of caprice at just the right place and in just the right manner.

At the beginning of the Mozart overture there was a trifle of raggedness in the attack, but at the recapitulation of the themes after the development the same passages went much better. It was interesting to hear this old overture ("Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail") once again; and although it is not to be ranked with the "Magic Flute" overture, or with that to "Don Juan," it has yet many points which make it worthy of an occasional place on the repertoire.

Of course it faded greatly in the strong light of the "Egmont" overture which followed. Egmont was a subject which appealed powerfully to Beethoven's sympathies; a deep love of liberty was one of the chief characteristics of the great composer's nature, and this trait speaks forth in no uncertain tones in the Heroic Symphony, in the finale of the Ninth Symphony (where universal brotherhood is the theme) and in this Egmont overture. The use of the piccolo in the latter part of this overture stands as one of the most marked examples of the proper employment of the tone-color of this instrument. Generally used by composers in bacchanalian or in diabolic effects (for the piccolo may be spoken of as the imp of the orchestra) Beethoven here uses it to portray the uprising of the oppressed Dutch people, and its wild shrieks, combined with the fierce high tones of the violins, make a dramatic effect that is almost unique. It was pleasant to note that Mr. Paur did not repress the shrewd runs on this instrument which do so much towards making the final cadences triumphant. The piccolo was excellently played, as also were the violins in those trying positions which Beethoven introduced for the first time into orchestral work. Before this overture it was held to be as much as an orchestral violinist could do to go up to three-lined A (the A an octave above that on the first added line above the staff in G clef notation) but here, for the first time, they are sent up to the C above this A (four-lined C) and give a most warlike effect thereby. Modern composers now go to this height very freely, but in Beethoven's day it was held to be almost "impossible." The kettle-drum was played a trifle too forcibly at the close, but this was a failing that leaned to Virtue's side.

The concert ended with Wagner's Centennial March. It is possible that Americans may feel some interest in a march which was written about them by one of the great masters of musical art, but it must be borne in mind that Wagner did not write this march from especial interest in our achievement of independence, but from a very decided affection for $5000, which sum was the prime incentive in the matter. When he wrote it he did not know one of our national melodies, and he seems not to have taken the trouble to learn any of them even with the $5000 dangling before them. He chooses for his theme of inspiration, not Washington, not Lincoln, but the pretty American girls that he had seen (this by his own confession) and the gentler passages of the march represent these. As a consequence the $5000 march has about the same success that a "$10,000 prize beauty" has at a circus: there is an interest of curiosity, but precious little of art. The bombastic passages are furiously grandiloquent; our heroes, we are glad to think, never strutted about like that. The only way in which one can fit the march to American circumstances is to suppose that Wagner had become prophetic and pictured the America of the present moment; in such a case the work at once becomes easy to explain; the recurring triplet figure is the "senator-motif" and its endless repetition pictures a currency debate in the upper house of our beloved congress; this figure naturally goes on almost forever; the massive theme which immediately follows the "Senator-motif" is the "Sugar-Trust-motif" and is closely combined with the former with, naturally, a great deal of brass; the furious explosions which follow suggest labor troubles, panic, and a general upset, but through it all the triplet-figure, representative of the debating senators, babbles on and on until the auditor becomes aweary of it, thus producing a most realistic and historically accurate picture. When one remembers what Dvorak has done for American music, and compares this work with the American Symphony ("From the New World") one feels that the weaker side of a great genius ought to be forgotten as speedily as possible. With the exception of one slight slip, the brasses played their important work magnificently, and the performance was altogether the best that the present writer has yet heard of this inflated work.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[101]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 24.

The Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall, last night. The programme was:

Concerto, Grosso, No. 6.....Handel
Symphony, B flat, major.....Haydn
Overture, "Elopement from the Seragho"..Mozart
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Centennial March.....Wagner

This is a good specimen of the kindergarten species of programme; at first glance it informs symphony concert patrons that they are to be instructed; and if they find pleasure it must be on their own account. It is a programme arranged according to chronology; and the earnest student is given the opportunity of tracing the development of music from the rude beginnings of a Handel to the massive profundities of a Wagner. A kindergarten programme, however, should be typical as well as chronological, typical of the composer and the era, and it should be also special. The average student, ignorant of the tricks of programme making, will find it difficult to detect the steps through which a concerto became a centennial march, or by what means evolution exalted a symphony into an overture. A chronological programme should keep to one species of art work; this not only allows the student to detect the advance or the degeneration of the art species in question, but it will add to that general dulness which seems to be the object of the majority of modern programmes.

Mr. Paur deserves credit for not attempting to over modernize that "dear old thief," Handel, though he would have been more than human if he had entirely resisted the desire. Handel is always modernized nowadays, whether in his songs, his oratorios, or his instrumental works. His simple dignity and majesty no longer appeal to us; the manna he offers us is without savor; for our modern palates have been stimulated by sulphuric acid and so he must be seasoned up to suit our taste.

The Symphony calls for no comment at this late date, but perhaps it may be pertinent to ask: Can we imagine "papa" Haydn leading his own work, with the perspiration of superfluous energy streaming down his face? Would he have asked for sombre energy when he could have obtained sweet grace, and would he have sought for thunder when the benign sunshine was streaming around him, and the midsummer breeze was dimpling the water? Was there a nervous restlessness in his vivacity, and did his fancy hurry him along headlong until he was out of breath?

It is somewhat puzzling to discover the theory by which the Wagner march was tagged on the end of the programme; it has no relation to what went before, and it is not a rare specimen of the composer's genius. It is interesting as showing what Wagner could do in an emergency, and it served its purpose. The official programme prints a criticism on this march, taken from the Atlantic Monthly for July, 1876. The critic says, "After playing over the march some half dozen times, we must candidly admit that we greatly enjoyed it. We find it neither monotonous nor dry, but full of fire, dignity and energy." Some half-dozen times? The critic has earned the right to praise.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," Foote; "An Island Fantasy," Paine; "Waldesruhe," Dvorak; Capriccio, Klenzel; Symphony No. 2, Beethoven; Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, Liszt-Dopple. The soloist will be Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its sixth concert of the season at Union Hall, on Monday evening. The programme was:

Quartet D-minor (op-posth).....Schubert
Quintet (first time).....C. M. Loeffler
Septet.....Beethoven

Mr. Loeffler's quintet was the novelty of the evening, and while it puzzled many it delighted all. For Mr. Loeffler is always original; the path trodden hard and level by the feet of the old masters delights him not; he does not care to travel over it, even though immortal fame awaits him at the journey's end. He prefers to strike out a new path for himself, through jungles of wait-a-bit thorns, through hollows crowded with blackberry bushes, and up the aisles of slippery mountains. The slips, slides and bruises amount to nothing provided something in the way of novelty is to be reached. Unfortunately the enthusiastic who shall follow after Mr. Loeffler will be disappointed; from the hillock top of Mr. Loeffler's originality there will be seen no happy promised land, but a bewildering chaos lighted up by prismatic colors from an artificial sun.

Mr. Loeffler has a poetic imagination and rare ingenuity in discovering novel instrumental effects; but he has a horror of form and of rules generally. He is a worker in dainty mosaics, although he has nothing to tell; he uses the little fragments of glass for their color, and the finished work is color without form; beautiful in effect, charming in harmonics and in contrasts, but with a great deal that must be taken for granted. The most cheerful of composers is Mr. Loeffler; he has no theories, and he does not trouble his hearers with abstruse ideas. His violins, viola and 'cello play certain notes and indulge in certain combinations, but they are not working towards any definite end or travelling along any predetermined line; they mean everything or nothing, not from what is said or done, but according to the mood of the hearer. Did Mr. Loeffler intend anything in particular? Who can read into the mind of the cheerful composer who stands in the cool shadows of the trees, staring out at the sunlighted country beyond, while fitfully playing on his Pan's pipe! Is he thinking deeply, or whistling as he stands, for want of thought? Given a smear of paint and a Michel Angelo and the eye of the artist will divine glorious pictures in the accidental juxtaposition of colors, while the average man will see simply a smear of paint.

The cheerfully placid end of the century composer always receives more praise or dispraise than he deserves. To some he is the rarest of rare geniuses, to others he is a clever charlatan, whereas, in reality, he is simply the experimentalist whose ideal is novelty for its own sake, and who seeks for novelty through happy chance, and not through the imperious dictates of inspiration. Mr. Loeffler's quintette is charming; it is unlike everything but the other compositions of Mr. Loeffler; it shows the learned and clever musician who reaches simplicity through unwearied labor, who imitates sentiment so closely that it requires a comparison with the old composers to detect the difference. It is dainty, graceful, fresh music, of a particular kind, and if one is willing to accept the kind without criticism, then surely it is music which will have much to say in the future, though just now it is laboring to learn its own language, and to discover its own meaning and so simply expresses itself in a cheerful and most pleasant infant babble.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 24, 1895.

THE THOMSON MATINEE, THE SYMPHONY, THE KNEISEL, ETC.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartette series fell upon last Monday and was given in the usual place, Union Hall, before a very large and evidently much gratified audience. The programme was notable for interesting and uncommon character, although only one of the three numbers which composed it was a new one. It began with Schubert's pleasant posthumous quintette in D minor, all of which is agreeable enough to the ear, and makes a good preface to more serious music, but has of its own only one movement—the andante—which rises toward eminence and commands actual admiration. The end came with Beethoven's ever beautiful septette, in which Messrs. Pourtau, Litke and Hackebarth added the clarinet, bassoon and horn to the quartette of strings. Not quite all of the movements,—of which so many, and particularly the lightest ones, breathe the same pure, genial, transparent spirit which enlightened Mozart's music in its best and brightest moods,—were played, but all which were chosen were read with delightful tone and fine proportion, not even the full sonority of the horn overpowering its associates in its sallies. Much the same praise may be given to the rendering of the Schubert, although there the first violin was at times too much in evidence and the middle parts not quite obvious enough.

Between these numbers was placed a new quintette (with a third violin) in a single movement of about a dozen minutes in length, which was played from the manuscript of its author, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, whom the audience complimented heartily when it was ended, as the Quartette had previously complimented him by adopting it. Mr. Loeffler is one who cares more for music pure and simple than for reasoned harmonies and methodical constructions. Even when he has given a definite title to something and has therefore promised as it were to demonstrate a posed proposition, he lets his fancy wander and establishes his thesis rather by suggestion than by argument. So in this new work one is led on rather through the captivation of the ear than by the deduction of the brain. For in this new composition, the ingenious plan of scoring is so wide as to provide for a solo voice, a responsive or decorative second and three others for the harmonious accompaniment. By this method new devices and effects are attained and many unaccustomed pleasures are given. For the chief purpose of the quintette seems to give pleasure and to allure the hearer to follow along a wandering path which has no appointed goal in view, and indeed rather rounds about upon itself and presents at the completion of its course much the same outlook which was greeted when it began. The opening is almost in the arioso vein, soft, smooth, light-footed, and yet lingering; thence the movement goes on with steps that vary a little in speed and length and energy, while now one and now another of the five companions leads in the march or in the intercourse that enlivens it, each change seeming to come as of itself and with no forced connection from what has preceded. Occasionally all hurry along abreast or all exclaim together; but generally the temper is sweet and quiet, the thought serene, the progress equable and the geniality impartially attendant upon all. One listens as easily and happily as to a fairy tale, and one is glad to have heard a quarter of an hour of absolute music, written for the consolation of the nerves and not for the stimulation of the reason.

Mr. Paur evidently had a profitable second thought about his sixteenth Symphony programme, for he substituted a dramatic Beethoven overture for a rather academic one, making the sequence of his five numbers all without soloists—to stand thus: The sixth Concerto Grosso (in G minor) of Handel; the symphony in B-flat major by Haydn; Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio" and Beethoven's "Eg[illegible]" overtures; Wagner's "Centennial" marc[illegible]

Just what M[illegible]r intends to elucidate or to effect by some o[illegible] combinations, one would like to know. Possibly this one may have been meant to illustrate the development of orchestral structure and scheme of color along certain lines. For one found this progression in it: The Handel concerto, depending solely upon the strings for its enunciation of thought, its emphasis, its contrasts and its retentive influence upon pleasurable attention; the symphony score, made more keen by the addition of the flutes and oboes, more imperative because of the trumpets, and more gravely sonorous by reason of the bassoons, horns and kettledrums; the Mozart overture expanding further with the clarinets, piccolo and various instruments of percussion; the Beethoven overture using virtually the same general disposition, but adding two more horns and massing at times all the more serious elements into mighty chords, out of which break beautiful and tender obbligati; the Wagner march, almost riotous in its recourse to nearly all possible instruments, and certainly including every family in its agglomeration of extra drums, trumpets, wooden wind, cymbals, gong, bass-tuba, etc., upon the fullest complement of the usual modern orchestra, so that one misses from it almost nothing but the glockenspiel, saxophone and harp.

There is too some broadening and deepening of spirit through the first four numbers. The Handel implies little more than the desire to give a facile pleasure; the Haydn appeals more sparklingly to quicker chords; the Mozart has its touches of romance and sentiment, while the Beethoven evokes the grander moods of passion, pathos, tragedy and imperiousness. As for the Wagner, in which musical noise reaches its acme, one hardly knows how to consider it, although it has now been played for almost twenty years. Even the editor of the programme-book can find nothing to replace his own somewhat vacillating opinion expressed long ago when the text of it was first published. One is sometimes inclined to wonder if it ought to be accepted seriously as a complimentary tribute to the genius of the United States, or whether it should be taken as a bold exposition of that notion which Europe is so apt to hold about the American people — that it is bombastic, vain-glorious, loud-mouthed, demonstrative, insistent, rampant and still partly savage in its ignorance of art and refinement and in its attachment to the pompous, exuberant and superficial. One who is so disposed can find all this suggested in the march, and can interpret its more subdued episodes as significant of the occasional silencing of those fabulous American proclivities by the serene and high-poised dignities of older and wiser nations. Be that as it may, the march is a striking—and pretty near stunning—exemplification of what Wagner could do in the way of pomp, grandiosity and a certain sort of stateliness, when he had only a few ideas and carte blanche as to instruments.

In performance the programme—which was unusually short—was better than its promise, being more entertaining in itself than might have been expected, and almost unexceptionally well directed and played throughout.

For the next concert this programme is announced: Arthur Foote's prologue to "Francesca da Rimini;" Professor Paine's "Island Fantasy;" violoncello solos from Dvorak and Klengel, for Mr. Schroeder; Beethoven's second symphony; Doppler's orchestral arrangement of Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

A STRONG DOSE OF EDUCATIONAL MUSIC.

Conductor Paur's Commendable Reading of Hadyn—Beethoven's Egmont Overture Overshadows the Mozart Overture—Wagner's Curious Centennial March.

A programme beginning with Handel's Concerto Grosso, continuing with a Haydn symphony, Mozart's overture to "Die Entfuehrung," Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, and ending with Wagner's Centennial March, may be called ultra-educational, but thanks to a magnificent performance, it sounded much better than it reads, and it had the merit of being very short. Nevertheless too much of the educational upon a single programme is not to be commended: it would be wiser to sugar-coat the pill with a little of the modern school, for after all we are not to be blamed for being most in sympathy with our own generation.

The Concerto Grosso for string orchestra is not a work which can arouse enthusiasm at this end of the 19th century, although it is well-constructed in the contrapuntal school of its time. The fugue was given with much clearness and good balance, and the musette, although lacking the continuous drone-bass which is generally characteristic of this movement, was rustic and genial in flavor; altogether the work was a good example of the early style of writing. Mr. Paur is to be commended for his treatment of Haydn; he never makes that composer seem trivial or periwigged, but gives to his measures something of manly power and dignity that is not always present in the readings of other conductors. The symphony in B flat, No. 6 of Peters' edition, is one of the most attractive of Haydn's set written for the London orchestra. The development of the chief theme of the first movement is interesting and the coda is beautiful. In the Adagio our Homer nods a bit, and there is a good deal more of the suaviter in modo than the fortiter in re in the number. Yet one may doubt whether any of the modern composers who have decried the necessity of tune could write such straightforward melody if they tried never so hard. The Minuet was rather conventional in its chief part, but the trio was delightfully melodious and was played in a flawless manner. The whole tendency of this age is against repetition in music and therefore the Haydn Rondos with their half dozen reappearances of the chief theme become prolix to our ears (it is not too much to say that every style of Rondo is likely to be discarded by the composer of classical works of the future), but the graceful dallyings with the first figure in the coda were given with a daintiness that deserves all praise, it was an exhibition of caprice at just the right place and in just the right manner.

At the beginning of the Mozart overture there was a trifle of raggedness in the attack, but at the recapitulation of the themes after the development the same passages went much better. It was interesting to hear this old overture ("Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail") once again; and although it is not to be ranked with the "Magic Flute" overture, or with that to "Don Juan," it has yet many points which make it worthy of an occasional place on the repertoire.

Of course it faded greatly in the strong light of the "Egmont" overture which followed. Egmont was a subject which appealed powerfully to Beethoven's sympathies; a deep love of liberty was one of the chief characteristics of the great composer's nature, and this trait speaks forth in no uncertain tones in the Heroic Symphony, in the finale of the Ninth Symphony (where universal brotherhood is the theme) and in this Egmont overture. The use of the piccolo in the latter part of this overture stands as one of the most marked examples of the proper employment of the tone-color of this instrument. Generally used by composers in bacchanalian or in diabolic effects (for the piccolo may be spoken of as the imp of the orchestra) Beethoven here uses it to portray the uprising of the oppressed Dutch people, and its wild shrieks, combined with the fierce high tones of the violins, make a dramatic effect that is almost unique. It was pleasant to note that Mr. Paur did not repress the shawm[illegible] runs on this instrument which do so much towards making the final cadences triumphant. The piccolo was excellently played, as also were the violins in those trying positions which Beethoven introduced for the first time into orchestral work. Before this overture it was held to be as much as an orchestral violinist could do to go up to three-lined A (the A an octave above that on the first added line above the staff in G clef notation) but here, for the first time, they are sent up to the C above this A (four-lined C) and give a most warlike effect thereby. Modern composers now go to this height very freely, but in Beethoven's day it was held to be almost "impossible." The kettle-drum was played a trifle too forcibly at the close, but this was a failing that leaned to Virtue's side.

The concert ended with Wagner's Centennial March. It is possible that Americans may feel some interest in a march which was written about them by one of the great masters of musical art, but it must be borne in mind that Wagner did not write this march from especial interest in our achievement of independence, but from a very decided affection for $5000, which sum was the prime incentive in the matter. When he wrote it he did not know one of our national melodies, and he seems not to have taken the trouble to learn any of them even with the $5000 dangling before them. He choose for his theme of inspiration, not Washington, not Lincoln, but the pretty American girls that he had seen (this by his own confession) and the gentler passages of the march represent these. As a consequence the $5000 march has about the same success that a "$10,000 prize beauty" has at a circus: there is an interest of curiosity, but precious little of art. The bombastic passages are furiously grandiloquent; our heroes, we are glad to think, never strutted about like that. The only way in which one can fit the march to American circumstances is to suppose that Wagner had become prophetic and pictured the America of the present moment; in such a case the work at once becomes easy to explain; the recurring triplet figure is the "senator-motif" and its endless repetition pictures a currency debate in the upper house of our beloved congress; this figure naturally goes on almost forever; the massive theme which immediately follows the "Senator-motif" is the "Sugar-Trust-motif" and is closely combined with the former with, naturally, a great deal of brass; the furious explosions which follow suggest labor troubles, panic, and a general upset, but through it all the triplet-figure, representative of the debating senators, babbles on and on until the auditor becomes aweary of it, thus producing a most realistic and historically accurate picture. When one remembers what Dvorak has done for American music, and compares this work with the American Symphony ("From the New World") one feels that the weaker side of a great genius ought to be forgotten as speedily as possible. With the exception of one slight slip, the brasses played their important work magnificently, and the performance was altogether the best that the present writer has yet heard of this inflated work.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[101]

...Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sixteenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Handel: Concerto Grosso No. 6, in G minor.
Haydn: Symphony in B-flat major (B. & H., No. 12; Peters, No. 6).
Mozart: Overture to "Die Entführung aus dem Serail."
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont," opus 84.
Wagner: Centennial March in G major.

The concerto grosso is decidedly the most effective orchestral work by Handel we have yet heard at a concert; far more so than the one in D minor which was played last year. One reason for this is undoubtedly that the present one, in G minor, is much more fully written out than the other; that is, that, although Handel evidently counted on a harpsichord or organ accompaniment here, as in his other concertos, the string parts are so written as to fill out the harmony more constantly than in the other, and the lack of an "accompaniment" is far less seriously felt. Only semi-occasionally—in the last allegro, for instance—do ungrateful bare places meet the ear. The whole work is in Handel's best vein; it was a happy inspiration of his, too, and somewhat in advance of his day, to break the monotony of key which is nowadays one of the most serious drawbacks to our enjoyment of a whole concerto, suite, or partita by an old master, by putting the middle movement (Musette: Larghetto) in E-flat major. The whole concerto was admirably played, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, and Mr. Schroeder leaving nothing to be desired in the concertino, and the ripieni parts being played at once with accuracy, vigor, delicacy, and perfection of ensemble. Only, we have our serious doubts as to Mr. Paur's tempo in the first movement; it seemed to us that he went more by tradition and the look of the notes than by Handel's marking and the intrinsic character of the music. The movement is marked Larghetto e affettuoso; no doubt the signification of Italian terms had not become so fixed in Handel's day as it has since, and Handel's Larghetto is not necessarily our modern Larghetto—did not Bach, for instance, mark his now familiar soprano air "Mein gläubiges Herze" with a Presto?—still it seems evident enough that, when he took the trouble to mark this movement in triple alla breve (3-2) time Larghetto e affettuoso, he must have meant to indicate something less slow than the ordinary Largo or Grave which would inevitably have been taken by conductors, had there been no tempo-marking at all. Mr. Paur took the movement uncompromisingly Grave, at the slowest tempo imaginable; it gave it enormous stateliness and impressiveness, but, to our thinking, not its right character. It sounded too merely conventional and routine-flavored.

Haydn's B-flat symphony is one of his most modern-sounding works, one in which premonitions of Beethoven are most frequent and striking. The more than ordinarily full scoring, replete with ingenious and novel effects, the harmony, the character of the working-out, even the themes themselves, have at times a modern flavor not to be mistaken. The work was excellently well played, with all due brilliancy and vivacity, and with careful attention to effects of light and shade; perhaps now and then one might feel a certain lack of perfect finish. But the symphony made a superb effect, the orchestration, for one thing, sounding doubly brilliant and full of color after the more sober chiaroscuro of the Handel concerto.

Mozart's overture to the "Entführung" is seldom heard at concerts; it would repay more frequent giving, for it is bright as a new dollar. Here we have the light, airy, vivacious Mozart in a very fascinating mood; the work has little depth, and stands a goodish way behind the "Figaro" overture; but it is so nimble, sprightly, and charming, it has so much color and zest, with its "Janitscharenmusik" and piccolo-flute, that it is infinitely delightful; one seems to hear the light-hearted Pedrillo chattering all through it! And what a beautiful episode that is of the C minor version of Belmonte's air! with its sweet wood-wind tones. We wonder who wrote the concert coda; in the opera, the overture ends with one foot in the air, on the dominant, and is enchained with the first stage number. Perhaps Mozart did it himself, or it may have been arranged from some ensemble-piece in the opera itself? At all events, it is the best concert coda to an old overture we have yet heard, even better than Wagner's to Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide." The overture was capitally played.

Beethoven's great "Egmont" overture is one of the master's works that have most fallen a prey to "interpreters." One almost wishes that Wagner had never had the (after all, reasonable) idea to insist upon the cognateness of the second theme with the stately sarabande motive of the introduction; conductors, ever since the publication of "Ueber das Dirigiren," seem bent upon stuffing this idea down your throat. Mr. Paur insists upon it less obtrusively than some of his confrères of the craft; you do not quite feel like calling out, "Yes, I know that already!" every time the figure comes in; but it seems to us, on the other hand, that he paves the way for making this thematic allusion unmistakable by taking the whole movement too slow. These modern "Brahms" Allegros in Beethoven sometimes make one almost regret the "ring-master's whip" of the old "Zopf" conductors; to be sure, one does not wish to hear a Beethoven Allegro absolutely run a steeple-chase, but it must have some go to it and not drag sentimentally. We missed also the bite of that Meyerbeerish rhythm in the basses (against the counter-rhythm in the violins) in the second part of the first theme. But, with these exceptions, the overture was grandly played, the coda being given with especial vim and brilliancy.

So far the programme had ample reason of being: it had led us from Handel, through Haydn and Mozart, to Beethoven; each one of the four selections from these masters was admirable of its kind and sharply characteristic; we doubt even whether anyone in the audience felt the "monotony" of hearing two overtures in succession. And now the crown of this classical edifice was to be Wagner's Centennial March—of all things in the world! The Centennial March! the "Grosser Festmarsch zur Eröffnung der hundertjährigen Gedenkfeier der Unabhängigkeits-Erklärung der vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika"—let us not begrudge the work a single syllable of its title, for it needs them all! We doubt if the country ever gets back the money it spent on this extraordinary (or say, extra-ordinary), composition. What could Wagner have been thinking of? It sounds as if he had been trying—and who shall say, without success, of a sort?—to set the spread-eagle and all past and gone Fourth-of-July orations to music. Really the Wagnerians in the country ought to start a subscription to give this remarkable work decent burial; for the glimpses of the moon are already tired of it. Nor was the work bettered in the playing; it was played as coarsely as might be, and only served to show that, if the Music Hall is to fall, it will not be as Jericho fell: it has stood the test, and is trumpet and trombone-proof!

The next programme is: Foote, symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 24: Paine, "An Island Fantasy;" Dvorák, "Waldesruhe," for 'cello; Klengel, capriccio for 'cello; Beethoven, symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 36; Liszt-Doppler, Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, in D minor. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the 'cellist.

Daily Evening News.

FALL RIVER, Mass.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 26.

THE SYMPHONY.

The annual symphony concert, at the Academy, last night, was, without doubt, the most generally pleasing concert ever given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That is equal to saying that it was the best high class concert ever given here. It was what was promised, a grand concert. It pleased the comparatively few expert critics because of the rendering of very difficult music in a manner as nearly perfect in execution and expression as possible. It pleased the crowd that loves music, but makes no pretence of much or any technical knowledge of the art because the selections were all very attractive to the ear from a musical standpoint.

There was a large enough audience to make the concert a paying attraction, but the management was disappointed. After the big houses that turned out for last year's concert and for the concert two years ago and the enthusiasm at last year's concert something like a crowded house from orchestra to gallery was expected. That the audience was not so large as that of last year was unquestionably due to the many outside attractions in the immediate past and the immediate future. People are tired out, or expect to be, and many of the regular symphony patrons did not attend. The concert by Sousa's band was one of the attractions that cut into the Symphony. A fine band concert is more generally popular than a full symphony concert, for the former is more easily understood and appreciated.

The idea of program for last evening that was quite widely circulated was that it was to be heavy. Such an idea would naturally not add to the drawing powers of the concert, and its effect acted with other causes in preventing the crowding of the house. The program was only heavy in that the selections played are very difficult of execution. The impression of the music itself was anything but heavy. The most imposing selection, the symphony, was a continuous run of dance strains that tempted the feet to follow, but left them far behind.

The most important personages in the concert barely succeeded in arriving on time. When Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, walked out to the front calm and smiling, to be warmly greeted by the audience, no one suspected that he had arrived here only a few minutes before 8 o'clock and driven at a run to the Academy. The orchestra came down early on a special train. Mr. Paur came down on the steamboat train, which was delayed nearly an hour by a derailed car. Mrs. Wyman, the soloist, came all the way from Columbus, O., for the concert, and came from Boston on the same train with the conductor. Had that derailed car kept the train back another hour, there would have been a large audience gathered here at loss for amusement.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra was never heard to better advantage than it was last night. Seventy-two of the 85 musicians who make up the orchestra when it is at home came down; a large number to play outside of one of the big cities. There were seven or eight new musicians and most of the others have been with the orchestra a number of seasons. The swing and time were perfect, every instrument in the 72 responding to the conductor's baton as though connected with it. Mr. Paur apparently has this orchestra as perfectly in his control as any of his predecessors had it. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, the soloist, was pleasantly remembered here for her beautiful voice and the very high state of cultivation that she has reached with it. She is among the best natural, and best trained, contraltos ever heard here. She came with the Symphony for the concert three years ago, and the audience last night was very glad to greet her again. In spite of her fatiguing journey she was at her best in her first song. She makes a fine stage appearance that predisposes an audience in her favor before she begins to sing. The full, rich notes came without an apparent extra effort, yet they reached every part of the hall with all their strength. She was called out three times after her first song, but would not repeat. The only criticism that can be made is that she did not sing in English. She is an American, and she certainly can afford to add to the favor in which some of the many fine songs in her own language are held.

The opening number was Symphony No. 7, in a major opus 92, by Ludwig Van Beethoven. The symphony was given in its full four movements. The truth of the announcement in the description accompanying the program that in all the four movements dance rhythms prevail was clearly apparent. It was such music as might well be supposed to accompany the tripping of fairies in those dances in the moonlight which mortals are not allowed to see. It was not the dance music of the ball room, and even the very graceful fancy dances often seen on the stage would hardly fit the rhythms.

Mrs. Wyman first sang the aria from Gounod's "Sappho." It was a splendid piece of work, and the applause that continued until she had come forward to bow three times was very genuine.

The overture to "The Sold Bride" by Bedrich Smetana was a favorite. In playing it the orchestra had a fine opportunity to display its perfect drill and timing. The playing of the violins was very rapid, and it seemed hardly possible that the frequent sharp, quick interruptions from first one set of instruments and then another could be made without a jar. It was a wonderful exhibition of skilful playing, while at the same time there was something very attractive in the wild music.

The next number was another long one. It was George Bizet's Orchestral Suite No. 1, "L'Arlesienne." In it there are four movements. First one set of instruments and then another takes up the theme and carries it on. The first movement is a march. The second is in minuet form, and through it runs a very perceptible suggestion of bagpipes. The third movement was entirely for strings without the double basses. The last movement was stirring and rather animated and gave a brilliant ending to a number which, though long, had not been at all tiresome, for its variety prevented that.

Mrs. Wyman sang, "Chi vuol comprar la bella Calandrina," by Iomelli. It is a bright and pretty song, but it was not well selected to exhibit the singer's ability, and while it pleased the audience, the applause was not nearly so loud and hearty as that following her first song.

The concert was brought to a close with the overture to "Carlo Broschi," by Daniel-Francois-Esprit Auber. The selection was lighter than those which had preceded it, and relieved any strained sensation that may have resulted from a close following of the more impressive music. It was played as perfectly as the others, and made a fit ending to the splendid concert.

THE DAILY GLOBE

THE FALL RIVER DAILY

FEBRUARY 26, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Delightful Treat for Lovers of Fine Music in the Academy Last Night.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave another of its grand concerts in the Academy of Music last night. As on all similar occasions for 10 years at least, the audience was made up of the city's influential and wealthy people, they being in close communion with themselves in the orchestra chairs, and the meek and lowly and expert musicians being heeded together in the galleries.

For the first time since its initial performance here, the magnificent orchestra rendered what may be properly termed popular classical music. For the most part it was music written by the great masters of an inspiring art.

It was music that electrified the Parisian masses when it was played for the first time in the authors' lives. Beethoven music is always moving and educational, whether written in symphonic form or vulgarized to meet the tastes of a waltz-loving musee public.

When rendered by an orchestra, superb in its make up, and inimitable in the accuracy and gracefulness of its movements, nothing that a musical mind can wish, is lacking.

The power and majesty of the orchestra, as a whole, the exquisite harmony of the first and second violins, the violas and the 'cellos, the purity and sweetness of tone from the flutes and clarionets, seemed never more entrancing and charming to the average Fall River ear than they did last night.

The opening number was Beethoven's seventh symphony. The music throughout was light and catchy, verging at times on dance music of the first order. It w the first time a Fall River audience was treated to a symphony complete, and there is no room to doubt the enjoyment it afforded. The consciousness of t presence of a theme that required lit effort to follow it and the wonderf clearness with which it was amplified t bassos, oboes and the first violins, serve to win and hold the popular love from the first measures to the abrupt ending of the last.

Emil Paur, the new conductor, is a barometer of the music his great orchestra holds in store. A glance at him at any time is accompanied by a feeling or a warning that something more exquisite or more thrilling is about to happen. He enters body and soul into the spirit of the author's music as he understands it and the great skill of the musicians is drawn toward him only to be reflected in divine tones from the best instruments the country affords.

Mrs. Julie L. Wyman was the soloist of the evening. In general, her success was not as pronounced as it was when she appeared here four years ago, and the critical ears distinguished a greater volume of tone but a lack of the sweetness in the voice that then charmed the audience. Her first selection was an aria from Sappho. It was rendered to be sure with all the grace and beauty of a trained operatic singer and was accompanied by music such as it is given to few only to sing with. It pleased the audience very much, however, and Mrs. Wyman bowed her thanks to three rounds of applause.

Her second selection was not as well received. The orchestral number that provoked the most applause was an overture to "The Sold Bride." There were many strong chords in it, and it was lively enough in all its stages to suit the popular ear.

In general it may be said the concert was more successful in so far as pleasing the popular ear goes than any attempted here by the orchestra before, and it was supremely successful in that it brought more closely to the average mind the skill, the strength and the magnificent powers of what has frequently been termed the world's greatest musical organization.

THE DAILY HERALD

ISSUED BY—

THE HERALD PUBLISHING CO.

FEBRUARY 26, 1895

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large Audience Listens to this Wonderful Musicial Organization.

The concert by the great Boston symphony orchestra in the academy of music last night attracted a large audience of music lovers, who were treated to a program of harmony previously familiar only to students of high class music. There was not what might be called a popular bit in the entire program. The music, however, was of the lighter sort, calculated to please, and it did so to an unusual degree. The program was as follows:

Symphony, No. 7, in A major..Beethoven
Aria from "Sappho".....Gormod
Mrs. Julie L. Wyman.
Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut".Smetana
"L'Arlesienne," orchestral suite,
No. 1.....Bizet
Song, "Chi vuol comprar la bella Calandrina".....Iomelli
Mrs. Wyman.
Overture to "Carlo Broschi" Auber

Of the performance of the orchestra there can be nothing but words of praise. It is a marvellous organization, and Fall River is specially favored in being afforded an opportunity to hear it. Emil Paur, the popular leader, was welcomed with a popular round of applau-e when he appeared, and good nature beamed from every lineament of his face. There can be no doubt he has inspired his men with much of his own enthusiasm. Their playing was characterized to an unusual degree with the personal element of the leader, whom it was evident they were closely following.

The soloist, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, has a rarely beautiful contralto voice. The tones are full and true, and her singing was greatly enjoyed. The aria pleased the audience so much that they recalled the singer three time-. Mrs. Wyman came forward to bow her thanks, but she did not respond to the encore with a song. Her second selection was likewise pleasing, but not so pretentious as the first.

A word of praise should be added about the programs distributed to patrons. They were in book form and contained a synopsis of the music, together with a historical sketch of the composers, making a considerable adjunct to the enjoyment of the concert.

[102]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1895.

The program of the sixteenth Symphony Concert, given last night, included Händel's Concerto Grosso No. 6, G minor; Haydn's Symphony No. 12, B flat major; Mozart's overture, Entführung aus dem Serail; Beethoven's Egmont overture and Wagner's Centennial March. What do you think of this for a program? As Thackeray said of Tupper, "We don't think of Mr. Tupper in England." Lord! what a program! Do you wish a learned discourse on Händel's concertos, with quotations from the ancients? Or a disquisition on the meaning of the themes in the Egmont overture? Or an essay on the inherent pessimism of Haydn? Or a rhapsody on the popular nature of Wagner's march? I should like to hear Mrs. Shaw whistle the tune, or hear it played by two flutes and a bimbonifono. Or an inquiry into the use of the seraglio in music? There is nothing else to write about. Mr. Paur is of late a liberal contributor to the volume entitled "How Not to Make Programs."

* * *

BOSTON, Mass., February 24, 1895.

THE sixth Kneisel Quartet concert was given the 18th in Union Hall. The program included Schubert's D minor quartet (op. posth.); C. M. Loeffler's quintet in one movement for three violins, viola and 'cello (MS., first time) and Beethoven's septet. The club was assisted in the quintet by Mr. Krafft; in the septet by Messrs. Pourtau (clarinet), Hackebarth (horn), Litke (bassoon) and Golde (double bass).

The performance of the septet was admirable, and it caused one to forget the purely academic nature of much of the work. String and wind instruments were in friendly rivalry, and the result was the perfection of ensemble. So, too, the performance of the quartet was excellent, but may the day soon come when only the second movement is heard in chamber concerts!

Mr. Loeffler's quintet is distinguished first of all for its extraordinary beauty of tonal color. As in his fantastic violin composition played here recently by himself and the Symphony Orchestra there are instrumental effects that are undoubtedly new and ravishing, so in this quintet are passages that charm the ear by their absolute novelty in shades of color. And I think it is such tonal impression that Mr. Loeffler chiefly seeks. The themes are not particularly striking—one of melancholy nature suggests Russia, indeed, it may be the memory of some folk-song, for all I know—but the treatment throughout is bold and original. It is as though Mr. Loeffler was discontented with old forms and conventional harmonies and European scales; and he would fain experiment. The technical mastery and the rare, exquisite taste of the man forbid sensationalism or any crudeness.

The quintet sounds like Loeffler; there is no question, no thought of another composer. The conservative may say: "Yes, but this music is all vague, and episodes follow without special meaning, and I don't know what it all means." And for this very reason it is all the more delightful. The hearer is in a new world. He forgets that quintets have, as a rule, four movements, and he is not conscious of fiddlers or fiddles. To him there is a new joy in living; and the dead may hear stranger and more beautiful music. And while he listens, he too weaves fancies, hopes, aspirations and dreams pleasant dreams. There are music makers who go to work at a piece of chamber music as a carpenter constructs a box, and they measure carefully the distance between the first theme and its reappearance. Such are the whippers of Pegasus, unwilling, balky Pegasus, who feels his rider to be an earnest, heavy thing of clay. They compel him to trot in sonata form; to walk sedately; to prance and be skittish; and finally to gallop, that audiences may applaud. And Pegasus is then a livery horse. Let Mr. Loeffler mount him, and he soars airward.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 3.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its seventeenth concert at Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini." ..... Foote
"An Island Fantasy" ..... Paine
"Waldesruhe" ..... Dvorak
Capriccio ..... Klengel
Solo for Violoncello.
Symphony No. 2 ..... Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2 ..... Liszt—Doppler
Soloist, Mr. A. Schroeder.

It is to the credit of the rising school of young musicians that they know the technique of their art, and that, whatever may be said of their inspiration, no objection can be urged against their workmanship. If activity were allowed to genius only, the field of art would resemble a desolate Sahara, with here and there a green spot to add to the sadness. Wild flowers and weeds add to nature's cheerfulness, and every Alpine traveller feels a tenderness for the edelweiss simply because it grows in rocky places. Shall the crows and peacocks be silenced because the nightingale indulges in song? The crow has something important to say of his experiences of life, and for the sake of fuller wisdom we may forgive the voice for the sake of the things uttered.

Our young musicians also have something to say, and they deserve to be heard with patient and respectful attention, if the message they bring is not of much æsthetic value, it is still valuable as a criterion on art, their criticism. Mr. Foote speaks with frank earnestness; his criticism is that art is difficult and laborious, that music writing requires a thorough knowledge of orchestral effects, and that given this knowledge, good workmanship may often be taken or mistaken for valuable ideas. His work tells us that effect is more useful than form, that indefiniteness of intention may often simulate the vagueness of sublimity, and that a pleased intellect has the power to pacify a disappointed emotion. It tells us that art has lost its wings and its darting, that the plain is better than the mountain; a well-regulated foot pace safer than an impulsive leap. Whatever is the worth of the message, Mr. Foote is always the conscientious artist, who puts what is best and highest in his art life in his work. The Symphonic Prologue is perhaps a trifle over-elaborate, the ornamentation excessive; but it is good musicianly work of its kind.

Mr. Paine's "Island Fantasy" has a higher art value, for it contains vitalizing ideas; the programme informs us that the composition expresses feelings aroused by memories of summer days by the seaside "amid the varying moods of ocean life, the soothing calm and murmur of the sea, gentle breezes and rippling waves, alternating with surge and storm." With these useful hints the music stimulates the imagination and it is very easy to connect the work of the harp with the sunlight flickering on gently undulating waves; to find in the sounds of the muted violins the peace and beatitude of hazy midsummer; the silence disturbed for a moment by the rattling of drums and blowing of trumpets, recalling tempests dying away to the full voices of the 'celli, indicating the brooding of nature after a thunder storm. The island is seemingly in midocean; its shores lapped by beautifully modulated waves, and in it the harmonies of nature are ever seeking to unite in new combinations and show their skill by their fine complexity and their attractive and novel patterns. Aside from the pleasing memories it recalls, the Island Fantasy is good, solid, musicianly work; dignified and scholarly as is everything that comes from Mr. Paine's hands.

The two little works played by Mr. Schroeder are very attractive. In the "Waldesruhe" Dvorak appears as the comtemplative poet, and his dream-picture has the direct earnestness and simplicity of fine art work. It is a charming dainty idyll. The pieces, as was to be expected were delightfully interpreted by Mr. Schroeder; tone, color, expression and sentiment, were faultless and around the unsually sedate audience into unmistakeable enthusiasm.

The programme for the next concert is Robert Kahn's Overture, "Elegie," first time; Berlioz Fantastic Symphony and Brahms's Academic Overture—a programme fully in harmony with the cheerful March weather.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 72.

SUNDAY, MARCH 3, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Foote's Symphonic Prologue Received with the Greatest Favor.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last night was:

Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," op. 24 ..... Arthur Foote
Symphonic Poem, "An Island Fantasy," op. 45 ..... John Knowles Paine
Solos for violoncello.
"Waldesruhe" ..... Antonin Dvorak
Capriccio, op. 8 ..... Julius Klengel
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 36 ..... Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, in D minor ..... Franz Liszt
(Scored for orchestra by the composer and Franz Doppler.)

The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder. Mr. Foote's symphonic prologue, which was first heard at these concerts some four years ago, was received on its second presentation last night with the same hearty favor that attended it on the former occasion. It was more effectively read, and with warmer and richer color, by Mr. Paur than characterized its performance in the past, and the result was greater strength and impressiveness. The applause at its close was very hearty, and it did not cease till the composer rose from his seat in the first balcony and bowed his acknowledgments.

Mr. Paine's "Island Fantasy" was heard again with genuine pleasure. It is full of poetry, grace of sentiment and depth of feeling. The instrumentation is charming in its refinement and its variety of chaste tone color, and the clearness of the work from beginning to end is delightful. It was heartily and appreciatively applauded, and it continued until Mr. Paine made his appearance on the stage. Dvorak's "Waldesruhe," is a beautiful adagio, flowingly melodious in its themes, and marked by a frank simplicity that is rare in the composer. It was played by Mr. Schroeder with a tender warmth of feeling and a largeness of style that won for him long continued applause. The capriccio by Klengel begins with a moto perpetuo, and breaks into a delicate second theme in a broader vein, after which it returns to the first subject. It is a thoroughly interesting composition, fresh, spirited and of discreet brevity. This also was performed in a delightfully artistic manner and with a brilliancy of technique that was none the less effective because it was undemonstrative. Again did the player draw forth a round of vigorous plaudits, and he was in addition recalled three times. Mr. Paur read the Beethoven symphony in a masterly manner, and the playing of the orchestra was up to its highest standard. The interpretation of the slow movement was especially fine.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Elegie," Robert Kahn (first time); fantastic symphony, Berlioz; academic overture, Brahms.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 3, 1895.

The program of the 17th Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini" ..... Foote
"An Island Fantasy" ..... Paine
"Waldesruhe" ..... Dvorak
Capriccio ..... Klengel
Symphony No. 2 ..... Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2 ..... Liszt-Doppler

After the purple and scarlet and red and crimson of opera, the cool green of Beethoven's larghetto was refreshing. The movement was played sympathetically, and gave great delight to the audience. Admirable indeed was the performance of Mr. Schroeder; it was so crisp and clear in bravura, so sustained and unexaggerated in cantabile. The pieces by Messrs. Paine and Foote were applauded loudly, and the composers bowed their acknowledgments.

By the way, Mr. Paur, symphonic poems entitled "Francesca da Rimini" have been composed by Tschaikowsky and Antonio Bazzini, names almost as well known in the musical world as that of Foote. Might it not be well to let the public of Boston know what musical views these foreign gentlemen entertained concerning Francesca and her playmates?

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 4, 1895.

The Symphony Concert.

After banqueting on highly spiced foreign dishes during the week we came home again to our customary seat at the symphonic table on Saturday night, happy to find that our musical digestion was not impaired, that we were not suffering from tonal dyspepsia.

Two American composers were honored in this programme, which began with Arthur Foote's "Francesca da Rimini" symphonic prologue. This work grows stronger upon more intimate acquaintance, for it possesses impressive themes and an easy, unforced leading of the parts; the development too is logical and interesting if not strikingly dramatic. The work has scarcely the intense passion of the loving and guilty pair, nor is the tragedy which culminated their amour sufficiently indicated. There is, however, a grandiose style in the work which is not ineffective, and which sufficiently accounted for the public favor which was accorded to the performance and which forced the composer to bow his acknowledgments from his seat.

Prof. Paine's "Island Fantasy" idealizes the sea shore very much as Mendelssohn celebrated the Isle of Staffa in his "Hebrides Overture," for there is the same tribute to the voice of Poseidon, the same touch of loneliness, the same pensive character, although no one will ever again achieve such a perfect ocean theme as that beautiful chief subject in Mendelssohn's overture. Anything that this composer writes is worthy of the respectful attention of the critic, for it may scarcely be questioned that John K. Paine stands at the head of the American School of Composition. But the reviewer would have preferred a selection from the "Oedipus" music (the high-water mark of native composition) to this rather discursive work. Spite of the beauty of the thematic material, there is something of prolixity in the working-out. The scoring is done with a masterly hand, only Templeton Strong, of the native army, comes near to Professor Paine in the matter of good orchestration. The performance was a worthy one, and especial mention may be made of the harp and the horn as being very satisfactory in prominent passages.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder then played two violoncello solos. Dvorak's "Waldesruhe" ("Forest Repose") took us from sea-shore to woodland in easy transition. It had a suave melodious character which reminded of a "Song without Words," and gave abundant opportunity for that rich tone and pure expression of which Mr. Schroeder is such a master. Its end with a broad passage on the C string gave a good example of Mr. Schroeder's noble tone. Klengel's "Cappriccio" seemed like Popper's "Papillons" in masquerade. It was a showy Rondo (of the simpler form) with a chief theme of Moto Perpetuo character and a contrasted counter theme of appropriate legato. It can only be regarded as a musical sugarplum, but it gives good opportunity for technical display and aroused much enthusiasm in the audience.

Beethoven's second symphony is a species of poor relation among the family of nine. It is the least grateful of them all for performance. Mr. Paur gave it a good and generally conservative reading, in which however, the kettle-drum punctuated the rhythm too much. It may be awfully heterodox to state that the second movement is too long for a slow movement, and that the attempt to develop themes in this tempo becomes prosy, but having taken this first downward step in musical heresy, we may add that the Larghetto seems Mozartish without Mozart's brevity. The finale is a good step towards the new school. The older finales were always jovial and seemed merely intended to send the audience home in a good humor. When Beethoven gave the joviality to the third movement, as he did in this symphony, by substituting the scherzo for the minuet, a change was bound to come in the finale too, and in this symphony one finds the beginning of a transition to the new school. The movement was brilliantly performed with just the right spirit and fire.

The Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 2, by Liszt (scored by Liszt and Doppler) is not so successful a work as the Polonaise in E which Muller-Berghaus orchestrated, but it has its showy moments. There is some very brilliant flute-work and Mr. Molé deserves enthusiastic praise, for he gave the trying passages without a flaw. Mr. Paur was in his element in working up the heavy climaxes which follow on each others heels in this work, and there was not a grain of pepper lost from the spicing of this orchestral mess of pottage. Next week the music will be still more highly flavored, for Berlioz's 'Sinfoni: Fantastique" the best possible study of modern orchestration, is promised for performance.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 3, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme at last night's Symphony offered nothing in the way of novelty, but for all that the selections were so well chosen as to give thorough satisfaction to the audience, which, by the way, was the smallest this season, owing to the counter attraction of grand opera.

The concert opened with Arthur Foote's symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," which was first played by the Symphony Orchestra in January, 1891. It is a fiery and impassioned composition, full of pretty melodies, skilfully introduced. It was well played, and Mr. Foote acknowledged the applause which followed from his seat in the balcony. John K. Paine's symphonic poem, "An Island Fantasy," which followed, has a number of dreamy passages, and introduces the harp in several lovely effects. The composer was also honored, as was Mr. Foote.

Alwin Schroeder, a member of the orchestra, was heard in a couple of charming compositions, "Waldesruhe," by Dvorak, and a capriccio by Julius Klengel. The first is quite short; the second, much longer, is very playful, and abounds in intricate passages for the solo player. It seemed to strike the popular fancy, as Mr. Schroeder received most generous applause. The Beethoven symphony No. 2 and the Liszt Hungarian rhapsody No. 2 completed the programme. It is always a delight to listen to this latter composition with its quaint and effective melodies, and it was most brilliantly played. For the concert next week there will be but three compositions: Robert Kahn's overture, "Elegie" (first time); Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, and the Brahms academic overture.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 3, 1895.

We have had to devote so much space to the opera, that we can give but a few lines to the seventeenth Symphony programme. This, however, was almost all familiar and friendly, including Mr. Foote's duly dolorous "Francesca da Rimini" prologue; Professor Paine's poetic "Island Fantasy"; Beethoven's Second Symphony, and for the vigorous tail-piece Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody in orchestral form. Besides these, there were played by Mr. Schroeder, the 'cellist, a "Waldesruhe" by Dvorak, in which he brought out a soft and beautiful tonality, and a Capriccio by Klengel, which required and received a facility and celerity of execution such as only a player of the first rank could possess and contribute. The orchestra played well and Mr. Paur obtained the smoothness and grace which he has somewhat lacked in two previous concerts.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 3, 1895.

Symphony Concert.

Two Boston composers were represented on yesterday's symphony concert program. Mr Paur could hardly have given pleasanter evidence that he appreciates "the best" in American music.

Mr Arthur Foote's symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," was presented by the Boston symphony orchestra for its first public hearing in January, four years ago. It was admirably given yesterday, and with its brilliant orchestral effects, and strongly developed themes, made an admirable opening for the concert. Those who were belated missed, indeed, one of the most interesting of Mr Paur's offerings.

The high rank which Mr John Knowles Paine has gained assures for any work of his a welcome in any concert hall devoted to classical music. His "Island Fantasy" gives abundant scope for his skill and knowledge of the art musical, and demonstrates his ability in tone painting in a way which leaves nothing to be desired. "An Island Fantasy" is true, descriptive music. Mr Paine never permits himself to resort to ad captandum devices to win applause, yet it would be difficult to set forth more poetically and effectively the varying moods of "the sounding sea." It was fitting that the distinguished composer should have been summoned to share the honors of the occasion. Mr Paur's interpretation of the work was most sympathetic.

Mr Alwin Schroeder was the soloist. He performed Dvorak's adagio for 'cello, "Woodland Rest," with much expression, though it was in Klengel's caprice, every difficulty in which was deftly overcome, that he won the heartiest applause. Mr Schroeder's place in favor with the symphony orchestra clientage has been fairly gained, and he fully earned the recalls for which he came forward to bow his acknowledgments.

The symphony was Beethoven's second, in D major—a masterwork familiar indeed to our concert stage, but which possesses perennial power to please and enthrall when presented with such appreciation and skill as marked the performance by our symphony orchestra.

Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody, No. 2, in D minor, orchestrated from the piano score by the composer and Franz Doppler, brought the program to a close. There is no denying that a Liszt rhapsody is noisy—there is no denying, either, the fascination of the vizarre gypsy music which characterizes all his works in this line. The performance was brilliant. If it was impossible for the orchestra to quite reproduce the effect which a great pianist could achieve with the rhapsody, the fault assuredly did not lie with the musicians.

M Charles Molé interpreted the passages set down for the flute in this exacting work with admirable skill, and Mr Schuecker's part as harpist was taken most artistically.

Three selections make up next Saturday's program. One of them, Robert Kahn's "Elegy," overture, is to have its first hearing. Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony will follow the novelty, and the concert is to end with Brahms' noble "Academic" overture.

[103]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1895.

The program of the sixteenth Symphony Concert, given last night, included Händel's Concerto Grosso No. 6, G minor; Haydn's Symphony No. 12, B flat major; Mozart's overture, Entführung aus dem Serail; Beethoven's Egmont overture and Wagner's Centennial March. What do you think of this for a program? As Thackeray said of Tupper, "We don't think of Mr. Tupper in England." Lord! what a program! Do you wish a learned discourse on Händel's concertos, with quotations from the ancients? Or a disquisition on the meaning of the themes in the Egmont overture? Or an essay on the inherent pessimism of Haydn? Or a rhapsody on the popular nature of Wagner's march? I should like to hear Mrs. Shaw whistle the tune, or hear it played by two flutes and a bimbonifono. Or an inquiry into the use of the seraglio in music? There is nothing else to write about. Mr. Paur is of late a liberal contributor to the volume entitled "How Not to Make Programs."

* * *

BOSTON, Mass., February 24, 1895.

THE sixth Kneisel Quartet concert was given the 18th in Union Hall. The program included Schubert's D minor quartet (op. posth.); C. M. Loeffler's quintet in one movement for three violins, viola and 'cello (MS., first time) and Beethoven's septet. The club was assisted in the quintet by Mr. Krafft; in the septet by Messrs. Pourtau (clarinet), Hackebarth (horn), Litke (bassoon) and Golde (double bass).

The performance of the septet was admirable, and it caused one to forget the purely academic nature of much of the work. String and wind instruments were in friendly rivalry, and the result was the perfection of ensemble. So, too, the performance of the quartet was excellent, but may the day soon come when only the second movement is heard in chamber concerts!

Mr. Loeffler's quintet is distinguished first of all for its extraordinary beauty of tonal color. As in his fantastic violin composition played here recently by himself and the Symphony Orchestra there are instrumental effects that are undoubtedly new and ravishing, so in this quintet are passages that charm the ear by their absolute novelty in shades of color. And I think it is such tonal impression that Mr. Loeffler chiefly seeks. The themes are not particularly striking—one of melancholy nature suggests Russia, indeed, it may be the memory of some folk-song, for all I know—but the treatment throughout is bold and original. It is as though Mr. Loeffler was discontented with old forms and conventional harmonies and European scales; and he would fain experiment. The technical mastery and the rare, exquisite taste of the man forbid sensationalism or any crudeness.

The quintet sounds like Loeffler; there is no suggestion, no thought of another composer. The conservative may say: "Yes, but this music is all vague, and episodes follow without special meaning, and I don't know what it all means." And for this very reason it is all the more delightful. The hearer is in a new world. He forgets that quintets have, as a rule, four movements, and he is not conscious of fiddlers or fiddles. To him there is a new joy in living; and the dead may hear stranger and more beautiful music. And while he listens, he too weaves fancies, hopes, aspirations and dreams pleasant dreams. There are music makers who go to work at a piece of chamber music as a carpenter constructs a box, and they measure carefully the distance between the first theme and its reappearance. Such are the whippers of Pegasus, unwilling, balky Pegasus, who feels his rider to be an earnest, heavy thing of clay. They compel him to trot in sonata form; to walk sedately; to prance and be skittish; and finally to gallop, that audiences may applaud. And Pegasus is then a livery horse. Let Mr. Loeffler mount him, and he soars airward.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 3, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme at last night's Symphony offered nothing in the way of novelty, but for all that the selections were so well chosen as to give thorough satisfaction to the audience, which, by the way, was the smallest this season, owing to the counter attraction of grand opera.

The concert opened with Arthur Foote's symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," which was first played by the Symphony Orchestra in January, 1891. It is a fiery and impassioned composition, full of pretty melodies, skilfully introduced. It was well played, and Mr. Foote acknowledged the applause which followed from his seat in the balcony. John K. Paine's symphonic poem, "An Island Fantasy," which followed, has a number of dreamy passages, and introduces the harp in several lovely effects. The composer was also honored, as was Mr. Foote.

Alwin Schroeder, a member of the orchestra, was heard in a couple of charming compositions, "Waldesruhe," by Dvorak, and a capriccio by Julius Klengel. The first is quite short; the second, much longer, is very playful, and abounds in intricate passages for the solo player. It seemed to strike the popular fancy, as Mr. Schroeder received most generous applause. The Beethoven symphony No. 2 and the Liszt Hungarian rhapsody No. 2 completed the programme. It is always a delight to listen to this latter composition with its quaint and effective melodies, and it was most brilliantly played. For the concert next week there will be but three compositions: Robert Kahn's overture, "Elegie" (first time); Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, and the Brahms Academic overture.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 3.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its seventeenth concert at Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini." ..... Foote
"An Island Fantasy" ..... Paine
"Waldesruhe" ..... Dvorak
Capriccio ..... Klengel
Solo for Violoncello.
Symphony No. 2 ..... Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2 ..... Liszt—Doppler
Soloist, Mr. A. Schroeder.

It is to the credit of the rising school of young musicians that they know the technique of their art, and that, whatever may be said of their inspiration, no objection can be urged against their workmanship. If activity were allowed to genius only, the field of art would resemble a desolate Sahara, with here and there a green spot to add to the sadness. Wild flowers and weeds add to nature's cheerfulness, and every Alpine traveller feels a tenderness for the edelweiss simply because it grows in rocky places. Shall the crows and peacocks be silenced because the nightingale indulges in song? The crow has something important to say of his experiences of life, and for the sake of fuller wisdom we may forgive the voice for the sake of the things uttered.

Our young musicians also have something to say, and they deserve to be heard with patient and respectful attention, if the message they bring is not of much æsthetic value, it is still valuable as a criterion on art, their criticism. Mr. Foote speaks with frank earnestness; his criticism is that art is difficult and laborious, that music writing requires a thorough knowledge of orchestral effects, and that given this knowledge, good workmanship may often be taken or mistaken for valuable ideas. His work tells us that effect is more useful than form, that indefiniteness of intention may often simulate the vacueness of sublimity, and that a pleased intellect has the power to pacify a disappointed emotion. It tells us that art has lost its wings and its daring, that the plain is better than the mountain; a well-regulated foot pace safer than an impulsive leap. Whatever is the worth of the message, Mr. Foote is always the conscientious artist, who puts what is best and highest in his art life in his work. The Symphonic Prologue is perhaps a trifle over-elaborate, the ornamentation excessive; but it is good musicianly work of its kind.

Mr. Paine's "Island Fantasy" has a higher art value, for it contains vitalizing ideas; the programme informs us that the composition expresses feelings aroused by memories of summer days by the seaside "amid the varying moods of ocean life, the soothing calm and murmur of the sea, gentle breezes and rippling waves, alternating with surge and storm." With these useful hints the music stimulates the imagination and it is very easy to connect the work of the harp with the sunlight flickering on gently undulating waves; to find in the sounds of the muted violins the peace and beatitude of hazy midsummer; the silence disturbed for a moment by the rattling of drums and blowing of trumpets, recalling tempests dying away to the full voices of the 'celli, indicating the brooding of nature after a thunder storm. The island is seemingly in midocean; its shores lapped by beautifully modulated waves, and in it the harmonies of nature are ever seeking to unite in new combinations and show their skill by their fine complexity and their attractive and novel patterns. Aside from the pleasing memories it recalls, the Island Fantasy is good, solid, musicianly work; dignified and scholarly as is everything that comes from Mr. Paine's hands.

The two little works played by Mr. Schroeder are very attractive. In the "Waldesruhe" Dvorak appears as the comtemplative poet, and his dream-picture has the direct earnestness and simplicity of fine art work. It is a charming dainty idyll. The pieces, as was to be expected were delightfully interpreted by Mr. Schroeder; tone, color, expression and sentiment, were faultless and around the unsually sedate audience into unmistakeable enthusiasm.

The programme for the next concert is Robert Kahn's Overture, "Elegie," first time; Berlioz Fantastic Symphony and Brahms's Academic Overture—a programme fully in harmony with the cheerful March weather.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 3, 1895.

We have had to devote so much space to the opera, that we can give but a few lines to the seventeenth Symphony programme. This, however, was almost all familiar and friendly, including Mr. Foote's duly dolorous "Francesca da Rimini" prologue; Professor Paine's poetic "Island Fantasy"; Beethoven's Second Symphony, and for the vigorous tail-piece Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody in orchestral form. Besides these, there were played by Mr. Schroeder, the 'cellist, a "Waldesruhe" by Dvorak, in which he brought out a soft and beautiful tonality, and a Capriccio by Klengel, which required and received a facility and celerity of execution such as only a player of the first rank could possess and contribute. The orchestra played well and Mr. Paur obtained the smoothness and grace which he has somewhat lacked in two previous concerts.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 72.

SUNDAY, MARCH 3, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Foote's Symphonic Prologue Received with the Greatest Favor.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last night was:

Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," op. 24 ..... Arthur Foote
Symphonic Poem, "An Island Fantasy," op. 45 ..... John Knowles Paine
Solos for violoncello.
"Waldesruhe" ..... Antonin Dvorak
Capriccio, op. 8 ..... Julius Klengel
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 36 ..... Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, in D minor ..... Franz Liszt
(Scored for orchestra by the composer and Franz Doppler.)

The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder, Mr. Foote's symphonic prologue, which was first heard at these concerts some four years ago, was received on its second presentation last night with the same hearty favor that attended it on the former occasion. It was more effectively read, and with warmer and richer color, by Mr. Paur than characterized its performance in the past, and the result was greater strength and impressiveness. The applause at its close was very hearty, and it did not cease till the composer rose from his seat in the first balcony and bowed his acknowledgments.

Mr. Paine's "Island Fantasy" was heard again with genuine pleasure. It is full of poetry, grace of sentiment and depth of feeling. The instrumentation is charming in its refinement and its variety of chaste tone color, and the clearness of the work from beginning to end is delightful. It was heartily and appreciatively applauded, and it continued until Mr. Paine made his appearance on the stage. Dvorak's "Waldesruhe," is a beautiful adagio, flowingly melodious in its themes, and marked by a frank simplicity that is rare in the composer. It was played by Mr. Schroeder with a tender warmth of feeling and a largeness of style that won for him long continued applause. The capriccio by Klengel begins with a moto perpetuo, and breaks into a delicate second theme in a broader vein, after which it returns to the first subject. It is a thoroughly interesting composition, fresh, spirited and of discreet brevity. This also was performed in a delightfully artistic manner and with a brilliancy of technique that was none the less effective because it was undemonstrative. Again d d the player draw forth a round of vigorous plaudits, and he was in addition recalled three times. Mr. Paur read the Beethoven symphony in a masterly manner, and the playing of the orchestra was up to its highest standard. The interpretation of the slow movement was especially fine.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Elegie," Robert Kahn (first time); fantastic symphony, Berlioz; academic overture, Brahms.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 3, 1895.

Symphony Concert.

Two Boston composers were represented on yesterday's symphony concert program. Mr Paur could hardly have given pleasanter evidence that he appreciates "the best" in American music.

Mr Arthur Foote's symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," was presented by the Boston symphony orchestra for its first public hearing in January, four years ago. It was admirably given yesterday, and with its brilliant orchestral effects, and strongly developed themes, made an admirable opening for the concert. Those who were belated missed, indeed, one of the most interesting of Mr Paur's offerings.

The high rank which Mr John Knowles Paine has gained assures for any work of his a welcome in any concert hall devoted to classical music. His "Island Fantasy" gives abundant scope for his skill and knowledge of the art musical, and demonstrates his ability in tone painting in a way which leaves nothing to be desired. "An Island Fantasy" is true, descriptive music. Mr Paine never permits himself to resort to ad captandum devices to win applause, yet it would be difficult to set forth more poetically and effectively the varying moods of "the sounding sea." It was fitting that the distinguished composer should have been summoned to share the honors of the occasion. Mr Paur's interpretation of the work was most sympathetic.

Mr Alwin Schroeder was the soloist. He performed Dvorak's adagio for 'cello, "Woodland Rest," with much expression, though it was in Klengel's caprice, every difficulty in which was deftly overcome, that he won the heartiest applause. Mr Schroeder's place in favor with the symphony orchestra clientage has been fairly gained, and he fully earned the recalls for which he came forward to bow his acknowledgments.

The symphony was Beethoven's second, in D major—a masterwork familiar indeed to our concert stage, but which possesses perennial power to please and enthrall when presented with such appreciation and skill as marked the performance by our symphony orchestra.

Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody, No. 2, in D minor, orchestrated from the piano score by the composer and Franz Doppler, brought the program to a close. There is no denying that a Liszt rhapsody is noisy—there is no denying, either, the fascination of the vizarre gypsy music which characterizes all his works in this line. The performance was brilliant. If it was impossible for the orchestra to quite reproduce the effect which a great pianist could achieve with the rhapsody, the fault assuredly did not lie with the musicians.

M Charles Mole interpreted the passages set down for the flute in this exacting work with admirable skill, and Mr Schuecker's part as harpist was taken most artistically.

Three selections make up next Saturday's program. One of them, Robert Kahn's "Elegy," overture, is to have its first hearing. Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony will follow the novelty, and the concert is to end with Brahms' noble "Academic" overture.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 3, 1895.

The program of the 17th Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini" ..... Foote
"An Island Fantasy" ..... Paine
"Waldesruhe" ..... Dvorak
Capriccio ..... Klengel
Symphony No. 2 ..... Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2 ..... Liszt-Doppler

After the purple and scarlet and red and crimson of opera, the cool green of Beethoven's larghetto was refreshing. The movement was played sympathetically, and gave great delight to the audience. Admirable indeed was the performance of Mr. Schroeder; it was so crisp and clear in bravura, so sustained and unexaggerated in cantabile. The pieces by Messrs. Paine and Foote were applauded loudly, and the composers bowed their acknowledgments.

By the way, Mr. Paur, symphonic poems entitled "Francesca da Rimini" have been composed by Tschaikowsky and Antonio Bazzini, names almost as well known in the musical world as that of Foote. Might it not be well to let the public of Boston know what musical views these foreign gentlemen entertained concerning Francesca and her playmates?

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 4, 1895.

The Symphony Concert.

After banqueting on highly spiced foreign dishes during the week we came home again to our customary seat at the symphonic table on Saturday night, happy to find that our musical digestion was not impaired, that we were not suffering from tonal dyspepsia.

Two American composers were honored in this programme, which began with Arthur Foote's "Francesca da Rimini" symphonic prologue. This work grows stronger upon more intimate acquaintance, for it possesses impressive themes and an easy, unforced leading of the parts; the development too is logical and interesting if not strikingly dramatic. The work has scarcely the intense passion of the loving and guilty pair, nor is the tragedy which culminated their amour sufficiently indicated. There is, however, a grandiose style in the work which is not ineffective, and which sufficiently accounted for the public favor which was accorded to the performance and which forced the composer to bow his acknowledgments from his seat.

Prof. Paine's "Island Fantasy" idealizes the sea shore very much as Mendelssohn celebrated the Isle of Staffa in his "Hebrides Overture," for there is the same tribute to the voice of Poseidon, the same touch of loneliness, the same pensive character, although no one will ever again achieve such a perfect ocean theme as that beautiful chief subject in Mendelssohn's overture. Anything that this composer writes is worthy of the respectful attention of the critic, for it may scarcely be questioned that John K. Paine stands at the head of the American School of Composition. But the reviewer would have preferred a selection from the "Oedipus" music (the high-water mark of native composition) to this rather discursive work. Spite of the beauty of the thematic material there is something of prolixity in the working-out. The scoring is done with a masterly hand, only Templeton Strong, of the native army, comes near to Professor Paine in the matter of good orchestration. The performance was a worthy one, and especial mention may be made of the harp and the horn as being very satisfactory in prominent passages.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder then played two violoncello solos. Dvorak's "Waldesruhe" ("Forest Repose") took us from sea-shore to woodland in easy transition. It had a suave melodious character which reminded of a "Song without Words," and gave abundant opportunity for that rich tone and pure expression of which Mr. Schroeder is such a master. Its end with a broad passage on the C string gave a good example of Mr. Schroeder's noble tone. Klengel's "Cappriccio" seemed like Popper's "Papillons" in masquerade. It was a showy Rondo (of the simpler form) with a chief theme of Moto Perpetuo character and a contrasted counter theme of appropriate legato. It can only be regarded as a musical sugarplum, but it gives good opportunity for technical display and aroused much enthusiasm in the audience.

Beethoven's second symphony is a species of poor relation among the family of nine. It is the least grateful of them all for performance. Mr. Paur gave it a good and generally conservative reading, in which however, the kettle-drum punctuated the rhythm too much. It may be awfully heterodox to state that the second movement is too long for a slow movement, and that the attempt to develop themes in this tempo becomes prosy, but having taken this first downward step in musical heresy, we may add that the Larghetto seems Mozartish without Mozart's brevity. The finale is a good step towards the new school. The older finales were always jovial and seemed merely intended to send the audience home in a good humor. When Beethoven gave the joviality to the third movement, as he did in this symphony, by substituting the scherzo for the minuet, a change was bound to come in the finale too, and in this symphony one finds the beginning of a transition to the new school. The movement was brilliantly performed with just the right spirit and fire.

The Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 2, by Liszt (scored by Liszt and Doppler) is not so successful a work as the Polonaise in E which Muller-Berghaus orchestrated, but it has its showy moments. There is some very brilliant flute-work and Mr. Molé deserves enthusiastic praise, for he gave the trying passages without a flaw. Mr. Paur was in his element in working up the heavy climaxes which follow on each others heels in this work, and there was not a grain of pepper lost from the spicing of this orchestral mess of pottage. Next week the music will be still more highly flavored, for Berlioz's 'Sinfoni Fantastique" the best possible study of modern orchestration, is promised for performance.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[103]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 4, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Foote: Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 24.
Paine: Symphonic Poem, "An Island Fantasy," opus 45.
Dvorák: "Waldesruhe," Adagio for 'cello and orchestra, in D-flat major.
Klengel: Capriccio for 'cello and orchestra, in D minor, opus 8.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 36.
Liszt-Doppler: Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, in D minor.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the 'cellist.

This is, we believe, the second time Mr. Foote's "Francesca da Rimini" has been played here; it is the first time that we personally have heard it, as we were not in Boston at its first performance in 1891. After a careful study of the score and this one hearing, we should not hesitate to place it at the head of all Mr. Foote has yet written in the larger concert forms. What is in general strong in Mr. Foote's writing,—solid, rational harmony, flowing, natural part-writing, stoutness of musical structure, and coherency of development,—is to be found in this work in its best estate; and, added to these characteristics of the efficient musician, we find here a depth and poignancy of expression, a melodic forcibleness, and vigor of effect, toward which his previous orchestral works have steadily striven, but without such brilliant convincingness of achievement. The whole symphonic prologue is conceived and carried out on a high poetic plane, and at the same time with impeccable musical consistency. In the matter of instrumentation Mr. Foote has here taken a long stride forwards; the whole scheme of the scoring is as modern as possible, one might almost call it post-Wagnerian, reminding one in method, though not always in result, of Richard Strauss and the latest French masters of the art. And the effect is always admirable; the strings are treated with infinite skill, and where the composer finds himself forced to resort to his brass to give due prominence to a melodic phrase in strong passages, he does it so cleverly that the sum total of his orchestral tone has no unpleasant brassiness, and his use of the trumpets in cantilena is so skilfully veiled that it detracts nothing from the effectiveness of these instruments when he employs them in their traditional character as trumpets, in true trumpet passages. The prologue was admirably played and produced an exceedingly strong impression, Mr. Foote having to bow his acknowledgments of the applause from his hiding place in the corner of the first balcony.

Professor Paine's "Island Fantasy" makes a better and better impression, the more one hears it. It is a perfectly free work of musico-poetic fancy, unlike Mr. Foote's prologue, which, with all its freedom of development, adheres essentially to the sonata form; but its frank departure from traditional musical forms does not in the least impugn its coherency of development nor prevent its having a distinct and musically logical plastic form of its own. Professor Paine has here conceived the "Symphonic Poem" in what seems to us its truest and best estate; as a piece of music inspired, or suggested, by extra-musical ideas and experiences, but never seeking to follow out an extra-musical train of thought in any slavish way, nor to model its form upon conditions foreign to its own art. What of tone-painting there is in the work is purely ideal and suggestive, never descending to mere realistic imitation. The composer has been poetic and fanciful without for a moment allowing himself to be unmusical; more than this, one sees that the musical side of his work was from beginning to end the prominent one in his mind. The composition is full of beauty, force and grace. It was excellently played, though it seemed to us at times that the heavy brass in the orchestra played somewhat louder than the composer must have calculated on in his scoring. The work was very warmly received, and Professor Paine bowed from the stage in response to the applause.

Beethoven's second symphony is always a delight. To be sure, with all its immense and characteristically Beethovenish advance upon the first one in C, one can hardly understand Berlioz's closing his analysis of the first with "In a word, this is not Beethoven. We shall find him!" as if in the second symphony the true Beethoven was for the first time revealed. Save for a measure or two in the slow introduction to the first movement, and some developments in the second theme of the final rondo, this symphony in D has Beethoven's "first manner" stamped all over it, and in no wise suggests what Beethoven came to later in his career. It is far more like the first symphony than it is like the third. But it is full of the most wonderful genius for all that. It was admirably played and received in a manner to warm the cockles of the veriest classicist's heart; the Larghetto was all but encored.

Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody (No. 12 of the pianoforte series), scored for orchestra by himself and Franz Doppler, was splendidly played in a way to do full justice to its fantastic, fitful wildness, and yet duly emphasizing what coherence it has as a musical composition. Mr. Molé's flute cadenzas were jewels in their way.

Mr. Schroeder played the two little pieces by Dvorák and Klengel simply to perfection. The former piece is perhaps the most lovely and enchanting thing of its kind we have yet heard. The Klengel capriccio is deft and dainty in a somewhat more commonplace way, but is not without charm, besides being thoroughly well-written music. Mr. Schroeder's playing of it was very "canny" indeed; he wisely let the music make its own effect just up to near the close, where he put on an extra touch of effectiveness that simply carried everything before it. He was enthusiastically applauded.

The next programme is: Robert Kahn, overture, "Elegie," in C minor (first time); Berlioz, "Fantastic" symphony, No. 1, in C major, opus 14a; Brahms, academic festival overture in C minor, opus 80.

The Boston Globe

MONDAY, MARCH 4.

WORKS OF LOCAL COMPOSERS.

JOHN K. PAINE AND ARTHUR FOOTE HEARD AT SYMPHONY.

The Former Undoubtedly the Greatest American Musician—"Rigoletto" and Sunday Evening Concert by the Operatic Artists.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini." ..... Foote
Symphonic Poem, "An Island Fantasy" ..... Paine
Solos of Violoncellos:
a "Waldesruhe" ..... Dvorak
b Capriccio ..... Klengel
Symphony No. 2 ..... Beethoven
Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 2 ..... Liszt

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist.

Mr. Arthur Foote's piece has been heard before in these concerts, in fact it was first brought out by this orchestra in January, 1891. One listens with gratification to the musicianlike manner in which Mr. Foote handles his material, which is at once melodic, elevated and original in its character. There is no striving for effects at the expense of legitimate art, no borrowed plumage from familiar costumers in orchestral decoration serving to cover the ill-shapen form beneath, but honest exposition of serious study upon classic models, enhanced through the imagination and individuality of the composer, its form displayed in the well-fitting and appropriate garments of chaste and artistic handiwork. This composition reflects credit upon its composer in every direction, and it would be well if some of his local contemporaries should emulate its just proportions. Mr. Foote was obliged to come forward and bow in acknowledgement of the hearty applause of the audience.

It is not at all creditable to the reputation of the conductors who have directed the affairs of our Symphony Orchestra that their want of discrimination has been the means of our hearing too seldom the works of Prof. John K. Paine. During the five years that Mr. Gericke was here he played but one of Prof. Paine's compositions, if my memory serves me correctly, and that was the symphonic poem hear Saturday night. Nikisch undertook a performance of Prof. Paine's "Spring" symphony with results discreditable to his ability as an interpreter, it being the only time in his term of four years that he attempted anything of Prof. Paine's. Mr. Paur has done better than either, for he gave a masterly rendering last season of the Prelude from Prof. Paine's immortal "Oedipus" and again this season we hear another work of this greatest American composer.

If we regard the art in its highest classical form, then Prof. Paine is one of the most eminent composers that the world has produced. As a master in every form of music he belongs among the very few great composers now living. Brahms in Germany and Saint-Saens in France are the only living composers in the highest realms of musical art who are the peers of Prof. Paine, and were the latter a native of either of those countries he would today be world-famous as a great composer.

Since Schumann died no composer has approached in symphonic composition the melodic form, classical purity, romance and poetry combined, which Prof. Paine has shown in his two symphonies. These works stand upon the same plane as do the immortal compositions of Beethoven, Schumann and Schubert, and it should be the duty of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform each season one or both of these classic compositions to serve as a beacon to the aspiring students and ambitious composers among our countrymen in lighting their path towards that pinnacle of true art, which, if gained, much be reached through other means than that employed by the majority of this class of writers whose efforts rarely stimulate them beyond the struggles of unspontaneous and imitative slavery to what is termed the "modern school of composition."

Well, perhaps Prof. Paine's countrymen will awaken some day to a realization of the fact that America has produced one composer whose musical stature reaches into that upper air of genius, whose contrapuntal ability stands shoulder to shoulder with that of the immortal Bach, whose invention in thematic treatment has the nobility and spontaneity of Beethoven, whose science equals that of Brahms, without the latter's dryness; whose imagination has the romance of Schumann and whose skill in orchestral devices and instrumental coloring is that of the most modern school in its rational form. Indeed, a prophet is not without honor except in his own country, especially when that country is the United States of America.

Prof. Paine's charming symphonic poem, prompted in the expression of feelings by the "remembrance of summer days at the seaside, amid the varying moods of ocean life; the soothing calm and murmur of the sea, gentle breezes and rippling waves, alternating with surge and storm," displayed in its wealth of melodic beauty, its fascinating harmonics, its broad and flowing rhythms, its delightful episodes with opportunities for the English horn, clarinet, harp and French horn in solo passages, the masterly hand of the ripe musician and romantic composer. There was need of a greater refinement in the rendering than Mr. Paur accorded it, its varying moods requiring a more acute definition in the nuances. The wind instruments were too often coarse and loud, thereby submerging the "figure" work, [illegible] have been a mere breath in the accomplishment of which Mr. Paur totally failed. The audience received the piece with enthusiastic applause, and Prof. Paine went upon the stage in response to calls to bow his acknowledgments of his fellow-townsmen's enthusiasm.

The Beethoven symphony was played in Mr. Paur's best style, but that is deficient in delicacy and refinement and lacking in a happy graduation of dynamic power. I am convinced that it does not exist in the musical nature of Mr. Paur to conceive this necessity for a fine gradation of power, and as the classics must rely almost wholly for effect upon an acute delineation in dynamics and not whatever upon sentimental dispensation of the material contained therein, it is necessary that Mr. Paur's critical listeners must remain content with what is offered in this direction under his baton, for he cannot better it. The appreciative few will live in memory of the gratifying results experienced in this respect while the refined Gericke was with us.

The orchestra plays at times somewhat slovenly nowadays as if it did not heed the conductor or perhaps because of insufficient rehearsals. Inflexible discipline and absolute control are the only means whereby 80 players can be kept in perfect accord.

Mr. Schroeder played his numbers in that highly artistic and technically perfect manner that marks his efforts always. Mr. Schroeder is a 'cellist of high quality, and the audience applauded his efforts with tremendous enthusiasm, recalling him many times. The Liszt number that ended the concert was played superbly.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 10.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night, at Music Hall, the Symphony Orchestra gave its eighteenth concert, of which the following is the programme:

Overture, "Elegie," (first time) ..... R. Kahn
Fantastic Symphony ..... Berlioz
Andante from "Lenore," Symphony ..... Raff
Academic Overture ..... Brahms

This is not a particularly attractive programme, and it is somewhat puzzling to discover on what theory it was made out. It may be that the gross elements in our æsthetic nature are refined by a season of penitence, and that a bad programme, like a day of fasting, brings its own reward. But surely the remedy should have some relation to the disease, and as the wise physician will not amputate a finger for a hang-nail, so will not an experienced doctor of the emotions produce convulsions for the sake of curing a hiccough. If there be any art-lover who hungrily yearns for programme music, it would seem that the heroic dose of the Fantastic Symphony would more than satisfy any average craving; but to follow it with an excerpt from the Burger ballad set to music and to give on top of this hot, spicy food, a dose of the classicism of Brahms is not to chasten but to punish; is not to "purge the humors" but to bring about an emotional dyspepsia of the incurable kind. It is true that for two weeks we have been indulging in the flippancy of opera, and that some cruelty is necessary in driving us back to the classic roadway, but the punishment should have been tinctured with mercy.

Of course the Fantastic Symphony is always worth the hearing, and it is inspiriting to follow the life history of the young man with the "fixed idea;" the morbid youth who witnesses his own execution and follows his own funeral procession. At the same time it is curious to consider how long this work would have kept its popularity if it had not been accompanied by a descriptive programme; that is, how long it would have remained alive from its own inherent musical worth. It is undeniable that Berlioz did not invent programme music, but he made the capital mistake of making it too definite. Instrumental music of enduring worth is vague; Berlioz insists on giving all the details, while the immortals gave simply the general ideas, and allowed the hearers to work out the details according to the power and capacity of their imagination. The young man with the fixed idea is so minutely described that we discover at once that he belongs neither to the region of music nor to life; he is a lay figure, around which wonderful combinations of instrumental combinations revole; the log that holds a dazzling musical pin-wheel. Berlioz once made the attempt to describe by means of instrumental music the galloping of two black horses! This is realism with a vengeance, and the microbe of the same realism has entered into the life-blood of the Fantastic Symphony, as it has entered into other works of this master, with certain danger to their vitality. Originality is dearly purchased at this price, especially when the so-called originality is only a name for the love of novelty. Berlioz is the father of modern French realism, and the children or grandchildren of his Fantastic symphony have infected French art generally, with the result that real cows and real cannons add to the effect of modern French opera, and portraits of scantily dressed ballet girls, and headless, blood-besmirched soldiers adorn the walls at every exhibition of French paintings. Realism in art degrades, despite the rare technical skill shown in producing it, and the degradation with its accompanying vulgarity is plainly to be noted in the Fantastic Symphony. How many steps is it from Berlioz to Regnault, Zola and Verlaine?

The Kahn overture is a solid and well made little work, modern in spirit, and with the modern fashion of elaborating a small idea in the most ingenious manner. Why the overture is called an elegy is difficult to imagine, except on the theory of contraries; for science takes the place of sentiment, and noise that of feeling.

The programme for the nineteenth concert is Brahm's Symphony No. 3; Mendelssohn Concerto for Violin; Reinecke's Entr'acte "Gouverneur von Tours;" and Marschner's Overture, "Hans Heiling." Mr. Franz Kneisel is the soloist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 6, 1895.

The seventeenth Symphony concert does not call for extended comment. The orchestra played Foote's Francesca da Rimini, Paine's An Island Fantasy, Beethoven's Second Symphony and the Liszt-Doppler arrangement of the Second Hungarian Symphony. The pieces by the local composers were applauded loudly, and the composers were obliged to bow their acknowledgments. Mr. Schroeder played with orchestra Dvorák's Waldesruhe and Klengel's Capriccio, op. 8. He gave great pleasure by the sureness of his technic, his artistic simplicity and his sympathetic treatment.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 10, 1895.

Echoes From the Symphony Concert.

The attendance at yesterday's symphony concert was smaller than usual, probably because of the numerous other musical attractions of the week. It is noteworthy, however, that there is generally a decrease in the size of the audience when no soloist is announced to appear.

The program arranged by Mr Paur for last night's concert, the 18th of the season, consisted of four numbers as follows:

Overture, Elegy, in C minor (MS) ..... Robert Kahn
(First time.)
Fantastic symphony, No. 1, in C major, op 14a, ... Hector Berlios
Andante from symphony No. 5, in E major (Lenore), op 177 ..... Joachin Raff
Academic festival overture, in C minor, op 80, ... Johannes Brahms

The overture by Robert Kahn was played here for the first time. It is an interesting work, is rich in musical ideas, some of which are notable for their originality, and the entire composition is written in a scholarly manner. The orchestration is very elaborate, in certain passages almost too elaborate, but the effects attained are artistic and pleasing. The overture was played from manuscript, and given splendid interpretation.

Berlioz' wonderful and truly fantastic symphony was the feature of the concert. This weird composition has often been played here and always listened to with the utmost attention. The enthusiastic applause invariably bestowed upon its performance is the best of evidence that even a symphony audience derives more enjoyment from such bizarre orchestral effects than from the calm and scholarly compositions of the classical writers. Under Mr Paur's able direction the symphony was given a superb performande.

The andante from Raff's "Lenore" symphony was played with fine expression and the often heard Brahms "Festival Overture" was given a spirited performance.

The next concert will be given March 23, there being no concert this week. Mr Franz Kneisel will be the soloist, and the program will be as follows: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; concerto for violin, Mendelssohn; entr'acte, "Gouverneur von Tours," Reinecke; overture, "Hans Heiling," Marschner.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 69.

SUNDAY, MARCH 10, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Effective Interpretation of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony No. 1.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was:

Overture, "Elegy" in C minor (MS.) ..... (First time) Robert Kahn
Fantastic symphony No. 1 ..... Berlioz
Andante from "Lenore" symphony ..... Raff
Academic overture ..... Brahms

The Kahn overture is in the extreme modern school by a young composer who is coming to the front in Germany. It is well put together and presents no obstacle to an understanding of it on a first hearing. It is rich and varied in harmonies and instrumentation, and is unmistakably the work of one who has mastered the intricacies of modern musical technique, and who can use them with skill and effect. The overture is academically correct in every essential, but though it says what it has to say with power and knowledge it says nothing new, and can be awarded no higher rank than that of Kapellmeister music of praiseworthy quality. It was brilliantly played.

The Berlioz symphony has never received so effective, so dramatic and so deeply interesting an interpretation here as was accorded it by Mr. Paur last night. The reading was remarkable in its originality and in the many new and singularly effective points that were brought out by him, especially in the "Walpurgis Night's Dream," in which the diablerie was wonderfully emphasized. The reading was stirringly virile throughout, and the performance by the orchestra may rank foremost among its very best efforts of the season. Notably beautiful in its chaste, poetic sentiment was the rendering of the "Scene in the Fields." Each movement drew forth a spirited round of applause from the audience, and Mr. Paur was compelled to bow his acknowledgments frequently. There will be no rehearsal and concert this week.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; concerto for violin, Mendelssohn; entr'acte, "Gouverneur von Tours," Reinecke (first time); overture, "Hans Heiling," Marschner (which will be given for the first time at this concert). Mr. Franz Kneisel is to be the soloist.

[104]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 6, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Foote: Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 24.
Paine: Symphonic Poem, "An Island Fantasy," opus 45.
Dvorák: "Waldesruhe," Adagio for 'cello and orchestra, in D-flat major.
Klengel: Capriccio for 'cello and orchestra, in D minor, opus 8.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 36.
Liszt-Doppler: Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, in D minor.
Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the 'cellist.

This is, we believe, the second time Mr. Foote's "Francesca da Rimini" has been played here; it is the first time that we personally have heard it, as we were not in Boston at its first performance in 1891. After a careful study of the score and this one hearing, we should not hesitate to place it at the head of all Mr. Foote has yet written in the larger concert forms. What is in general strong in Mr. Foote's writing,—solid, rational harmony, flowing, natural part-writing, stoutness of musical structure, and coherency of development,—is to be found in this work in its best estate; and, added to these characteristics of the efficient musician, we find here a depth and poignancy of expression, a melodic forcibleness, and vigor of effect, toward which his previous orchestral works have steadily striven, but without such brilliant convincingness of achievement. The whole symphonic prologue is conceived and carried out on a high poetic plane, and at the same time with impeccable musical consistency. In the matter of instrumentation Mr. Foote has here taken a long stride forwards; the whole scheme of the scoring is as modern as possible, one might almost call it post-Wagnerian, reminding one in method, though not always in result, of Richard Strauss and the latest French masters of the art. And the effect is always admirable; the strings are treated with infinite skill, and where the composer finds himself forced to resort to his brass to give due prominence to a melodic phrase in strong passages, he does it so cleverly that the sum total of his orchestral tone has no unpleasant brassiness, and his use of the trumpets in cantilena is so skilfully veiled that it detracts nothing from the effectiveness of these instruments when he employs them in their traditional character as trumpets, in true trumpet passages. The prologue was admirably played and produced an exceedingly strong impression, Mr. Foote having to bow his acknowledgments of the applause from his hiding place in the corner of the first balcony.

Professor Paine's "Island Fantasy" makes a better and better impression, the more one hears it. It is a perfectly free work of musico-poetic fancy, unlike Mr. Foote's prologue, which, with all its freedom of development, adheres essentially to the sonata form; but its frank departure from traditional musical forms does not in the least impugn its coherency of development nor prevent its having a distinct and musically logical plastic form of its own. Professor Paine has here conceived the "Symphonic Poem" in what seems to us its truest and best estate: as a piece of music inspired, or suggested, by extra-musical ideas and experiences, but never seeking to follow out an extra-musical train of thought in any slavish way, nor to model its form upon conditions foreign to its own art. What of tone-painting there is in the work is purely ideal and suggestive, never descending to mere realistic imitation. The composer has been poetic and fanciful without for a moment allowing himself to be unmusical; more than this, one sees that the musical side of his work was from beginning to end the prominent one in his mind. The composition is full of beauty, force and grace. It was excellently played, though it seemed to us at times that the heavy brass in the orchestra played somewhat louder than the composer must have calculated on in his scoring. The work was very warmly received, and Professor Paine bowed from the stage in response to the applause.

Beethoven's second symphony is always a delight. To be sure, with all its immense and characteristically Beethovenish advance upon the first one in C, one can hardly understand Berlioz's closing his analysis of the first with "In a word, this is not Beethoven. We shall find him!" as if in the second symphony the true Beethoven was for the first time revealed. Save for a measure or two in the slow introduction to the first movement, and some developments in the second theme of the final rondo, this symphony in D has Beethoven's "first manner" stamped all over it, and in no wise suggests what Beethoven came to later in his career. It is far more like the first symphony than it is like the third. But it is full of the most wonderful genius for all that. It was admirably played and received in a manner to warm the cockles of the veriest classicist's heart; the Larghetto was all but encored.

Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody (No. 12 of the pianoforte series), scored for orchestra by himself and Franz Doppler, was splendidly played in a way to do full justice to its fantastic, fitful wildness, and yet duly emphasizing what coherence it has as a musical composition. Mr. Molé's flute cadenzas were jewels in their way.

Mr. Schroeder played the two little pieces by Dvorák and Klengel simply to perfection. The former piece is perhaps the most lovely and enchanting thing of its kind we have yet heard. The Klengel capriccio is deft and dainty in a somewhat more commonplace way, but is not without charm, besides being thoroughly well-written music. Mr. Schroeder's playing of it was very "canny" indeed; he wisely let the music make its own effect just up to near the close, where he put on an extra touch of effectiveness that simply carried everything before it. He was enthusiastically applauded.

The next programme is: Robert Kahn, overture, "Elégie," in C minor (first time); Berlioz, "Fantastic" symphony, No. 1, in C major, opus 14a; Brahms, academic festival overture in C minor, opus 80.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, MARCH 6.

WORKS OF LOCAL COMPOSERS.

JOHN K. PAINE AND ARTHUR FOOTE HEARD AT SYMPHONY.

The Former Undoubtedly the Greatest American Musician—"Rigoletto" and Sunday Evening Concert by the Operatic Artists.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini." ..... Foote
Symphonic Poem, "An Island Fantasy"..... Paine
Solos of Violoncellos:
a "Waldesruhe" ..... Dvorak
b Capriccio ..... Klengel
Symphony No. 2..... Beethoven
Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 2..... Liszt
Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist.

Mr. Arthur Foote's piece has been heard before in these concerts, in fact it was first brought out by this orchestra in January, 1891. One listens with gratification to the musicianlike manner in which Mr. Foote handles his material, which is at once melodic, elevated and original in its character. There is no striving for effects at the expense of legitimate art, no borrowed plumage from familiar costumers in orchestral decoration serving to cover the ill-shapen form beneath, but honest exposition of serious study upon classic models, enhanced through the imagination and individuality of the composer, its form displayed in the well-fitting and appropriate garments of chaste and artistic handiwork. This composition reflects credit upon its composer in every direction, and it would be well if some of his local contemporaries should emulate its just proportions. Mr. Foote was obliged to come forward and bow in acknowledgement of the hearty applause of the audience.

It is not at all creditable to the reputation of the conductors who have directed the affairs of our Symphony Orchestra that their want of discrimination has been the means of our hearing too seldom the works of Prof. John K. Paine. During the five years that Mr. Gericke was here he played but one of Prof. Paine's compositions, if my memory serves me correctly, and that was the symphonic poem hear Saturday night. Nikisch undertook a performance of Prof. Paine's "Spring" symphony with results discreditable to his ability as an interpreter, it being the only time in his term of four years that he attempted anything of Prof. Paine's. Mr. Paur has done better than either, for he gave a masterly rendering last season of the Prelude from Prof. Paine's immortal "Oedipus" and again this season we hear another work of this greatest American composer.

If we regard the art in its highest classical form, then Prof. Paine is one of the most eminent composers that the world has produced. As a master in every form of music he belongs among the very few great composers now living. Brahms in Germany and Saint-Saens in France are the only living composers in the highest realms of musical art who are the peers of Prof. Paine, and were the latter a native of either of those countries he would today be world-famous as a great composer.

Since Schumann died no composer has approached in symphonic composition the melodic form, classical purity, romance and poetry combined, which Prof. Paine has shown in his two symphonies. These works stand upon the same plane as do the immortal compositions of Beethoven, Schumann and Schubert, and it should be the duty of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform each season one or both of these classic compositions to serve as a beacon to the aspiring students and ambitious composers among our countrymen in lighting their path towards that pinnacle of true art, which, if gained, much be reached through other means than that employed by the majority of this class of writers whose efforts rarely stimulate them beyond the struggles of unspontaneous and imitative slavery to what is termed the "modern school of composition."

Well, perhaps Prof. Paine's countrymen will awaken some day to a realization of the fact that America has produced one composer whose musical stature reaches into that upper air of genius, whose contrapuntal ability stands shoulder to shoulder with that of the immortal Bach, whose invention in thematic treatment has the nobility and spontaneity of Beethoven, whose science equals that of Brahms, without the latter's dryness; whose imagination has the romance of Schumann and whose skill in orchestral devices and instrumental coloring is that of the most modern school in its rational form. Indeed, a prophet is not without honor except in his own country, especially when that country is the United States of America.

Prof. Paine's charming symphonic poem, prompted in the expression of feelings by the "remembrance of summer days at the seaside, amid the varying moods of ocean life; the soothing calm and murmur of the sea, gentle breezes and rippling waves, alternating with surge and storm," displayed in its wealth of melodic beauty, its fascinating harmonics, its broad and flowing rhythms, its delightful episodes with opportunities for the English horn, clarinet, harp and French horn in solo passages, the masterly hand of the ripe musician and romantic composer. There was need of a greater refinement in the rendering than Mr. Paur accorded it, its varying moods requiring a more acute definition in the nuances. The wind instruments were too often coarse and loud, thereby submerging the "figure" work of the strings. The ending of the poem should have been a mere breath, in the accomplishment of which Mr. Paur totally failed. The audience received the piece with enthusiastic applause, and Prof. Paine went upon the stage in response to calls to bow his acknowledgments of his fellow-townsmen's enthusiasm.

The Beethoven symphony was played in Mr. Paur's best style, but that is deficient in delicacy and refinement and lacking in a happy graduation of dynamic power. I am convinced that it does not exist in the musical nature of Mr. Paur to conceive this necessity for a fine gradation of power, and as the classics must rely almost wholly for effect upon an acute delineation in dynamics and not whatever upon sentimental dispensation of the material contained therein, it is necessary that Mr. Paur's critical listeners must remain content with what is offered in this direction under his baton, for he cannot better it. The appreciative few will live in memory of the gratifying results experienced in this respect while the refined Gericke was with us.

The orchestra plays at times somewhat slovenly nowadays as if it did not heed the conductor or perhaps because of insufficient rehearsals. Inflexible discipline and absolute control are the only means whereby 80 players can be kept in perfect accord.

Mr. Schroeder played his numbers in that highly artistic and technically perfect manner that marks his efforts always. Mr. Schroeder is a 'cellist of high quality, and the audience applauded his efforts with tremendous enthusiasm, recalling him many times. The Liszt number that ended the concert was played superbly.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 10.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night, at Music Hall, the Symphony Orchestra gave its eighteenth concert, of which the following is the programme:

Overture, "Elegie," (first time)..... R. Kahn
Fantastic Symphony..... Berlioz
Andante from "Lenore," Symphony..... Raff
Academic Overture..... Brahms

This is not a particularly attractive programme, and it is somewhat puzzling to discover on what theory it was made out. It may be that the gross elements in our æsthetic nature are refined by a season of penitence, and that a bad programme, like a day of fasting, brings its own reward. But surely the remedy should have some relation to the disease, and as the wise physician will not amputate a finger for a hang-nail, so will not an experienced doctor of the emotions produce convulsions for the sake of curing a hiccough. If there be any art-lover who hungrily yearns for programme music, it would seem that the heroic dose of the Fantastic Symphony would more than satisfy any average craving; but to follow it with an excerpt from the Burger ballad set to music and to give on top of this hot, spicy food, a dose of the classicism of Brahms is not to chasten but to punish; is not to "purge the humors" but to bring about an emotional dyspepsia of the incurable kind. It is true that for two weeks we have been indulging in the flippancy of opera, and that some cruelty is necessary in driving us back to the classic roadway, but the punishment should have been tinctured with mercy.

Of course the Fantastic Symphony is always worth the hearing, and it is inspiriting to follow the life history of the young man with the "fixed idea;" the morbid youth who witnesses his own execution and follows his own funeral procession. At the same time it is curious to consider how long this work would have kept its popularity if it had not been accompanied by a descriptive programme; that is, how long it would have remained alive from its own inherent musical worth. It is undeniable that Berlioz did not invent programme music, but he made the capital mistake of making it too definite. Instrumental music of enduring worth is vague; Berlioz insists on giving all the details, while the immortals gave simply the general ideas, and allowed the hearers to work out the details according to the power and capacity of their imagination. The young man with the fixed idea is so minutely described that we discover at once that he belongs neither to the region of music nor to life; he is a lay figure, around which wonderful combinations of instrumental combinations revole; the log that holds a dazzling musical pin-wheel. Berlioz once made the attempt to describe by means of instrumental music the galloping of two black horses! This is realism with a vengeance, and the microbe of the same realism has entered into the life-blood of the Fantastic Symphony, as it has entered into other works of this master, with certain danger to their vitality. Originality is dearly purchased at this price, especially when the so-colled originalty is only a name for the love of novelty. Berlioz is the father of modern French realism, and the children or grandchildren of his Fantastic symphony have infected French art generally, with the result that real cows and real cannons add to the effect of modern French opera, and portraits of scantily dressed ballet girls, and headless, blood-besmirched soldiers adorn the walls at every exhibition of French paintings. Realism in art degrades, despite the rare technical skill shown in producing it, and the degradation with its accompanying vulgarity is plainly to be noted in the Fantastic Symphony. How many steps is it from Berlioz to Regnault, Zola and Verlaine?

The Kahn overture is a solid and well made little work, modern in spirit, and with the modern fashion of elaborating a small idea in the most ingenious manner. Why the overture is called on elegy is difficult to imagine, except on the theory of contraries; for science takes the place of sentiment, and noise that of feeling.

The programme for the nineteenth concert is Brahm's Symphony No. 3; Mendelssohn Concerto for Violin; Reinecke's Entr'acte "Gouverneur von Tours;" and Marschner's Overture, "Hans Heiling." Mr. Franz Kneisel is the soloist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 6, 1895.

The seventeenth Symphony concert does not call for extended comment. The orchestra played Foote's Francesca da Rimini, Paine's An Island Fantasy, Beethoven's Second Symphony and the Liszt-Doppler arrangement of the Second Hungarian Symphony. The pieces by the local composers were applauded loudly, and the composers were obliged to bow their acknowledgments. Mr. Schroeder played with orchestra Dvorák's Waldesruhe and Klengel's Capriccio, op. 8. He gave great pleasure by the sureness of his technic, his artistic simplicity and his sympathetic treatment.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 10, 1895.

Echoes From the Symphony Concert.

The attendance at yesterday's symphony concert was smaller than usual, probably because of the numerous other musical attractions of the week. It is noteworthy, however, that there is generally a decrease in the size of the audience when no soloist is announced to appear.

The program arranged by Mr Paur for last night's concert, the 18th of the season, consisted of four numbers as follows:

Overture, Elegy, in C minor (MS) ..Robert Kahn
(First time.)
Fantastic smphony, No. 1, in C major, op 14a, Hector Berlioz
Andante from symphony No. 5, in E major (Lenore), op 177 ..... Joachin Raff
Academic festival overture, in C minor, op 80, Johannes Brahms

The overture by Robert Kahn was played here for the first time. It is an interesting work, is rich in musical ideas, some of which are notable for their originality, and the entire composition is written in a scholarly manner. The orchestration is very elaborate, in certain passages almost too elaborate, but the effects attained are artistic and pleasing. The overture was played from manuscript, and given splendid interpretation.

Berlioz' wonderful and truly fantastic symphony was the feature of the concert. This weird composition has often been played here and always listened to with the utmost attention. The enthusiastic applause invariably bestowed upon its performance is the best of evidence that even a symphony audience derives more enjoyment from such bizarre orchestral effects than from the calm and scholarly compositions of the classical writers. Under Mr Paur's able direction the symphony was given a superb performance.

The andante from Raff's "Lenore" symphony was played with fine expression and the often heard Brahms "Festival Overture" was given a spirited performance.

The next concert will be given March 23, there being no concert this week. Mr Franz Kneisel will be the soloist, and the program will be as follows: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; concerto for violin, Mendelssohn; entr'acte, "Gouverneur von Tours," Reinecke; overture, "Hans Heiling," Marschner.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 69.

SUNDAY, MARCH 10, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Effective Interpretation of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony No. 1.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was:

Overture, "Elegy" in C minor (MS.)..... (First time) Robert Kahn
Fantastic symphony No. 1..... Berlioz
Andante from "Lenore" symphony..... Raff
Academic overture..... Brahms

The Kahn overture is in the extreme modern school by a young composer who is coming to the front in Germany. It is well put together and presents no obstacle to an understanding of it on a first hearing. It is rich and varied in harmonies and instrumentation, and is unmistakably the work of one who has mastered the intricacies of modern musical technique, and who can use them with skill and effect. The overture is academically correct in every essential, but though it says what it has to say with power and knowledge it says nothing new, and can be awarded no higher rank than that of Kapellmeister music of praiseworthy quality. It was brilliantly played.

The Berlioz symphony has never received so effective, so dramatic and so deeply interesting an interpretation here as was accorded it by Mr. Paur last night. The reading was remarkable in its originality and in the many new and singularly effective points that were brought out by him, especially in the "Walpurgis Night's Dream," in which the diablerie was wonderfully emphasized. The reading was stirringly virile throughout, and the performance by the orchestra may rank foremost among its very best efforts of the season. Notably beautiful in its chaste, poetic sentiment was the rendering of the "Scene in the Fields." Each movement drew forth a spirited round of applause from the audience, and Mr. Paur was compelled to bow his acknowledgments frequently. There will be no rehearsal and concert this week.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; concerto for violin, Mendelssohn; entr'acte, "Gouverneur von Tours," Reinecke (first time); overture, "Hans Heiling," Marschner (which will be given for the first time at this concert). Mr. Franz Kneisel is to be the soloist.

[104]

[illegible] Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 10, 1[illegible]

The programme of the 18th Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Overture, "Elegie," in C minor, (MS), (first time).....Robert Kahn
Symphony Fantastique.....Berlioz
Andante, from Symphony No. 5, "Lenore".....Raff
Liebesglueck: Andante quasi Larghetto.....Raff
Academische Fest-Ouverture.....Brahms

Robert Kahn was born in Mannheim July 1865. The program-book states that he studied composition under Brahms. Kahn studied under Vio: Lachner, Kiel and Heinberger. His works, string quartet, piano quartet, trio, songs for choruses of female voices, are well spoken of. The overture played last night is eminently respectable music. It is the work of a man who has studied and knows his trade. It seems, however, to be without marked originality of invention or treatment.

Mr. Paur gave a careful reading of the colossal work of Berlioz. Consider the time this symphony was written, as well as the contemporary instrumentation, and it is no wonder that it made a sensation, or that Schumann spent much labor in his celebrated analysis. Even now, when many young composers try to begin where Berlioz left off, certain effects seem new and extraordinary. Yet there is much that is dull, and certain passages that are positively offensive. The first movement is not an unmixed delight, and does not the ball-music seem tarnished? Yet the "Scene in the Fields" is still of wondrous beauty, and the "March to the Scaffold" is a masterpiece of musical nightmare. With the exception of the burlesquing of the "Fixed Idea," the last movement seemed last night tiresome in the deliberate attempt to be demoniacally grotesque. There is such straining, there is such brutality without any real effect. The "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saens is a far higher flight of imagination, and how comparatively simple are the means employed in producing the sensation of that which is diabolical. Or, if it is a question of shudder, mark how Verdi creates an atmosphere of indescribable terror at the beginning of the last act of "Otello."

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert of last night was of rather a weird character considered in its entirety, and for which the Berlioz fantastic symphony, No. 1, was largely responsible.

The overture, "Elegy," in C minor, by Robert Kahn, was heard here for the first time and made a favorable impression. The overture begins with a slow introduction, in which the horns are ingeniously and effectively made use of. A pretty theme runs through it, which is elaborately developed and gradually worked up to a strong climax, which is very effective.

The fantastic symphony, already referred to, is in five movements and occupies an entire hour in its rendering, and as an example of weird, wild and fantastic orchestration it should be given first rank. From beginning to end it is thoroughly descriptive and the composer has certainly here produced a masterly tone picture. The second movement descriptive of a ball has a strong flavor of Strauss, while the third is thoroughly pastoral and offers a strong contrast to the two movements which follow, describing the march to the scaffold and the Walpurgis-night's dream. Some exception might here be taken to the thunder effects by the kettledrums and also to the C bass-tuba in the last movement, which was offensively out of tune and in marked contrast to the G bell, which rang out "clear as a bell."

The other numbers on the programme were the andante from Raff's "Lenore" symphony and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. There will be no concert next week, but at that of the week following the soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1895.

The Sixteenth Symphony Concert was scantily patronized by the irregulars, partly because it was on an unusual day, Thursday, and partly because it had no soloist; but all the same it was one of the most enjoyable of the season, with a brisk charm about it, leading off with Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 6, in G minor, for strings only.

Then came that perennially beautiful E-flat, or Flute Symphony, by Haydn, the ninth of the Salomon series, exquisitely played. In happy contrast were the two overtures, Mozart's Seraglio Elopement and Beethoven's Egmont, and then the traps filed into their places for Wagner's bangup Centennial March.

The last Kneisel Quartet Concert will take place at Wissner Hall, Saturday afternoon, March 16th. Mme. Julie Rive-King, who is to be the pianist of the occasion, has not appeared in Brooklyn since 1883, when she played with the Brooklyn Philharmonic, under the direction of Theodore Thomas. The program is as follows: I. Cherubini, Quartet in D major; II. Beethoven, Quartet in E minor, op. 59, No. 2; III. Schumann, Piano Quintet in E flat major; Piano, Mme Julie Rive-King.

[105]

Freitag, 8. [illegible] 1895.

Das berühmte [illegible] Symphonie Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Georg Paur giebt am nächsten Montag Abend das fünfte und letzte Symphonie Konzert in dieser Saison. Als Solist wirkt hier der Violoncellist Alwin Schröder mit. Das Programm umfaßt Symphonie Fantastique von Berlioz und die berühmte Ungarische Rhapsodie No. 2 von Liszt, sowie Kompositionen für Cello. Tickets sind bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, MARCH 11.

ROBERT KAHN'S COMPOSITION GIVEN AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme offered was as follows:

Overture, "Elegy," in C minor (MS.).....Robert Kahn
Symphony Fantastique.....Berlioz
Andante from Symphony No. 5, "Leonora."....Raff
Academic Festival Overture.....Brahms

Robert Kahn's overture was played for the first time at these concerts. Its composer is a young German musician, whose associations musically must have been of the best, and whose studies have been pursued upon a good foundation. Although unknown in this country, he has acquired considerable reputation in Germany, principally through his chamber music, which is said to be admirable in quality and legitimate in character. This can be easily believed after hearing the overture Saturday evening, for it is the work of one with ideas worthy of treatment, and with knowledge and invention sufficient to work out his conception. The instrumentation is also to be praised for its rational employment of the means offered in the modern school of orchestration. If this work does not present startling attempts, it is, nevertheless, entirely above the class of composition described as kapellmeister music, and it is easy to understand why the classic musicians of Germany should be so interested in its composer. It was splendidly played by the orchestra under Mr. Paur's baton, whose intelligent reading of the score served in displaying its value in a favorable light.

Mr. Paur is also to be praised for the excellent manner in which he brought out the varied characteristics of Berlioz's long and extremely difficult work. Of course it gets dull at times, but on the whole it is worthy the attention of the symphonic conductor in the arranging of his programmes, and is of interest to the listener and the student when so admirably read and played as it was on this occasion. The Andante of Raff was a most agreeable selection, and Mr. Paur is to be commended for his independence in presenting one movement from a symphony, a matter of good judgment that should be exercised in future programmes. The playing of this selection and of the Brahms overture was in the orchestra's best style. There will be no concert next Saturday evening.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1895.

The eighteenth Symphony programme included no solo number and was disposed thus: First, an unpublished "Elegiac" overture by Robert Kahn, a young German writer whose music is said to have found favor in Berlin and Leipsig and to have obtained the support of no less a man than Joachim. This overture, which was discreetly played, is a pleasant composition, not particularly original and certainly not impressive, but clearly stated and nicely put together. It is of course set chiefly in the minor mode, with sweet plaintive melodies and swelling states of ascending emotions. One can feel reasonably sure that the departed whom it commemorates caused no poignant sorrow in vanishing, but rather left a comfortable hope of a serene hereafter, for the melancholy is all mild, the emotion controlled and the consolation ready and waiting. As giving a taste of the quality of a composer who may become eminent, this overture was acceptable; but as a piece of music among others, it had no special call to be chosen. Second came the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz, to the requirements of whose score Mr. Paur was faithful, providing all the luxury of kettle-drums and drummers, the profuse ponderosity of extra brasses and basses, the clangorous bells, the strident little clarinet, the rumbled bass-drum, the pastoral echoes, and all the rest of it. The performance was also faithful, even to the romantic quality of the symphony; for some how or other the most German of our German conductors always seem to be impressed into rendering to Berlioz that ungrudging and unreserving service which they will grant to almost no other Frenchmen. Something more of elasticity and lingering sweep would have bettered the ball scene; but the Ranz des Vaches episodes, the March to the Scaffold and the Walpurgis Night were in their turns what their scheme would have them—simply sweet and pathetic, gloomily and warningly imperious, and weirdly and violently wild and eccentric. After the excitement and turmoil of the latter parts of the symphony, something calmative and balmy was needed, and so Mr. Paur put in the andante from Raff's "Lenore" symphony, and ended his rather long concert with Brahms's sturdy and humorously touched "Academic" overture.

This week will be the vacant one, but next week will come the nineteenth concert with Brahms's third symphony, Mendelssohn's violin concerto, to be played by Mr. Kneisel, and two new things—Reinecke's Entr' acte from his "Governor of Tours;" and Marschner's "Hans Heiling" overture.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 11, 1895.

The Symphony Concert.

One is always sure of one's programme at the symphony concerts; it is never,—"Owing to the sudden indisposition of the first contrabass the management are obliged to substitute the 'Tabasco March' for Beethoven's Fifth Symphony," and nowadays one is reasonably certain of an assortment of schools of composition upon the programme also. Robert Kahn is in some sort a descendant of Beethoven, for Beethoven begat Brahms, and Brahms begat Kahn. Therefore it was futile to expect much apice in Kahn's Elegie Overture, given for the first time at the concert on Saturday, and it was natural to expect shapeliness and logical development. Such expectations, both negative and positive, were fulfilled in the hearing, and the parties who came direct from the opera season, after seeing Manon, Juliet, Romeo, Valentine, Raoul and Carmen die (there is great mortality in grand opera) were quite ready for a touch of elegiac music. There was an abundance of dissonance in the introduction, but the themes of the body of the overture were clear and well-treated. The coda was an especially effective touch, being a broad and beautiful culmination of thematic material that had gone before.

Now followed Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," one of the greatest tests of the equipment and ensemble of an orchestra. It received a performance that redounded to the credit of our conductor and of the orchestra. This is the most vast, most realistic, and most minute piece of "programme-music" in existence, and it was in excellent taste to give the opinions pro and con, regarding the legitimacy of this kind of music, in the programme-book, so that the audience might not be led astray by the direct character of the symphony. The romantic fact that this symphony was in a measure a love-letter to Harriet Smithson certainly does not detract from its popular effect.

The first movement is comparatively simple in its scoring, and was played with surety, although its dreaminess and vagueness was somewhat rigid and deliberate. The division of violins towards the close was splendidly effective in its performance. The waltz of the second movement was given with clearness, but once more the caprice seemed rather formal, although the working up of the end was wonderfully well done. The waltz almost never appears as a symphonic movement, although it is the child of the minuet and the latter has a legitimate place in the classical cycle forms, yet here it seems entirely in place and presents a most graceful picture. Of course one is contented to find makeshifts in a Berlioz score, and two harps were not to be expected, spite of the composer's request. Mr. Schuecker, however, did excellently on one.

The next movement (in which an unfortunate oboe is struck by lightning) is too long, spite of its glow of tone-color and its many pastoral effects. The English horn was beautifully played in this, and so was the oboe. The kettle-drummer deserves great praise for he did the work of two performers, and his graphic touches added much to the picture. There is too much of long-winded ecstasy in this movement but its beautiful ending makes ample amends for prolixity, and Mr. Mueller deserves especial mention for the manner in which those sad English horn phrases were delivered. A duet between English horn and drum is not an everyday occurrence in music, and this is one of the fine points of the symphony.

But it is the last two movements on which the greatness of the Symphonie Fantastique chiefly rests, and these two movements were given with greater effect and a more intelligible style than ever before in Boston. Never has the wonderful bassoon passage been so well performed here, and the strange pizzicati of contra-basses (Berlioz was the inventor of harmonies given thus) and the impressive rhythm of cymbals and bass drum made the "March to Execution" one to be long remembered. Among the Ionians in ancient Greece an awe-inspiring march was played upon the tibia as culprits were marched to execution, and one cannot help wondering whether Berlioz had read of this and made the awful bassoon mutterings as a modern reflection of it, as one cannot help comparing these dreadful footsteps on bassoons with the footsteps of the French mob, which Dickens so graphically and poetically describes in "The Tale of Two Cities." It may sound ludicrous to speak of the beheading of a clarinette by a bass-drum, but this is one of the most graphic pictures ever presented in music, a picture for the ear as definite as any ever given to the eye. And it was performed in a manner to make one become excited in the use of adjectives in the description. The muted horns gave their baleful tones with just the right power, and the final catastrophe was most vivid. What a supreme moment it is as one hears the clarinette alone, giving the love-theme, the criminal awaiting the fall of the axe, his thought not upon his fate but upon his love! then the final stroke, a fearful quarter-note by full orchestra, a moment's pause and then perhaps too dire a picture of a quivering corpse. Decidedly Berlioz's tonepainting is to be classed with those pictures of torture, pain, and death in which the old Spanish painters used to revel. Now comes a picture of Hades with the thermometer at 700 in the shade. To tell the history of Berlioz's degradation of his own tender love-theme would be an ungrateful task and show forth the meaner side of his nature, a nature which was not grand in even its best aspect, but the ribald tune is a strong, if sensational, touch, and introduces a new instrument to the orchestra—the E flat clarinette, so copiously used in military band. Generally, composers have found the piccolo sufficiently impish to picture satanic effects, but Berlioz piles Ossa on Pelion and adds the E-flat clarinette squealings to the shrieks of the other instrument. Right wildly was this theme squirted into the seething mess, with just the proper vulgarization of its character. Then came that parody of the "Dies Irae," which Berlioz may have borrowed from the wicked "Mass of Fools" of mediæval times. The bells were out of tune, and somewhat marred the effect. There are many expedients used for bells in music, Berlioz himself inventing the best in a combination of harp and horn. The composer in this instance permits the use of two pianos for the effect, where bells are not obtainable, and the gong has been used in Boston in this passage, also. On this occasion the instrument seemed to be the new tubular bells which certainly would have been just the proper thing for the work, had they been in tune. This kind of bell must eventually come into use in "Parsifal" where the bell-figure is so important. The odd "Frappée" effect on the violins was very clearly done. This effect, sometimes marked "Col' Legno," is made very simply by striking the violin-strings with the back of the bow. Every theme in this movement, and there are mighty difficult passages in it, was clear and recognizable, and the execution was one that ought to set all doubts about the status of our orchestra at rest and win recognition for the careful work of Mr. Paur. It was appreciated to some extent, for the conductor was obliged to bow many times to the applause which followed the movements. It might not be amiss to play the last two movements again at some concert in the immediate future, for such scoring needs more than one hearing, and many auditors may have been tired by an opera season that presented much for study and caused some musical indigestion.

A gentle movement from the Lenore Symphony poured oil upon the troubled waters. The horn did some fine work in this. The movement was the right thing in the wrong place, it was Wordsworth after Poe. With the jolly "Academic Overture" the concert ended. Brahms has not the element of humor in a large degree, and could not have invented the Student's songs on which this overture is founded; but he has the gift of developing a theme magnificently, and this was called upon to good purpose in the work. Fancy setting "Upidee" in classical form! Yet "Was Kommt dort von der Hoeh" is not a bit more elevated in style, and forms one of the best touches of the work. The overture was played in proper, rollicking style, and with it this concert of many moods came to an end.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MONDAY, MARCH 11, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Robert Kahn: Overture, "Elégie," in C minor (MS.). (First time.)
Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique, No. 1, in C major, opus 14a.
Raff: Andante quasi Larghetto from Symphony No. 5, in E major, "Lenore," opus 177.
Brahms: Akademische Fest-Ouvertüre, in C minor, opus 80.

The new Kahn overture seems plainly a work out of the common run. Robert Kahn is a young man, a pupil of Brahms in composition, and it is reported that the path to publicity, if not to fame, has been made exceptionally easy for him: it is said that he has had the rare luck to have almost everything he has written performed under the most distinguished auspices. We have had the opportunity of studying the score of this overture of his, and have heard one performance of it; it seems to us decidedly the finest piece of work we have heard from a young and little-known composer for many years. In form and development it is clarity itself; not that it adheres—either slavishly or otherwise — to the fixed, traditional overture form, for the way the composer has taken a theme from the slow introduction and woven it into the main body of the work is to be recognized as an element, if not exactly of novelty, yet of unacademic fancy; but that the overture has a stoutly consistent and easily apprehensible plastic form of its own, and its development is so clear and lucid that the listener is never left in doubt for a moment as to what the composer means to say. Added to this, the work shows inventiveness of no common order: not merely that primary melodic inventiveness in virtue of which a composer creates beautiful and pregnant thematic matter, but that more sustained inventive power which gives him wealth of resource in making the most of his material. To be sure, one finds little if any originality in the work; it sounds tout de reflet et de reverbère, if you will; one finds hints at Brahms in every other measure. But this is entirely normal and to be expected: Kahn is still young and in his first manner, and the first manner of almost every composer is that of his teacher or model; a composer's individuality crops out, as a rule, only in his second. And just here, by the way, the thought presents itself to us: if a young composer's first manner begins with Brahms, what incalculable phases may not his third manner assume? One point in the overture, however, leaves us considerably in doubt, and this is the instrumentation. The work often makes the impression of being badly scored; many passages sound thin and ragged, there are times when for a moment or two the very bottom seems to drop out of the orchestra, others when the trombones and tuba seem de trop and say nothing. But we are by no means sure that this is always the composer's fault; we remember well enough when a good deal of Brahms sounded in much the same way. The trouble may have been largely in the performance, and may be curable by more and more careful rehearsing, of the sort that has long been recognized as necessary to make many a standard composition sound well and show the composer's idea in its true light.

Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony was given, as it seemed to us, almost as well as it was last year; and this is saying a good deal. Mr. Paur's reading of the work is admirable at every point; Berlioz could not find a more sympathetic interpreter. Only it seemed to us on Saturday evening that some passages were played with less perfection of finish than marked last year's performance. The new bells made a fine effect in the burlesque of the Dies irae in the last movement, saving that they carried realism to the point of sounding not quite in tune: but, then, who ever heard a bell sound in tune? Every time we hear this wonderful symphony we are impressed anew with what an astounding master of orchestration Berlioz was. Remember that in this work he was still hampered by writing for plain horns and trumpets; even in the "Marche au Supplice" he gives the indication that the horns shall be "ordinaires ou à cylindres," showing that, though he might prefer to have valve-horns for this movement, he had written the parts so that they could be played on the old plain instruments. No doubt, new and surpassingly beautiful orchestral effects have been discovered since Berlioz's day: Wagner, Richard Strauss, and not a few of his own countrymen have gone beyond him in some respects; but what strikes us in Berlioz more forcibly than in any of the great masters of orchestration who have come after him is his wonderful sense for the exact relation of means to effect: with all his apparently lavish employment of orchestral means, there is never anything superfluous in his score; he never seems to use an instrument simply because he has it at hand, but only when he absolutely needs it. No composer ever treated orchestral means with a finer economy; when he has, so to speak, to put his hand in his pocket and bring out a second tuba, for instance, it is absolutely because he cannot do without one; and so soon as he no longer needs it, he lets it count rests. Then the wonderful clearness of his scoring: it is as clear and transparent as Haydn's or Mozart's!

It was a curious effect, that of hearing the slow music from the "Lenore" symphony immediately after Berlioz's "Fantastic." In one way it seemed like a return to sanity after what Heine once called der frechste Wahnsinn (the most impudent insanity);" but in another way it seemed terribly like leaving the company of a distinguished maniac of real genius for that of a most inveterate bourgeois. Indeed Raff, with all his high qualities, had a strong bourgeois streak in him; and in saying this we use the term in its most invidious sense. To be sure it is hardly fair to judge of a symphonic movement out of its true frame; but the "Lenore" symphony is old enough by this time to be spoken of without weighing every syllable, and the impression made by this movement from it, coming right after Berlioz's work, was distinct enough to be worth noting: with all its melodious beauty the movement sounded absolutely d'un épicier!"

Brahms's Academic Overture seems to us more and more delightful, the oftener we hear it. What an admirable use the man has made of his homely material! And note here that "homely" does not in the least mean "bourgeois." How he has welded all those scraps of students' songs together, so that the joints do not show! And what true geniality and joviality there is in it all! The genial joviality and high animal spirits of a serious [illegible] now to desipere in loco—which [illegible] "dissipate in low company." [illegible] played with immense [illegible] times rather coarsely; the [illegible] not quite up to Mr. Paur's [illegible] last year, when the overture [illegible] the whole audience to its feet, and [illegible] ed as if Brahms had been Wagner.

The next programme is: [illegible] No. 3, in F major, opus 90; Mendelssohn concerto for violin, in E minor, opus 64; Reinecke entr'acte from "Der Gouvernaur von Tours" (first time); Marschner, overture to "Hans Heiling." Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist. The rehearsal and concert come [illegible]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 10, 1895.

The program of the 18th Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Overture, "Elegie," in C minor, (MS), (first time).....Robert Kahn
Symphony Fantastique.....Berlioz
Andante, from Symphony No. 5, "Lenore"....Raff
H. Liebesglueck: Andante quasi Larghetto.... Raff
Akademische Fest-Ouverture.....Brahms

Robert Kahn was born in Mannheim July 21, 1865. The program-book states that he studied composition under Brahms. Kahn studied under Vin: Lachner, Kiel and Rheinberger. His works, string quartet, piano quartet, trio, songs for choruses of female voices, are well spoken of. The overture played last night is eminently respectable music. It is the work of a man who has studied and knows his trade. It seems, however, to be without marked originality of invention or treatment.

Mr. Paur gave a careful reading of the colossal work of Berlioz. Consider the time this symphony was written, as well as the contemporary instrumentation, and it is no wonder that it made a sensation, or that Schumann spent much labor in his celebrated analysis. Even now, when many young composers try to begin where Berlioz left off, certain effects seem new and extraordinary. Yet there is much that is dull, and certain passages that are positively offensive. The first movement is not an unmixed delight, and does not the ball-music seem tarnished? Yet the "Scene in the Fields" is still of wondrous beauty, and the "March to the Scaffold" is a masterpiece of musical nightmare. With the exception of the burlesquing of the "Fixed Idea," the last movement seemed last night tiresome in the deliberate attempt to be demoniacally grotesque. There is such straining, there is such brutality without any real effect. The "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saens is a far higher flight of imagination, and how comparatively simple are the means employed in producing the sensation of that which is diabolical. Or, if it is a question of shudder, mark how Verdi creates an atmosphere of indescribable terror at the beginning of the last act of "Otello."

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert of last night was of rather a weird character considered, in its entirety, and for which the Berlioz fantastic symphony, No. 1, was largely responsible.

The overture, "Elegy," in C minor, by Robert Kahn, was heard here for the first time and made a favorable impression. The overture begins with a slow introduction, in which the horns are ingeniously and effectively made use of. A pretty theme runs through it, which is elaborately developed and gradually worked up to a strong climax, which is very effective.

The fantastic symphony, already referred to, is in five movements and occupies an entire hour in its rendering, and as an example of weird, wild and fantastic orchestration it should be given first rank. From beginning to end it is thoroughly descriptive and the composer has certainly here produced a masterly tone picture. The second movement descriptive of a ball has a strong flavor of Strauss, while the third is thoroughly pastoral and offers a strong contrast to the two movements which follow, describing the march to the scaffold and the walpurgis-night's dream. Some exception might here be taken to the thunder effects by the kettledrums and also to the C bass-tuba in the last movement, which was offensively out of tune and in marked contrast to the G bell, which rang out "clear as a bell."

The other numbers on the programme were the andante from Raff's "Lenore" symphony and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. There will be no concert next week, but at that of the week following the soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1895.

The Sixteenth Symphony Concert was scantily patronized by the irregulars, partly because it was on an unusual day, Thursday, and partly because it had no soloist; but all the same it was one of the most enjoyable of the season, with a brisk charm about it, leading off with Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 6, in G minor, for strings only.

Then came that perennially beautiful E-flat, or Flute Symphony, by Haydn, the ninth of the Salomon series, exquisitely played. In happy contrast were the two overtures, Mozart's Seraglio Elopement and Beethoven's Egmont, and then the traps filed into their places for Wagner's bangup Centennial March.

The last Kneisel Quartet Concert will take place at Wissner Hall, Saturday afternoon, March 16th. Mme. Julie Rive-King, who is to be the pianist of the occasion, has not appeared in Brooklyn since 1883, when she played with the Brooklyn Philharmonic, under the direction of Theodore Thomas. The program is as follows: I. Cherubini, Quartet in D major; II. Beethoven, Quartet in E minor, op. 59, No. 2; III. Schumann, Piano Quintet in E flat major; Piano, Mme. Julie Rive-King.

[105]

Philadelphia [illegible]-Post.

Freitag, 8. März 1895.

Das berühmte Boston Symphonie Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur gieb am nächsten Montag Abend das fünfte und letzte Symphonie Konzert in dieser Saison. Als Solist wirkt der der Violoncellist Alwin Schröder mit. Das Programm umfaßt Symphonie Fantastique von Berlioz und die berühmte Ungarische Rhapsodie No. 2 von Liszt, sowie Kompositionen für Cello. Tickets sind bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, MARCH 11.

ROBERT KAHN'S COMPOSITION GIVEN AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme offered was as follows:

Overture, "Elegy," in C minor (MS.).....Robert Kahn
Symphony Fantastique.....Berlioz
Andante from Symphony No. 5, "Leonora."....Raff
Academic Festival Overture.....Brahms

Robert Kahn's overture was played for the first time at these concerts. Its composer is a young German musician, whose associations musically must have been of the best, and whose studies have been pursued upon a good foundation. Although unknown in this country, he has acquired considerable reputation in Germany, principally through his chamber music, which is said to be admirable in quality and legitimate in character. This can be easily believed after hearing the overture Saturday evening, for it is the work of one with ideas worthy of treatment, and with knowledge and invention sufficient to work out his conception. The instrumentation is also to be praised for its rational employment of the means offered in the modern school of orchestration. If this work does not present startling attempts, it is, nevertheless, entirely above the class of composition described as kapellmeister music, and it is easy to understand why the classic musicians of Germany should be so interested in its composer. It was splendidly played by the orchestra under Mr. Paur's baton, whose intelligent reading of the score served in displaying its value in a favorable light.

Mr. Paur is also to be praised for the excellent manner in which he brought out the varied characteristics of Berlioz's long and extremely difficult work. Of course it gets dull at times, but on the whole it is worthy the attention of the symphonic conductor in the arranging of his programmes, and is of interest to the listener and the student when so admirably read and played as it was on this occasion. The Andante of Raff was a most agreeable selection, and Mr. Paur is to be commended for his independence in presenting one movement from a symphony, a matter of good judgment that should be exercised in future programmes. The playing of this selection and of the Brahms overture was in the orchestra's best style. There will be no concert next Saturday evening.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1895.

The eighteenth Symphony programme included no solo number and was disposed thus: First, an unpublished "Elegiac" overture by Robert Kahn, a young German writer whose music is said to have found favor in Berlin and Leipsig and to have obtained the support of no less a man than Joachim. This overture, which was discreetly played, is a pleasant composition, not particularly original and certainly not impressive, but clearly stated and nicely put together. It is of course set chiefly in the minor mode, with sweet plaintive melodies and swelling states of ascending emotions. One can feel reasonably sure that the departed whom it commemorates caused no poignant sorrow in vanishing, but rather left a comfortable hope of a serene hereafter, for the m 'ancholy is all mild, the emotion controlled and the consolation ready and waiting. As giving a taste of the quality of a composer who may become eminent, this overture was acceptable; but as a piece of music among others, it had no special call to be chosen. Second came the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz, to the requirements of whose score Mr. Paur was faithful, providing all the luxury of kettle-drums and drummers, the profuse ponderosity of extra brasses and basse., the clangorous bells, the strident little clarinet, the rumbled bass-drum, the pastoral echoes, and all the rest of it. The performance was also faithful, even to the romantic quality of the symphony; for some how or other the most German of our German conductors always seem to be impressed into rendering to Berlioz that ungrudging and unreserving service which they will grant to almost no other Frenchmen. Something more of elasticity and lingering sweep would have bettered the ball scene; but the Ranz des Vaches episodes, the March to the Scaffold and the Walpurgis Night were in their turns what their scheme would have them—simply sweet and pathetic, gloomily and warningly imperious, and weirdly and v olently wild and eccentric. After the excitement and turmoil of the latter parts of the symphony, something calmative and balmy was needed, and so Mr. Paur put in the andante from Raff's "Lenore" symphony, and ended his rather long concert with Brahms's sturdy and humorously touched "Academic" overture.

This week will be the vacant one, but next week will come the nineteenth concert with Brahms's third symphony, Mendelssohn's violin concerto, to be played by Mr. Kneisel, and two new things—Reinecke's 'Entr' acte from his "Governor of Tours;" and Marschner's "Hans Heiling" overture.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 11, 1895.

The Symphony Concert.

One is always sure of one's programme at the symphony concerts; it is never,—"Owing to the sudden indisposition of the first contra-bass the management are obliged to substitute the 'Tabasco March' for Beethoven's Fifth Symphony," and nowadays one is reasonably certain of an assortment of schools of composition upon the programme also. Robert Kahn is in some sort a descendant of Beethoven, for Beethoven begat Brahms, and Brahms begat Kahn. Therefore it was futile to expect much spice in Kahn's Elegie Overture, given for the first time at the concert on Saturday, and it was natural to expect shapeliness and logical development. Such expectations, both negative and positive, were fulfilled in the hearing, and the parties who came direct from the opera season, after seeing Manon, Juliet, Romeo, Valentine, Raoul and Carmen die (there is great mortality in grand opera) were quite ready for a touch of elegiac music. There was an abundance of dissonance in the introduction, but the themes of the body of the overture were clear and well-treated. The coda was an especially effective touch, being a broad and beautiful culmination of thematic material that had gone before.

Now followed Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," one of the greatest tests of the equipment and ensemble of an orchestra. It received a performance that redounded to the credit of our conductor and of the orchestra. This is the most vast, most realistic, and most minute piece of "programme-music" in existence, and it was in excellent taste to give the opinions pro and con, regarding the legitimacy of this kind of music, in the programme-book, so that the audience might not be led astray by the direct character of the symphony. The romantic fact that this symphony was in a measure a love-letter to Harriet Smithson certainly does not detract from its popular effect.

The first movement is comparatively simple in its scoring, and was played with surety, although its dreaminess and vagueness was somewhat rigid and deliberate. The division of violins towards the close was splendidly effective in its performance. The waltz of the second movement was given with clearness, but once more the caprice seemed rather formal, although the working up of the end was wonderfully well done. The waltz almost never appears as a symphonic movement, although it is the child of the minuet and the latter has a legitimate place in the classical cycle forms, yet here it seems entirely in place and presents a most graceful picture. Of course one is contented to find makeshifts in a Berlioz score, and two harps were not to be expected, spite of the composer's request. Mr. Schuecker, however, did excellently on one.

The next movement (in which an unfortunate oboe is struck by lightning) is too long, spite of its glow of tone-color and its many pastoral effects. The English horn was beautifully played in this, and so was the oboe. The kettle-drummer deserves great praise for he did the work of two performers, and his graphic touches added much to the picture. There is too much of long-winded ecstasy in this movement but its beautiful ending makes ample amends for prolixity, and Mr. Mueller deserves especial mention for the manner in which those sad English horn phrases were delivered. A duet between English horn and drum is not an everyday occurrence in music, and this is one of the fine points of the symphony.

But it is the last two movements on which the greatness of the Symphonie Fantastique chiefly rests, and these two movements were given with greater effect and a more intelligible style than ever before in Boston. Never has the wonderful bassoon passage been so well performed here, and the strange pizzicati of contra-basses (Berlioz was the inventor of harmonies given thus) and the impressive rhythm of cymbals and bass drum made the "March to Execution" one to be long remembered. Among the Ionians in ancient Greece an awe-inspiring march was played upon the tibia as culprits were marched to execution, and one cannot help wondering whether Berlioz had read of this and made the awful bassoon mutterings as a modern reflection of it, as one cannot help comparing these dreadful footsteps on bassoons with the footsteps of the French mob, which Dickens so graphically and poetically describes in "The Tale of Two Cities." It may sound ludicrous to speak of the beheading of a clarinette by a bass-drum, but this is one of the most graphic pictures ever presented in music, a picture for the ear as definite as any ever given to the eye. And it was performed in a manner to make one become excited in the use of adjectives in the description. The muted orns gave their baleful tones with just the right power, and the final catastrophe was most vivid. What a supreme moment it is as one hears the clarinette alone, giving the love-theme, the criminal awaiting the fall of the axe, his thought not upon his fate but upon his love! then the final stroke, a fearful quarter-note by full orchestra, a moment's pause and then perhaps too dire a picture of a quivering corpse. Decidedly Berlioz's tonepainting is to be classed with those pictures of torture, pain, and death in which the old Spanish painters used to revel. Now comes a picture of Hades with the thermometer at 700 in the shade. To tell the history of Berlioz's degradation of his own tender love-theme would be an ungrateful task and show forth the meaner side of his nature, a nature which was not grand in even its best aspect, but the ribald tune is a strong, if sensational, touch, and introduces a new instrument to the orchestra—the E flat clarinette, so copiously used in military band. Generally, composers have found the piccolo sufficiently impish to picture satanic effects, but Berlioz piles Ossa on Pelion and adds the E-flat clarinette squealings to the shrieks of the other instrument. Right wildly was this theme squirted into the seething mess, with just the proper vulgarization of its character. Then came that parody of the "Dies Irae," which Berlioz may have borrowed from the wicked "Mass of Fools" of mediæval times. The bells were out of tune, and somewhat marred the effect. There are many expedients used for bells in music, Berlioz himself inventing the best in a combination of harp and horn. The composer in this instance permits the use of two pianos for the effect, where bells are not obtainable, and the gong has been used in Boston in this passage, also. On this occasion the instrument seemed to be the new tubular bells which certainly would have been just the proper thing for the work, had they been in tune. This kind of bell must eventually come into use in "Parsifal" where the bell-figure is so important. The odd "Frappée" effect on the violins was very clearly done. This effect, sometimes marked "Col' Legno," is made very simply by striking the violin-strings with the back of the bow. Every theme in this movement, and there are mighty difficult passages in it, was clear and recognizable, and the execution was one that ought to set all doubts about the status of our orchestra at rest and win recognition for the carfeful work of Mr. Paur. It was appreciated to some extent, for the conductor was obliged to bow many times to the applause which followed the movements. It might not be amiss to play the last two movements again at some concert in the immediate future, for such scoring needs more than one hearing, and many auditors may have been tired by an opera season that presented much for study and caused some musical indigestion.

A gentle movement from the Lenore Symphony poured oil upon the troubled waters. The horn did some fine work in this. The movement was the right thing in the wrong place, it was Wordsworth after Poe. With the jolly "Academic Overture" the concert ended. Brahms has not the element of humor in a large degree, and could not have invented the Student's songs on which this overture is founded; but he has the gift of developing a theme magnificently, and this was called upon to good purpose in the work. Fancy setting "Upidee" in classical form! Yet "Was Kommt dort von der Hoeh" is not a bit more elevated in style, and forms one of the best touches of the work. The overture was played in proper, rollicking style, and with it this concert of many moods came to an end.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 11, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Robert Kahn: Overture, "Elégie," in C minor (MS.). (First time.)
Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique, No. 1, in C major, opus 14a.
Raff: Andante quasi Larghetto from Symphony No. 5, in E major, "Lenore," opus 177.
Brahms: Akademische Fest-Ouverture, in C minor, opus 80.

The new Kahn overture seems plainly a work out of the common run. Robert Kahn is a young man, a pupil of Brahms in composition, and it is reported that the path to publicity, if not to fame, has been made exceptionally easy for him: it is said that he has had the rare luck to have almost everything he has written performed under the most distinguished auspices. We have had the opportunity of studying the score of this overture of his, and have heard one performance of it; it seems to us decidedly the finest piece of work we have heard from a young and little-known composer for many years. In form and development it is clarity itself; not that it adheres—either slavishly or otherwise — to the fixed, traditional overture form, for the way the composer has taken a theme from the slow introduction and woven it into the main body of the work is to be recognized as an element, if not exactly of novelty, yet of unacademic fancy; but that the overture has a stoutly consistent and easily apprehensible plastic form of its own, and its development is so clear and lucid that the listener is never left in doubt for a moment as to what the composer means to say. Added to this, the work shows inventiveness of no common order: not merely that primary melodic inventiveness in virtue of which a composer creates beautiful and pregnant thematic matter, but that more sustained inventive power which gives him wealth of resource in making the most of his material. To be sure, one finds little if any originality in the work; it sounds tout de reflet et de reverbère, if you will; one finds hints at Brahms in every other measure. But this is entirely normal and to be expected: Kahn is still young and in his first manner, and the first manner of almost every composer is that of his teacher or model; a composer's individuality crops out, as a rule, only in his second. And just here, by the way, the thought presents itself to us: if a young composer's first manner begins with Brahms, what incalculable phases may not his third manner assume? One point in the overture, however, leaves us considerably in doubt, and this is the instrumentation. The work often makes the impression of being badly scored; many passages sound thin and ragged, there are times when for a moment or two the very bottom seems to drop out of the orchestra, others when the trombones and tuba seem de trop and say nothing. But we are by no means sure that this is always the composer's fault; we remember well enough when a good deal of Brahms sounded in much the same way. The trouble may have been largely in the performance, and may be curable by more and more careful rehearsing, of the sort that has long been recognized as necessary to make many a standard composition sound well and show the composer's idea in its true light.

Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony was given, as it seemed to us, almost as well as it was last year; and this is saying a good deal. Mr. Paur's reading of the work is admirable at every point; Berlioz could not find a more sympathetic interpreter. Only it seemed to us on Saturday evening that some passages were played with less perfection of finish than marked last year's performance. The new bells made a fine effect in the burlesque of the Dies irae in the last movement, saving that they carried realism to the point of sounding not quite in tune: but then, who ever heard a bell sound in tune? Every time we hear this wonderful symphony we are impressed anew with what an astounding master of orchestration Berlioz was. Remember that in this work he was still hampered by writing for plain horns and trumpets; even in the "Marche au Supplice" he gives the indication that the horns shall be "ordinaires ou à cylindres," showing that, though he might prefer to have valve-horns for this movement, he had written the parts so that they could be played on the old plain instruments. No doubt, new and surpassingly beautiful orchestral effects have been discovered since Berlioz's day: Wagner, Richard Strauss, and not a few of his own countrymen have gone beyond him in some respects; but what strikes us in Berlioz more forcibly than in any of the great masters of orchestration who have come after him is his wonderful sense for the exact relation of means to effect: with all his apparently lavish employment of orchestral means, there is never anything superfluous in his score; he never seems to use an instrument simply because he has it at hand, but only when he absolutely needs it. No composer ever treated orchestral means with a finer economy; when he has, so to speak, to put his hand in his pocket and bring out a second tuba, for instance, it is absolutely because he cannot do without one; and so soon as he no longer needs it, he lets it count rests. Then the wonderful clearness of his scoring: it is as clear and transparent as Haydn's or Mozart's!

It was a curious effect, that of hearing the slow music from the "Lenore" symphony immediately after Berlioz's "Fantastic." In one way it seemed like a return to sanity after what Heine once called der frechste Wahnsinn (the most impudent insanity);" but in another way it seemed terribly like leaving the company of a distinguished maniac of real genius for that of a most inveterate bourgeois. Indeed Raff, with all his high qualities, had a strong bourgeois streak in him; and in saying this we use the term in its most invidious sense. To be sure it is hardly fair to judge of a symphonic movement out of its true frame; but the "Lenore" symphony is old enough by this time to be spoken of without weighing every syllable, and the impression made by this movement from it, coming right after Berlioz's work, was distinct enough to be worth noting: with all its melodious beauty the movement sounded absolutely d'un épicier!"

Brahms's Academic Overture seems to us more and more delightful, the oftener we hear it. What an admirable use the man has made of his homely material! And note here that "homely" does not in the least mean "bourgeois." How he has welded all those scraps of students' songs together, so that the joints do not show! And what true geniality and joviality there is in it all! The genial joviality and high animal spirits of a serious man who knows how to desipere in loco—which does not mean "dissipate in low company." The overture was played with immense spirit and dash, if at times rather coarsely; the performance was not quite up to Mr. Paur's memorable first one, last year, when the overture brought nearly the whole audience to its feet, and they shouted as if Brahms had been Wagner.

The next programme is: Brahms, symphony No. 3, in F major, opus 90; Mendelssohn, concerto for violin, in E minor, opus 64; Reinecke, entr'acte from "Der Gouverneur von Tours" (first time); Marschner, overture to "Hans Heiling." Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist. The rehearsal and concert come on March 22 and 23; there will be no concert this week.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TEN PAGES

TUESDAY, MARCH 12, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Delightful Program by Mr. Paur and the Boston Orchestra.

The symphony season closed last night at the Academy of Music with the fifth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur conductor. The five concerts by this organization have never been exceeded in interest so far as the orchestral work is concerned. Mr. Paur is a man of many parts and has given us a wide range of themes and composers to enjoy. The houses have invariably been crowded and full appreciation shown the work of the musicians. Last fall we were promised a series of concerts by Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Seidl. Each was obliged to give up the season after a single concert with poor patronage. In this we see a lack of discrimination. There is enough musical appreciation in this city to have patronized fifteen concerts, but such is the stupidity of our people that they cling to one and despise the two others.

Last night's program:

Hector Berlioz—Fantastic Symphony in C major, Op. 14a.

Solos for Violoncello.

a. Antonin Dvorak .....“Waldesruhe”
b. Julius Klengel .....Capriccio, Op. 8

Mr. Alwin Schoeder.

Monsigny—Chaconne and Rigodon from Suite “Aline, Reine de Golconde.”
Liszt-Doppler ..Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2

The Fantastic Symphony well deserves its name. Written in parts at different times and afterwards remodeled into its present shape, its origin was the composer's unrequited love for one who afterwards became his wife. It would be hard to find in any single work a greater variety of theme or more diverse musical concepts. The first movement is full of passionate love themes; the next is a delirious ball scene, in which his fancy is given full flight. In the third movement—pastoral—opening with a shepherd's pipe, there is a complex description of country life, from the singing of birds to the artillery of a passing thunder storm—all worked out in singularly lucid style, with great musical beauty. The fourth movement—the march to the gallows—is a mixture of a dirge and trumphant strains, denoting either the triumph of law or the future happy state of the unforunate. The effect was heightened by a gallows-looking structure at the back of the orchestra on which were hung the bronze pipes giving forth bell tones in the last movement, which is a Walpurgis night's dream, a fantastic, weird composition in which the whirring of witches' wings is mixed with the mellow tones of church bells.

The symphony is a delightful composition and was played with great spirit.

Mr. Schroeder, first 'cellist of the orchestra, who has been heard before as a soloist, is a master musician. He played with great intelligence and feeling.

The List Rhapsody No. 2, the finest of the series, was given charmingly.

The conductor was overwhelmed with applause and the season ended with great satisfaction to the audiences.

PUBLIC LEDGER

THE [illegible]-PHILADELPHIA,

MARCH 12, 1895.

Academy of Music—Closing Concert of the Boston Orchestra Series.

The fifth and concluding concert of the season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted to the Academy of Music last night an audience whose numbers were but little diminished by the inclemency of the weather. A glance at the programme and at the assembled orchestra indicated an unusually interesting concert. The opening number was Berlioz's “Fantastic” symphony (C Major), and lined up at the rear of the stage were no less than three members to handle the kettle drums and two to manage the cymbals, while looming up like the ronfold that has to do with the episodes of the fourth movement was a frame work from which were pendent two billets of brass, each as long as the man who struck them with a mallet to produce the church chime effect in that movement. Berlioz has been often and cordially criticized for the lack of form and want of unity in this particular work, which appears to be beyond the comprehension of most conductors or an impossible task to their bands. Given as it was last night, with a conductor after Berlioz's own heart and an orchestra which has reached the extreme of virtuosity, and the symphony glows with spontaneous power and charm. The greater clearness and finish with which such scenes as the “March to the Scaffold” and the “Walpurgis Night's Dream” were given left little of the usual “morbid” and “unwholesome” characteristics so frequently found in them, though none would dispute the grim expressiveness of the picture.

Alwin Schroeder, the orchestra's first 'cellist, played Dvorak's “Waldesruhe” with marked delicacy and tenderness and followed it with Julius Klengel's Capriccio (op. 8) a show piece in which Mr. Schroeder has before evidenced his very excellent accomplishments in bowing and fingering. The audience, or rather the encore contingent of it, applauded at intervals for the space of several minutes in the hope of getting an additional contribution from Mr. Schroeder, but Conductor Paur calmly conversed with him until the applause ceased, and then went on with the closing number. This was Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, which was also superbly played, though there were differences in the arrangement played or in the reading, or in both, that varied it somewhat from the one familiarized here at previous concerts. Conductor Paur and his men are certainly to be congratulated upon their season's work, and especially upon this crowning entertainment.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS

MARCH 12, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Fifth and Last for the Season at the Academy of Music.

Conductor Paur closed the current season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening by presenting a rather popular programme, which was received with considerable manifestation of pleasure in general. The conductor, as the last effect of the year, gave the audience a symphony that was definite enough in form and treatment to arouse even the most uninitiated. It was the Symphony Fantastic in C major of Berlioz. This, with its effectively simple opening, its waltz movement, the charming pastoral adagio, the sombre “march to the scaffold,” and the involved and diabolical “Walpurgis Night” movement was given in a lively manner by the increased orchestra. There were the bells and the drums and what-not, so that the man who was annoyed at the notoriety he attained because he was said to compose for 400 instruments, got a noisy interpretation.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cello player, who rendered Dvorak's “Waldersrhue” most sympathetically, showing the rich quality of his art, and then followed it with Klengel's “Capricio,” which with its rapidity of movement displayed the dexterity of the player. Mr. Paur was quite churlish in refusing to allow Mr. Schroeder to give an encore which was demanded again and again by the audience. Following the 'cello solos was on old-fashioned bit of French dance music very simple in character and quite pleasant to hear; a chaconne and rigodon by Monsigny. The programme was concluded with a Liszt-Duppler Hungarian rhapsody No. 2, which the orchestra gave with much spirit.

The programme, however, was hardly up to a high musical standard, as the Berlioz Symphony is of the skyrocket kind. Mr. Paur is no doubt gaining in favor in this city and the present series show him at the close in a much more favorable light that when he first appeared before a Philadelphia audience. The season has been a most successful one, crowded houses being the rule.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.,

TUESDAY, MARCH 12, 1895.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Fifth and Closing Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its fifth and last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night, when the programme included Berlioz's “Symphonie Fantastique,” Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, instrumented by Doppler, No. 2, and some dance music, by Monsigny—dance music must be not less than a hundred years old to get a place on a Boston Symphony programme. Strauss is inadmissible, although there could have been few in the audience who would not have sooner heard the “Bal Promessen, or the “Village Swallows,” than Monsigny's colorless and tasteless tunes. But Strauss' turn with symphony orchestras will come some time in the next century, when he has ripened, or faded into a classic. Mr. Paur's last night's programme will be recognized as a distinctively romantic one. Berlioz's famous symphony must perhaps be regarded as programme music, but it is a wonderful work all the same, full of fire and fury and imaginative force, and with a wealth of melodic and illustrative ideas, which at times diverges into a wild extravagance. It was superbly played, and produced a profound impression upon a large and sympathetic audience. Mr. Alwin Schroder, the leading 'cello player of the orchestra, in his rendering of a caprice by Klangel, gave an extraordinarily brilliant exhibition of virtuosity. He was loudly applauded, but firmly and properly declined a persistent encore.

E PHILADELPHIA RECORD,

n- was [illegible] times. n

MARCH 12, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy.

This season's series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to a brilliant close last evening at the Academy of Music. As a farewell offering Leader Paur had prepared a very attractive programme, the principal number being Hector Berlioz's fantastic symphony in C major, the five movements of which were given with greater effect and color than usual. The work of the violins in the second movement was simply exquisite, and the dainty waltz melody was played with a most delicate and poetical touch. The sonorous passages of the conclusion of the symphony brought out the full resources of the orchestra. Violoncellist Alwin Shroeder was the soloist of the evening. He played with rare expression and understanding Dvorak's “Waldesruhe,” and was really charming in Klengel's “Capriccio.” He was most liberally applauded. The concert concluded with the Doppler arrangement of the Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, which was played in a masterly manner.

PHILADELPHIA TIMES.

MARCH 12, 1895.

The Last Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a large audience to the Academy of Music last evening. Considering the limited opportunities for hearing the best orchestral music that Philadelphia has enjoyed this season, the small proportion of the classics included in Mr. Paur's programmes has been a disappointment to many. In his last concert he got away from the classics altogether. The symphony was the “Fantastique” of Berlioz, which it is interesting to hear once in a while, especially when so admirably played, but which always leaves a good many desires unsatisfied. The soloist was that fine executant on the violoncello, Mr. Schroeder, who played a number of small modern pieces with excellent skill, and the concert closed with the familiar Hungarian Rhapsody.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 13.

Symphony Orchestra at the Capital.

WASHINGTON, March 12—The fifth and last concert of the Boston symphony orchestra was given this evening to the largest audience of the season. Mrs Cleveland and Attorney General and Mrs Olney were in one of the boxes. The program included the works of Mendelssohn, Monsigny, Dvorak and Liszt, and was perhaps received with more favor than any of the other concerts.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

PUBLISHED BY
THE EVENING NEWS PUBLISHING COMPANY OF BALTIMORE CITY.
Office, No. 201 East Baltimore Street.

CHAS. H. GRASTY, President. DOUGLAS H. GORDON, Secretary-Treasurer.

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 12, 1895.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

WILL GIVE THE LAST CONCERT TOMORROW NIGHT.

It Arrives in Baltimore Today and Will Go to Washington This Evening, Returning to the Carrollton Tonight—Dates Already Booked for Its Return to This City Next Season—The Fantasy of Lover Berlioz.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Baltimore this morning on its last trip for the season of 1894-95. It will go to Washington at 6 o'clock tonight, and give a concert there, returning about midnight.

It will hold a private rehearsal at Music Hall at noon tomorrow, and tomorrow night will give its last concert of the season at Baltimore in Music Hall Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen, pianist, will be the soloist. A notable feature of the programme will be the fantastic symphony of Berlioz.

Such a variety of instruments will be required to portray the fancies of the dreaming lover that the number of performers has been increased to nearly 100.

Pleased With Baltimore.

The orchestra will come again next season. Dates have already been booked, and the same general plan of five monthly concerts will be followed. Assistant-Manager Comee said today:

“Our patronage in Baltimore this season has been most gratifying, and our present splendid clientele has grown from the faithful hundreds who clung to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through all its wanderings, beginning at Harris Academy of Music some nine years ago, and using the Lyceum Theatre, Concordia Hall, Harris' Academy Concert Hall and Ford's Theatre, and finally settling in the superb Music Hall, a fitting home for such an orchestra.

“Financially, I can say our success this season has been far greater than any previous year. The management is satisfied and pleased with both the size and character of the Baltimore audiences. Baltimore furnishes as enthusiastic and intelligent audiences as it is the privilege of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play to anywhere.”

Handling an Orchestra.

It is something of a task to take care of a large orchestra traveling. Usually the orchestra leaves the Providence Station, Boston, Sunday on the train that starts at 7.30 in the evening. They travel in three sleepers, which are specially reserved for them, though attached to the regular train. The assigning of the berths is all done by Mr. Comee, who, of course, considers very carefully the personal preferences of the men. In the early days of the orchestra Mr. Comee put together in one section two men who had not spoken for three months, and travelers can appreciate the awkwardness of such an arrangement. But today Mr. Comee has too good a run of the orchestra and its affairs to make a break of that sort.

Mr. Paur, who cannot stand the night travel, always starts ahead of the orchestra and travels to New York in the daytime, returning on Sunday.

The Matter of Baggage.

The daytime travel of the orchestra is made in two day-coaches, one for the smokers, and one for the non-smokers, and a special baggage car is always attached to the train in which they go. The handling of their baggage is no small item of the travel. All the orchestra instruments travel in the baggage car and the itinerary always states at what time hotel and theatre baggage must be ready, and if any of the men fail to be prompt in this matter, they move their baggage at their own expense. About one-half the men carry trunks, and the rest valises. Usually there are about 120 pieces of baggage to handle. Of course, if any of the orchestra men have solos on the programmes given while on tour they carry their own special instruments, and those they do not trust out of their own hands.

The housing of the orchestra is very easily done. The list is sent on ahead to the hotel, and the rooms are assigned the names entered on the register before they arrive, so that when they get there they simply walk up to the desk, look on the register, get their number and ask for their keys. The men room together in about the same grouping that they travel, each man having a separate bed.

Card Players.

Apart from this personally-conducted style of travel, each man is an independent person. He eats and sleeps as he pleases, and occupies the time not devoted to travel or concerts exactly as he likes. On the train nine-tenths of the men play cards. As there are 13 nationalities in the orchestra, there is a great variety in the games, although the favorite American game, poker, is very generally known. One or two French and German games press it hard. For this card playing the men break up into groups, and those groups will hang together for many seasons.

As an example of how persistently this playing is kept up, take the score of one group who played together for three seasons. In '91 and '92 they played 2754 points in whist, and the winning pair was 12 points ahead at the end of the trip. This was on the Western trip, and on their arrival in Fall River, on their return, they were even, the 12 points being made between Fall River and Boston. In '92 and '93 they played 4084 points, the winners being 216 points ahead. In '93 and '94 the score was 3414, with the winners 222 points ahead.

Many of the men read, and some of it is said to be very solid reading, and there are chess-playing groups. Their days are spent very much as other men traveling would spend them. Some of the boys do a little sight-seeing, some of them practice and some of them sleep. In Baltimore it is very oddly noted there is hardly a man who does not drift into some of the stores and buy something. It has become an almost universal habit of the men to do this, even if it's not more than a necktie they get.

[106]

HOW THEY TRAVEL.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ON THE ROAD.

Their Route—How They Pair Off—On the Trains and at the Hotel—Their Ways of Killing Time—Card-Playing—A Few Anecdotes.

The Richmond lovers of music doubtless remember, with pleasure, the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here a year or two ago. It is by long odds the finest organization of the kind in this country, and is equal to any in Europe. In an article on this orchestra and the way they travel, the Boston Herald pays a deserved compliment to the management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis, and his assistant, Mr. Fred. R. Comee:

The merest glance at the matter will show the most casual thinker, says the Herald, what a might of detail there is taking over eighty musicians, with their instruments, music, and baggage from Boston to Washington and return, and give by the way six concerts from Saturday to Saturday. Yet so nicely has the plan of the tour been laid out that the entire company travels as if each were by himself, with the utmost comfort, and without a hitch, the itinerary, which is printed and given out to each man before starting, being adhered to with an exactness that is little short of remarkable.

Usually the orchestra leaves the Providence Station Sunday on the train that starts at 7:30 in the evening, although on their last trip, owing to the Handel and Hayden concert, they left at midnight on that day. They travel in three sleepers, which are especially reserved for them, though attached to the regular train. The assigning of the berths is all done by Comee, who, of course, considers very carefully the personal preferences of the men. This requires no end of tact, and only a long association with the orchestra could enable a man to attend to this simple detail and make no blunder. In the early days of the orchestra, Mr. Comee put together in one section two men who had not spoken for three months, and travellers can appreciate the awkwardness of such an arrangement. But to-day Comee has too good a run of the orchestra and its affairs to make a break of that sort.

As in every organization where men are thrown much together, they pair off in a way and settle into groups. This has to be known by the assistant manager, who governs himself accordingly. Tim Adamowski and his brother Joe, who live together in town, always travel together. But while there are two Loefflers, two Heindls, and two Kneisels in the orchestra, the Adamowski are the only brothers that pair off. Among the couples that travel as pals are Louis Svecenski and Otto Roth Zach and Grunberg, Moldauer and Fiedler. In assigning the berths each of these pair of men is given a section, and they settle among themselves the upper and lower berth question, it usually being a turn about and turn matter.

Ever since the Boston Symphony orchestra became an institution here it has been a sort of pet with Boston's finest. Music lovers have made a sort of fetish of the organization, and fetishism in the form of symphony concert attendance has been as smart as it has been popular. Since, therefore, everything from the personal habits to the personal foibles of the individual members of the orchestra has been alike interesting to the violet-bedecked girl who sits in the be-premiumed seats below stairs, and the equally pretty and much enthusiastic girl who rushes for the best seat up aloft, it is not unlikely that many may take a great interest in the way in which the orchestra travels when three or four times each season it leaves Boston with a Saturday night that seems all out of shape owing to a lack of symphony concert.

The southern trip, the only one they make now, the western trip being a thing of the past, is always about the same in its details. They go through direct to Philadelphia, with that inevitable hiatus, two hours in New York on the morning of Monday from 7 to 9 o'clock, arriving there at 11:23. They go at once to the Continental Hotel. They give a concert at the Academy of Music Monday evening, and leave at ten minutes of 8 Tuesday morning for Baltimore, where they arrive at 10:15, and put up at the Carrollton. They remain in Baltimore two days, as they give the Washington concerts from that city, never having to put up at the capital, since, some years ago, they received rather shabby treatment from one of the houses during a tremendous influx of tourists. The Baltimore and Ohio railroad puts a special train at their service, and they make the run between the two cities in fifty minutes, and are made so comfortable at the Carrollton that it is much more convenient and attractive than staying in Washington. Their Washington concert is usually given on Tuesday evening. Their train from Baltimore leaves at 6 o'clock, and after the concert returns at 10:40, so that before 11 o'clock they are sitting down to their hearty supper at the Carrollton again. Their Baltimore concert is given at the new Music Hall, one of the handsomest in the country, on Wednesday, and the next morning, that's Thursday, they leave for New York at ten minutes of 9, where they arrive at five minutes of 1, and go directly to the Park-Avenue Hotel, where they have always stopped. They give a concert that evening, Thursday, at the Metropolitan Opera House, and on the following day [illegible] give a public rehearsal at the Academy of Music, in Brooklyn, at 3 P. M., [illegible] concert at the same place Saturday [illegible] the course. They leave [illegible] night on the mid- [illegible] Sunday

The daytime travel [illegible] orchestra is made in two day-coaches, one for the smokers, and one for the non-smokers, and a special baggage-car is always attached to the train in which they go. The handling of their baggage is no small item of the travel. Mr. Neil Patterson attends to all this for Mr. Ellis, and the system by which it is done is so admirable that there is never any confusion. All the orchestra instruments travel in the baggage-car in Mr. Patterson's care, and the itinerary always states at what time hotel and theatre baggage must be ready, and if any of the men fail to be prompt in this matter, why they move their baggage at their own expense. About one half the men carry trunks, and the rest "live in a valise," as the saying is. Usually there are about 120 pieces of baggage to handle. Of course, if any of the orchestra-men have solos on the programmes given while on tour, they carry their own special instruments, and those they do not trust out of their own hands.

While the orchestra as a body stops at the Park-Avenue, the Continental, and the Carrollton, there are individual members of the orchestra who prefer to go somewhere else, in which case they are allowed an expense account equal to what it costs to pay the bills of the other men, who, as the saying is, "go to the hotel with Comee." For instance, Loeffler always stops at Hotel Martin, down in University place, while in New York. Several of the other men have some foreign hotel to which they are attached, and to which they always go, although most of the men prefer to have all that bother taken off their hands, and to go along with the majority.

This housing of the orchestra is very easily done. The list is sent on ahead to the hotel, and the rooms are assigned, the names entered on the register before they arrive, so that when they get there they simply walk up to the desk, look on the register, get their number, and ask for their keys. The men room together in about the same grouping that they travel, each man having a separate bed.

Apart from this personally conducted style of travel, each man is an independent person. He eats and sleeps as he pleases, and occupies the time not devoted to travel or concerts exactly as he likes. On the train nine tenths of the men play cards. As there are thirteen nationalities in the orchestra, there is a great variety in the games, although the favorite American game, poker, is very generally known. One or two French and German games press it hard. For this card playing the men break up into groups, and those groups will hang together for many seasons. As an example of how persistently this playing is kept up, take the score of one group who played together for three seasons. In 1891 and 1892 they played 2,734 points in whist, and the winning pair was 12 points ahead at the end of the trip. This was on the western trip, and on their arrival in Fall River on their return, they were even, the 12 points being made between Fall River and Boston. In 1892 and 1893 they played 4,084 points, the winners being 216 points ahead. In 1893 and 1894 the score was 3,414, with the winners 222 points ahead.

Of course, many of the men read, and some of it is said to be very solid reading, too, and there is chess-playing groups. Their days are spent very much as other men travelling would spend them. Some of the boys do a little sight-seeing, some of them practice, and some of them sleep. In Philadelphia it is very oddly noted that there is hardly a man who does not drift into Wanamaker's and buy something. It has become an almost universal habit of the men to do this, even if it's not more than a necktie they get. In most of the cities many of them have friends or admirers, and there is some entertaining of a mild sort done.

The concerts when on the road are really more brilliant to look at than they are, because of the halls in which they are given are infinitely handsomer than Music Hall, and full-dress is much more usual. For example, the Academy of Music in Philadelphia seats 3,000 people, 600 more than our Music Hall, and is always packed, the "rush" faction there being as energetic as it is in Boston. The new Music Hall at Baltimore is very handsome, and seats 2,700, and there the orchestra has a clientele as loyal as its Boston following, the same people coming year in and year out. In Washington Mrs. Cleveland has a box always, although this year she has not occupied it. The Russian Legation always occupied a box, and all the most famous of the diplomatic set are always in the audience, which is full-dress, a very brilliant sight.

As a rule, the men enjoy the trips. They like the change, and for the credit of the orchestra and for Boston it is worth nothing that they are not viewed as "show people" by either the railroads or the hotels, while such is the sentiment of the body that it is doubtful if anything irregular could happen. The honor of the orchestra as a body is dead set against anything of the sort, and it would take a bold man to brave the sentiment of the men as an organization.

Many of the men have their little quips and quirks, but they are usually of an inoffensive sort, for which no one suffers. One, the first violinist, for example, is invariably late. It is said that so common is this habit that Comee as he paces the platform awaiting his men is often heard to say to the conductor as he sees the violinist enter the gate: "Well, you may go ahead. We are all here." Occasionally the man gets left, and has to travel on behind the orchestra at his own expense.

The assistant manager always laughs when anything is said of the men being left. It recalls a telegram which he once received at Wilmington, as the orchestra travelled homeward from Baltimore. It read: "Me and Hoyer is left." "I often wondered," said Comee, "why they sent that. I knew it almost as soon as they did. Did they expect me to put back for them, or to go back and personally conduct them on the next train? Goodness knows."

[illegible] excitement, [illegible] of the Julie Wyman [illegible] in Philadelphia. Probably the [illegible] their experience [illegible] year of the great blizzard. That was in Gerrick's time. They left Boston on the usual train—7:30 P. M.—and only got as far as East Douglas, where they remained until 6 the next night, when they were pulled back to town, and the entire trip given up. It was very lucky for their comfort that Comee had been so afraid that they might be snowed up during the night that, without saying a word to any one, he sent up to Parker's and bought 200 sandwiches, and at the station he bought all the apples and doughnuts he could find, and had them packed away. They only got forty miles, when they were snow-bound, and the next morning when they woke the snow was over the tops of the cars. They spent all that day shovelling snow by turns to assist the trainmen and get out of their snow-bank.

An amusing experience that is still the subject of laughter was the suggestion made to the conductor at—well, never mind the place—they probably know better by this time—that if the orchestra were to play from the station to the hotel they would probably have a much bigger house at night.

There is a funny story, which, at the time of its happening, was told from Maine to Florida. But that was six years ago, and it was so good that it may bear repeating, and even if it is not new to many Symphony-orchestra followers, they may enjoy a revival of laughter over it. It was when Charlie Behr was in the orchestra, and they gave a concert at Lowell. The opera-house there is situated very much as the Tremont is here—that is, you go into the lobby, pass the ticket-office, and turn round to approach the auditorium. The stage-door is up an alley off another street from the main entrance and quite a little distance from it. Behr only played in the overture of the programme given, and after that was free to go where he pleased. It was the custom of the theatre, as in most one-night places, to bill the next night's attraction as soon as to-night's audience was in, that having the advantage of catching the eyes of the audience coming out. The Symphony Orchestra four-sheet posters were up on the bill-boards at the entrance of the theatre at 8 o'clock. At 8:15 the Cleveland minstrels, which were coming the next evening, had their paper up.

Behr left the stage, went out the stage-door, and, wondering what he would do with himself until the concert was over, strolled up the street, turned a corner, and walked down the main street. Soon he came to the brilliantly-lighted front of a theatre. He read the posters at the door, "Cleveland's Minstrels." That suited him. He went in, bought a ticket, and sauntered into the auditorium. He took a look at the stage, and thought to himself, "Well, that's the queerest minstrel circle I ever saw. All white faces." Then he looked at the middle man—Gerricke, and he bolted back to the box-office and demanded his money. Comee was in the back of the office counting up the house. The ticket-man called out to him: "Mr. Comee, here's one of your men want's his money back."

"What's that?"

"One of your men asking for his money back. Oh, well, come and see for yourself."

Comee went into the front of the office, and there was Behr. He tumbled at once, and when he had a pause in his laughter, he said: "Charlie, if you leave your 50 cents, I'll never tell of this, but if you take it away, I can't promise."

"Oh, confound it," said Behr, "you'll tell it anyway. Give me my 50 cents," and he got it.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 18, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will give the closing concert of its series at the Metropolitan Opera House next Thursday evening. Miss Marie Brema will be the singer. The orchestral numbers of the program include the Overture Elegy, Robert Kahn (first performance in New York); symphonie fantastique, Berlioz, and Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from the Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn. The orchestra on this occasion will number nearly one hundred men.

Kneisel Quartet.—The Kneisel Quartet will give the last of its delightful series of concerts at Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall next Friday evening. The program includes the quartet in D minor, Borodine, quartet in D minor, Schubert; and the Beethoven septet, in the performance of which the quartet will be assisted by Mr. Pourtau, clarinet; Mr. Hackebarth, horn; Mr. Litke, bassoon, and Mr. Golde, double bass, all leading members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To-night we will bid farewell to Mr. Paur and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the year. They give their fifth and last concert of the present season. The Symphony Fantastique of Berlioz and Second Rhapsody of Liszt are among the pieces, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cello player, will be the soloist.

* * *

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 16, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The finest of the world's orchestras is to give its last concert in Brooklyn to-night. It played at the Academy of Music yesterday in the preliminary rehearsal, or matinee, and faced about as large an audience as it might gather in Meriden or New Britain or Passaic. It was a fine programme that it offered, too, in which there was a delightful sequence of the classic, the romantic and the sensational. Beethoven opened the programme with the "Egmont" overture, broad, solid, perfectly proportioned and, despite its animation, pervaded with that calm of command which is distinctive of genius. Mr. Paur's reading of this work was temperate and violated no conventions. Bizet's "Arlesienne" suite has been heard before—in fact, there was no new music on the bill—but it endures repetition well. The prelude is simply and purely charming, and indeed the spirit of the work has a gratefully affecting innocence and juvenility. The minuet ends so peacefully that its chirping notes remind one of a night concert in the woods, when the crickets and katydids are calling one another and a bird now and then gurgles and trills in his dreams. The adagietto is sweet nearly to cloying and the carillon, with its booming horns, swinging their three notes up and down, as from a belfry, is joyous. Raff's "In the Woods" symphony is another of the things that can be heard once in a season or oftener. There is a fine romantic quality in Raff and there is a directness of style that usually goes with the romantic tendency. He never maunders after his themes, nor resorts to strained effects in orchestration, nor exhibits himself as a technician in his harmonies; all is free and direct, his melody is always fresh and his harmonies fit it. His "In the Woods" symphony vies with his "Lenore" in picturesqueness and vividness. It has, however, the health of nature in it, for even the rush of the wild hunt of wizards and sprites is but a symbolizing of the activities of earth and air and water, and if it is a bit spooky it is none the less lifting, and the hearer envies the joy of the fierce riders as they hurl themselves across the empyrean, uttering their cries, the hoofs of their horses thundering in the clouds. Though the band was a trifle lax at the beginning of the concert, it worked in admirable unity in this spirited and difficult symphony, and was wrought to a true enthusiasm at the close. Liszt was the other composer on the programme, and he was represented in two numbers, one for orchestra and the other for solo with support of the diminished band. The Hungarian rhapsody No. 2 is an old favorite and it was played yesterday with a fine swing and a vim that emphasized its gypsy origin. The other piece was the E flat concerto, likewise founded on Hungarian music, and this brought out Bernhard Stavenhagen as solo pianist. This artist is not brilliant, but he is an exceptionally satisfying player. His fault, which he does not often exhibit, however, is that of pounding in strong passages, with a pedal somewhat too freely opened. Aside from this he employs a crystaline touch that he tempers to remarkable delicacy, and his shading gains from this. When he rises to power he is less agreeable than he is as a player who lets us feel the power in reserve. In all that he does he is musicianly and unaffected and a player like that is worth many of the crack-a-jacks who dazzle and startle with their purely digital performances and leave soul and sentiment out of the reckoning. The programme will be repeated to-night and this will close the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Brooklyn. It may be the last of its appearances in this city, for it seems that among the million and more of inhabitants in this city there are not enough people who like music to make its visits profitable. The list of works performed during the season is appended:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92
Overture, "Egmont."
Bemberg.....aria, "La Mort de Jeanne d'Arc"
Berlioz.....overture, "Carnaval Romain"
Bizet.....suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1
Dvorak, Symphony No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95.
Overture, "Carneval" (first time).
Gluck.....Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne
Lachner.....suite No. 1, in D minor, Op. 113
Liszt.....Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, in D minor
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in E flat.
Masse.....aria, "Galathee"
Massenet.....aria, "Pleurez pleurez, mes yeux!" from "The Cid."
Mendelssohn...Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."
Raff.....Symphony No. 3, in F major, "In the Woods," Op. 153.
Saint-Saens.....Prelude, "The Deluge"
Aria from "Samson and Delilah."
Schumann.....Symphony No. 2, in C major
Concerto for pianoforte, in A minor
Concerto for violoncello, Op. 129
Smetana.....Overture, "The Bartered Bride"
Wagner.....

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 12. März 1895.

Das Schluß-Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters fand gestern Abend in der Academy of Music vor einem sehr zahlreichen und kunstverständigen Publikum statt. Das Programm bot die Fantastique Symphonie von Berlioz, welches in virtuoser Weise zur Geltung gebracht wurde und als eine Musterleistung des Orchesters bezeichnet werden muß. Der „Gang zum Richtplatz" und der „Walpurgis-Nacht Traum", wurden mit einer geradezu großartigen Wirkung zum Vortrag gebracht. Das Gleiche gilt von der berühmten zweiten „Rhapsodie Hongroise" von Liszt.

Als Solist fungirte der erste Cellist des Orchesters, Herr Alwin Schroeder, welcher Dvorak's „Waldesruhe" und Klengels „Capriccio" meisterhaft vortrug.

Das Orchester und Dirigent Paur können mit den großartigen Erfolgen dieser Konzert-Saison wohl zufrieden sein.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

The evening concerts were those of the Boston Orchestra (the last of this season's series) in the Metropolitan Opera House, and of the Beethoven String Quartet, in the Chamber Music Hall. Of the latter it is not possible to say more than that Mr. Dannreuther's organization, which stands for the best that local musicians are doing in the department of chamber music, entertained a faithful clientele in a most dignified and worthy manner. For his last concert Mr. Paur seemed to have determined to give New-Yorkers all they could stand, and for the first time in the history of the Boston Orchestra we heard one of its concerts that lasted from 8:15 o'clock to 10:40—which is a little more music than ought to be offered at a single sitting. The orchestral numbers consisted of an uninspired and uninspiring overture in C minor, by Robert Kahn, which is called "Elegy," and is still in manuscript, in which form, it is to be hoped, it will remain—not because it is ill made, but because it says nothing over which music lovers have not long been willing to chant a funeral song. The central number was Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, which was brilliantly played, and in which it was a rather unusual pleasure to hear justly tuned and effective bells, or, rather, musical tubes. The concert closed with the overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music.

[107]

THE [illegible] DISPATCH.

TUESDAY.....MARCH 12, 1895.

HOW THEY TRAVEL.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ON THE ROAD.

Their Route—How They Pair Off—On the Trains and at the Hotel—Their Ways of Killing Time—Card-Playing—A Few Anecdotes.

The Richmond lovers of music doubtless remember, with pleasure, the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here a year or two ago. It is by long odds the finest organization of the kind in this country, and is equal to any in Europe. In an article on this orchestra and the way they travel, the Boston Herald pays a deserved compliment to the management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis, and his assistant, Mr. Fred. R. Comee:

The merest glance at the matter will show the most casual thinker, says the Herald, what a might of detail there is taking over eighty musicians, with their instruments, music, and baggage from Boston to Washington and return, and give by the way six concerts from Saturday to Saturday. Yet so nicely has the plan of the tour been laid out that the entire company travels as if each were by himself, with the utmost comfort, and without a hitch, the itinerary, which is printed and given out to each man before starting, being adhered to with an exactness that is little short of remarkable.

Usually the orchestra leaves the Providence Station Sunday on the train that starts at 7:30 in the evening, although on their last trip, owing to the Handel and Hayden concert, they left at midnight on that day. They travel in three sleepers, which are especially reserved for them, though attached to the regular train. The assigning of the berths is all done by Comee, who, of course, considers very carefully the personal preferences of the men. This requires no end of tact, and only a long association with the orchestra could enable a man to attend to this simple detail and make no blunder. In the early days of the orchestra, Mr. Comee put together in one section two men who had not spoken for three months, and travellers can appreciate the awkwardness of such an arrangement. But to-day Comee has too good a run of the orchestra and its affairs to make a break of that sort.

As in every organization where men are thrown much together, they pair off in a way and settle into groups. This has to be known by the assistant manager, who governs himself accordingly. Tim Adamowski and his brother Joe, who live together in town, always travel together. But while there are two Loefflers, two Heindls, and two Kneisels in the orchestra, the Adamowski are the only brothers that pair off. Among the couples that travel as pals are Louis Svecenski and Otto Roth Zach and Grunberg, Moldauer and Fiedler. In assigning the berths each of these pair of men is given a section, and they settle among themselves the upper and lower berth question, it usually being a turn about and turn matter.

Ever since the Boston Symphony orchestra became an institution here it has been a sort of pet with Boston's finest. Music lovers have made a sort of fetish of the organization, and fetisicism in the form of symphony concert attendance has been as smart as it has been popular. Since, therefore, everything from the personal habits to the personal follies of the individual members of the orchestra has been alike interesting to the violet-bedecked girl who sits in the bepremiumed seats below stairs, and the equally pretty and much enthusiastic girl who rushes for the best seat up aloft, it is not unlikely that many may take a great interest in the way in which the orchestra travels when three or four times each season it leaves Boston with a Saturday night that seems all out of shape owing to a lack of symphony concert.

The southern trip, the only one they make now, the western trip being a thing of the past, is always about the same in its details. They go through direct to Philadelphia, with that inevitable hiatus, two hours in New York on the morning of Monday from 7 to 9 o'clock, arriving there at 11:23. They go at once to the Continental Hotel. They give a concert at the Academy of Music Monday evening, and leave at ten minutes of 8 Tuesday morning for Baltimore, where they arrive at 10:15, and put up at the Carrollton. They remain in Baltimore two days, as they give the Washington concerts from that city, never having to put up at the capital, since, some years ago, they received rather shabby treatment from one of the houses during a tremendous influx of tourists. The Baltimore and Ohio railroad puts a special train at their service, and they make the run between the two cities in fifty minutes, and are made so comfortable at the Carrollton that it is much more convenient and attractive than staying in Washington. Their Washington concert is usually given on Tuesday evening. Their train from Baltimore leaves at 6 o'clock, and after the concert returns at 10:40, so that before 11 o'clock they are sitting down to their hearty supper at the Carrollton again. Their Baltimore concert is given at the new Music Hall, one of the handsomest in the country, on Wednesday, and the next morning, that's Thursday, they leave for New York at ten minutes of 9, where they arrive at five minutes of 1, and go directly to the Park-Avenue Hotel, where they have always stopped. They give a concert that evening, Thursday, at the Metropolitan Opera-House, and on the following day they give a public rehearsal at the Academy of Music, in Brooklyn, at 8 P. M., and a concert at the same place Saturday evening concludes the course. They leave New York Saturday night on the midnight express, and arrive home Sunday

Mr. Paur, who cannot stand the night travel, always starts ahead of the orchestra and travels to New York in the daytime, returning on Sunday.

The daytime travel of the orchestra is made in two day-coaches, one for the smokers, and one for the non-smokers, and a special baggage-car is always attached to the train in which they go. The handling of their baggage is no small item of the travel. Mr. Neil Patterson attends to all this for Mr. Ellis, and the system by which it is done is so admirable that there is never any confusion. All the orchestra instruments travel in the baggage-car in Mr. Patterson's care, and the intinerary always states at what time hotel and theatre baggage must be ready, and if any of the men fail to be prompt in this matter, why they move their baggage at their own expense. About one half the men carry trunks, and the rest "live in a valise," as the saying is. Usually there are about 120 pieces of baggage to handle. Of course, if any of the orchestra-men have solos on the programmes given while on tour, they carry their own special instruments, and those they do not trust out of their own hands.

While the orchestra as a body stops at the Park-Avenue, the Continental, and the Carrollton, there are individual members of the orchestra who prefer to go somewhere else, in which case they are allowed an expense account equal to what it costs to pay the bills of the other, men, who, as the saying is, "go to the hotel with Comee." For instance, Loeffler always stops at Hotel Martin, down in University place, while in New York. Several of the other men have some foreign hotel to which they are attached, and to which they always go, although most of the men prefer to have all that bother taken off their hands, and to go along with the majority.

This housing of the orchestra is very easily done. The list is sent on ahead to the hotel, and the rooms are assigned, the names entered on the register before they arrive, so that when they get there they simply walk up to the desk, look on the register, get their number, and ask for their keys. The men room together in about the same grouping that they travel, each man having a separate bed.

Apart from this personally conducted style of travel, each man is an independent person. He eats and sleeps as he pleases, and occupies the time not devoted to travel or concerts exactly as he likes. On the train nine tenths of the men play cards. As there are thirteen nationalities in the orchestra, there is a great variety in the games, although the favorite American game, poker, is very generally known. One or two French and German games press it hard. For this card playing the men break up into groups, and those groups will hang together for many seasons. As an example of how persistently this playing is kept up, take the score of one group who played together for three seasons. In 1891 and 1892 they played 2,734 points in whist, and the winning pair was 12 points ahead at the end of the trip. This was on the western trip, and on their arrival in Fall River on their return, they were even, the 12 points being made between Fall River and Boston. In 1892 and 1893 they played 4,084 points, the winners being 216 points ahead. In 1893 and 1894 the score was 3,414, with the winners 222 points ahead.

Of course, many of the men read, and some of it is said to be very solid reading, too, and there is chess-playing groups. Their days are spent very much as other men travelling would spend them. Some of the boys do a little sightseeing, some of them practice, and some of them sleep. In Philadelphia it is very oddly noted that there is hardly a man who does not drift into Wanamaker's and buy something. It has become an almost universal habit of the men to do this, even if it's not more than a necktie they get. In most of the cities many of them have friends or admirers, and there is some entertaining of a mild sort done.

The concerts when on the road are really more brilliant to look at than they are, because of the halls in which they are given are infinitely handsomer than Music Hall, and full-dress is much more usual. For example, the Academy of Music in Philadelphia seats 3,000 people, 600 more than our Music Hall, and is always packed, the "rush" faction there being as energetic as it is in Boston. The new Music Hall at Baltimore is very handsome, and seats 2,700, and there the orchestra has a clientele as loyal as its Boston following, the same people coming year in and year out. In Washington Mrs. Cleveland has a box always, although this year she has not occupied it. The Russian Legation always occupied a box, and all the most famous of the diplomatic set are always in the audience, which is full-dress, a very brilliant sight.

As a rule, the men enjoy the trips. They like the change, and for the credit of the orchestra and for Boston it is worth nothing that they are not viewed as "show people" by either the railroads or the hotels, while such is the sentiment of the body that it is doubtful if anything irregular could happen. The honor of the orchestra as a body is dead set against anything of the sort, and it would take a bold man to brave the sentiment of the men as an organization.

Many of the men have their little quips and quirks, but they are usually of an inoffensive sort, for which no one suffers. One, the first violinist, for example, is invariably late. It is said that so common is this habit that Comee as he paces the platform awaiting his men is often heard to say to the conductor as he sees the violinist enter the gate: "Well, you may go ahead. We are all here." Occasionally the man gets left, and has to travel on behind the orchestra at his own expense.

The assistant manager always laughs when anything is said of the men being left. It recalls a telegram which he once received at Wilmington, as the orchestra travelled homeward from Baltimore. It read: "Me and Hoyer is left." "I often wondered," said Comee, "why they sent that. I knew it almost as soon as they did. Did they expect me to put back for them, or to go back and personally conduct them on the next train? Goodness knows."

The touring has its excitements, like that recently told of the Julie Wyman experience in Philadelphia. Probably the most exciting time was their experience the year of the great blizzard. That was in Gerrick's time. They left Boston on the usual train—7:30 P. M.—and only got as far as East Douglas, where they remained until 6 the next night, when they were pulled back to town, and the entire trip given up. It was very lucky for their comfort that Comee had been so afraid that they might be snowed up during the night that, without saying a word to any one, he sent up to Parker's and bought 200 sandwiches, and at the station he bought all the apples and doughnuts he could find, and had them packed away. They only got forty miles, when they were snow-bound, and the next morning when they woke the snow was over the tops of the cars. They spent all that day shovelling snow by turns to assist the trainmen and get out of their snow-bank.

An amusing experience that is still the subject of laughter was the suggestion made to the conductor at—well, never mind the place—they probably know better by this time—that if the orchestra were to play from the station to the hotel they would probably have a much bigger house at night.

There is a funny story, which, at the time of its happening, was told from Maine to Florida. But that was six years ago, and it was so good that it may bear repeating, and even if it is not new to many Symphony-orchestra followers, they may enjoy a revival of laughter over it. It was when Charlie Behr was in the orchestra, and they gave a concert at Lowell. The opera-house there is situated very much as the Tremont is here—that is, you go into the lobby, pass the ticket-office, and turn round to approach the auditorium. The stage-door is up an alley off another street from the main entrance and quite a little distance from it. Behr only played in the overture of the programme given, and after that was free to go where he pleased. It was the custom of the theatre, as in most one-night places, to bill the next night's attraction as soon as to-night's audience was in, that having the advantage of catching the eyes of the audience coming out. The Symphony Orchestra four-sheet posters were up on the bill-boards at the entrance of the theatre at 8 o'clock. At 8:15 the Cleveland minstrels, which were coming the next evening, had their paper up.

Behr left the stage, went out the stage-door, and, wondering what he would do with himself until the concert was over, strolled up the street, turned a corner, and walked down the main street. Soon he came to the brilliantly-lighted front of a theatre. He read the posters at the door, "Cleveland's Minstrels." That suited him. He went in, bought a ticket, and sauntered into the auditorium. He took a look at the stage, and thought to himself, "Well, that's the queerest minstrel circle I ever saw. All white faces." Then he looked at the middle man—Gerricke, and he bolted back to the box-office and demanded his money. Comee was in the back of the office counting up the house. The ticket-man called out to him: "Mr. Comee, here's one of your men want's his money back."

"What's that?"

"One of your men asking for his money back. Oh, well, come and see for yourself."

Comee went into the front of the office, and there was Behr. He tumbled at once, and when he had a pause in his laughter, he said: "Charlie, if you leave your 50 cents, I'll never tell of this, but if you take it away, I can't promise."

"Oh, confound it," said Behr, "you'll tell it anyway. Give me my 50 cents," and he got it.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 12. März 1895.

Das Schluß-Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters fand gestern Abend in der Academy of Music vor einem sehr zahlreichen und kunstverständigen Publikum statt. Das Programm bot die Fantastique Symphonie von Berlioz, welches in virtuoser Weise zur Geltung gebracht wurde und als eine Musterleistung des Orchesters bezeichnet werden muß. Der „Gang zum Richtplatz" und der „Walpurgis-Nacht Traum", wurden mit einer geradezu großartigen Wirkung zum Vortrag gebracht. Das Gleiche gilt von der berühmten zweiten „Rhapsodie Hongroise" von Liszt.

Als Solist fungirte der erste Cellist des Orchesters, Herr Alwin Schroeder, welcher Dvoraks „Waldesruhe" und Klengels „Capriccio" meisterhaft vortrug.

Das Orchester und Dirigent Paur können mit den großartigen Erfolgen dieser Konzert-Saison wohl zufrieden sein.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

The evening concerts were those of the Boston Orchestra (the last of this season's series) in the Metropolitan Opera House, and of the Beethoven String Quartet, in the Chamber Music Hall. Of the latter it is not [illegible]le to say more than that Mr. Dannreuther's or[illegible]zation, which stands for the best that local mu[illegible]ns are doing in the department of chamber [illegible]ic, entertained a faithful clientele in a most dig[illegible]ed and worthy manner. For his last concert M[illegible] Paur seemed to have determined to give New-Y[illegible]kers all they could stand, and for the first time in [illegible]he history of the Boston Orchestra [illegible] heard one of its concerts that lasted from 8:15 o'clock to 10:40—which is a little more music than ought to be offered at a single sitting. The orchestral numbers consisted of an uninspired and uninspiring overture in C minor, by Robert Kahn, which is called "Elegy," and is still in manuscript, in which form, it is to be hoped, it will remain—not because it is ill made, but because it says nothing over which music lovers have not long been willing to chant a funeral song. The central number was Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, which was brilliantly played, and in which it was a rather unusual pleasure to hear justly tuned and effective bells, or, rather, musical tubes. The concert closed with the overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 13, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will give the closing concert of its series at the Metropolitan Opera House next Thursday evening. Miss Marie Brema will be the singer. The orchestral numbers of the program include the Overture Elegy, Robert Kahn (first performance in New York); symphonie fantastique, Berlioz, and Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from the Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn. The orchestra on this occasion will number nearly one hundred men.

Kneisel Quartet.—The Kneisel Quartet will give the last of its delightful series of concerts at Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall next Friday evening. The program includes the quartet in D minor, Borodine, quartet in D minor, Schubert; and the Beethoven septet, in the performance of which the quartet will be assisted by Mr. Pourtau, clarinet; Mr. Hackebarth, horn; Mr. Litke, bassoon, and Mr. Golde, double bass, all leading members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To-night we will bid farewell to Mr. Paur and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the year. They give their fifth and last concert of the present season. The Symphony Fantastique of Berlioz and Second Rhapsody of Liszt are among the pieces, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cello player, will be the soloist.

* * *

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 16, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The finest of the world's orchestras is to give its last concert in Brooklyn to-night. It played at the Academy of Music yesterday in the preliminary rehearsal, or matinee, and faced about as large an audience as it might gather in Meriden or New Britain or Passaic. It was a fine programme that it offered, too, in which there was a delightful sequence of the classic, the romantic and the sensational. Beethoven opened the programme with the "Egmont" overture, broad, solid, perfectly proportioned and, despite its animation, pervaded with that calm of command which is distinctive of genius. Mr. Paur's reading of this work was temperate and violated no conventions. Bizet's "Arlesienne" suite has been heard before—in fact, there was no new music on the bill—but it endures repetition well. The prelude is simply and purely charming, and indeed the spirit of the work has a gratefully affecting innocence and juvenility. The minuet ends so peacefully that its chirping notes remind one of a night concert in the woods, when the crickets and katydids are calling one another and a bird now and then gurgles and trills in his dreams. The adagietto is sweet nearly to cloying and the carillon, with its booming horns, swinging their three notes up and down, as from a belfry, is joyous. Raff's "In the Woods" symphony is another of the things that can be heard once in a season or oftener. There is a fine romantic quality in Raff and there is a directness of style that usually goes with the romantic tendency. He never maunders after his themes, nor resorts to strained effects in orchestration, nor exhibits himself as a technician in his harmonies; all is free and direct, his melody is always fresh and his harmonies fit it. His "In the Woods" symphony vies with his "Lenore" in picturesqueness and vividness. It has, however, the health of nature in it, for even the rush of the wild hunt of wizards and sprites is but a symbolizing of the activities of earth and air and water, and if it is a bit spooky it is none the less lifting, and the hearer envies the joy of the fierce riders as they hurl themselves across the empyrean, uttering their cries, the hoofs of their horses thundering in the clouds. Though the band was a trifle lax at the beginning of the concert, it worked in admirable unity in this spirited and difficult symphony, and was wrought to a true enthusiasm at the close. Liszt was the other composer on the programme, and he was represented in two numbers, one for orchestra and the other for solo with support of the diminished band. The Hungarian rhapsody No. 2 is an old favorite and it was played yesterday with a fine swing and a vim that emphasized its gypsy origin. The other piece was the E flat concerto, likewise founded on Hungarian music, and this brought out Bernhard Stavenhagen as solo pianist. This artist is not brilliant, but he is an exceptionally satisfying player. His fault, which he does not often exhibit, however, is that of pounding in strong passages, with a pedal somewhat too freely opened. Aside from this he employs a crystaline touch that he tempers to remarkable delicacy, and his shading gains from this. When he rises to power he is less agreeable than he is as a player who lets us feel the power in reserve. In all that he does he is musicianly and unaffected and a player like that is worth many of the crack-a-jacks who dazzle and startle with their purely digital performances and leave soul and sentiment out of the reckoning. The programme will be repeated to-night and this will close the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Brooklyn. It may be the last of its appearances in this city, for it seems that among the million and more of inhabitants in this city there are not enough people who like music to make its visits profitable. The list of works performed during the season is appended:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92
Overture, "Egmont."
Bemberg.....aria, "La Mort de Jeanne d'Arc"
Berlioz.....overture, "Carnaval Romain"
Bizet.....suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1
Dvorak, Symphony No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95.
Overture, "Carneval" (first time).
Gluck.....Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne
Laohner.....suite No. 1, in D minor, Op. 113
Liszt.....Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, in D minor
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in E flat.
Masse.....aria, "Galathee"
Massenet.....aria "Pleurez! pleurez, mes yeux!" from "The Cid."
Mendelssohn...Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."
Raff.....Symphony No. 3, in F major, "In the Woods," Op. 153.
Saint-Saens.....Prelude, "The Deluge"
Aria from "Samson and Delilah."
Schumann.....Symphony No. 2, in C major
Concerto for pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54.
Concerto for violoncello, Op. 129.
Smetana.....Overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut"
Wagner.....Rudelsmarsch"

FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA.

IT'S LAST CONCERT OF THE SEASON.

An Uninteresting Novelty and a Poor Rendering of the Fantastic Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its local season at the Metropolitan Opera House last night with a concert that, although of merit, was not quite up to the standard of this excellent organization. The sole instrumental novelty, which was an overture entitled "Elegy," by Robert Kahn, is a work that is in manuscript. The hearing afforded last night warrants the opinion that the overture will never reach the dignity of publication, unless Herr Kahn, who is reported to be a wealthy dilettante, gratifies his pride solely "to see himself in print." "Elegy" is hardly more than a reproduction of a faint mood, and it is almost totally lacking in ideas of originality or strength, though not without a slight poetic charm, and presented without many blunders of rhetoric.

Another novelty was the first appearance here of Miss Marie Brema in concert, who is disguised as Fraulein Brema when she sings with Mr. Damrosch's company. Miss Brema is Scotch by birth, but musically a German, and she has the best virtues and worst vices of her adopted artistic land. She is a great Wagnerian artist, but an uneven vocalist. She is so faithful to the master's principles of intensified speech that her singing of the aria from Gounod's "Reine de Saba" was faulty in intonation and spasmodic in style of delivery. But the songs she afterward gave suited her methods better, because they did not need long sustained effort and at the same time gave the audience a taste of Miss Brema's ardent, dramatic artistic temperament, which it found much to its liking. Miss Brema should correct her faults of vocalism before it is too late.

The principal instrumental number was Berlioz's fantastic symphony, and it was played to strict time and at a consequent loss of imagery and color. M. Paur is a conservative and scholarly conductor, but his reading of that bizarre and highly imaginative work reminded one of the performance of a Hamlet who loftily ignored the frenzied and overwrought characteristics of the Prince and called on his father's ghost purely as a matter of business and as a gentleman who loved his father on earth should.

The best orchestral performance was Mendelssohn's notturno from his "Midsummer Night Dream," which was played with sympathy and understanding. The audience was not as large as usual.

The New-York Times.

SIXTEEN PAGES

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Last Concert at the Metropolitan Opera House an Excellent One.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Metropolitan Opera House. The audience was one of tolerable size, though in the Metropolitan it did not look large. The concert was an admirable entertainment, and went far toward atoning for the many shortcomings of Mr. Emil Paur in the course of the present season. The most serious fault of the concert was its length. Usually Mr. Paur's programmes are judicious in this respect. He generally manages to get through inside of two hours, but last night he ran to two hours and a quarter, which is quite too much for human patience. The result was that some of the best orchestral playing heard in New-York this season went for almost nothing.

The orchestral numbers were an overture, "Elegy," in C minor, by Robert Kahn, played for the first time here; Berlois's "Fantastic Symphony," and the overture, scherzo, nocturne, and wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. It is quite impossible to tell why Mr. Paur treated us to the Kahn number. It proved to be a most doleful and wearisome composition, written with sufficient skill in the handling of the orchestra, but without any special reason for existence. If we must have novelties, let us have some by American composers, whose works will at least have a patriotic excuse for existence if they have no other.

The Berlois symphony was played most commendably. Mr. Paur had evidently given the score sympathetic study, which is to be praised, particularly because his tastes seem to lie in other directions. The orchestra displayed to the highest advantage its admirable virtuosity, and the remarkable drum effects were brought out in a striking manner. Even the bells were in tune, and that is indeed rare. The Mendelssohn music was played with delightful smoothness and precision, and seldom has the hackneyed wedding march been given with so much dignity and breadth of style.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Marie Brema of the German opera. Her numbers were the familiar aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" and songs by Brahms, Loring Thomas, and Kjerulf. The second song, to which Mr. Schroeder played a 'cello obligato beautifully, had to to be repeated. Miss Brema sang all her numbers excellently. At each appearance this artist reveals new powers, and it is now safe to say that she is one of the best dramatic singers ever heard by this public.

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, March 15, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Paur has been often praised for the brevity of his programmes, which seldom last more than an hour and a half; but his idea seems to be after all that two hours is the proper length of a concert. At any rate he made his last concert, which took place yesterday evening at the Metropolitan, so long as to raise the average for the whole series. The mistake could have been avoided by omitting the first piece on the programme. It was an overture entitled "Elegy," by a young German composer of about thirty summers, named Robert Kahn. He is said to have been a pupil of Bülow and Brahms, and his overture gives evidence of that fact, for it is as academically dry and uninteresting as the performances of Bülow and the compositions of Brahms. Music ought to be æsthetic, but this piece is ascetic. Herr Kahn must have a big Puritan streak in his make-up, for he labors zealously to avoid everything that could possibly give pleasure to the audience, and succeeds admirably in this effort.

Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which followed the overture, reveals its composer's lack of a genuine dramatic instinct. He was very clever in poetically conceiving a theatrical effect, but he lacks the power of working up a climax and dwelling on it; and every climax is followed by a sudden anti-climax, which is a vexatious disappointment. How much more genuinely inspired, how much more beautiful, even in orchestration, is Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, a fine performance of which closed the concert!

The vocal soloist was Frl. Brema, who won much applause for her singing of Lieder by Brahms, Goring Thomas, and Kjerulf. She sang with excellent spirit and style, but her voice was lacking in resonance and sensuous charm. She does not sufficiently utilize the nasal resonance. It is strange how few singers understand the art of tone-emission, on which the sensuous charm of singing depends.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Kahn's "Elegy" the Novelty of a Beautifully Rendered Programme at the Metropolitan.

There are programmes which sound better than they read and vice versa.

That of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth and final concert, which occurred at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening, belonged to the former class.

Curious—very curious—did it look in print to see Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony in juxtaposition with a new "Elegy," by Gustav Kahn. And the only other orchestral number was Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream."

So beautiful, however, was everything done by the Boston Orchestra—it is still what it was, the best instrumental organization in America—that all prejudices were silenced quickly enough.

The novelty of the evening, Kahn's "Elegy," is, as the title would indicate, a trifle Mendelssohnian in point of character. But it is brilliantly scored and sufficiently interesting to be played again.

Of Berlioz's C major symphony (No. 1), it would be about as easy to say anything new as about Mendelssohn's most famous composition.

Miss Brema was the soloist.

Besides an operatic selection, which has become as great an affliction in the concert hall as the "Theure Halle" aria, she sang songs by Brahms, Goring Thomas and Kjerulf. And wonderfully did she "say" them all. Of course, such an intense, dramatic nature as Miss Brema's is heard to much greater advantage on the stage.

But she delighted her audience and had to repeat the Lieder. It seemed as if the listeners would never tire hearkening and applauding.

In a short, a very short time, since that third act of "Die Walkuere," Miss Brema has become something of a celebrity.

N.Y. FIGARO

Sonnabend, den 9. März 1895.

Providence, R. I., 7. März '95.

Die letzten Wochen waren überaus thatenreich in musikalischer Hinsicht und scheint es auch endlich unseren lieben Providencern nicht an Liebe zur herrlichen und geselligen Kunst der Töne zu fehlen. Daß die Konzerte des Boston Symphony Orchesters anregend und belebend auf das Publikum wirken, ist außer Frage und ganz dasselbe müssen wir von den Arion Konzerten sagen.

Die Programme des Boston Symphonie Orchesters sind ja nicht ausschließlich klassischen Tonwerken gewidmet, sondern es ist auch die neue Musikströmung berücksichtigt. Auf jeden Fall geschieht die Wiedergabe der Tonwerke bei den Grundsätzen des Dirigenten und der Künstlerschaft der Kapellmitglieder auf die würdigste Weise. Die Leistungen des Arion

---

The

FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifth and last concert for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in the Metropolitan Opera House. There was enough of novelty, enough of solo work, and enough of old-time music on the programme to make a wide variety in style, and thus to keep attention on the alert. An interesting composition, in manuscript, by the young German composer Robert Kahn, began the concert. Herr Kahn is a pupil and friend of Brahms, of Joachim, and of Mr. Paur. He resides in Berlin, where he is a teacher in the Hochschule. For so young a man—he is only 26—he has composed much, chiefly chamber music and songs. The "Elegy" upon the programme last evening is quite original and full of true sentiment.

The chief labor of the concert lay in Berlioz's exquisite Fantastic Symphony, which the orchestra played to perfection. The first violins were especially noticeable for sweetness and smoothness of tone, while the whole band should have credit for its success in making those delicate nuances of expression which Berlioz's music must inevitably receive for its proper rendering.

The last part of this symphony is called "A Walpurgis Night's Dream," and is a marvel of weird effects and picturings. It is as full of emotional demands and compellings as the most extravagant melodrama, and causes the nervous system to be wrought up to a tremendous pitch of excitement by its graphic descriptions of witches, hobgoblins, fairies, stormy weather, and church bells, these ingredients being mixed in various degrees of potency and proportion throughout the long movement.

Fräulein Brema sang with the orchestra Gounod's great air from "La Reine de Saba," "Plus grand dans son obscurité," but was by no means as successful in this as in the Lieder which afterward she gave with piano accompaniment.

The last number on the programme was the "Midsummer Night's Dream." We have heard this music better played than it was last night, but it was welcome and very charming, though undoubtedly Mendelssohn, like Haydn, Mazart, and others, is rapidly fading into the mists of the past.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Kahn's "Elegy" the Novelty of a Beautifully Rendered Programme at the Metropolitan.

There are programmes which sound better than they read and vice versa.

That of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth and final concert, which occurred at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening, belonged to the former class.

Curious—very curious—did it look in print to see Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony in juxtaposition with a new "Elegy," by Gustav Kahn. And the only other orchestral number was Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream."

So beautiful, however, was everything done by the Boston Orchestra—it is still what it was, the best instrumental organization in America—that all prejudices were silenced quickly enough.

The novelty of the evening, Kahn's "Elegy," is, as the title would indicate, a trifle Mendelssohnian in point of character. But it is brilliantly scored and sufficiently interesting to be played again.

Of Berlioz's C major symphony (No. 1), it would be about as easy to say anything new as about Mendelssohn's most famous composition.

Miss Brema was the soloist.

Besides an operatic selection, which has become as great an affliction in the concert hall as the "Theure Halle" aria, she sang songs by Brahms, Goring Thomas and Kjerulf. And wonderfully did she "say" them all. Of course, such an intense, dramatic nature as Miss Brema's is heard to much greater advantage on the stage.

But she delighted her audience and had to repeat the Lieder. It seemed as if the listeners would never tire hearkening and applauding.

In a short, a very short time, since that third act of "Die Walkuere," Miss Brema has become something of a celebrity.

BY GEORGE W. THOMAS.

FRIDAY, March 15, 1895.

A LOPSIDED PROGRAMME.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening in the Metropolitan Opera House. The programme was what an alienist would have called asymmetrical. It was lopsided, top heavy and bulged in the middle. Berlioz's long, wonderfully scored, thin in thought, fantastic symphony was played, but it sounded antiquated. Its pseudo-classicism bores its "property," and theatrical blood and thunder in the witches' Sabbath no longer thrills. It is as stale as "The Mysteries of Udolpho" and romances of that ilk. But scored—heavens, what gorgeous color; what ingenuity; what finesse!

Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music—his happiest—was played as no other orchestra in America can play it. The scherzo exhibits the marvelous playing of the woodwind, while the strings—an elastic, sonorous band—did wonders in the overture. But isn't Mendelssohn trite?

Marie Brema sang Gounod's "Plus Grand Dans Son Obscurite" in an eloquent fashion. She literally ennobled its banal measures. Later she sang some songs with piano accompaniment, Brahms' wondrous "Mainacht" with luscious coloring, a piece of trash by Goring Thomas called "Time's Garden," altogether unworthy of his pen, and a buoyant little song by Kjerulf, the Norwegian. The Thomas piece had a 'cello obligato beautifully played by Alwin Schroeder, and it was sung with intense feeling by Brema, but for all that it is musical rot, not much better than that atrocious bit of British blubber known to fame and Philistia as "The Lost Chord." Brema grows on one. She was magnificent last night, and the Kjerulf song, with its Valkyrie motif, had to be repeated, and, alas! for the public taste, so was the Thomas trash. The novelty was an overture by Robert Kahn, a well-scored, fine-felt fragment, and well developed. M. Paur conducted with passion and with a stick.

The World.

Published by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York.

FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Final Concert at the Metropolitan Opera-House, with Frl. Marie Brema as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their fifth and final concert this season at the Metropolitan last night. There was a time when the concerts of this orchestra were the most important events of their kind during each musical season. That this seems no longer to be the case, at any rate in the same degree, is not because the capacity of the orchestra in doing ideally perfect work is in any sense lessened, but because their possibilities are not properly brought out.

Great armies need great commanders, and Mr. Paur is anything but great. Robert Kahn, the composer of the overture, "Elegy," C minor, which opened the programme and which was heard for the first time, is a wealthy Berlin amateur, a pupil of Brahms and Von Bulow. The form and manner of his musical speech are unexceptionable, far better indeed than the matter, which could hardly be called either very novel or very interesting—uneventful in short.

Frl. Marie Brema sang an aria from Gounod's "Reine de Saba" with orchestra, and three songs, Brahms's "Mainacht," Goring Thomas's "Time's Guerdon" and Kjerulf's "Von Liebe," with piano in a manner that showed that the lyric as well as the declamatory style was within the range of her abilities. The Gounod aria was perhaps marked by more temperament than finish, but the three songs were given with much sympathetic charm and grace, and refinement of style, the two by Goring Thomas and Kjerulf being redemanded and repeated. Frl. Brema does not always perhaps sing quite easily, but her taste is excellent and her charm undeniable.

The Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, overture, scherzo, notturno and "Wedding March," which brought the concert to a close, lost much of its romantic grace, delicacy and charm and became commonplace, not to say positively common, in Mr. Paur's hands.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

---

[108]

Morning Advertiser.

FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA.

ITS LAST CONCERT OF THE SEASON.

An Uninteresting Novelty and a Poor Rendering of the Fantastic Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its local season at the Metropolitan Opera House last night with a concert that, although of merit, was not quite up to the standard of this excellent organization. The sole instrumental novelty, which was an overture entitled "Elegy," by Robert Kahn, is a work that is in manuscript. The hearing afforded last night warrants the opinion that the overture will never reach the dignity of publication, unless Herr Kahn, who is reported to be a wealthy dilettante, gratifies his pride solely "to see himself in print." "Elegy" is hardly more than a reproduction of a faint mood, and it is almost totally lacking in ideas of originality or strength, though not without a slight poetic charm, and presented without many blunders of rhetoric.

Another novelty was the first appearance here of Miss Marie Brema in concert, who is disguised as Fraulein Brema when she sings with Mr. Damrosch's company. Miss Brema is Scotch by birth, but musically a German, and she has the best virtues and worst vices of her adopted artistic land. She is a great Wagnerian artist, but an uneven vocalist. She is so faithful to the master's principles of intensified speech that her singing of the aria from Gounod's "Reine de Saba" was faulty in intonation and spasmodic in style of delivery. But the songs she afterward gave suited her methods better, because they did not need long sustained effort and at the same time gave the audience a taste of Miss Brema's ardent, dramatic artistic temperament, which it found much to its liking. Miss Brema should correct her faults of vocalism before it is too late.

The principal instrumental number was Berlioz's fantastic symphony, and it was played to strict time and at a consequent loss of imagery and color. M. Paur is a conservative and scholarly conductor, but his reading of that bizarre and highly imaginative work reminded one of the performance of a Hamlet who loftily ignored the frenzied and overwrought characteristics of the Prince and called on his father's ghost purely as a matter of business and as a gentleman who loved his father on earth should.

The best orchestral performance was Mendelssohn's notturno from his "Midsummer Night Dream," which was played with sympathy and understanding. The audience was not as large as usual.

The New-York Times.

SIXTEEN PAGES

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Last Concert at the Metropolitan Opera House an Excellent One.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Metropolitan Opera House. The audience was one of tolerable size, though in the Metropolitan it did not look large. The concert was an admirable entertainment, and went far toward atoning for the many shortcomings of Mr. Emil Paur in the course of the present season. The most serious fault of the concert was its length. Usually Mr. Paur's programmes are judicious in this respect. He generally manages to get through inside of two hours, but last night he ran to two hours and a quarter, which is quite too much for human patience. The result was that some of the best orchestral playing heard in New-York this season went for almost nothing.

The orchestral numbers were an overture, "Elegy," in C minor, by Robert Kahn, played for the first time here; Berloiz's "Fantastic Symphony," and the overture, scherzo, nocturne, and wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. It is quite impossible to tell why Mr. Paur treated us to the Kahn number. It proved to be a most doleful and wearisome composition, written with sufficient skill in the handling of the orchestra, but without any special reason for existence. If we must have novelties, let us have some by American composers, whose works will at least have a patriotic excuse for existence if they have no other.

The Berloiz symphony was played most commendably. Mr. Paur had evidently given the score sympathetic study, which is to be praised, particularly because his tastes seem to lie in other directions. The orchestra displayed to the highest advantage its admirable virtuosity, and the remarkable drum effects were brought out in a striking manner. Even the bells were in tune, and that is indeed rare. The Mendelssohn music was played with delightful smoothness and precision, and seldom has the hackneyed wedding march been given with so much dignity and breadth of style.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Marie Brema of the German opera. Her numbers were the familiar aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" and songs by Brahms, Loring Thomas, and Kjerulf. The second song, to which Mr. Schroeder played a 'cello obligato beautifully, had to to be repeated. Miss Brema sang all her numbers excellently. At each appearance this artist reveals new powers, and it is now safe to say that she is one of the best dramatic singers ever heard by this public.

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, March 15, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Paur has been often praised for the brevity of his programmes, which seldom last more than an hour and a half; but his idea seems to be after all that two hours is the proper length of a concert. At any rate he made his last concert, which took place yesterday evening at the Metropolitan, so long as to raise the average for the whole series. The mistake could have been avoided by omitting the first piece on the programme. It was an overture entitled "Elegy," by a young German composer of about thirty summers, named Robert Kahn. He is said to have been a pupil of Bülow and Brahms, and his overture gives evidence of that fact, for it is as academically dry and uninteresting as the performances of Bülow and the compositions of Brahms. Music ought to be æsthetic, but this piece is ascetic. Herr Kahn must have a big Puritan streak in his make-up, for he labors zealously to avoid everything that could possibly give pleasure to the audience, and succeeds admirably in this effort.

Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which followed the overture, reveals its composer's lack of a genuine dramatic instinct. He was very clever in poetically conceiving a theatrical effect, but he lacks the power of working up a climax and dwelling on it; and every climax is followed by a sudden anti-climax, which is a vexatious disappointment. How much more genuinely inspired, how much more beautiful, even in orchestration, is Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, a fine performance of which closed the concert!

The vocal soloist was Frl. Brema, who won much applause for her singing of Lieder by Brahms, Goring Thomas, and Kjerulf. She sang with excellent spirit and style, but her voice was lacking in resonance and sensuous charm. She does not sufficiently utilize the nasal resonance. It is strange how few singers understand the art of tone-emission, on which the sensuous charm of singing depends.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Kahn's "Elegy" the Novelty of a Beautifully Rendered Programme at the Metropolitan.

There are programmes which sound better than they read and vice versa.

That of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth and final concert, which occurred at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening, belonged to the former class.

Curious—very curious—did it look in print to see Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony in juxtaposition with a new "Elegy," by Gustav Kahn. And the only other orchestral number was Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream."

So beautiful, however, was everything done by the Boston Orchestra—it is still what it was, the best instrumental organization in America—that all prejudices were silenced quickly enough.

The novelty of the evening, Kahn's "Elegy," is, as the title would indicate, a trifle Mendelssohnian in point of character. But it is brilliantly scored and sufficiently interesting to be played again.

Of Berlioz's C major symphony (No. 1), it would be about as easy to say anything new as about Mendelssohn's most famous composition.

Miss Brema was the soloist.

Besides an operatic selection, which has become as great an affliction in the concert hall as the "Theure Halle" aria, she sang songs by Brahms, Goring Thomas and Kjerulf. And wonderfully did she "say" them all. Of course, such an intense, dramatic nature as Miss Brema's is heard to much greater advantage on the stage.

But she delighted her audience and had to repeat the Lieder. It seemed as if the listeners would never tire hearkening and applauding.

In a short, a very short time, since that third act of "Die Walkuere," Miss Brema has become something of a celebrity.

N.Y. FIGARO

Sonnabend, den 9. März 1895.

Providence, R. I., 7. März '95.

Die letzten Wochen waren überaus thatenreich in musikalischer Hinsicht und scheint es auch endlich unseren lieben Providencern nicht an Liebe zur herrlichen und geselligen Kunst der Töne zu fehlen. Daß die Konzerte des Boston Symphoni Orchesters anregend und belebend auf das Publikum wirken, ist außer Frage und ganz dasselbe müssen wir von den Arion Konzerten sagen.

Die Programme des Boston Symphonie Orchesters sind ja nicht ausschließlich klassischen Tonwerken gewidmet, sondern es ist auch die neue Musikströmung berücksichtigt. Auf jeden Fall geschieht die Wiedergabe der Tonwerke bei den Grundsätzen des Dirigenten und der Künstlerschaft der Kapellmitglieder auf die würdigste Weise. Die Leistungen des Arion

The Sun.

FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifth and last concert for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in the Metropolitan Opera House. There was enough of novelty, enough of solo work, and enough of old-time music on the programme to make a wide variety in style, and thus to keep attention on the alert. An interesting composition, in manuscript, by the young German composer Robert Kahn, began the concert. Herr Kahn is a pupil and friend of Brahms, of Joachim, and of Mr. Paur. He resides in Berlin, where he is a teacher in the Hochschule. For so young a man—he is only 26—he has composed much, chiefly chamber music and songs. The "Elegy" upon the programme last evening is quite original and full of true sentiment.

The chief labor of the concert lay in Berlioz's exquisite Fantastic Symphony, which the orchestra played to perfection. The first violins were especially noticeable for sweetness and smoothness of tone, while the whole band should have credit for its success in making those delicate nuances of expression which Berlioz's music must inevitably receive for its proper rendering.

The last part of this symphony is called "A Walpurgis Night's Dream," and is a marvel of weird effects and picturings. It is as full of emotional demands and compellings as the most extravagant melodrama, and causes the nervous system to be wrought up to a tremendous pitch of excitement by its graphic descriptions of witches, hobgoblins, fairies, stormy weather, and church bells, these ingredients being mixed in various degrees of potency and proportion throughout the long movement.

Fräulein Brema sang with the orchestra Gounod's great air from "La Reine de Saba," "Plus grand dans son obscurité," but was by no means as successful in this as in the Lieder which afterward she gave with piano accompaniment.

The last number on the programme was the "Midsummer Night's Dream." We have heard this music better played than it was last night, but it was welcome and very charming, though undoubtedly Mendelssohn, like Haydn, Mazart, and others, is rapidly fading into the mists of the past.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Kahn's "Elegy" the Novelty of a Beautifully Rendered Programme at the Metropolitan.

There are programmes which sound better than they read and vice versa.

That of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth and final concert, which occurred at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening, belonged to the former class.

Curious—very curious—did it look in print to see Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony in juxtaposition with a new "Elegy," by Gustav Kahn. And the only other orchestral number was Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream."

So beautiful, however, was everything done by the Boston Orchestra—it is still what it was, the best instrumental organization in America—that all prejudices were silenced quickly enough.

The novelty of the evening, Kahn's "Elegy," is, as the title would indicate, a trifle Mendelssohnian in point of character. But it is brilliantly scored and sufficiently interesting to be played again.

Of Berlioz's C major symphony (No. 1), it would be about as easy to say anything new as about Mendelssohn's most famous composition.

Miss Brema was the soloist.

Besides an operatic selection, which has become as great an affliction in the concert hall as the "Theure Halle" aria, she sang songs by Brahms, Goring Thomas and Kjerulf. And wonderfully did she "say" them all. Of course, such an intense, dramatic nature as Miss Brema's is heard to much greater advantage on the stage.

But she delighted her audience and had to repeat the Lieder. It seemed as if the listeners would never tire hearkening and applauding.

In a short, a very short time, since that third act of "Die Walkuere," Miss Brema has become something of a celebrity.

The New York Recorder.

BY GEORGE W. TURNER.

FRIDAY, March 15, 1895.

A LOPSIDED PROGRAMME.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening in the Metropolitan Opera House. The programme was what an alienist would have called asymmetrical. It was lopsided, top heavy and bulged in the middle. Berlioz's long, wonderfully scored, thin in thought, fantastic symphony was played, but it sounded antiquated. Its pseudo-classicism bores its "property," and theatrical blood and thunder in the witches' Sabbath no longer thrills. It is as stale as "The Mysteries of Udolpho" and romances of that ilk. But scored—heavens, what gorgeous color; what ingenuity; what finesse!

Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music—his happiest—was played as no other orchestra in America can play it. The scherzo exhibits the marvelous playing of the woodwind, while the strings—an elastic, sonorous band—did wonders in the overture. But isn't Mendelssohn trite?

Marie Brema sang Gounod's "Plus Grand Dans Son Obscurite" in an eloquent fashion. She literally ennobled its banal measures. Later she sang some songs with piano accompaniment, Brahms' wondrous "Mainacht" with luscious coloring, a piece of trash by Goring Thomas called "Time's Garden," altogether unworthy of his pen, and a buoyant little song by Kjerulf, the Norwegian. The Thomas piece had a 'cello obligato beautifully played by Alwin Schroeder, and it was sung with intense feeling by Brema, but for all that it is musical rot, not much better than that atrocious bit of British blubber known to fame and Philistia as "The Lost Chord." Brema grows on one. She was magnificent last night, and the Kjerulf song, with its Valkyrie motif, had to be repeated, and, alas! for the public taste, so was the Thomas trash. The novelty was an overture by Robert Kahn, a well-scored, fine-felt fragment, and well developed. Mr. Paur conducted with passion and with a stick.

The World.

Published by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York.

FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Final Concert at the Metropolitan Opera-House, with Frl. Marie Brema as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their fifth and final concert this season at the Metropolitan last night. There was a time when the concerts of this orchestra were the most important events of their kind during each musical season. That this seems no longer to be the case, at any rate in the same degree, is not because the capacity of the orchestra in doing ideally perfect work is in any sense lessened, but because their possibilities are not properly brought out.

Great armies need great commanders, and Mr. Paur is anything but great. Robert Kahn, the composer of the overture, "Elegy," C minor, which opened the programme and which was heard for the first time, is a wealthy Berlin amateur, a pupil of Brahms and Von Bulow. The form and manner of his musical speech are unexceptionable, far better indeed than the matter, which could hardly be called either very novel or very interesting—uneventful in short.

Frl. Marie Brema sang an aria from Gounod's "Reine de Saba" with orchestra, and three songs, Brahms's "Mainacht," Goring Thomas's "Time's Guerdon" and Kjerulf's "Von Liebe," with piano in a manner that showed that the lyric as well as the declamatory style was within the range of her abilities. The Gounod aria was perhaps marked by more temperament than finish, but the three songs were given with much sympathetic charm and grace, and refinement of style, the two by Goring Thomas and Kjerulf being redemanded and repeated. Frl. Brema does not always perhaps sing quite easily, but her taste is excellent and her charm undeniable.

The Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, overture, scherzo, notturno and "Wedding March," which brought the concert to a close, lost much of its romantic grace, delicacy and charm and became commonplace, not to say positively common, in Mr. Paur's hands.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

FADED TEXT

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 19, 1895

Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The seventh concert in the series by the Kneisel quartette was given last evening in Union Hall. The assisting artists were Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen, pianist. The programme: Schumann, Quartette in A major, op. 41, No. 1. Songs with piano—(a) Emil Paur, Huete Dich; (b) Bizet, Aubade; c) Bizet, Chanson d'Avril; (d) Henschel, Spring; Dvorak, Piano quintette in A major, op. 81.

The ensemble playing of the quartette was very fine and was up to the high standard which it has attained among the musicians of Boston.

The Schumann Quartette in A major, op. 41, No. 1, was full of those rich harmonies which is characteristic of Schumann's string quartette works. The second movement was rendered in a masterly manner, and the last movement was played with a spirit and exactness which elicited much applause from a highly appreciative audience. The quintette by Dvorak was a fitting climax to the programme.

Each movement displayed the composer's originality in the treatment of figures and melodies, the entire composition being well written. The scherzo was treated in an artistic manner by both string and pianoforte. The finale was a brilliant and fitting ending to the quintette.

Mr. Stavenhagen had excellent opportunities of displaying his brilliant technique and splendid phrasing. As a pianist he never fails to please and hold the attention of the audience. The songs rendered by Miss Gertrude Franklin were sung in her usual pleasing manner, and the vocal execution of Henschel's "Spring" song was especially fine. The sympathetic quality of her voice and style of singing added much to the enjoyment of the programme.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 78.

TUESDAY, MARCH 19, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The seventh Kneisel Quartet concert was given in Union Hall last evening, with Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen as assisting artists, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, who had been announced, being prevented by illness from appearing. The concert was interesting from first to last, and there could have been no such dull moments enjoyed (?) by the superpious musician as the Brahms trio, originally announced, might possibly have inflicted. The Schumann Quartet, in A major op. 41, No. 3—not No. 1 as the programme announced—is well known here, yet it cannot be heard too often. Romantic in character from first to last its romanticism is all in all of the most refined—the very worthiest type. Its scholarship throughout is that of the master who is no less soulful and spontaneous than scholarly in all that he has to say. It would be difficult to find in the entire chamber music repertoire a more thoroughly interesting masterpiece than is Schumann quartet.

Of its performance it seems well-nigh superfluous to say more than that Mr. Kneisel and his associates were at their best; but, if anything, a special word of tribute may be paid their performance of the assai agitato, for more nearly perfect playing ensemble has not been heard in this city, not even from the Kneisel Quartet.

The group of songs following the quartet were as follows, viz.: "Heute Dich," by Emil Paur; "Aubade" and "Chanson d'Avril," Bizet, and the "Spring Song," by Henschel. Here, indeed, were four songs which, to be even adequately interpreted, required an artist of the highest intelligence, not to mention the intricate and varied difficulty of their technical demands; yet that these songs were heard at their best, as Miss Franklin sang them, no unbiased musician could for a moment doubt. They were one and all most charmingly interpreted. Superlatively fine, indeed, was the artist's utterance of her each and every phrase. The intricate and perplexing changes of rhythm in the song by Paur were beautifully delivered, while as for perfect intonation and pure legato singing the Bizet songs were given in a style that was flawless. Even the difficult song by Henschel, with its attending trills and roulades, was sung with perfect ease and delightful technical finish."

Miss Franklin was most heartily applauded and recalled. The Dvorak quintet was ardently played, yet, with not quite the efficiency that an adequate number of rehearsals with Herr Stavenhagen would have insured. While Herr Stavenhagen did much refined and artistic playing, he was at times, notably in his forte playing, both coarse and noisy. Mr. Kneisel and his associates were quite to the reverse; yet, even their worthiest playing was not wholly successful in contending with the very pugilistic kind of animosity that the pianist seemed to entertain for his keyboard.

The eighth and last concert will be given on Monday evening, April 8. C. L. C.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MARCH 19, 1895.

Kneisel Quartet.

As the series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet draws near a close the attendance becomes larger, and the concert last night attracted one of the largest audiences of the season.

Never before so far as the writer knows have the concerts consisted of anything but instrumental music. An innovation was made last night however, and Miss Gertrude Franklin sang four songs as the second number of the program.

Miss Franklin is uneven in her singing, at times almost perfect and again far from that. Last night she was not in her best voice and yet her singing gave real pleasure, and she was recalled after the fourth song. Her part of the program contained two songs by Bizet, one by Henschel and one by Mr Paur. The last named, which was sung first, by the way, did not leave a very distinct impression.

Messrs Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder began the concert with the Shumann quartet in A major, which they played superbly. The second movement, moderato, and the closing one were magnificent. In the former, Mr Schroeder was preeminent, and the latter was remarkable on account of Mr Kneisel's splendid execution.

The last number on the program was Dvorak's piano quintet in A major. In this the quartet was assisted by Bernard Stavenhagen. The enthusiasm of the audience was roused to a high pitch, although some of the music seemed forced and unnatural.

The last concert of the season will be given in Union hall, April 8.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 19, 1895.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The Kneisel Quartet's concert last night in Union Hall was, in its way, the finest of this season. The music was of a different type than usual, Schumann's quartet in A major (Op. 41, No. 1), and Dvorak's piano quintet in A major (Op. 81), making the whole of the instrumental part of the concert. For the last of these the quartet was assisted by Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen.

Miss Gertrude Franklin sang four songs, by Paur, Henschel and two by Bizet.

The quintet was the more appreciated by the audience, which was large, as is usual at these concerts. This work has more snap than the Schumann selection, which, with Dvorak's own peculiarities in the matter of intervals—and themes, for that matter—makes it more spicy to listen to.

The eighth and last concert of the Kneisel Quartet will be given on April 8.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, MARCH 19, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its seventh concert at Union Hall last evening. The program was as follows: Quartet in A major, op. 41, No. 1, Schumann; songs, with piano accompaniment; piano quintet in A major, op. 81, Dvorak. Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer, and Bernhard Stavenhagen the club's assistant in the quintet.

It seemed, when the Schumann quartet had been played, that its varied charms would constitute the most pleasing reminiscence of the evening. The dominant 'cello passages as played by Mr. Schroeder, haunted the memory; the fascination of the adagio movement had not vanished, and the delight in the rare ensemble had been as irresistible as ever. Yet when the first movement of the quintet was over, scarcely a vestige of Schumann's piquancy and strange beauty remained. The zest with which Mr. Stavenhagen began the performance of his part of the quintet soon seized all the players. They appeared to strive to outdo one another in faultlessness and delicacy of skill. In the scherzo, despite the artistic restraint of the pianist, there were vivid glimpses of the accomplished virtuoso; but, however, only the unsympathetic could have quashed the impulse. The large audience applauded the players loudly until they had twice bowed in response.

Henschel's "Spring," the only song which Miss Franklin sang in English, gave more genuine pleasure than the songs of Bizet and Emil Paur together. The applause, strange to relate, was discriminate.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, MARCH 19, 1895.

Union Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The seventh of the Kneisel Quartet concerts was given last night at Union Hall. The quartet was assisted by Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen, in giving the following programme—

Schumann: Quartet in A major, op. 41, No. 1.
Assai sostenuto—allegro molto moderato
—assai agitato—adagio molto—
—molto allegro.

Songs with piano:
(a) Emil Paur. Huete dich.
(b) Bizet. Aubade.
(c) Bizet. Chanson d'Avril.
(d) Henschel. Spring.

Dvorák: Piano Quintet in A major, op. 81.
Allegra ma non tanto—Dumka (andante con moto).
Scherzo (furiant, molto vivace—
Finalé (allegro).

Without dealing in superlatives, it is impossible to express adequately the masterly interpretation of this program by the quartet and Mr. Stavenhagen.

The Schumann Quartet, with its rich modulations, close harmonies and passionate strength of utterance, was read with the truest comprehension by these four musicians, whose warmth and strength of tone lends an orchestral effect quite unique in the annals of chamber music. They met the demands of the stormy assai agitato with full sympathy for its intensity, while the poetic melancholy of the adagio molto was never better expressed. The piano quintet by Dvorák is replete with melodies introduced in the very first bar where the 'cello sings a fascinating tune savoring of creole days to a running piano accompaniment. The Dumka movement, both vocal and piquant, set the audience into such a state of physical sympathy that heads and hands swayed with the rythmic motion of the music.

Mr. Stavenhagen's versatility was a salient point for consideration upon this occasion to those who had heard his recitals of the past winter. He seems equal to a true expression of any musical thought, not being a specialist belonging to some particular style or school, as was demonstrated by his grasp upon not only the technicalities, but the feeling of the composition under consideration, differing so widely from those we have heard him interpret up to this time. Here the precision of attack and perfect intonation of the Kneisel Quartet supported ably Mr. Stavenhagen's fine work, their united beauty of accent standing out as a lesson to students of that important musical feature.

Miss Franklin in her group of songs was hardly at her best. Her intonation, usually impeccable, was uncertain, and a fault fast becoming permanent in her singing (that of enunciating through nearly closed teeth), was conspicuous. In the Henschel song of spring fewer "white tones" were noticeable and more of Miss Franklin's usual excellence of phrasing was perceptible.

PRO[illegible]NCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, MARCH 21, 1895.

Symphony Concert.

The last concert for this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last evening. There was an attendance which seemed slightly above the average, and a fine programme, whose chief number was Dr. Antonin Dvorak's new "American" symphony, a work which has caused no little discussion among the critics. Another pleasant feature of the concert was the appearance of that very excellent singer, Miss Gertrude Franklin, who has not been heard in Providence for several years. Aside from Dr. Dvorak's symphony, the programme contained nothing new, but the remaining numbers, though more or less familiar, were agreeable in themselves and pleasantly contrasted. The order was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95.....Antonin Dvorak
I. Adagio (E minor).
Allegro molto (E minor).
II. Larghetto (D-flat major).
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace (E minor).
Trio (C major).
IV. Allegro con fuoco (E minor).
Aria, "Sweet Bird".....Haendel
Chaconne and Rigodon from Suite "Aline.
Reine de Golconde".....Monsigny
"Danse Macabre".....Saint-Saens
Aria from "Taming of the Shrew".....
.....Herman Goetz
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2.....Liszt-Doppler

When Dr. Dvorak came to this country, some two and a half years ago, as director of the National Conservatory of Music, in New York, it was announced on his behalf that he would undertake the task—apparently an impossible one to our native composers—of founding a style of composition which should possess a national character. This symphony "From the New World" is his first effort in that direction. The search for thematic material brought him face to face with the difficulty that constantly confronts our composers, the fact that we have here no stock of folk-songs upon which to draw for such uses. The older nations, welded compactly by centuries of growth and differentiated sharply one from another by a constant attitude of antagonism, each possesses a characteristic fund of folk-lore that colors their literature, and a simple growth of traditional song-forms which, though simple in themselves, when elaborated by the composer's art, give what is recognized as the national character to the larger forms of music. America is far too young to have yet acquired any heirlooms of this sort, aside from the fact that our population is a cosmopolitan one; the blood of pretty much every nation on earth is in our veins, and as a country we have no more individuality than a composite photograph. Moreover, art is a plant of slow growth; we have always had music makers, but until within the last quarter century none worthy the name of composer; and these have been perforce obliged to copy the forms of foreign music from sheer lack of any forms of our own.

Dvorak's solution of this difficulty has been to take the negro melodies of the South as the nearest approach to folk-song that can be found here. So his new symphony is built upon thematic material borrowed from, or in imitation of, the songs of the plantations. Naturally, the proposition has provoked much comment and discussion. That the Southern negro songs possess distinctive characteristics no one is disposed to deny, but that they are in any sense American can hardly be admitted. In truth, they are themselves a mixture in which the native African element is largely modified by the various influences that surrounded the slaves in the years gone by; no doubt they approach nearer the folk-song than anything else we have, but the attempt to label them "American" will hardly succeed, even with so eminent a musician as Dvorak to stand as godfather.

As for the symphony itself, it is a grand work, by one of the foremost living composers. The larghetto is rather prolix, and the weakest number of the four; the third movement is of the greatest beauty, the trio being one of the most charming things we have had from Dvorak's pen; there is an abundance of rugged—almost barbaric—grandeur in the first and final movements, and the whole work is overlaid with that elaborately skillful and original instrumentation so characteristic of the composer. It was splendidly played and most enthusiastically received. The other orchestral numbers of the programme have been heard before, and were all given with the same delicacy and skill that ever mark the playing of this magnificent organization.

Miss Gertrude Franklin's singing of her two numbers was marked by a high degree of excellence. It is several years since she has appeared in Providence, but the time has only served to mellow her voice and broaden her art. Handel's florid and difficult aria was given with splendid command of vocal resource, and provoked a well-deserved recall; her second number displayed an equal ability in broad cantilena, and met with equal appreciation.

The symphony concerts of this season have been fully equal to any we have ever had, both in point of musical interest and excellence of interpretation. Fine soloists have been furnished, so that no complaints have been heard on that score, as was the case last year. The audiences have averaged about 1200; it seems as if Providence was a large enough city to fill Infantry Hall for such performances, when the music of the world's greatest masters is played by an orchestra that is without a superior, if, indeed, it has an equal.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 20, 1895.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday night the last of the concerts—properly a rehearsal and a concert, though I have never seen or heard a piece rehearsed at one of these afternoon performances since Thomas' time—by the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred at the Academy of Music. There was a fair audience at the night performance, but the matinée was disgracefully attended. It is no secret that the people of the band and the managers are not pleased with Brooklyn. The lack of interest is not due to defective management, so far as I can see, and it is certainly not due to any want of aid from the press, because the papers of the town have done their best to bring people to the concerts. It is not apparently due to lack of wealth, because there are several dollars here, and a good many people would resent the imputation that it was caused by a lack of public taste. One thing is sure, and that is that Mr. Seidl, with a small orchestra that plays under him hardly once in a week, draws better than Mr. Paur's big and altogether admirable band. Nobody would be surprised if Mr. Seidl, or the Seidl Society, had the field alone next season. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, has been maintained by Mr. Higginson for years as a sort of musical missionary enterprise, and perhaps if he labors with us benighted Brooklynites for a couple of seasons longer we shall come around to the belief that there is pretty good music in it, after all.

The bill comprised the Egmont overture, Bizet's Arlesienne suite, Raff's In the Woods, Liszt's first concerto and his second Hungarian rhapsody—a bill to catch the people surely, if anything can. But it didn't. Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen was the soloist. He played the concerto with delicacy, alternating with noise. He was a kind of musical Jekyll and Hyde, and although on artistic and picturesque grounds I don't object to Mr. Hyde, I must say that Dr. Jekyll is better to live with. Stavenhagen's fortissimi were to my ear coarse, his pedal was open in transitions of key, his bass was wiry and metallic; but one can but admire his soundness, his freedom from eccentricities and affectations, his sympathy and his conscientiousness. It was regrettable that he did not give us a work with a little more soul than the Liszt piece, for I fancy he would have done something with Schumann or Chopin.

Mr. Paur was in his usual good spirits and gave us strong, manful if not highly refined readings of the other numbers. His hold was a little lax at times, and in the overture there were audible disparities of attack between the brass and string divisions, but the temper of the band improved as time went on, and only the inevitable percussionists were at fault in the later numbers. Why is it that a drum cannot be made to keep time? It is the easiest of all instruments in several respects, and is the one of all others that we expect to mark the beat in an authoritative fashion. The Bizet suite was played with a great deal of charm. What a pity Bizet could not have been spared for another dozen years! The Hungarian rhapsody was given with all desirable speed and elan, and the Raff symphony was played nearly as well as I have ever heard it. No doubt it is not proper to admire Raff very much. He is too frank and simple in his forms, too obviously melodic, his harmonies seldom have wrong notes in them, and he suggests pictures, which is also wrong. But, whenever the Wood symphony or the Lenore symphony is played I shall try to be there.

Once in a while I have enough of pumpernickel and salt ham, and am to be pacified only with candy. Keep your Brahms and the rest, and be reverent when they are speaking, but let us likewise hear Mendelssohn's violin concerto once in a while and a Raff symphony. When Mr. Krehbiel tells me that parts of the Lenore symphony are the worst things ever written I am sorry for Raff, sorry for myself, but there is a sneaking sorrow for Mr. Krehbiel, too. On my word, there are few times when the orchestra seems a grander institution than when it is employed with such affairs as the Wild Hunt in the Im Walde. And it is the great creation of the age. The pyramid and temple periods have passed, we shall perhaps never see any more Gothic cathedrals, the press and the telegraph and railroad and such things are useful, but not beautiful—but we have the orchestra.

Franz Kneisel and his three associate players, together with Mrs. Rivé-King, pianist, played on Saturday afternoon in Wissner Hall, Mrs. King making her first appearance on that occasion in a dozen years or so. The attendance was large, the conduct of the audience cordial, the concert brief but highly enjoyable, and the affair was altogether pleasant and creditable. We await the recovery of Mr. Seidl for a continuance of musical activities.

* * *

The bassoonists of the Symphony Orchestra certainly look well fed and contented, and yet they played the passages in The March to the Scaffold, a week ago Saturday, with such diabolical enjoyment that the lights were low, and horned and winged things flapped about Mr. Paur, who kept on beating heroically, fortified by the thought of duty and his pleasant home in Jamaica Plain.

* * *

Fifth Concert of Boston's Band.

THE fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday evening. Marie Brema was the solo singer and this was the program played:

Overture, Elegy, in C minor (MS.) (first time).....Robert Kahn
Aria from Reine de Saba.....Gounod
Fantastic Symphony, No. 1, in C major, op. 14a.....Hector Berlioz
I Reveries—Passions—largo, C minor, 4-4.
Allegro agitato e appassionato assai, C major, 4-4.
II. A Ball: Valse—allegro non troppo, A major, 3-8.
III. Scene in the Fields—adagio, F major, 6-8.
IV. March to the Scaffold: alegretto non troppo, G minor, 4-4.
V. A Walpurgis Night's Dream—larghetto, C major, 4-4.
Allegro, C minor and C major, 6-8.

SONGS WITH PIANO.

Mainacht.....Brahms
Time's Garden.....Goring Thomas
Von Liebe.....Kjerulf
Overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march, from the Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn

This scheme was by no means a satisfactory one. More than one of the Mendelssohn numbers was superfluous. The nocturne and the wedding march are banal and either the overture or the scherzo should have been given. Played contiguously they cloyed.

The band was at its best in the scherzo, which was played with great finesse. The Berlioz symphony has begun to collect Time's avenging dust despite its beauty of orchestral color and the enormous technic displayed in the writing. The march and the whirling orgy and parody of the Dies Iræ remain still as superb specimens of what might be called the diabolic school of writing. Berlioz was certainly a diabolist of the purest water. The orchestra was far from flawless in the work, slips in intonation and rhythm occurring, and the tubes that did duty as bells were not quite in tune. But the work as a whole was given with spirit and brilliancy.

Brema sang the war-worn aria "Plus Grand dans son Obscurité" with great dramatic power. She literally rehabilitated its musty measures. Her singing of the Brahms song was very satisfying and intensely musical. The Thomas song is rubbish, unworthy of his fame, belonging as it does to the category of songs of the Lost Chord variety. But as she sang it very well, and Mr. Schroeder's 'cello obligato being very inspiring, the audience—a small one—redemanded the numbers. Brema, who reveals herself on the concert stage as a stalwart example of healthy womanhood, sang with much buoyancy the Norwegian composer's Von Liebe. Its motif is distinctly Valkyrian. This true artist will undoubtly tone down her exaggerated style into a cooler and more grateful method of expression. All that she does savors of the footlights. She is nothing if not dramatic, and there is an abounding passion and vitality in her work that is very infectious. She enjoyed a marked triumph at this concert.

The novelty proved to be an unpretentious overture by Robert Kahn, a pupil of Brahms, and evidently a young man of great promise. Not alone his skill in handling or his melodic material, but his formal sense is never at fault. That it suggests Brahms is inevitable, and as Mr. Apthorp says in the Boston Transcript, "this is entirely normal and to be expected. Kahn is still young and in his first manner, and the first manner of almost every composer is that of his teacher or model; a composer's individuality crops out, as a rule, only in his second. And just here, by the way, the thought presents itself to us: if a young composer's first manner begins with Brahms, what incalculable phases may not his third manner assume?"

Kahn has used the overture form with respect and concision, although never in the conventional sense, as is evidenced by his ingenious use of a theme from the introduction in the work itself. Kahn's themes are melodic and his treatment lucid, and his admirable mastery of the mechanism of his art as well as knowledge of instrumentation all have enabled him to produce a work which augurs much for his future. That he has said nothing new is granted, but his voice is nevertheless individual and fresh. We expect big things of Robert Kahn. Mr. Paur conducted in his usual earnest but angular manner.

FOR the first time this season I heard the Kneisel Quartet play. It was last Friday night, and at the hall of the Mendelssohn Glee Club. I resisted the solid allurements of The Dusk of the Gods, for I was aweary of gods, monsters, leading motives, tarnhelms and potions. I longed for music pure and simple, music without metaphysics and stagecraft. I heard Schubert's D minor Quartet, and it was a draught of Hippocrene after Wagner's heady and composite brew. The Kneisel Quartet is composed of four wingless angels, who make music for mortals out of goodness of heart and return to heaven on the midnight train. The Schubert Quartet, which suggests Ta-ra-ra boom-de-ay, the Nibelungs motif, and the last movement of the Kreutzer sonata, is one of those perfect things in art which remain eternally fresh. It was played with ineffable charm. I did not care much for the Borodine quartet in D. It is full of rude vitality and pretty themes, but it sounded melodramatic and most certainly not original. The Russian peeped out in the brisk vivace.

* * *

The Beethoven septet, op. 20, for violin, viola, clarinet, horn, bassoon, 'cello and double bass, was played by Messrs. Kneisel, Svecenski, Portau, Hackebarth, Litke, Schroeder and Golde. It was, however, the one blur on an otherwise perfect evening of music. Fancy cutting Beethoven; fancy cutting out a couple of movements—fancy, I say, with honest indignation, coming from Boston to New York and omitting the theme and variations, the scherzo! Wasn't it a shocking thing to do, Mr. Kneisel, and aren't you ashamed of yourself? I missed that lovely solo for the 'cello in the trio of the scherzo and the droll dialogue of bassoon and clarinet in the variations; and that thrilling horn variation in B flat minor, where was it, I ask? Echo, in the person of Mr. Hackebarth, sadly answers, "In the score." It is written in true Beethoven fashion, simplicity and grandeur of effect being produced by the golden tone of the horn stealing mysteriously in across a triplet accompaniment. And Mr. Kneisel calmly scratched all this beautiful music, because, no doubt, he feared missing the last train for Walhalla. Couldn't he with the other angels of his company have taken a milk train for once and sneaked into Wotanville noiselessly? Again I cry, what a pity!

* * *

The last time I heard the septet, which is delightfully old-fashioned, it was in company with Walt Whitman, "the good gray poet," who was very fond of music. I took the old man to the Camden ferry after the concert and left him to the company of a deckhand and a blear-eyed yellow dog. It was at a Carl Gaertner soirée and, if I remember aright, the hornist was Koch, now with Sousa. Walt made copious memoranda during the performance of the septet and told me that music stimulated his brain enormously.

* * *

There can be no possible doubt about it. When Emil Paur came to America he was a big, loose gaited, lumbering man whose head was a mop of hair, and he certainly looked musical. Now all this is changed. Emil has become Americanized and believes in his barber as much as in his Brahms. Alas! he has become a bit of a dandy, and I charge it all to Timothy Adamowski's fatal influence. Tim is the handsomest man in the orchestra. (I ask the tympanist's pardon.) Mr. Paur naturally took him for a model. Else why that hirsute arrangement on the forehead! Is it not a hairy paraphrase of the famous Adamowski bang? Come, come, Monsieur Paur, give an account of yourself. Is this sort of thing to continue, and will you eventually become graceful and a lady killer! Alas! art is ever swamped by the materialistic tendencies of America. We may live to see the day when Paur will conduct from a bicycle and attired in Plymouth Rock panties. O Dies Iræ!

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and last concert of the present season at the Academy, and, notwithstanding the weather, a large, fashionable and enthusiastic audience assembled to bid the splendid organization good-bye until next winter. How could it help being enthusiastic? True, the orchestral greatness was at the beginning of the program. Fantastic symphony by Hector Berlioz! Both title and composer conjure up thoughts of what is to follow. Always passionate, fanciful and many hued, unusual must be the effect when Berlioz singles out one of his compositions and labels it Fantastique. Yes, the orchestra must be unusual, and its three drummers and the bars of brass, and its great virtuosity in general, gave a great performance of a wonderful work—symphony of tone, symphony of color. Some painters lay on their color as though with a trowel, but these tones were born of the whirlwind and the cyclone. Berlioz brings them together with the art of Berlioz. A superb musical bouquet, but it is a bouquet of sunflowers and hollyhocks and flags and huge stacks of cabbage roses, with here and there a cattleya or a cypripedium, and trailers of clematis and passion flowers all in a monster vase in the open air with gigantic humming birds and goblin bees feasting about it. Gorgeous faintly describes it. It is the apotheosis of musical tone.

The balance of the program seemed tame in comparison. But the violoncello solos of Mr. Schroeder were beautiful and the refinement and delicacy were sweetly restful after the cyclonic symphony.

...SUNDAY, MARCH 24, 1895.

The Nineteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Kneisel Plays Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, F major.....Brahms
Concerto for violin, E minor.....Mendelssohn
Entr'acte from "Der Gouverneur von Tours," (First time).....Reinecke
Overture to "Hans Heiling".....Marschner

The compiler of the program book says "'Der Gouveneur von Tours' is not down in any musical or operatic cyclopaedia."

Mr. Apthorp in his most authoritative manner, his neck clothed with thunder, makes this positive statement.

Alas, the statement is not true.

It is true that there is no mention of Reinecke's opera in Grove's Dictionary, Pougin's Supplement to the great work of Fétis, or the "Dictionnaire Lyrique" by Clément and Larousse.

But the leading "operatic cyclopaedia" is the "Opern-Handbuch" by Dr. Hugo Riemann, published at Leipsic by Koch; and on page 792 is a paragraph, which, Englished, reads as follows: "'Der Gouverneur von Tours,' comic opera in three acts, by Karl Reinecke; text by Edwin Bormann and founded on 'Die Mönche.' (Leipsic, Nov. 22, 1891.)"

Is this statement by Riemann correct? Apparently not.

For the Signale, No. 68, 1891, announced the first performance of "Der Gouverneur von Tours" at the Court Theatre, Schwerin, Nov. 20, 1891. It also announced the success of the opera, although "the libretto founded on the well-known French comedy 'Die Mönche' might well be condensed." However great the success may then have been, it was not such as to make the opera well known to the musical world. Little or nothing was heard of the work until Nov. 24, 1894, when it was brought out at the City Theatre, Cologne, and Reinecke himself conducted.

* * *

Mr. Apthorp also says that Joseffy is a pupil of Reinecke. Mr. Joseffy may have taken a few lessons of Reinecke, for he studied in several German cities. But he is pre-eminently a pupil of Tausig.

* * *

The entr'acte is a German attempt at piquancy. It reminds one of the gavotte from "Mignon" and also of the famous "Pizzicati" in "Sylvia." They order these matters better in France. Where the French wear pumps with rosettes, the Germans wear rubber boots.

* * *

The overture to "Hans Heiling" is preceded in the opera by a "vorspiel" in which Hans, his mother, and the Earth Spirits appear. The overture is in the style of Weber. It is well-made after a conventional pattern. There is no suspicion of program music. It's a cut-and-dried affair, neither better nor worse than the average overture of its day.

Mr. Apthorp in the program book says that "Hans Heiling" was nearly Marschner's last work for the stage. As a matter of fact, he wrote five operas after "Hans Heiling" was produced, although one of them was given for the first time after his death.

* * *

The first three movements of the Brahms symphony are Brahms at his best. There are elemental, granitic qualities in the first movement that give an overwhelming feeling of power. This movement suffered in consequence of the comparative slowness of the second theme as taken by Mr. Paur. The continuity was broken. There were episodes instead of a mighty whole of alternate strength and sweetness.

Nor was Mr. Paur happy in the pace of the second movement. The music is frankness itself, after the trifling debt to "Zampa" is acknowledged. But last evening it was tortured into something deep, mystic, cryptic, wonderful. The result was tedium instead of delight.

The third movement was read and played delightfully.

Mr. Apthorp says of the last movement: "The ending of this finale is one of the most highly poetic I know of in all orchestral music; the dramatic significance the last themes have acquired during the first movement imparts an indescribable atmosphere of pathos to it all. It is, however, really only the ghost of the first theme of the first movement that thus returns at the close; for, unfortunately, either intentionally or by miscalculation, Brahms has so written it that it is perceptible only to the eye, but is not to be detected by even the most carefully intent ear. The theme is so veiled in the tremolo of the muted strings that its melodic outline is evanescent, and no one would notice it save in the printed score." There is only one thing to be said in reply to this extraordinary statement: "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Ear trumpets are now admirably disguised. A fan thoughtfully bitten at critical moments does not provoke public comment, and it is of invaluable assistance.

* * *

Mr. Kneisel gave an eminently Mendelssohnian performance of an eminently Mendelssohnian work. He played with great care; his accuracy was praiseworthy, as ever; his taste was not to be disputed. His tone seemed thin, and his interpretation was unemotional.

PHILIP HALE.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 23, 1895.

The Kneisel Quartet gave their farewell concert for this season on Friday evening last at the Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall.

The quartet have given better examples of their talent than they did on this occasion, Mr. Kneisel's high notes being somewhat shrill and lacking resonance, and Mr. Otto Roth, with the second violin, was a little faulty in his tempo, but apart from these small "degants" the concert gave intense pleasure to an audience composed very largely of "connoisseurs."

The Allegro Moderato of Borodines Quartet in D major and the Adante Con Moto of Schubert's Quartet in D minor, Op. posth, were beautifully rendered, as was also Beethoven's Septet for violin, viola, clarinet, horn, violoncello and double bass. The quartet have been instrumental in materially increasing the interest for chamber music and their departure will be regretted by the ever-growing circle of lovers of classical music.

...SUNDAY, MARCH 24, 1895.

Franz Kneisel Soloist at Symphony Concert.

Mr Franz Kneisel was the soloist at last evening's symphony concert, and the large audience gave the favorite violinist an enthusiastic welcome. His annual appearance as soloist with the orchestra of which he is a distinguished member, is always looked forward to with pleasure by the symphony concert patrons, and with excellent reason, for he is justly entitled to foremost rank among resident violinists.

He is a thoroughly intelligent player, one who is absolutely devoid of affectation, and one who never attempts to win the favor of his audience by any arts other than those which properly belong to a conscientious musician.

His honesty of purpose, artistic endeavor and unassuming bearing are the more noteworthy because of the fact that these desirable qualities are not evident in the makeup of certain less worthy but more talked about popular players of the Boston symphony orchestra.

Mendelssohn's brilliant concerto for violin in E minor was Mr Kneisel's selection for last evening's concert. The concerto has been heard here frequently and is recognized as offering excellent opportunities for the violinist to display his skill as a virtuoso as well as his ability as an interpreter. The work is interesting at all times, and while due prominence is given the solo instrument, the orchestral accompaniment is a rich and pleasing piece of musical embroidery.

Mr Kneisel's interpretation was both graceful and scholarly. The character of the man is exemplified in his playing. It is straightforward, honest playing, exact at all times and brilliant in many instances. His tone is of splendid quality, pure, warm and broad, and his technique is highly developed.

He played the brilliant solo cadenza superbly, executing with wonderful dexterity and sureness the complicated passages of runs and double octaves. The slow movement was played with much expression, grace and finish, and the final movement was given with splendid spirit and artistic effect.

The orchestral selections consisted of Johannes Brahm's symphony No. 3 in F major, the entr'acte from Karl Reinecke's "Der Gouverneur von Tours" and the overture to Heinrich Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling."

Mr Paur gave a very intelligent and praiseworthy reading of the Brahms symphony. He entered thoroughly into the spirit of the composer's work, and under his direction the orchestra gave the most interesting performance that the symphony has received here.

The playing of the first violins was especially good throughout the second movement, noteworthy, even, for this unrivalled collection of string players. In the third movement the horn solo was heard with much pleasure, and likewise deserving of praise was the playing of the several other wind instruments which are given solo prominence in this movement. Indeed, the performance as a whole reflected highest credit upon the orchestra and its director.

The entr'acte by Karl Reinecke was played for the first time here. It is a dainty and pleasing movement, lively and tuneful. The first part is played by all the strings pizzicato, then comes a theme which is developed by fuller instrumentation, after which there is a return to the original theme, and the movement closes with the pizzicato playing.

The Marschner overture is an elaborately developed work, at times descriptive in character, and possessed of some delightful melodies and rich harmonic effects. It was brilliantly played by the orchestra, and cordially applauded by the audience.

Following is the program announced for the next rehearsal and concert:

Overture, Spring .....Goetz
(First time.)
Kahal Moor of the Wine Red Hand
Horatio W. Parker
Rhapsodie for baritone and orchestra. (New.)
Variations .....Knorr
(First time.)
Aria from Die Meistersinger .....Wagner
Symphony No. 9, in C major .....Schubert
Soloist, Mr Max Heinrich.

Kneisel Quartet.

The last concert of the Kneisel quartet will be given in Union hall Monday evening, April 8. The club will also give three recitals before going to Europe in Brattle hall, Cambridge, on the evenings of March 27, April 15 and 23. Leon Pourtan, clarionet, will assist at the first concert and William Krafft will play third violin in the Roeffler quintet April 15.

The famous quartet will go to London this summer, where manager C. A. Ellis has arranged a series of three recitals to be given in Prince's hall on Monday afternoons June 10, 17 and 24.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 83.

SUNDAY, MARCH 24, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Kneisel Heard in the Mendelssohn Concerto—The Orchestra Plays Brilliantly.

The selections for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last night were:

Symphony No. 3, in F.....Brahms
Concerto for violin.....Mendelssohn
Entr'acte, "Der Gouverneur von Tours (first time).....Reinecke
Overture, "Hans Heiling".....Marschner

The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel. The Brahms symphony, despite its many moments of dulness in the first movement and in the finale, is decidedly the most genial and the least labored of the composer's works in its class. The andante is always interesting in the hearing, and the allegretto is among the most tuneful and the most graceful bits of writing for the orchestra that Brahms has ever achieved. For once the pedagogue disappears entirely, and is really frank and amiable. Mr. Paur's reading of the work was virile and sympathetic throughout, and its performance by the orchestra was very beautiful in its finish and its smoothness. Mr. Kneisel's interpretation of the Mendelssohn concerto was thoroughly charming in its delicate tenderness, its exquisite tunefulness, its technical brilliancy and the fine artistic sentiment that pervaded it. There was not a flaw in its rendering. All that was needed to make the performance wholly satisfying was a fuller volume of tone, a shortcoming that may be accounted for by the dispiriting indisposition under which the artist labored. He was welcomed with the heartiest cordiality, and his playing won for him a whirlwind of plaudits, three vigorous recalls and a gift of flowers.

The Reinecke entr'acte is a dainty trifle, very pretty in its themes and piquant in its orchestration. It is true that its leading subject recalls the gavotte in "Mignon" and the pizzicato in Delibe's "Sylvia," but it was none the less pleasing on that account, and met with immediate favor.

It was gratifying to hear the spirited and brilliant Marschner overture again, though this was the first time that it appeared on the Symphony concert programmes. It is a closely-knit work and admirably put together, is clear in form, richly colored in its instrumentation, and masterly in treatment. These composers who dealt with their art from within, instead of from without, and who were not troubled by the modern yearning to philosophize in tones, wrote music for music's sake. Hence they are always interesting, and if they do not carry one above the clouds and befog the understanding, they never fail to hold the attention. This overture is a fine work in its order, and though it reflects Weber strongly it has a worth that is wholly the composer's own. It was splendidly played, and with rich variety of tone color.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Spring," Goetz (first time); rhapsodie for baritone and orchestra, H. W. Parker (first time); variations, Knorr (first time); aria from "Die Meistersinger," Wagner; symphony No. 9, C-major, Schubert. Mr. Max Heinrich will be the soloist.

...Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 25, 1895

THE SYMPHONY.

BRAHMS' THIRD IN F MAJOR LEADS PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, Entr'acte from Reinecke's "Gouverneur von Tours" and the Overture to "Hans Heiling" by Marschner the Others—The Orchestra.

At the nineteenth symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening, the works performed were the Brahms symphony No. 3 in F major, Mendelssohn's violin concerto; Entr'acte from "Der Gouverneur von Tours," Reinecke, and the overture to "Hans Heiling," by Heinrich Marschner. Not to intrude an individual preference in judging this programme, even the most captious music lover should heartily commend Herr Paur for selecting it just as he did. The unbending classicality of the Brahms symphony gave way to a tuneful and pleasing yet well-worn concerto, and the spirit of eclecticism that pervaded Herr Paur's choice even extended to so simple a tid-bit as the gavot by Reinecke which, by the way, very much resembles, although it is quite inferior to the ever piquant gavot from Mignon.

The Brahms symphony in F wears well. While it is not so much involved in polyphonic complications and rhythmic eccentricities as to stamp it as the most characteristic symphony by Brahms, it is all the more likely to outlive either symphonies number one, in C minor, or number two in D major. It is difficult, however, to become reconciled to the unmusical harshness and grotesque contortions of the first movement. Furthermore, what is there in its initial phrase of three notes that could have induced the composer to repeat it over and over again well nigh ad nauseum?

The movement is not without its charming music in a lovely pastoral theme in A major, that is effectively built on a double pedal point of tonic and dominant.

The striking likeness to the prayer in Herold's Zampa, noticeable in the first theme of the andante, that has been commented upon, is immaterial, as it does not extend beyond the first four notes. It is perhaps more noteworthy that this movement is built on much the same plan as the adagio in Beethoven's choral symphony. Of the performance of the work and Conductor Paur's reading of it,—waving any questionable tempo, except the third movement which seemed to be taken somewhat too rapidly for an allegretto—one can only speak in terms of praise. The splenetic criticisms that have recently appeared in the columns of New York papers to the contrary notwithstanding, Boston may well take pride not only in its orchestra which even they do not deny to be ideal, but in Emil Paur. The playing Saturday evening was remarkable not only for the perfect precision that attended it, but also for the fact that whether retards or accelerations were made, whether the volume of tone was united to a delicate pianissimo or rendered robust and powerful, the effect was always clear as that of the conductor's masterly and artistic one-man power; and this too was pregnant with all the musical feeling, as well as all the intellectuality that a musician could desire, while it invariably called forth a simultaneous response from the orchestra. In Herr Kneisel's performance of Mendelssohn's violin concerto there was the characteristic absence of anything like sensationalism or of striving after effect by any but legitimate means. Leonine vigor the concerto itself does not call for, and Mr. Kneisel's playing was invariably unaffected, sincere, and straightforward. His treatment of the ever beautiful theme with which the andante opens was no less manly than caressing; and if the performance of the work as a whole did not hinge perilously on the gates of genius, there was the deeper satisfaction to be derived from it, namely that it was truly musical playing in which the composer was not sacrificed to any desire of the violinist to display his own skill. Nevertheless the real shortcoming of the performance may be suggested by Robert Browning's reply to a lady who asked him to read a certain poem by Theodore Parker, saying he would find it a perfect prose poem. "For Heaven's sake don't bring me any prose poems," cried Browning "that is a genre for which we poets have no respect at all." Whether or not the poetic quality be lacking in Herr Kneisel's art, it is a pleasure to acknowledge that he has a fine sense of musical beauty; and that he is mainly and predominantly a high-minded, sincere and masterly musician. And so at the close of his performance it was a pleasure to have him applauded so loudly, so long, and so deservedly as he was, and with no less zeal on the part of thoughtful musicians in the audience, than by hundreds of admiring amateurs.

The entr' acte by Reinecke sounded oddly enough in a symphony concert; and surely after having established a precedent so heterodoxical, one need experience no surprise if comic operas like Westward Ho, Tabasco, or Robin Hood are resorted to by our amiable conductor in the make up of his programmes. With equal propriety, why not? Surely there is much more artistic music to be found in any one of the operas named than Reinecke's entre' acte contains. Or if the standard of symphony concert programmes is to be changed, why not introduce some of the Strauss waltzes—which are greatly admired by Brahms, by the way, even if the average super-pious patron of the symphony concert series might not condescend to listen to their performance? It was refreshing to have the concert close with an overture so spirited, bright and lively—to Boston a genuine novelty—as the Marschner overture to Hans Heiling.

It was capitally well played. At the next concert the programme will include the overture "Spring," by Goetz; Kahal Moor of the Wine Red Hand, H. W. Parker; variations (first time), Knorr; Aria from "Die Meistersinger" and the ninth symphony, by Schubert. Mr. Max Heinrich will be the soloist.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 24, 1895.

The Nineteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Kneisel Plays Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, F major.....Brahms
Concerto for violin, E minor.....Mendelssohn
Entr'acte from "Der Gouverneur von Tours," (First time).....Reinecke
Overture to "Hans Heiling".....Marschner

The compiler of the program book says "'Der Gouveneur von Tours' is not down in any musical or operatic cyclopaedia."

Mr. Apthorp in his most authoritative manner, his neck clothed with thunder, makes this positive statement.

Alas, the statement is not true.

It is true that there is no mention of Reinecke's opera in Grove's Dictionary, Pougin's Supplement to the great work of Fétis, or the "Dictionnaire Lyrique" by Clément and Larousse.

But the leading "operatic cyclopaedia" is the "Opern-Handbuch" by Dr. Hugo Riemann, published at Leipsic by Koch; and on page 792 is a paragraph, which, Englished, reads as follows: "'Der Gouverneur von Tours,' comic opera in three acts, by Karl Reinecke; text by Edwin Bormann, and founded on 'Die Mönche.' (Leipsic, Nov. 22, 1891.)"

Is this statement by Riemann correct? Apparently not.

For the Signale, No. 68, 1891, announced the first performance of "Der Gouverneur von Tours" at the Court Theatre, Schwerin, Nov. 20, 1891. It also announced the success of the opera, although "the libretto founded on the well-known French comedy 'Die Mönche' might well be condensed." However great the success may then have been, it was not such as to make the opera well known to the musical world. Little or nothing was heard of the work until Nov. 24, 1894, when it was brought out at the City Theatre, Cologne, and Reinecke himself conducted.

* * *

Mr. Apthorp also says that Joseffy is a pupil of Reinecke. Mr. Joseffy may have taken a few lessons of Reinecke, for he studied in several German cities. But he is pre-eminently a pupil of Tausig.

* * *

The entr'acte is a German attempt at piquancy. It reminds one of the gavotte from "Mignon" and also of the famous "Pizzicati" in "Sylvia." They order these matters better in France. Where the French wear pumps with rosettes, the Germans wear rubber boots.

* * *

The overture to "Hans Heiling" is preceded in the opera by a "vorspiel" in which Hans, his mother, and the Earth Spirits appear. The overture is in the style of Weber. It is well-made after a conventional pattern. There is no suspicion of program music. It's a cut-and-dried affair, neither better nor worse than the average overture of its day.

Mr. Apthorp in the program book says that "Hans Heiling" was nearly Marschner's last work for the stage. As a matter of fact, he wrote five operas after "Hans Heiling" was produced, although one of them was given for the first time after his death.

* * *

The first three movements of the Brahms symphony are Brahms at his best. There are elemental, granitic qualities in the first movement that give an overwhelming feeling of power. This movement suffered in consequence of the comparative slowness of the second theme as taken by Mr. Paur. The continuity was broken. There were episodes instead of a mighty whole of alternate strength and sweetness.

Nor was Mr. Paur happy in the pace of the second movement. The music is frankness itself, after the trifling debt to "Zampa" is acknowledged. But last evening it was tortured into something deep, mystic, cryptic, wonderful. The result was tedium instead of delight.

The third movement was read and played delightfully.

Mr. Apthorp says of the last movement: "The ending of this finale is one of the most highly poetic I know of in all orchestral music; the dramatic significance the last themes have acquired during the first movement imparts an indescribable atmosphere of pathos to it all. It is, however, really only the ghost of the first theme of the first movement that thus returns at the close; for, unfortunately, either intentionally or by miscalculation, Brahms has so written it that it is perceptible only to the eye, but is not to be detected by even the most carefully intent ear. The theme is so veiled in the tremolo of the muted strings that its melodic outline is evanescent, and no one would notice it save in the printed score." There is only one thing to be said in reply to this extraordinary statement: "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Ear trumpets are now admirably disguised. A fan thoughtfully bitten at critical moments does not provoke public comment, and it is of invaluable assistance.

* * *

Mr. Kneisel gave an eminently Mendelssohnian performance of an eminently Mendelssohnian work. He played with great care; his accuracy was praiseworthy, as ever; his taste was not to be disputed. His tone seemed thin, and his interpretation was unemotional.

PHILIP HALE.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 23, 1895.

The Kneisel Quartet gave their farewell concert for this season on Friday evening last at the Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall.

The quartet have given better examples of their talent than they did on this occasion, Mr. Kneisel's high notes being somewhat shrill and lacking resonance, and Mr. Otto Roth, with the second violin, was a little faulty in his tempo, but apart from these small "degants" the concert gave intense pleasure to an audience composed very largely of "connoisseurs."

The Allegro Moderato of Borodines Quartet in D major and the Adante Con Moto of Schubert's Quartet in D minor, Op. posth, were beautifully rendered, as was also Beethoven's Septet for violin, viola, clarinet, horn, violoncello and double bass. The quartet have been instrumental in materially increasing the interest for chamber music and their departure will be regretted by the ever-growing circle of lovers of classical music.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 24, 1895.

Franz Kneisel Soloist at Symphony Concert.

Mr Franz Kneisel was the soloist at last evening's symphony concert, and the large audience gave the favorite violinist an enthusiastic welcome. His annual appearance as soloist with the orchestra of which he is a distinguished member, is always looked forward to with pleasure by the symphony concert patrons, and with excellent reason, for he is justly entitled to foremost rank among resident violinists.

He is a thoroughly intelligent player, one who is absolutely devoid of affectation, and one who never attempts to win the favor of his audience by any arts other than those which properly belong to a conscientious musician.

His honesty of purpose, artistic endeavor and unassuming bearing are the more noteworthy because of the fact that these desirable qualities are not evident in the makeup of certain less worthy but more talked about popular players of the Boston symphony orchestra.

Mendelssohn's brilliant concerto for violin in E minor was Mr Kneisel's selection for last evening's concert. The concerto has been heard here frequently and is recognized as offering excellent opportunities for the violinist to display his skill as a virtuoso as well as his ability as an interpreter. The work is interesting at all times, and while due prominence is given the solo instrument, the orchestral accompaniment is a rich and pleasing piece of musical embroidery.

Mr Kneisel's interpretation was both graceful and scholarly. The character of the man is exemplified in his playing. It is straightforward, honest playing, exact at all times and brilliant in many instances. His tone is of splendid quality, pure, warm and broad, and his technique is highly developed.

He played the brilliant solo cadenza superbly, executing with wonderful dexterity and sureness the complicated passages of runs and double octaves. The slow movement was played with much expression, grace and finish, and the final movement was given with splendid spirit and artistic effect.

The orchestral selections consisted of Johannes Brahm's symphony No. 3 in F major, the entr'acte from Karl Reinecke's "Der Gouverneur von Tours" and the overture to Heinrich Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling."

Mr Paur gave a very intelligent and praiseworthy reading of the Brahms symphony. He entered thoroughly into the spirit of the composer's work, and under his direction the orchestra gave the most interesting performance that the symphony has received here.

The playing of the first violins was especially good throughout the second movement, noteworthy, even, for this unrivalled collection of string players. In the third movement the horn solo was heard with much pleasure, and likewise deserving of praise was the playing of the several other wind instruments which are given solo prominence in this movement. Indeed, the performance as a whole reflected highest credit upon the orchestra and its director.

The entr'acte by Karl Keinecke was played for the first time here. It is a dainty and pleasing movement, lively and tuneful. The first part is played by all the strings pizzicato, then comes a theme which is developed by fuller instrumentation, after which there is a return to the original theme, and the movement closes with the pizzicato playing.

The Marschner overture is an elaborately developed work, at times descriptive in character, and possessed of some delightful melodies and rich harmonic effects. It was brilliantly played by the orchestra, and cordially applauded by the audience.

Following is the program announced for the next rehearsal and concert:

Overture, Spring .....Goetz
(First time.)
Kahal Moor of the Wine Red Hand .....Horatio W. Parker
Rhapsodie for baritone and orchestra. (New.)
Variations .....Knorr
(First time.)
Aria from Die Meistersinger .....Wagner
Symphony No. 9, in C major .....Schubert
Soloist, Mr Max Heinrich.

Kneisel Quartet.

The last concert of the Kneisel quartet will be given in Union hall Monday evening, April 8. The club will also give three recitals before going to Europe in Brattle hall, Cambridge, on the evenings of March 27, April 15 and 23. Leon Pourtan, clarionet, will assist at the first concert and William Krafft will play third violin in the Roeffler quintet April 15.

The famous quartet will go to London this summer, where manager C. A. Ellis has arranged a series of three recitals to be given in Prince's hall on Monday afternoons June 10, 17 and 24.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 83.

SUNDAY, MARCH 24, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Kneisel Heard in the Mendelssohn Concerto—The Orchestra Plays Brilliantly.

The selections for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last night were:

Symphony No. 3, in F.....Brahms
Concerto for violin.....Mendelssohn
Entr'acte, "Der Gouverneur von Tours" (first time).....Reinecke
Overture, "Hans Heiling".....Marschner

The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel. The Brahms symphony, despite its many moments of dulness in the first movement and in the finale, is decidedly the most genial and the least labored of the composer's works in its class. The andante is always interesting in the hearing, and the allegretto is among the most tuneful and the most graceful bits of writing for the orchestra that Brahms has ever achieved. For once the pedagogue disappears entirely, and is really frank and amiable. Mr. Paur's reading of the work was virile and sympathetic throughout, and its performance by the orchestra was very beautiful in its finish and its smoothness. Mr. Kneisel's interpretation of the Mendelssohn concerto was thoroughly charming in its delicate tenderness, its exquisite tunefulness, its technical brilliancy and the fine artistic sentiment that pervaded it. There was not a flaw in its rendering. All that was needed to make the performance wholly satisfying was a fuller volume of tone, a shortcoming that may be accounted for by the dispiriting indisposition under which the artist labored. He was welcomed with the heartiest cordiality, and his playing won for him a whirlwind of plaudits, three vigorous recalls and a gift of flowers.

The Reinecke entr'acte is a dainty trifle, very pretty in its themes and piquant in its orchestration. It is true that its leading subject recalls the gavotte in "Mignon" and the pizzicato in Delibe's "Sylvia," but it was none the less pleasing on that account, and met with immediate favor.

It was gratifying to hear the spirited and brilliant Marschner overture again, though this was the first time that it appeared on the Symphony concert programmes. It is a closely-knit work and admirably put together, is clear in form, richly appeared on the symphony programmes. It is a closely-knit work and admirably put together, is clear in form, richly colored in its instrumentation, and masterly in treatment. These composers who dealt with their art from within, instead of from without, and who were not troubled by the modern yearning to philosophize in tones, wrote music for music's sake. Hence they are always interesting, and if they do not carry one above the clouds and befog the understanding, they never fail to hold the attention. This overture is a fine work in its order, and though it reflects Weber strongly it has a worth that is wholly the composer's own. It was splendidly played, and with rich variety of tone color.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Spring," Goetz (first time); rhapsodie for baritone and orchestra, H. W. Parker (first time); variations, Knorr (first time); aria from "Die Meistersinger," Wagner; symphony No. 9, C-major, Schubert. Mr. Max Heinrich will be the soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 25, 1895

THE SYMPHONY.

BRAHMS' THIRD IN F MAJOR LEADS PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, Entr'acte from Reinecke's "Gouverneur von Tours" and the Overture to "Hans Heiling" by Marschner the Others—The Orchestra.

At the nineteenth symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening, the works performed were the Brahms symphony No. 3 in F major; Mendelssohn's violin concerto; Entr'acte from "Der Gouverneur von Tours," Reinecke, and the overture to "Hans Heiling," by Heinrich Marschner. Not to intrude an individual preference in judging this programme, even the most captious music lover should heartily commend Herr Paur for selecting it just as he did. The unbending classicality of the Brahms symphony gave way to a tuneful and pleasing yet well-worn concerto, and the spirit of eclecticism that pervaded Herr Paur's choice even extended to so simple a tid-bit as the gavot by Reinecke which, by the way, very much resembles, although it is quite inferior to the ever piquant gavot from Mignon.

The Brahms symphony in F wears well. While it is not so much involved in polyphonic complications and rhythmic eccentricities as to stamp it as the most characteristic symphony by Brahms, it is all the more likely to outlive either symphonies number one, in C minor, or number two in D major. It is difficult, however, to become reconciled to the unmusical harshness and grotesque contortions of the first movement. Furthermore, what is there in its initial phrase of three notes that could have induced the composer to repeat it over and over again well nigh ad nauseam?

The movement is not without its charming music in a lovely pastoral theme in A major, that is effectively built on a double pedal point of tonic and dominant.

The striking likeness to the prayer in Herold's Zampa, noticeable in the first theme of the andante, that has been commented upon, is immaterial, as it does not extend beyond the first four notes. It is perhaps more noteworthy that this movement is built on much the same plan as the adagio in Beethoven's choral symphony. Of the performance of the work and Conductor Paur's reading of it,—waving any questionable tempo, except the third movement which seemed to be taken somewhat too rapidly for an allegretto—one can only speak in terms of praise. The splenetic criticisms that have recently appeared in the columns of New York papers to the contrary notwithstanding, Boston may well take pride not only in its orchestra which even they do not deny to be ideal, but in Emil Paur. The playing Saturday evening was remarkable not only for the perfect precision that attended it, but also for the fact that whether retards or accelerations were made, whether the volume of tone was united to a delicate pianissimo or rendered robust and powerful, the effect was always clear as that of the conductor's masterly and artistic one-man power; and this too was pregnant with all the musical feeling, as well as all the intellectuality that a musician could desire, while it invariably called forth a simultaneous response from the orchestra. In Herr Kneisel's performance of Mendelssohn's violin concerto there was the characteristic absence of anything like sensationalism or of striving after effect by any but legitimate means. Leonine vigor the concerto itself does not call for, and Mr. Kneisel's playing was invariably unaffected, sincere, and straightforward. His treatment of the ever beautiful theme with which the andante opens was no less manly than caressing; and if the performance of the work as a whole did not hinge perilously on the gates of genius, there was the deeper satisfaction to be derived from it, namely that it was truly musical playing in which the composer was not sacrificed to any desire of the violinist to display his own skill. Nevertheless the real shortcoming of the performance may be suggested by Robert Browning's reply to a lady who asked him to read a certain poem by Theodore Parker, saying he would find it a perfect prose poem. "For Heaven's sake don't bring me any prose poems," cried Browning "that is a genre for which we poets have no respect at all." Whether or not the poetic quality be lacking in Herr Kneisel's art, it is a pleasure to acknowledge that he has a fine sense of musical beauty; and that he is mainly and predominantly a high-minded, sincere and masterly musician. And so at the close of his performance it was a pleasure to have him applauded so loudly, so long, and so deservedly as he was, and with no less zeal on the part of thoughtful musicians in the audience, than by hundreds of admiring amateurs.

The entr' acte by Reinecke sounded oddly enough in a symphony concert; and surely after having established a precedent so heterodoxical, one need experience no surprise if comic operas like Westward Ho, Tabasco, or Robin Hood are resorted to by our amiable conductor in the make up of his programmes. With equal propriety, why not? Surely there is much more artistic music to be found in any one of the operas named than Reinecke's entre' acte contains. Or if the standard of symphony concert programmes is to be changed, why not introduce some of the Strauss waltzes—which are greatly admired by Brahms, by the way, even if the average super-pious patron of the symphony concert series might not condescend to listen to their performance? It was refreshing to have the concert close with an overture so spirited, bright and lively—to Boston a genuine novelty—as the Marschner overture to Hans Heiling.

It was capitally well played. At the next concert the programme will include the overture "Spring," by Goetz; Kahal Moor of the Wine Red Hand, H. W. Parker; variations (first time), Knorr; Aria from "Die Meistersinger" and the ninth symphony, by Schubert. Mr. Max Heinrich will be the soloist.

C. L. CAPEN.

[111]

...DAY, MARCH 23, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The nineteenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, opus 90.
Mendelssohn: Concerto for violin, in E minor, opus 64.
Reinecke: Entr'acte from "De Gouverneur von Tours." (First time.)
Marschner: Overture to "Hans Heiling," opus 80.
Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist.

What a great work the Brahms symphony is! And yet the score is in some ways a perplexing one; there are some passages in it which, play them just as they stand, do not sound as you are fain to hear them in your mind's ear, as you read them from the printed page. That Brahms is a master of instrumentation, in so far as his command of the modern orchestra is amply sufficient to his needs, need not be doubted; but it is equally unquestionable that there are passages in his scores which need careful treatment in performance, if the idea is to stand out clearly and sharply. But then, Brahms is not peculiar in this. Wagner has attributed the necessity of experimentalizing in rehearsal on certain passages in Beethoven's later scores, notably in the ninth symphony, to the incomplete condition of some of the orchestral instruments in his day, and his consequently lacking that fulness of orchestral resource which more recent composers have at their disposal; saying that that perfection of dynamic balance between the various parts of the orchestra, which composers of the present day insure by a skilful grouping of different masses of instruments, is to be obtained in many passages in Beethoven's scores only by bringing certain parts into the foreground by stronger playing, and throwing others more into the shade by playing them less strongly. This is true enough. Beethoven, not to mention Schumann, often needs this sort of "doctoring," if the outlines of his music are to stand out distinctly. But are Beethoven and Schumann alone in this? Experience has proved that the same process has often to be applied to Wagner himself, with all his wealth of orchestral resource, and wonderful skill in using it. Both Wagner and Berlioz, the two di majores of orchestration, have at times to be "doctored" in this way, if their music is to sound right, and this process is particularly necessary with Brahms.

Take, for instance, the first two measures of his third symphony, the one played last Saturday evening. In these two measures (including the first beat of the third) a very definite and important theme is announced; it lies in the upper voice, on the very surface of the harmony. These measures are scored for the eight usual wooden wind instruments, the horns and trumpets, all playing forte. On examining the score, one finds that the instrumentation looks singularly old-fashioned, even reckless: the important theme (F, A-flat, F) is given only to one flute, one oboe and one horn, and these three instruments—two of which are by no means powerful—are to give it prominence over the whole mass of the others. We doubt if anyone has ever heard the theme in these two measures (here in Boston, at least); we doubt if any listener has ever got any other impression of them than that of an F major chord followed by a chord of the diminished 7th on the same bass; the theme itself is drowned out, the sudden high F of the first trumpet in the second measure being especially apt to veil the melodic significance of the A-flat in the flute, oboe and horn. Now, can not the right orchestral balance be so restored in performance that this theme shall be plainly audible and catch the listener's attention? If he hears it plainly in these opening measures, he will be all the more apt to notice it when it comes in the bass (double-basses, third trombone, and double-bassoon) in the next three measures, and grasp its full thematic significance.

Again, in the last nine measures of the Finale, where the "ghost" of the first theme of the first movement returns in the waving tremolo of the muted strings against the soft, sustained chords in the wood-wind, horns, and trumpets: who has ever heard this augmention of the theme here, or even suspected its presence, save from seeing it in the score? And yet it seems to us that, by hook or by crook, its presence might be made audibly manifest. Surely Brahms cannot have put it there for nothing!

One more passage, and we have done. In the first four measures of the un poco sostenuto which closes the finale (pages 102 and 103 of the full score) the oboes, reënforced in the upper octave by the flutes, make a sudden and wholly unexpected break into F major in the very middle of a phrase; the melody in the above-named instruments is accompanied by sustained harmonies in the horns and trumpets, and a tremolo in the muted strings. This has always proved a ticklish passage in performances here, and we have never heard it produce its full effect. The sudden change to F major—like sunlight breaking forth from between the clouds—is so unexpected and daring that the passage needs to be played with infinite firmness and authority, to impress itself upon the ear as intentional and not as a mis-copy in the parts. We have generally heard it sound very uncertain and shaky; last Saturday evening it sounded absolutely spectral; the accompanying horns were all but inaudible, and the high flute and oboe tones seemed a mere chilly whistling of the March wind. We know the flute and oboe are marked forte, and the horns mezzo forte; well and good! but the passage—one of the great "strokes" in the symphony—must be made to sound as well as it looks!

We have mentioned these three particular cases of miscalculated dynamic balance as especially noticeable, not only in last Saturday evening's performance, but in all performances of the symphony we have heard here. Is it not time that they should be licked into shape by clever exp[illegible]ents at rehearsal? Upon the whole, the [illegible]mphony was played with great fire and expressiveness, if not always with very fine finish of ensemble.

Mr. Kneisel played the ever-beautiful Mendelssohn concerto excellently well. At first he seemed unusually nervous, but this he soon conquered as he warmed to his work; throughout the concerto, however, he gave the impression of fatigue and less than his wonted vital energy; it was unfortunate that he had to (did he have to?) play through the long and taxing Brahms symphony before attacking the concerto, for the symphony in itself is enough to take it out of most players, even when they are in tip-top physical form. But he played with so much musicianly feeling and appreciation, with such admirable technique and in so pure a style, that he brought the fine music well home to you, and you could enjoy it [illegible] of his great per[illegible] has much left in him to admire, [illegible] when he gets a little). As for his conception of the second movement (though his playing was exquisite) we must, for once, part company with him; if he wishes to play this Andante in that wondrously slow tempo, he has a perfect right to do so; only to us it is incomprehensible. He was very warmly received both before and after the performance, the applause after each movement doing away, ut majore, with the prescribed connection between the several divisions of the work.

So far the programme had been a pure delight. Now it took a sudden plunge into the uninteresting. Reinecke's entr'acte from his latest comic opera, "Der Gouverneur von Tours," is a dainty little bit of trivialty quite fit for a promenade concert. It reminds one tantalizingly of the gavotte in Thomas's "Mignon"—tantalizingly, because it is not half so good. And, as for Marschner's "Hans Heiling" overture, it takes long and friendly association with the composition to enable one to enjoy it—say, as a welcome old acquaintance—nowadays; but who in Boston has any old associations with the "Hans Heiling" overture? One may delight in a visit from his own great-grandfather for sweet affection's sake, even if the old gentleman be in his dotage, but anyone else's great grandfather in these conditions is liable to be a bore. If we had been brought up on "Hans Heiling" in our infancy and early childhood, we might like to hear from him now and then; but to be introduced to him, or even renew a passing bowing acquaintance with him, at this late date, is tedious enough. The overture has been growing old at railway speed for the last fifty years and is now thoroughly decrepit.

The next programme is—Goetz, overture, "Spring" (first time); H. W. Parker, "Kahal, Moor of the Wine-Red Hand;" rhapsody for baritone and orchestra (first time); Knorr, variations (first time); Wagner, air from "Die Meistersinger;" Schubert, symphony No. 9, in C major. Mr. Max Heinrich will be the singer.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 24, 1895.

Brahms' third Symphony, with which the nineteenth Music Hall programme began, is—as a bright woman near me remarked—just about the right sort of music for Lent, because it is so melancholy, penitential and depressing. Ostensibly in the major key of F, and occasionally digressing into some relative major keys, its feelings and the majority of its moods are still minor, and it exercises over the listener no brighter sway than can come from the spell of a mild, soft, introspective pensiveness. It is melodious beyond its author's wont, and many of its themes are tenderly beautiful, even if they do not cling and haunt. It is wrought out with intricate care and masterly command of contrapuntal and instrumental arts; but only in one almost turbulent passage in the first movement does it substitute confusion for complexity, and only in the last does it hide for a time an essential thought within an impenetrable thicket of adornments and secondary considerations. Yet, in spite of its giving much auditory pleasure, it leaves the mind unfed and the heart uncontented. Its struggles have brought no sure and happy conquest, and its uncertainties have been resolved into settled conclusion. When it ends one says that it was fine, but one has an unsatisfied wish that it had been less vague and had impressed as its last word even a conviction of defeat and despair. It is too much like common life, which ever doubts, hopes, contends and defers its faith to a tomorrow's evidences of final fact. The orchestra played it almost altogether well, their grasp and tension wavering into uncertainty only in the uglier and rougher parts of the first movement.

After the symphony came with a dear and welcome delight the pure ideal music of Mendelssohn's violin concerto. Not mighty music, commanding the spheres and the souls to stand and listen in silence, nor profound music compelling hearts to search in themselves for a fit response to its searching strains; but beautiful, refreshing, encouraging, enlightening and purifying music. Mr. Kneisel played it in his most elegant and dainty style, faultless for intonation, phrase and fine-drawn spirituality, speaking there after the French sense of "spirituel." His tone seemed unusually slender—almost as if he were playing to a small company of the elect in a little, favorable room; but it was most clear and crystalline, unflecked by a blemish, and it reached every nook and corner, arriving at the most distant with an airy fineness, which by no means ill consorted with the delicate fancies which imbue it.

Next came a quite fascinating entr' acte from Reinecke's "Governor of Tours"—a light stepping, piquant pizzicato just barely colored and sustained by wood-wind tone and contrasted now and then with a few bars of cantilena. It ought to become almost as much a favorite as the "Pizzicati" of Delibes, which is gradually growing too familiar.

Marschner's vigorous overture to "Hans Heiling" was last on the programme, and the audience evidently enjoyed its short, grave opening, its bits of song, its taste of a waltz and its stirring, hurrying conclusion, especially as all these were animatedly played.

Next Saturday's programme reads thus:—

Goetz, Overture, "Spring," first time; Horatio W. Parker, Kahal Moor of the Wine Red Hand, Rhapsodic for Baritone and Orchestra, new; Knorr, Variations, first time; Wagner, Aria from "Die Meistersinger;" Schubert, Symphony No. 9, in C. major. Soloist, Mr. Max Heinrich.

[illegible]

MONDAY, MARCH [illegible], 1895.

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY.

AN ENTR' ACTE AND AN OVERTURE HEARD FOR THE FIRST TIME HERE.

Franz Kneisel in a Most Delightful Programme—News Notes of the World of Music.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following programme was performed: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; concerto for violin, Mendelssohn; entr' acte from "Der Gonverneur von Tours," Reinecke; overture to "Hans Heiling," Marschner. The Reinecke and Marschner numbers were heard for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist.

The Brahms symphony, one of the more agreeable of this composer's symphonic works, was listened to with interest and pleasure by the audience. The Andante and the Allegretto are so unlike Brahm's usual style that one might almost doubt the authorship when attributed to the great contrapuntist. They are delightful specimens of melodic writing in which the composer put aside for the time being his musical "2-foot rule" and indulged in the romance of a less arbitrary style. The Allegretto in many respects reminds one of Mendelssohn. The symphony was splendidly played by the orchestra, and although the conductor's reading might be criticised in the matter of tempi, yet that is a matter in which Mr. Paur's taste may be superior, perhaps, to that of his critic.

The Reinecke entr' acte was an agreeable number and delighted the audience; the same can be said of the Marschner overture, both of which the orchestra played charmingly.

Mr. Kneisel's performance of the Mendelssohn concerto was marked with that graceful and artistically finished style with which we are familiar in everything that he renders. His intonation was perfect, his technique ample and brilliant. There was nothing sentimental in the effort; it was exquisite in its purity. His tone, however, was weak, and the general effect was one of tameness; in other words, devoid of any emotional element. He, perhaps, was unfortunate that he brought himself in comparison with Ysaye, who so recently performed this concerto here, a rendering of that incomparable description which sinks deep in the memory of the listener, producing an impression so profound that the lapse of time, even, cannot in the least efface in one's remembrance the supremacy of its grandeur; an artistic effort that rose above the interpretation upon this occasion as the summit of Mont Blanc rises above the level of the sea. Mr. Kneisel was more than warmly welcomed, and after his performance was recalled many times, a demonstration showing the high estimation in which he is regarded by the patrons of these concerts. The programme next Saturday evening will embrace overture, "Spring," Goetz; variations, Knorr, and Schubert's great symphony, No. 9, in C major. Mr. Max Heinrich will sing a rhapsodie by H. W. Parker, and an aria from "The Meistersingers," Wagner.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 24.

The Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall, last night. The programme was:

Symphony No. 3, F-major, op. 90.....Brahms
Concerto for violin, G-minor, op. 64...Mendelssohn
Entr' acte, "Gouveneur von Tours".....Reinecke
Overture, "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The Brahms symphony represents this composer in his human mood, he is poetic without being diffuse and learned without revealing an excess of pedantry. The work can be understood by the ordinary music lover, and this fact may detract from its merits in the eyes of connoisseurs, but even a modern composer must be allowed occasionally to take off his professional gown and yield to those emotions which he shares with the rest of humanity. Science is our latter day idol and art has become merged with it; but a continual diet of mathematical formulas is apt to prove monotonous as well as innutritious, and when reason is tired, feeling may be allowed to take its place and human dignity remain unimpeached. The symphony was played with dignity and brilliancy, and with a fine respect for color contrasts. Brahms is praised for his modern spirit, but surely in his intellect he is Hindu; and in his imagination Persian. His imagination seems continually to busy itself with the battle between light and darkness; is not this third symphony, for example, a tone picture of the struggles between Ormuzd and Ahrimanes, modern only in that the emotions are held in check by reason? The Hindu element of his nature is revealed in his desire to remove everything to the region of abstractions, which is the region of mysteries. It would not be difficult to prove that Brahms is a Babylonian, as well as a Hindu and Persian; but this is the great advantage of an art like music; it readily adapts itself to any theory, and by agreeing with all, proves that it belongs to none.

The Mendelssohn Concerto was finely played by Mr. Kneisel, and yet memory is sometimes cruel to anticipated pleasure. Mr. Kneisel's violin seemed to speak in an unusually weak voice; to have lost some of its masterfulness, while behind him and overtopping him seemed to stand the smiling ghost of Ysaye. Did Mr. Kneisel's interpretation lack broadness of style and was it pretty rather than dignified; was his tone thin and so weak that it was absorbed in the more healthy tones given out by the orchestra? Perhaps we have been led to expect too much and perhaps Mr. Kneisel himself forced a comparison that could not fail to tell against himself; in any case he was not fully satisfactory; his violin seemed possessed of one of those homunculi mentioned by Paracelsus; proportion and shape were perfect, beauty was patent but everything was reduced in size; what should have been a giant was a graceful little figure that would fit comfortably in a small vial.

The Reinecke entr acte is a charming, graceful movement, that recalled, unreasonably perhaps, the gavotte in Mignon; the Marschner overture was well worth the hearing, it is good honest work without originality and patterned in a style that was beloved in a time when the world was less restless and more easily satisfied than it is now.

The programmee for the next concert is: Goetz's Overture, "Spring;" Parker's Rhapsodie for baritone and orchestra; Variations by Knorr; Aria from the "Meistersinger;" Schubert's Symphony, No. 8, in G. Mr. Max Heinrich is the soloist.

[112]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 25, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The nineteenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, opus 90.
Mendelssohn: Concerto for violin, in E minor, opus 64.
Reinecke: Entr'acte from "De Gouverneur von Tours." (First time.)
Marschner: Overture to "Hans Heiling," opus 80.
Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist.

What a great work the Brahms symphony is! And yet the score is in some ways a perplexing one; there are some passages in it which, play them just as they stand, do not sound as you are fain to hear them in your mind's ear, as you read them from the printed page. That Brahms is a master of instrumentation, in so far as his command of the modern orchestra is amply sufficient to his needs, need not be doubted; but it is equally unquestionable that there are passages in his scores which need careful treatment in performance, if the idea is to stand out clearly and sharply. But then, Brahms is not peculiar in this. Wagner has attributed the necessity of experimentalizing in rehearsal on certain passages in Beethoven's later scores, notably in the ninth symphony, to the incomplete condition of some of the orchestral instruments in his day, and his consequently lacking that fulness of orchestral resource which more recent composers have at their disposal; saying that that perfection of dynamic balance between the various parts of the orchestra, which composers of the present day insure by a skilful grouping of different masses of instruments, is to be obtained in many passages in Beethoven's scores only by bringing certain parts into the foreground by stronger playing, and throwing others more into the shade by playing them less strongly. This is true enough. Beethoven, not to mention Schumann, often needs this sort of "doctoring," if the outlines of his music are to stand out distinctly. But are Beethoven and Schumann alone in this? Experience has proved that the same process has often to be applied to Wagner himself, with all his wealth of orchestral resource, and wonderful skill in using it. Both Wagner and Berlioz, the two di majores of orchestration, have at times to be "doctored" in this way, if their music is to sound right, and this process is particularly necessary with Brahms.

Take, for instance, the first two measures of his third symphony, the one played last Saturday evening. In these two measures (including the first beat of the third) a very definite and important theme is announced; it lies in the upper voice, on the very surface of the harmony. These measures are scored for the eight usual wooden wind instruments, the horns and trumpets, all playing forte. On examining the score, one finds that the instrumentation looks singularly old-fashioned, even reckless: the important theme (F, A-flat, F) is given only to one flute, one oboe and one horn, and these three instruments—two of which are by no means powerful—are to give it prominence over the whole mass of the others. We doubt if anyone has ever heard the theme in these two measures (here in Boston, at least); we doubt if any listener has ever got any other impression of them than that of an F major chord followed by a chord of the diminished 7th on the same bass; the theme itself is drowned out, the sudden high F of the first trumpet in the second measure being especially apt to veil the melodic significance of the A-flat in the flute, oboe and horn. Now, can not the right orchestral balance be so restored in performance that this theme shall be plainly audible and catch the listener's attention? If he hears it plainly in these opening measures, he will be all the more apt to notice it when it comes in the bass (double-basses, third trombone, and double-bassoon) in the next three measures, and grasp its full thematic significance.

Again, in the last nine measures of the Finale, where the "ghost" of the first theme of the first movement returns in the waving tremolo of the muted strings against the soft, sustained chords in the wood-wind, horns, and trumpets: who has ever heard this augmention of the theme here, or even suspected its presence, save from seeing it in the score? And yet it seems to us that, by hook or by crook, its presence might be made audibly manifest. Surely Brahms cannot have put it there for nothing!

One more passage, and we have done. In the first four measures of the un poco sostenuto which closes the finale (pages 102 and 103 of the full score) the oboes, reënforced in the upper octave by the flutes, make a sudden and wholly unexpected break into F major in the very middle of a phrase; the melody in the above-named instruments is accompanied by sustained harmonies in the horns and trumpets, and a tremolo in the muted strings. This has always proved a ticklish passage in performances here, and we have never heard it produce its full effect. The sudden change to F major—like sunlight breaking forth from between the clouds—is so unexpected and daring that the passage needs to be played with infinite firmness and authority, to impress itself upon the ear as intentional and not as a mis-copy in the parts. We have generally heard it sound very uncertain and shaky; last Saturday evening it sounded absolutely spectral; the accompanying horns were all but inaudible, and the high flute and oboe tones seemed a mere chilly whistling of the March wind. We know the flute and oboe are marked forte, and the horns mezzo forte; well and good! but the passage—one of the great "strokes" in the symphony—must be made to sound as well as it looks!

We have mentioned these three particular cases of miscalculated dynamic balance as especially noticeable, not only in last Saturday evening's performance, but in all performances of the symphony we have heard here. Is it not time that they should be licked into shape by clever exp[illegible]nents at rehearsal? Upon the whole, the [illegible]mphony was played with great fire and expressiveness, if not always with very fine finish of ensemble.

Mr. Kneisel played the ever-beautiful Mendelssohn concerto excellently well. At first he seemed unusually nervous, but this he soon conquered as he warmed to his work; throughout the concerto, however, he gave the impression of fatigue and less than his wonted vital energy; it was unfortunate that he had to (did he have to?) play through the long and taxing Brahms symphony before attacking the concerto, for the symphony in itself is enough to take it out of most players, even when they are in tip-top physical form. But he played with so much musicianly feeling and appreciation, with such admirable technique and in so pure a style, that he brought the fine music well home to you, and you could enjoy it unreservedly. It was not one of his great per[illegible], but it was a very beautiful one. Mr. Kneisel has much left in him to admire, even when he nods a little. As for his conception of the second movement (though his playing was exquisite) we must, for once, part company with him; if he wishes to play this Andante in that wondrously slow tempo, he has a perfect right to do so; only to us it is incomprehensible. He was very warmly received both before and after the performance, the applause after each movement doing away, vi majore, with the prescribed connection between the several divisions of the work.

So far the programme had been a pure delight. Now it took a sudden plunge into the uninteresting. Reinecke's entr'acte from his latest comic opera, "Der Gouverneur von Tours," is a dainty little bit of trivialty quite fit for a promenade concert. It reminds one tantalizingly of the gavotte in Thomas's "Mignon"—tantalizingly, because it is not half so good. And, as for Marschner's "Hans Heiling" overture, it takes long and friendly association with the composition to enable one to enjoy it—say, as a welcome old acquaintance—nowadays; but who in Boston has any old associations with the "Hans Heiling" overture? One may delight in a visit from his own great-grandfather for sweet affection's sake, even if the old gentleman be in his dotage, but anyone else's great grandfather in these conditions is liable to be a bore. If we had been brought up on "Hans Heiling" in our infancy and early childhood, we might like to hear from him now and then; but to be introduced to him, or even renew a passing bowing acquaintance with him, at this late date, is tedious enough. The overture has been growing old at railway speed for the last fifty years and is now thoroughly decrepit.

The next programme is—Goetz, overture, "Spring" (first time); H. W. Parker, "Kahal, Moor of the Wine-Red Hand," rhapsody for baritone and orchestra (first time); Knorr, variations (first time); Wagner, air from "Die Meistersinger;" Schubert, symphony No. 9, in C major. Mr. Max Heinrich will be the singer.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 24, 1895.

Brahms' third Symphony, with which the nineteenth Music Hall programme began, is—as a bright woman near me remarked—just about the right sort of music for Lent, because it is so melancholy, penitential and depressing. Ostensibly in the major key of F, and occasionally digressing into some relative major keys, its feelings and the majority of its moods are still minor, and it exercises over the listener no brighter sway than can come from the spell of a mild, soft, introspective pensiveness. It is melodious beyond its author's wont, and many of its themes are tenderly beautiful, even if they do not cling and haunt. It is wrought out with intricate care and masterly command of contrapuntal and instrumental arts; but only in one almost turbulent passage in the first movement does it substitute confusion for complexity, and only in the last does it hide for a time an essential thought within an impenetrable thicket of adornments and secondary considerations. Yet, in spite of its giving much auditory pleasure, it leaves the mind unfed and the heart uncontented. Its struggles have brought no sure and happy conquest, and its uncertainties have been resolved into settled conclusion. When it ends one says that it was fine, but one has an unsatisfied wish that it had been less vague and had impressed as its last word even a conviction of defeat and despair. It is too much like common life, which ever doubts, hopes, contends and defers its faith to a tomorrow's evidences of final fact. The orchestra played it almost altogether well, their grasp and tension wavering into uncertainty only in the uglier and rougher parts of the first movement.

After the symphony came with a dear and welcome delight the pure ideal music of Mendelssohn's violin concerto. Not mighty music, commanding the spheres and the souls to stand and listen in silence, nor profound music compelling hearts to search in themselves for a fit response to its searching strains; but beautiful, refreshing, encouraging, enlightening and purifying music. Mr. Kneisel played it in his most elegant and dainty style, faultless for intonation, phrase and fine-drawn spirituality, speaking there after the French sense of "spirituel." His tone seemed unusually slender—almost as if he were playing to a small company of the elect in a little, favorable room; but it was most clear and crystalline, unflecked by a blemish, and it reached every nook and corner, arriving at the most distant with an airy fineness, which by no means ill consorted with the delicate fancies which imbue it.

Next came a quite fascinating entr' acte from Reinecke's "Governor of Tours"—a light stepping, piquant pizzicato just barely colored and sustained by wood-wind tone and contrasted now and then with a few bars of cantilena. It ought to become almost as much a favorite as the "Pizzicati" of Delibes, which is gradually growing too familiar.

Marschner's vigorous overture to "Hans Heiling" was last on the programme, and the audience evidently enjoyed its short, grave opening, its bits of song, its taste of a waltz and its stirring, hurrying conclusion, especially as all these were animatedly played.

Next Saturday's programme reads thus:—

Goetz, Overture, "Spring," first time; Horatio W. Parker, Kahal Moor of the Wine Red Hand, Rhapsodie for Baritone and Orchestra, new; Knorr, Variations, first time; Wagner, Aria from "Die Meistersinger;" Schubert, Symphony No. 9, in C. major. Soloist, Mr. Max Heinrich.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, MARCH 25, 1895.

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY.

AN ENTR' ACTE AND AN OVERTURE HEARD FOR THE FIRST TIME HERE.

Franz Kneisel in a Most Delightful Programme—News Notes of the World of Music.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following programme was performed: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; concerto for violin, Mendelssohn; entr' acte from "Der Gonverneur von Tours," Reinecke; overture to "Hans Heiling," Marschner. The Reinecke and Marschner numbers were heard for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist.

The Brahms symphony, one of the more agreeable of this composer's symphonic works, was listened to with interest and pleasure by the audience. The Andante and the Allegretto are so unlike Brahm's usual style that one might almost doubt the authorship when attributed to the great contrapuntist. They are delightful specimens of melodic writing in which the composer put aside for the time being his musical "2-foot rule" and indulged in the romance of a less arbitrary style. The Allegretto in many respects reminds one of Mendelssohn. The symphony was splendidly played by the orchestra, and although the conductor's reading might be criticised in the matter of tempi, yet that is a matter in which Mr. Paur's taste may be superior, perhaps, to that of his critic.

The Reinecke entr' acte was an agreeable number and delighted the audience; the same can be said of the Marschner overture, both of which the orchestra played charmingly.

Mr. Kneisel's performance of the Mendelssohn concerto was marked with that graceful and artistically finished style with which we are familiar in everything that he renders. His intonation was perfect, his technique ample and brilliant. There was nothing sentimental in the effort; it was exquisite in its purity. His tone, however, was weak, and the general effect was one of tameness; in other words, devoid of any emotional element. He, perhaps, was unfortunate that he brought himself in comparison with Ysaye, who so recently performed this concerto here, a rendering of that incomparable description which sinks deep in the memory of the listener, producing an impression so profound that the lapse of time, even, cannot in the least efface in one's remembrance the supremacy of its grandeur; an artistic effort that rose above the interpretation upon this occasion as the summit of Mont Blanc rises above the level of the sea. Mr. Kneisel was more than warmly welcomed, and after his performance was recalled many times, a demonstration showing the high estimation in which he is regarded by the patrons of these concerts. The programme next Saturday evening will embrace overture, "Spring," Goetz; variations, Knorr, and Schubert's great symphony, No. 9, in C major. Mr. Max Heinrich will sing a rhapsodie by H. W. Parker, and an aria from "The Meistersingers," Wagner.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 24.

The Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall, last night. The programme wss:

Symphony No. 3, F-major, op. 90.....Brahms
Concerto for violin, G-minor, op. 64...Mendelssohn
Entr' acte, "Gouveneur von Tours".....Reinecke
Overture, "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The Brahms symphony represents this composer in his human mood, he is poetic without being diffuse and learned without revealing an excess of pedantry. The work can be understood by the ordinary music lover, and this fact may detract from its merits in the eyes of connoisseurs, but even a modern composer must be allowed occasionally to take off his professional gown and yield to those emotions which he shares with the rest of humanity. Science is our latter day idol and art has become merged with it; but a continual diet of mathematical formulas is apt to prove monotonous as well as innutritious, and when reason is tired, feeling may be allowed to take its place and human dignity remain unimpeached. The symphony was played with dignity and brilliancy, and with a fine respect for color contrasts. Brahms is praised for his modern spirit, but surely in his intellect he is Hindu, and in his imagination Persian. His imagination seems continually to busy itself with the battle between light and darkness; is not this third symphony, for example, a tone picture of the struggles between Ormuzd and Ahrimanes, modern only in that the emotions are held in check by reason? The Hindu element of his nature is revealed in his desire to remove everything to the region of abstractions, which is the region of mysteries. It would not be difficult to prove that Brahms is a Babylonian, as well as a Hindu and Persian; but this is the great advantage of an art like music; it readily adapts itself to any theory, and by agreeing with all, proves that it belongs to none.

The Mendelssohn Concerto was finely played by Mr. Kneisel, and yet memory is sometimes cruel to anticipated pleasure. Mr. Kneisel's violin seemed to speak in an unusually weak voice; to have lost some of its masterfulness, while behind him and overtopping him seemed to stand the smiling ghost of Ysaye. Did Mr. Kneisel's interpretation lack broadness of style and was it pretty rather than dignified; was his tone thin and so weak that it was absorbed in the more healthy tones given out by the orchestra? Perhaps we have been led to expect too much and perhaps Mr. Kneisel himself forceed a comparison that could not fail to tell against himself; in any case he was not fully satisfactory; his violin seemed possessed of one of those homunculi mentioned by Paracelsus; proportion and shape were perfect, beauty was patent but everything was reduced in size; what should have been a giant was a graceful little figure that would fit comfortably in a small vial.

The Reinecke entr acte is a charming, graceful movement, that recalled, unreasonably perhaps, the gavotte in Mignon; the Marschner overture was well worth the hearing, it is good honest work without originality and patterned in a style that was beloved in a time when the world was less restless and more easily satisfied than it is now.

The programmee for the next concert is: Goetz's Overture, "Spring;" Parker's Rhapsodie for baritone and orchestra; Variations by Knorr; Aria from the "Meistersinger;" Schubert's Symphony, No. 9, in G. Mr. Max Heinrich is the soloist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 27, 1895.

The program of the Nineteenth Symphony Concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in F major.....Brahms
Concerto for violin, E minor.....Mendelssohn
Entr'acte from Der Gouverneur von Tours.....Reinecke
Overture to Hans Heiling.....Marschner

Do you know anything about Der Gouverneur von Tours, or do you know anybody who ever saw the opera? It is my impression that Riemann is wrong in giving in his Opera-Handbuch the place and the time of the first production as Leipsic, November 23, 1891. Was it not first produced at Schwerin, November 20, 1891?

The entr'acte is a painstaking attempt at piquancy. How much better the French order these matters. Reinecke had Delibes in his mind when he wrote this piece, but he fell far short of his model. There is neither inspiration nor ingenious, carefully wrought filigree work.

And what is there to say about the Hans Heiling overture? Nothing, except that it is Weberish; just as pepperette recalls the existence of pepper.

Mr. Paur's reading of the Brahms symphony is not to be praised without reserve. He took the second theme of the first movement at such a slow pace that it lagged, it lost its charm, and there was a painful interruption to the naturally continuous flow of thought. Then the andante was stripped of its frankness. Mr. Paur did not seem to be content with its simple freshness. He dived for possible riches. And he was so deliberate in his diving that the hearer forgot the beauty of Brahms in wondering what the diver would bring up. No, no; this will never do. These delightful movements do not admit of such treatment. The third movement was read and played exceedingly well.

Mr. Kneisel's performance was virginibus puerisque. It was accurate, careful, polished to the last degree. The tone was small, and there was an absence of emotion. The performance reminded one of the habit in French boarding schools for young ladies of insisting on pronunciation and metre in the reading of poetry, but always substituting tambour for amour, lest strange, vague emotions should quiver beneath maidens' breasts. PHILIP HALE.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its seventh concert in Union Hall the 18th. The program included Schumann's A major quartet, op. 41, No. 1; Dvorák's A major piano quintet, and these songs, sung by Miss Franklin: Hüte Dich, Emil Paur; Aubade and Chanson d'Avril, Bizet, and the Spring Song, by Henschel. Mr. C. L. Capen wrote the following review that appeared in the Boston Herald:

The Schumann quartet in A major, op. 41, No. 3—not No. 1, as the program announced—is well known here, yet it cannot be heard too often. Romantic in character from first to last its romanticism is all in all of the most refined—the very worthiest type. Its scholarship throughout is that of the master who is no less soulful and spontaneous than scholarly in all that he has to say. It would be difficult to find in the entire chamber music répertoire a more thoroughly interesting masterpiece than is the Schumann quartet. Of its performance it seems well nigh superfluous to say more than that Mr. Kneisel and his associates were at their best; but, if anything, a special word of tribute may be paid their performance of the assai agitato, for more nearly perfect ensemble playing has not been heard in this city, not even from the Kneisel Quartet. The Dvorák quintet was ardently played, yet with not quite the efficiency that an adequate number of rehearsals with Herr Stavenhagen would have insured. While Herr Stavenhagen did much refined and artistic playing, he was at times, notably in his forte playing, both coarse and noisy. Mr. Kneisel and his associates were quite the reverse; yet, even their worthiest playing was not wholly successful in contending with the very pugilistic kind of animosity that the pianist seemed to entertain for his keyboard.

Mr. Capen spoke in most flattering terms of Miss Franklin's singing:

Here, indeed, were four songs, which to be even adequately interpreted required an artist of the highest intelligence, not to mention the intricate and varied difficulty of their technical demands; yet that these songs were heard at their best, as Miss Franklin sang them, no unbiased musician could for a moment doubt. They were one and all most charmingly interpreted. Superlatively fine, indeed, was the artist's utterance of her each and every phrase.

* * *

Kneisel Quartet.—The Kneisel Quartet season in Brooklyn, given at Wissner Hall, brought forward two pianists never before heard in that city, and one who had not played there in twelve years. Mme. Paur and Mr. Arthur Whiting were the new pianists heard, and Mme. Rivè-King was the old favorite who reappeared. Three artists like the above was quite an array of star players for Mr. Colell to secure.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 90.

SUNDAY, MARCH 31, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Novelties on the Programme Lend Special Interest.

Max Heinrich the Soloist—Goetz Overture Full of Beauty—Parker's Rhapsody Dramatic—Knorr Variations Piquant—Audience Cheers Tree—Jefferson Closes.

The selections for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening were:

Overture, "Spring," in A major, op. 15 (first time).....Goetz
Rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand," op. 40 (first time).....H. W. Parker
Variations on an Ukraine folk song, op. 7 (first time).....Knorr
Pogner's Address, from "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Symphony No. 9, in C major.....Schubert

The soloist was Mr. Max Heinrich. The three novelties on the programme lent a special interest to it. That so charming a work as the Goetz overture should not have been heard here before is surprising. It is full of beauty, and its originality is as graceful as it is refreshing. Its melodiousness is unbroken from beginning, from the lovely, but brief, adagio to the end. Why it should be named "Spring" does not appear, but it has nothing of the aspect of "programme" music as may be listened to with pleasure and perfect understanding without any association with its title. The second theme is fascinating, and its announcement and development are delightful. The overture is perhaps somewhat prolix in its "working out," and the line is not strongly drawn between this portion of the work and what immediately precedes it, but as a whole it flows with remarakble ease, its effects are fine in their well considered contrasts, and there is an absence of conventionality in the treatment generally, both harmonic and instrumental, that gives a marked and unique individuality to the composition.

Mr. Parker's rhapsody is strongly dramatic and is brilliantly and effectively scored, but on a first hearing it seems to lack unity or continuity, and the general effect is so fragmentary that it is not easy to divine the composer's intentions, even from a rhapsodic standpoint. The orchestra predominates throughout to an extent that makes the voice part ineffective. The poem by the Irish poet, James Clarence Mangan, is obscure in meaning. The narrator dreams of a beautiful land in which the sun shines on fields of corn and lustrous gardens in a golden clime, and he hears the tones of silver lyres and many voices, whose song is as the heavenly hymn of angels. Then there is a change and the minstrels become dumb, all is dark, and kings and nobles are stricken with terror. Then the narrator, in his dream, goes forth and sees the sky flecked with blood and amid its shorn beams a skeleton. And that is all. If he had seen snakes the whole thing would be susceptible of explanation, but the skeleton leaves all in obscurity. The poem does not appear to be a felicitous choice for musical treatment, and in its fogginess of intent is not attractive in itself, and that shortcoming cannot be overcome easily by the musician. Thence, despite the admirable skill that Mr. Parker has shown in his orchestration and the impressive brilliancy of effect that characterizes the work, it is uninteresting through the lack of a motive that appeals lucidly to the understanding. The voice part is trying to the singer and is declamatory rather than melodious as the word is generally understood. Mr. Heinrich sang it with vigorous dramatic emphasis, and won three enthusiastic recalls.

The Knorr variations are on a theme that is piquant in subject and rhythm. The work shows a thorough knowledge of the orchestra, and the variations are ingenious and musicianly, an adagio and a scherzando being notably pleasing. As a whole, however, it is wanting in variety of effect, and frequently falls into tameness until the last three variations (there are eight in all) are reached. The performance, which was marked by the highest finish, did the fullest possible justice to the work. Mr. Heinrich's singing of "Pogner's Address" was artistic in phrasing and expression, but the song does not afford him an opportuntiy to be heard at his best, and beside, his voice seemed dry and fatigued. Nevertheless, he was warmly applauded and twice recalled.

The symphony was read in a masterly manner by Mr. Paur, and in a thoroughly sympathetic vein, and the performance by the orchestra was up to its highest standard. The repeat in the first movement was judiciously omitted. If some of the repetitions in the andante, beautiful as it is, could be similarly treated it would be an advantage to the movement.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4 (B. and H.), Haydn; serenade for wind instruments, Mozart (first time); concerto for pianoforte, Chopin; overture, "Der Freischutz," Weber. The soloist is to be Miss Antoinette Szumowska.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 31, 1895.

Mr. Horatio W. Parker's "Cahal Mor" Produced for the First Time at the Twentieth Symphony Concert.

The program of the 20th symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture, "Spring," in A major, op. 15. (First time).....Goetz
Raphsody for baritone and orchestra, "Cahal Mor of the Wine-Red Hand," op. 40. (First time).....H. W. Parker
Variations on an Ukraine Folk-Song, in F major, op. 7. (First time).....Knorr
Pogner's Address, from "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg".....Wagner
Symphony No. 9, in C major.....Schubert

This concert was one of marked interest. It is a good thing to hear new music, so that the hearer may in future renew pleasure or avoid boredom.

The overture of Götz is entitled "Spring," a natural phenomenon known only to dwellers in New England by allusions to it by poets, musicians, men of scientific attainments and travelers. Spring in music is associated generally with a liberal use of clarinets, oboes, and flutes. But Götz abstained from the conventional and did not indulge himself in program-writing. The overture is fresh, original, spontaneous, and for the most part beautiful. The beginning and the ending are dramatic in a simple manner. The themes are eminently pleasing, and the development of them is thoroughly musical, not merely pedagogic. All in all it is a delightful work.

* * *

Mr Parker took as the text of his rhapsody the wild poem entitled "A Vision of Conraught in the Thirteenth Century," by James Clarence Mangan. The motto of this poem is "Et moi, j'ai été aussi en Arcadie." Mr. Parker for his musical purpose made a few slight changes in Mangan's verses. This poem is not perhaps as characteristic of the poet's genius as "O'Hussey's Ode to the Maguire," "Sarsfield," or "The Nameless One," and yet read the first verse:

"I walked entranced
Through a land of Morn;
The sun, with wondrous excess of light,
Shone down and glanced
Over seas of corn
And lustrous gardens aleft and right.
Even in the clime
Of resplendent Spain,
Beams no such sun upon such a land;
But it was the time,
'Twas in the reign
Of Cahal Mor of the Wine-red Hand."

And who would not listen eagerly to the strange tale of the dreamer?

Did Mangan weave these fancies of opium and strong drink? Is the story founded on some Irish legend? There is no note or commentary. And the poem needs none. A gloss would be an impertinence.

This Rhapsodoy seems to me the highest flight of Mr. Parker's imagination. Freedom of thought, splendor of diction, gorgeous color, dramatic expression, the legitimately spectacular in music;—all these are in this orchestral piece in which the human voice is obligato. There is no attempt at panoramic treatment, and yet the mood of each verse is italicized most eloquently. Nor is there the incoherency that seems inevitable in the musical presentation of such a poem. Finely and impressively does Mr. Parker keep riveting the hearer's attention to the refrain, to that glorious, haunting line:

"Of Cahal Mor of the Wine-red Hand."

The instrumentation throughout is that of a master. Thrilling are the effects gained by simple means as in the expression of the strange change beneath the dome. Sensuousness that is noble, terror, the fantastic, the spiritual, the horrible—Mr. Parker suggests all these, and in the suggesting controls himself. And the highest praise is that the hearer henceforth cannot think of the poem of Mangan without the instantaneous accompanying thought of the music that is its double.

Mr. Max Heinrich declaimed the text with marked dignity and thorough appreciation of poet and musician.

* * *

And after this glowing, imaginative work came the variations by Knorr, a son, I believe, of the Dr. Knorr who was Schumann's friend. These variations show the well trained musician, who thinks correctly and as many other respectable people think. There are interesting rhythmic problems solved, and the variations are thoroughly made. And when you say they are thoroughly made, the story is told.

* * *

Mr. Heinrich declaimed Pogner's address from Wagner's comic opera. In the opera Pogner is a good deal of a bore; and why should he be brought out on the concert stage? This is not said with any disrespect to Mr. Heinrich, who went through his task manfully and as though he really enjoyed it.

* * *

It is the fashion to rail at the great symphony by Schubert; but even the scoffers must be dumb when they hear the famous trombone passages in the first movement, or even the very opening of the symphony. Long as the second movement is, there are measures of imperishable beauty. And in these first two movements there is stuff enough for a dozen conventional symphonies.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 31, 1895.

The vocal music at the twentieth Symphony concert anticipated in certain senses the Wagner epoch of next week, of which prelude there was really no need. Mr. Max Heinrich, who was the singer, produced Pogner's Address, which has become about as hackneyed as Webster's reply to Hayne or Shiel's "Irish Aliens," and made rather less effect than one of those speeches would do at a Latin School exhibition. He also sang something new—a setting by Mr. H. W. Parker of Mangan's half legendary, half fanciful ballad, "Cahal Mor of the Wine-red Hand." The weird and romantic verses offer a composer an opportunity to write something thrilling and pathetic—a strong and strange scene with a brilliant vein of melody in the old Irish modes running through it for the singer, and imparting its chief quality and merit. Mr. Parker has tried pretty nearly every orchestral combination, using all the drums, the harp, the cymbals and the full brass choir. Some of his illustrative passages are certainly both pathetic and dramatic, and their variety is no less noticeable than their general appositeness. But the singer is oppressed and burdened in true Wagnerian style. What he has to sing has neither the freedom, the appropriateness nor the diversity of the orchestra score, and he stands at times almost like a good speaker reduced to describing a panorama. Especially must this be the case when the orchestra are so continuously and mercilessly loud as Mr. Paur allowed them to be. If Mr. Heinrich had had a fair chance, his vivid and sympathetic dramatic style might have made his delivery of the vocal text far more interesting to the audience and more remunerative to himself.

There were two new orchestral works on the programme, of which the first was a "Spring" overture by Goetz, which began with a hopeful and promising trumpet-call followed by a soft, slow rising adagio and a pleasantly pastoral allegro. But the interest was not well sustained, although the writing appeared to be neat, tasteful and skilful. The other was a nice and generally interesting set of variations by Iwan Knorr upon a Ukraine folk-song, in which the theme was held up with remarkable clearness and the contrasts between the wooden wind and the strings were particularly clever and agreeable. Both were played too heavily, however.

The symphony was Schubert's ninth, in C major, so full of beauty and of strength, in the playing of which the latter element was more obvious than the former, for there was far too little softness and delicacy in the reading. The orchestra seemed to have got so much power to their elbows and lungs as not to be able to come anywhere near a pianissimo, and hardly to compass a piano.

Next Saturday's programme names: Haydn's fourth symphony, a Mozart serenade for wind instruments, Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture and a Chopin concerto for a new pianist, Miss Szumowska.

The Kneisel Quartette at their last concert but one for the present season had the assistance of Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen in playing Dvorak's pianoforte quintette in A, opus 81. In this work the foreign virtuoso replaced Mrs. H. H. A. Beach who was prevented by illness from taking her expected share. Mr. Stavenhagen's performance was interesting always, but not at all points satisfactory. In his happier moments he showed the taste, the delicacy, the gracefully-moving touch and the interpretative sympathy which have been noticed in his lighter numbers at his own concerts, but again he seemed to feel as if he were playing some impetuously thundering passage of Liszt, and overbore his associates, who held discreetly back from excess of force although they kept close beside him when he forced the pace. A Schumann quartette, also in A major, began the evening and was perfectly played by Mr. Kneisel and his harmonious brethren. Between these pieces, Miss Franklin, who never appears to better advantage than in a room of moderate size, sang in her best style an odd "Heute Dich," by Mr. Paur, a pair of songs by Bizet and an elaborately difficult song by Henschel, meeting their technical difficulties with ease and beautifying them with pure tones and fine phrasings.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 31, 1895.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concert of last night was noticeable more because of the fact that three of the five numbers on the programme were heard for the first time, rather than of any special musical value attached to either of them. The programme opened with the overture "Spring" in A major, by Goetz, which has as its chief feature a quaint beginning and ending, but its passages, while of a harmonious nature, do not rise above mediocrity.

The second number introduced Mr. Max Heinrich, whom it is always a pleasure to hear. He was heard in a rhapsody, "Cahal Mor of the Wine-Red Hand," by H. W. Parker, and which really proved a thankless task for the soloist. Not that he did not do it justice, for he certainly did all that was possible with the material at hand. To quote a line in one of the verses, "none seemed to understand" what the rhapsody was all about. Much more can be said for the orchestral background than for the vocal part, for it was rich in varied and graceful passages and of a highly dramatic order in several places.

Mr. Heinrich was later heard in Pogner's address from Wagner's "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," which he rendered in German and with much interest and enthusiasm. The number showed to advantage all the beauties and artistic qualities of Mr. Heinrich's cultivated voice and proved a delight to the audience.

Iwan Knorr's variations on an Ukraine folk-song in F major was also one of the new numbers, but it proved to be rather dull and failed to arouse any enthusiasm. The programme closed with the Schubert symphony No. 9, whose many beauties largely atone for its great length.

At the next concert a Mozart serenade for wind instruments will be played for the first time and Miss Antoinette Szumowska will be the piano soloist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 27, 1895.

The program of the Nineteenth Symphony Concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in F major.....Brahms
Concerto for violin, E minor.....Mendelssohn
Entr'acte from Der Gouverneur von Tours.....Reinecke
Overture to Hans Heiling.....Marschner

Do you know anything about Der Gouverneur von Tours, or do you know anybody who ever saw the opera? It is my impression that Riemann is wrong in giving in his Opera-Handbuch the place and the time of the first production as Leipsic, November 22, 1891. Was it not first produced at Schwerin, November 20, 1891?

The entr'acte is a painstaking attempt at piquancy. How much better the French order these matters. Reinecke had Delibes in his mind when he wrote this piece, but he fell far short of his model. There is neither inspiration nor ingenious, carefully wrought filigree work.

And what is there to say about the Hans Heiling overture? Nothing, except that it is Weberish; just as pepperette recalls the existence of pepper.

Mr. Paur's reading of the Brahms symphony is not to be praised without reserve. He took the second theme of the first movement at such a slow pace that it lagged, it lost its charm, and there was a painful interruption to the naturally continuous flow of thought. Then the andante was stripped of its frankness. Mr. Paur did not seem to be content with its simple freshness. He dived for possible riches. And he was so deliberate in his diving that the hearer forgot the beauty of Brahms in wondering what the diver would bring up. No, no; this will never do. These delightful movements do not admit of such treatment. The third movement was read and played exceedingly well.

Mr. Kneisel's performance was virginibus puerisque. It was accurate, careful, polished to the last degree. The tone was small, and there was an absence of emotion. The performance reminded one of the habit in French boarding schools for young ladies of insisting on pronunciation and metre in the reading of poetry, but always substituting tambour for amour, lest strange, vague emotions should quiver beneath maidens' breasts. PHILIP HALE.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its seventh concert in Union Hall the 18th. The program included Schumann's A major quartet, op. 41, No. 1; Dvorák's A major piano quintet, and these songs, sung by Miss Franklin: Hüte Dich, Emil Paur; Aubade and Chanson d'Avril, Bizet, and the Spring Song, by Henschel. Mr. C. L. Capen wrote the following review that appeared in the Boston Herald:

The Schumann quartet in A major, op. 41, No. 3—not No. 1, as the program announced—is well known here, yet it cannot be heard too often. Romantic in character from first to last its romanticism is all in all of the most refined—the very worthiest type. Its scholarship throughout is that of the master who is no less soulful and spontaneous than scholarly in all that he has to say. It would be difficult to find in the entire chamber music répertoire a more thoroughly interesting masterpiece than is the Schumann quartet. Of its performance it seems well nigh superfluous to say more than that Mr. Kneisel and his associates were at their best; but, if anything, a special word of tribute may be paid their performance of the assai agitato, for more nearly perfect ensemble playing has not been heard in this city, not even from the Kneisel Quartet. The Dvorák quintet was ardently played, yet with not quite the efficiency that an adequate number of rehearsals with Herr Stavenhagen would have insured. While Herr Stavenhagen did much refined and artistic playing, he was at times, notably in his forte playing, both coarse and noisy. Mr. Kneisel and his associates were quite the reverse; yet, even their worthiest playing was not wholly successful in contending with the very pugilistic kind of animosity that the pianist seemed to entertain for his keyboard.

Mr. Capen spoke in most flattering terms of Miss Franklin's singing:

Here, indeed, were four songs, which to be even adequately interpreted required an artist of the highest intelligence, not to mention the intricate and varied difficulty of their technical demands; yet that these songs were heard at their best, as Miss Franklin sang them, no unbiased musician could for a moment doubt. They were one and all most charmingly interpreted. Superlatively fine, indeed, was the artist's utterance of her each and every phrase.

* * *

Kneisel Quartet.—The Kneisel Quartet season in Brooklyn, given at Wissner Hall, brought forward two pianists never before heard in that city, and one who had not played there in twelve years. Mme. Paur and Mr. Arthur Whiting were the new pianists heard, and Mme. Rivè-King was the old favorite who reappeared. Three artists like the above was quite an array of star players for Mr. Colell to secure.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 90.

SUNDAY, MARCH 31, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Novelties on the Programme Lend Special Interest.

Max Heinrich the Soloist—Goetz Overture Full of Beauty—Parker's Rhapsody Dramatic—Knorr Variations Piquant—Audience Cheers Tree—Jefferson Closes.

The selections for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening were:

Overture, "Spring," in A major, op. 15 (first time).....Goetz
Rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand," op. 40 (first time).....H. W. Parker
Variations on an Ukraine folk song, op. 7 (first time).....Knorr
Pogner's Address, from "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Symphony No. 9, in C major.....Schubert

The soloist was Mr. Max Heinrich. The three novelties on the programme lent a special interest to it. That so charming a work as the Goetz overture should not have been heard here before is surprising. It is full of beauty, and its originality is as graceful as it is refreshing. Its melodiousness is unbroken from beginning, from the lovely, but brief, adagio to the end. Why it should be named "Spring" does not appear, but it has nothing of the aspect of "programme" music as may be listened to with pleasure and perfect understanding without any association with its title. The second theme is fascinating, and its announcement and development are delightful. The overture is perhaps somewhat prolix in its "working out," and the line is not strongly drawn between this portion of the work and what immediately precedes it, but as a whole it flows with remarakble ease, its effects are fine in their well considered contrasts, and there is an absence of conventionality in the treatment generally, both harmonic and instrumental, that gives a marked and unique individuality to the composition.

Mr. Parker's rhapsody is strongly dramatic and is brilliantly and effectively scored, but on a first hearing it seems to lack unity or continuity, and the general effect is so fragmentary that it is not easy to divine the composer's intentions, even from a rhapsodic standpoint. The orchestra predominates throughout to an extent that makes the voice part ineffective. The poem by the Irish poet, James Clarence Mangan, is obscure in meaning. The narrator dreams of a beautiful land in which the sun shines on fields of corn and lustrous gardens in a golden clime, and he hears the tones of silver lyres and many voices, whose song is as the heavenly hymn of angels. Then there is a change and the minstrels become dumb, all is dark, and kings and nobles are stricken with terror. Then the narrator, in his dream, goes forth and sees the sky flecked with blood and amid its shorn beams a skeleton. And that is all. If he had seen snakes the whole thing would be susceptible of explanation, but the skeleton leaves all in obscurity. The poem does not appear to be a felicitous choice for musical treatment, and in its fogginess of intent is not attractive in itself, and that shortcoming cannot be overcome easily by the musician. Thence, despite the admirable skill that Mr. Parker has shown in his orchestration and the impressive brilliancy of effect that characterizes the work, it is uninteresting through the lack of a motive that appeals lucidly to the understanding. The voice part is trying to the singer and is declamatory rather than melodious as the word is generally understood. Mr. Heinrich sang it with vigorous dramatic emphasis, and won three enthusiastic recalls.

The Khorr variations are on a theme that is piquant in subject and rhythm. The work shows a thorough knowledge of the orchestra, and the variations are ingenious and musicianly, an adagio and a scherzando being notably pleasing. As a whole, however, it is wanting in variety of effect, and frequently falls into tameness until the last three variations (there are eight in all) are reached. The performance, which was marked by the highest finish, did the fullest possible justice to the work. Mr. Heinrich's singing of "Pogner's Address" was artistic in phrasing and expression, but the song does not afford him an opportuntiy to be heard at his best, and beside, his voice seemed dry and fatigued. Nevertheless, he was warmly applauded and twice recalled.

The symphony was read in a masterly manner by Mr. Paur, and in a thoroughly sympathetic vein, and the performance by the orchestra was up to its highest standard. The repeat in the first movement was judiciously omitted. If some of the repetitions in the andante, beautiful as it is, could be similarly treated it would be an advantage to the movement.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4 (B. and H.), Haydn; serenade for wind instruments, Mozart (first time); concerto for pianoforte, Chopin; overture, "Der Freischutz," Weber. The soloist is to be Miss Antoinette Szumowska.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 31, 1895.

Mr. Horatio W. Parker's "Cahal Mor" Produced for the First Time at the Twentieth Symphony Concert.

The program of the 20th symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture, "Spring," in A major, op. 15. (First time).....Goetz
Raphsody for baritone and orchestra, "Cahal Mor of the Wine-Red Hand," op. 40. (First time).....H. W. Parker
Variations on an Ukraine Folk-Song, in F major, op. 7. (First time).....Knorr
Pogner's Address, from "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg".....Wagner
Symphony No. 9, in C major.....Schubert

This concert was one of marked interest. It is a good thing to hear new music, so that the hearer may in future renew pleasure or avoid boredom.

The overture of Götz is entitled "Spring," a natural phenomenon known only to dwellers in New England by allusions to it by poets, musicians, men of scientific attainments and travelers. Spring in music is associated generally with a liberal use of clarinets, oboes, and flutes. But Götz abstained from the conventional and did not indulge himself in program-writing. The overture is fresh, original, spontaneous, and for the most part beautiful. The beginning and the ending are dramatic in a simple manner. The themes are eminently pleasing, and the development of them is thoroughly musical, not merely pedagogic. All in all it is a delightful work.

* * *

Mr Parker took as the text of his rhapsody the wild poem entitled "A Vision of Conraught in the Thirteenth Century," by James Clarence Mangan. The motto of this poem is "Et moi, j'ai été aussi en Arcadie." Mr. Parker for his musical purpose made a few slight changes in Mangan's verses. This poem is not perhaps as characteristic of the poet's genius as "O'Hussey's Ode to the Maguire," "Sarsfield," or "The Nameless One," and yet read the first verse:

"I walked entranced
Through a land of Morn;
The sun, with wondrous excess of light,
Shone down and glanced
Over seas of corn
And lustrous gardens aleft and right.
Even in the clime
Of resplendent Spain,
Beams no such sun upon such a land;
But it was the time,
'Twas in the reign
Of Cahal Mor of the Wine-red Hand."

And who would not listen eagerly to the strange tale of the dreamer?

Did Mangan weave these fancies of opium and strong drink? Is the story founded on some Irish legend? There is no note or commentary. And the poem needs none. A gloss would be an impertinence.

This Rhapsodoy seems to me the highest flight of Mr. Parker's imagination. Freedom of thought, splendor of diction, gorgeous color, dramatic expression, the legitimately spectacular in music;—all these are in this orchestral piece in which the human voice is obligato. There is no attempt at panoramic treatment, and yet the mood of each verse is italicized most eloquently. Nor is there the incoherency that seems inevitable in the musical presentation of such a poem. Finely and impressively does Mr. Parker keep riveting the hearer's attention to the refrain, to that glorious, haunting line:

"Of Cahal Mor of the Wine-red Hand."

The instrumentation throughout is that of a master. Thrilling are the effects gained by simple means as in the expression of the strange change beneath the dome. Sensuousness that is noble, terror, the fantastic, the spiritual, the horrible—Mr. Parker suggests all these, and in the suggesting controls himself. And the highest praise is that the hearer henceforth cannot think of the poem of Mangan without the instantaneous accompanying thought of the music that is its double.

Mr. Max Heinrich declaimed the text with marked dignity and thorough appreciation of poet and musician.

* * *

And after this glowing, imaginative work came the variations by Knorr, a son, I believe, of the Dr. Knorr who was Schumann's friend. These variations show the well trained musician, who thinks correctly and as many other respectable people think. There are interesting rhythmic problems solved, and the variations are thoroughly made. And when you say they are thoroughly made, the story is told.

* * *

Mr. Heinrich declaimed Pogner's address from Wagner's comic opera. In the opera Pogner is a good deal of a bore; and why should he be brought out on the concert stage? This is not said with any disrespect to Mr. Heinrich, who went through his task manfully and as though he really enjoyed it.

* * *

It is the fashion to rail at the great symphony by Schubert; but even the scoffers must be dumb when they hear the famous trombone passages in the first movement, or even the very opening of the symphony. Long as the second movement is, there are measures of imperishable beauty. And in these first two movements there is stuff enough for a dozen conventional symphonies.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 31, 1895.

The vocal music at the twentieth Symphony concert anticipated in certain senses the Wagner epoch of next week, of which prelude there was really no need. Mr. Max Heinrich, who was the singer, produced Pogner's Address, which has become about as hackneyed as Webster's reply to Hayne or Shiel's "Irish Aliens," and made rather less effect than one of those speeches would do at a Latin School exhibition. He also sang something new—a setting by Mr. H. W. Parker of Mangan's half legendary, half fanciful ballad, "Cahal Mor of the Wine-red Hand." The weird and romantic verses offer a composer an opportunity to write something thrilling and pathetic—a strong and strange scene with a brilliant vein of melody in the old Irish modes running through it for the singer, and imparting its chief quality and merit. Mr. Parker has tried pretty nearly every orchestral combination, using all the drums, the harp, the cymbals and the full brass choir. Some of his illustrative passages are certainly both pathetic and dramatic, and their variety is no less noticeable than their general appositeness. But the singer is oppressed and burdened in true Wagnerian style. What he has to sing has neither the freedom, the appropriateness nor the diversity of the orchestra score, and he stands at times almost like a good speaker reduced to describing a panorama. Especially must this be the case when the orchestra are so continuously and mercilessly loud as Mr. Paur allowed them to be. If Mr. Heinrich had had a fair chance, his vivid and sympathetic dramatic style might have made his delivery of the vocal text far more interesting to the audience and more remunerative to himself.

There were two new orchestral works on the programme, of which the first was a "Spring" overture by Goetz, which began with a hopeful and promising trumpet-call followed by a soft, slow rising adagio and a pleasantly pastoral allegro. But the interest was not well sustained, although the writing appeared to be neat, tasteful and skilful. The other was a nice and generally interesting set of variations by Iwan Knorr upon a Ukraine folk-song, in which the theme was held up with remarkable clearness and the contrasts between the wooden wind and the strings were particularly clever and agreeable. Both were played too heavily, however.

The symphony was Schubert's ninth, in C major, so full of beauty and of strength, in the playing of which the latter element was more obvious than the former, for there was far too little softness and delicacy in the reading. The orchestra seemed to have got so much power to their elbows and lungs as not to be able to come anywhere near a pianissimo, and hardly to compass a piano.

Next Saturday's programme names: Haydn's fourth symphony, a Mozart serenade for wind instruments, Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture and a Chopin concerto for a new pianist, Miss Szumowska.

The Kneisel Quartette at their last concert but one for the present season had the assistance of Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen in playing Dvorak's pianoforte quintette in A, opus 81. In this work the foreign virtuoso replaced Mrs. H. H. A. Beach who was prevented by illness from taking her expected share. Mr. Stavenhagen's performance was interesting always, but not at all points satisfactory. In his happier moments he showed the taste, the delicacy, the gracefully-moving touch and the interpretative sympathy which have been noticed in his lighter numbers at his own concerts, but again he seemed to feel as if he were playing some impetuously thundering passage of Liszt, and overbore his associates, who held discreetly back from excess of force although they kept close beside him when he forced the pace. A Schumann quartette, also in A major, began the evening and was perfectly played by Mr. Kneisel and his harmonious brethren. Between these pieces, Miss Franklin, who never appears to better advantage than in a room of moderate size, sang in her best style an odd "Heute Dich," by Mr. Paur, a pair of songs by Bizet and an elaborately difficult song by Henschel, meeting their technical difficulties with ease and beautifying them with pure tones and fine phrasings.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 31, 1895.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concert of last night was noticeable more because of the fact that three of the five numbers on the programme were heard for the first time, rather than of any special musical value attached to either of them. The programme opened with the overture "Spring" in A major, by Goetz, which has as its chief feature a quaint beginning and ending, but its passages, while of a harmonious nature, do not rise above mediocrity.

The second number introduced Mr. Max Heinrich, whom it is always a pleasure to hear. He was heard in a rhapsody, "Cahal Mor of the Wine-Red Hand," by H. W. Parker, and which really proved a thankless task for the soloist. Not that he did not do it justice, for he certainly did all that was possible with the material at hand. To quote a line in one of the verses, "none seemed to understand" what the rhapsody was all about. Much more can be said for the orchestral background than for the vocal part, for it was rich in varied and graceful passages and of a highly dramatic order in several places.

Mr. Heinrich was later heard in Payner's address from Wagner's "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," which he rendered in German and with much interest and enthusiasm. The number showed to advantage all the beauties and artistic qualities of Mr. Heinrich's cultivated voice and proved a delight to the audience.

Iwan Knorr's variations on an Ukraine folk-song in F major was also one of the new numbers, but it proved to be rather dull and failed to arouse any enthusiasm. The programme closed with the Schubert symphony No. 9, whose many beauties largely atone for its great length.

At the next concert a Mozart serenade for wind instruments will be played for the first time and Miss Antoinette Szumowska will be the piano soloist.

[113]

Boston Journal

SUNDAY, MARCH 31, 1895.

Symphony Concert.

The usual large audience was gathered in Music hall last evening and gave cordial evidence of thoroughly enjoying the program arranged by director Paur for the 20th Symphony concert. Three novelties were offered, an overture entitled "Spring," by Herman Goetz; "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand," a rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, by Horatio W. Parker, and variations on an Ukraine folk-song in F major, by Iwan Knorr. The other selections were Pogner's address from Wagner's "Meistersinger," and Schubert's ninth symphony. Mr Max Heinrich was the soloist.

The Goetz overture is a gracefully written and very pleasing, although rather unpretentious work. The themes are clear, strongly developed, and are marked by considerable originality. To a certain extent the music is of a descriptive character, and is often strikingly suggestive of the title given the composition. The instrumentation is very elaborate, and the effects gained are artistic and enjoyable.

The variations written by Knorr on the Ukraine song are excellent examples of this well-equipped composer's versatility and originality in musical thought. There are eight variations on the original theme, an odd, barbaric melody of peculiar rhythm. It is played in three-part harmony by the wood wind over a pizzicato bass in the cello and double basses. The second part of the melody is given to the strings, and the third to the horns and bassoons. The variations are all notable for beautiful and contrasted effects, and betray admirable command of orchestral resources.

Schubert's splendid symphony was finely played. Mr Paur's reading was at once forceful and intelligent. He endeavored to give a faithful reflection of the spirit of the composer, and very properly refrained from attempting to improve upon the original score. Mr Paur has gained an enviable reputation for the faithfulness of his interpretations, a reputation that was not possessed by his predecessor.

Mr Max Heinrich has long been a favorite here, and his appearance at the symphony concert last evening was welcomed by enthusiastic applause. He sang the Pogner address with superb distinctness of enunciation and with splendid spirit and expression. He was in the best of voice, and altogether gave an admirable interpretation of one of the gems of Wagner's famous musical comedy.

He was no less successful in singing the rhapsody written by Mr Parker for the text of James Clarence Morgan's poem, "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand." The poem is written in heroic measure, and tells of the former glories of Erin. Mr Parker's music is admirably suited to the text, and like all the work by this talented composer, it is written in a scholarly and finished style. Mr Parker has dedicated this rhapsody to Mr Heinrich.

The program announced for the next symphony concert is as follows:

Symphony No. 4 ..... Haydn
Serenade for wind instruments ..... Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte ..... Chopin
Overture, Freischuetz ..... Weber
Soloist, Miss Antoinette Szumowska.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 31.

The Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twentieth concert of the season, at Music Hall, last night. The programme was:

Overture, "Spring" (first time) ..... Goetz
Cahal of the Wine Red Rand (new) Horatio W. Parker
Variations (first time) ..... Knorr
Aria from the "Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
Symphony, No. 9, in C major ..... Schubert
Soloist, Mr. Max Heinrich.

The Goetz overture is a most attractive work, with a certain freshness and unlabored gayety, that are not strongly characteristic of modern composers. Goetz did not live long enough to exhaust his ideas or the romance of youth, and so there is always an inspiring touch of poetry in his music, a sincerity and a spontaneity, that cause one to forget the absence, perhaps, of higher art qualities.

Mr. Parker's "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand" is a rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, and even in its title is suggestive of oriental lands, rose gardens and bulbuls, and leads one to suspect that the wine-red hand will receive some special illustrative touches in music, a belief which required strong imaginative powers to confirm; the poem to which the music is set deals simply with a golden age, where the climate was delightful and there were "thrones and circling fires," tones of silver lyres and voices "in wreathed swell." After awhile the climate changed, "kings and nobles all looked aghast" the sky "showed fleckt with blood, an 'alien sun glared from the north; amid his thorn beams stood a skeleton." This is the subject of Mr. Parker's rhapsody. The orchestral introduction suggests a storm, but it is doubtful if they had this in the golden age; but when the work suggests peace and beauty the orchestra is in a continual state of unrest, "circling fires" are represented on the harp, and the "heavenly hymn of an angel band" by drums and cymbals. The composer's intention was larger than his demonstration; there is a suggestion of mystery in both the words and the music, but it is the mystery of turgid thought and not of poetic imagination. Perhaps a rhapsody will excuse vagueness, exaggeration and affectation, and it may be that what is most incomprehensible is most profound. Mr. Heinrich's singing aroused the audience to great enthusiasm.

The Knorr variations are interesting without being over stimulating. They interest like the skill of the conjuror who turns one rabbit into two and extracts a canary bird from a thimble. The skill displayed is admirable, and unfortunately not impossible.

Mr. Heinrichs again aroused the enthusiasm of the audience by his singing of Pogner's address, the orchestra frequently overpowering his voice by its loudness, but probably this was the intention of the composer.

The programme for the next concert is: Haydn's Symphony No. 4; Mozart's Serenade for wind instruments; a Chopin Concerto for pianoforte, and Weber's Overture, "Der Frieschutz." Miss Antoinette Szumowska is the soloist.

MONDAY, APRIL 1, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goetz: Frühlings-Ouverture, in A major, opus 15. (First time.)
Horatio W. Parker: "Cahal Mór of the Wine-red Hand," rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, opus 40. (First time.)
Iwan Knorr: Variations on an Ukraine Folk-song, in F major, opus 7. (First time.)
Wagner: Pogner's Address, from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," act 1., scene iii.
Schubert: Symphony No. 9, in C major.
Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

Goetz's overture is a charming work, full of bright, melodic invention and well worked out; not a composition of the gigantic sort, but pure, delightful music. It was exceedingly well played.

Iwan Knorr is a new composer to our public; he is a man of forty-two, born in Western Prussia and brought up in the Leipzig school; after spending a good part of his life in Russia, he was called in 1883 to Hoch's Conservatorium in Frankfort as teacher of theory and composition. Judging from the set of variations played at this concert, his Leipzig teaching, under Reinecke and Richter, did not prevent his being strongly influenced by his Russian surroundings. The Ukrane theme is lovely in itself, and deliciously given out by the orchestra; the variations, however, did not impress us very strongly. The first one is based upon a sort of counterpoint of which one hoped that Meyerbeer had said the last word, and most of the others shine more by brilliancy of orchestration and a certain piquant fantasticism of style than by more solid musical qualities. There is, however, one variation, an Adagio in D-flat major, which is full of genuine musical beauty. The composition was admirably played.

The great Schubert symphony was played with a technical perfection up to the very best things our orchestra has done. The balance between all parts of the orchestra was perfect, even in those places where Schubert's somewhat reckless scoring might well have given undue prominence to certain parts, and even the most intricate passages were played with a distinctness and finish that left nothing to be desired. The performance was also full of vitality and vigor, certain details of accent being brought out with convincing distinctness. One point in the performance, on the other hand, was far less commendable. If there ever were a work, of which rhythmic persistency was a prime factor, this symphony of Schubert's is that work; each one of the four movements is an idealized dance. Mr. Paur's "modifications" of the tempo seemed to us without exception entirely out of place and disturbing; we had far rather have heard the symphony go as if by clock-work. No doubt some passages were thrown into stronger relief by the process, but only at the expense of cooling down the general temperature of the work, so to speak. The Finale suffered most, but there were also places in the slow movement in which a sudden slackening of the tempo was more irritating than anything else. The wonderful Trio of the Scherzo also suffered from dragging. Only the first movement went almost invariably to our liking.

Mr. Parker's "Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand" is a work not to be judged too quickly. The composer has well caught the picturesque suggestiveness of Mangan's glowing verses, and rendered it musically with a wealth of fancy and richness of coloring that compel admiration at once. In regard to the composer's specifically melodic power, we still feel much as we did after hearing his "Hora novissima;" we are not yet sufficiently familiar with his general melodic style to judge of it. To us his phrases always bring the unexpected, and the unexpected in music is often of the nature of a disappointment. This trait in Mr. Parker's melody may quite as well be a sign of genuine originality as of mere searching after novelty; not one of the really great and original composers in history ever had his melodic style appreciated at first. We are as yet in the condition of finding Mr. Parker's phrases merely unusual; with time and better acquaintance we may get to seeing something else in them. But of the dramatic force shown in this Rhapsody there can be no question; it is enormously effective. One impression it made on us was, however, so distinct that we are tolerably sure of its being right; it is the impression that almost all American works have made upon us for the last two decades, not only American musical compositions, but American pictures, statues, stories, novels and poetry. This is the impression of being, like our national bread and biscuits, all too slack-baked. We do not feel this in "Cáhal Mór" more strongly than in a host of other native works; or, if we did, it would only be because there seems to be more talent, perhaps genius, shown here than in most of them; but we do feel it quite as strongly as in others. Like most of the younger American composers, painters, authors or poets, Mr. Parker has here put out a composition in just that condition in which one feels it to be ready for the composer to begin really to work on it. The plan and scheme of the work are admirable; they show fineness of conception, imaginativeness, poetic sympathy, even now and then a touch of genius. What could be finer, for instance, than Mr. Parker's way of treating the fourth stanza?—

I sought the hall, and, behold!—a change
From light to darkness, from weal to woe!
Kings, nobles, all looked aghast and strange,
The minstrel group sat in dumbest show!
Had some great crime wrought this dread amaze.
This terror? None seemed to understand!

Here the poet goes on with the ever-recurring refrain about—

This is the time, these be the days,
Of Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand!

or, rather, we suppose he does; for we have not seen the printed poem, and have the text only as it stands in Mr. Parker's score. Mr. Parker, with admirable musico-poetic instinct, cuts out this refrain; he leaves the explanation all in the vague and lets the orchestra tell what "none seemed to understand." This is a stroke of something very like genius. Nor is this by any means the only fine point in the work, which is one of the most brilliant we have yet heard from an American composer. And yet, with all its poetic imagery, brilliancy, gorgeous and picturesque coloring, the composition, even in the matter of orchestration, gives one the impression of being somehow unfinished, of needing to be worked over some more. Mr. Heinrich sang it splendidly, his perfect clearness of enunciation of the text never for a mo-

The next programme is: Haydn, symphony in D major, "The Clock" (B. & H., No. 4; Peters, No. 3); Mozart, serenade for wind instruments, No. 11, in E-flat major (first time); Chopin, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in F minor, opus 21; Weber, overture to "Der Freischütz." Miss Antoinette Szumowska will be the pianist.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, APRIL 1, 1895.

THE TWENTIETH SYMPHONY.

SEVERAL COMPOSITIONS HEARD FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following programme was performed:

Overture, "Spring" ..... Goetz
Rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, "Cahal Mor of the Wine-Red Hand," ..... H. W. Parker
Variations on an Ukraine Folk-Song ..... Knorr
Pogner's Address, "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
Symphony No. 9, in C major ..... Schubert

Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist.

The Goetz Overture, the Rhapsody by Parker and the Variations by Knorr were heard for the first time in these concerts. Conductor Paur, as is often the case, was too generous in the quantity offered on this occasion. It is poor policy and bad art in programme arrangement and performance to be obliged to hurry from one number to another as was the case at this concert. The Knorr Variations could well have been omitted and given on some future occasion, if it was necessary to expose their protracted and not inspiring proportions. Mr. Paur could have then vouchsafed his audience a few minutes' rest between the remaining numbers, much to the advantage of the performance and the comfort of the listeners.

The "Spring" overture of Goetz proved to be a delightful composition, the composer having worked out his ideas in a skilful and coherent manner—ideas that are the result of inspiration on the part of the author, not invention, for they are fresh and spontaneous, and flow like a river between its banks, unobstructed and broadening in the course of development. It is a pleasure to listen to such genuine music devoid of the effort to paint a panorama of the earliest season, with its fitful changes, birds, buds and blossoms, as the modern composer too frequently attempts. It was splendidly read and played.

The element in Mr. Parker's Rhapsody that commands at once the attention of the listener is the characteristic display of imagination in the instrumentation, a mastery of means that renders the composition at times dramatic and effective in the extreme. The poem is abrupt in its changes and the effort of the composer to depict the poet's intention is probably the reason why the composer has appeared to be fragmentary and incoherent in his setting of the verses. The orchestral score is brilliant and effective almost to the extinction of the vocal part. One must listen, and admire the means employed, and at the same time regret that the composer has not behind this mastery of resources, something of greater import musically, to go hand in hand with his emotional adornment. Such compositions have not the lasting value that should accompany the sincere and ambitious effort of so admirable a workman.

Mr. Max Heinrich sang his part in a musicianlike and dramatic manner as he is wont to do upon all occasions. In the same proportion that he is admirable as a musician he is deficient as a vocalist. He has little or no idea of vowel forms, and has no logical method of voice production. His voice, which naturally is not of mellifluous quality, is located in his nose, his pharynx or his throat, as it happens to hit. His efforts are as if an instrumentalist had taken up singing at once without the least attempt at elementary training either in voice-building or vocal technique. Mr. Heinrich's intonation has of late become disagreeably false at times. The audience recalled Mr. Heinrich several times, although his effort in a vocal sense was not a commendable one. He met with similar recognition in the Wagner aria, which was overburdened by the accompaniment. But this matters little, as the aria is barely worth the effort Mr. Knorr, in his Variations, shows the knowledge, skill and ingenuity of the competent musician both in the composition and the instrumentation, but the Variations as a whole are ineffective and wearisome as a concert piece.

The great Schubert symphony was in many respects finely played. The wind, especially the wood-wind, was often too loud and wanting in delicacy, the fault of the conductor, who has a very poor appreciation of the necessity for dynamic gradation. Individually the flute, oboe and clarinet soloists played with delightful effect in the obligato passages. The wind and strings seesawed in the last movement at times. Mr. Paur is to be thanked for the repeats omitted and the "cuts" made in this work of "heavenly length." Generally speaking the orchestra played splendidly throughout the programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING APRIL 1. 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

Three New Works and Schubert's Tenth Symphony.

The Concert Distinguished by Varied Beauty of Selection.

That keen communication of sympathy that sometimes prevails in a concert hall has perhaps not been more noticeable in the symphony concert series this season than at the twentieth concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening. The concert was distinguished by a varied beauty of selection including much that was new: the vigor, delicacy and smoothness, and by the prompt and unanimous ensemble with which nearly everything was rendered. Appetizing at the start was the overture "Spring" by Hermann Goetz. Regarding the significance of its title, this work like the pastoral music of Beethoven would seem to be feeling rather than painting. It is however, a sunny, bright and exhilerating product that, if anything, tends to illustrate the general awakening of animate nature at the arrival of spring. Following the overture came a rhapsody for baritone and orchestra to the words of a grotesque and visionary old Irish poem by James Clarence Mangan. The work is voluptuously scored, the composer unmistakably having found in the poem the widest desirable scope for his virtuosic tone painting. Its single shortcoming would appear to be with a proneness to present a "Carlylian wide-weltering chaos" in an incessant sea of tones, yet even this slightly unfavorable impression might wholly disappear as the result of a second hearing. The succession of harmonies and modulations have often an appalling effect in outbursts of grim humor, while all possible orchestral means are applied so as to intensify to the utmost the weird and supernatural suggestions of James Mangan's poem. The charm of the coloring, the magical spirit which pervades the composition, and the dramatic picture presented of manly, passionate, and even in the dream, heroic conflict, are all in all productive of a truly beautiful and richly colored tone piece. The vocal part throughout is one of extreme difficulty, and it covers a wide range.

As regards pure vocalism there was perhaps as little of it in Mr. Max Heinrich's singing as there would have been in the art of some venerable canter Emeritus. His naturally sympathetic voice seemed pitiably tired; but his interpretation was as usual that of the ideal musician. The mind and the heart of the singer were as one in one of the most artistic and masterly triumphs, attained nevertheless at no small disadvantage, that has been experienced in Music Hall this season. Brave Max Heinrich.

The third novelty that the programme had to offer was a work by Irvan Knorr—eight melancholy variations on an Ukraine folk-song, in F major, op. 7. The variations are one and all ingeniously and correctly made: but the composer would seem to have used his profound musical knowledge not to intensify or to illustrate in any strong light the thoughts and images of a profoundly musical nature, but to obscure the same, possibly through fear of appearing commonplace. The work imposes not a little dreariness and unrest. A terrible deal of mind is made in it to subserve the interests of the theoretical bug-bear that the composer utilizes for the express purpose of making the musical expression seem secondary.

Following the symphony, Pogner's Address from the "Master Singers" was finely given by Mr. Max Heinrich; and then for a finale came the great symphony in C major by Schubert. This was stated on the programme to be Schubert's ninth symphony. So thought George Grove when this posthumous work was discovered many years ago; but in 1881 Mr. Grove does not hesitate to style the C-major symphony as No. 10.

The proof seems indisputable to Grove that there was a symphony written by Schubert while in Gastein, which is doubtless his symphony No. 9. The symphony played Saturday evening, namely, the 10th, and not the 9th, as the programme stated, was written during the last year that Schubert lived. In no symphonic music of Schubert are the wind instruments so charmingly used as in the first two movements of this work.

Who shall say that it was to Schubert's disadvantage that he was unskilled in counterpoint, so long as he was such a complete master of orchestral effect, and such a fountainhead of the very purest melody. The stately, soul-stirring harmonies of the introduction and the rich, warm coloring in the allegro that follows were brought vividly into view by Conductor Paur, and in the form of a real picture.—so masterly was the reading and so unanimously con amore was the performance by the orchestra.

The rhapsodie referred to was also for the most part finely played; although there was an unhealthy pitch at times in some of the wind instruments which may possibly have arisen from a whole week's blow-out that must have been required for its interpretation. The harp effects of the work were exquisitely illustrated by Herr Schnecker.

C. L. Capen.

Note.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a fine programme in Cambridge, at Sanders Theatre, next Thursday evening. "An Island Fantasy" by J. K. Paine; symphony "Im Walde" by Raff; and ballet music from Silvia by Delibes will be performed: and there will be vocal selections rendered by Mr. Ben Davies.

[114]

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, MARCH 31, 1895.

Symphony Concert.

The usual large audience was gathered in Music hall last evening and gave cordial evidence of thoroughly enjoying the program arranged by director Paur for the 20th Symphony concert. Three novelties were offered, an overture entitled "Spring," by Herman Goetz; "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand," a rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, by Horatio W. Parker, and variations on an Ukraine folk-song in F major, by Iwan Knorr. The other selections were Pogner's address from Wagner's "Meistersinger," and Schubert's ninth symphony. Mr Max Heinrich was the soloist.

The Goetz overture is a gracefully written and very pleasing, although rather unpretentious work. The themes are clear, strongly developed, and are marked by considerable originality. To a certain extent the music is of a descriptive character, and is often strikingly suggestive of the title given the composition. The instrumentation is very elaborate, and the effects gained are artistic and enjoyable.

The variations written by Knorr on the Ukraine song are excellent examples of this well-equipped composer's versatility and originality in musical thought. There are eight variations on the original theme, an odd, barbaric melody of peculiar rhythm. It is played in three-part harmony by the wood wind over a pizzicato bass in the cello and double basses. The second part of the melody is given to the strings, and the third to the horns and bassoons. The variations are all notable for beautiful and contrasted effects, and betray admirable command of orchestral resources.

Schubert's splendid symphony was finely played. Mr Paur's reading was at once forceful and intelligent. He endeavored to give a faithful reflection of the spirit of the composer, and very properly refrained from attempting to improve upon the original score. Mr Paur has gained an enviable reputation for the faithfulness of his interpretations, a reputation that was not possessed by his predecessor.

Mr Max Heinrich has long been a favorite here, and his appearance at the symphony concert last evening was welcomed by enthusiastic applause. He sang the Pogner address with superb distinctness of enunciation and with splendid spirit and expression. He was in the best of voice, and altogether gave an admirable interpretation of one of the gems of Wagner's famous musical comedy.

He was no less successful in singing the rhapsody written by Mr Parker for the text of James Clarence Morgan's poem, "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand." The poem is written in heroic measure, and tells of the former glories of Erin. Mr Parker's music is admirably suited to the text, and like all the work by this talented composer, it is written in a scholarly and finished style. Mr Parker has dedicated this rhapsody to Mr Heinrich.

The program announced for the next symphony concert is as follows:

Symphony No. 4 ..... Haydn
Serenade for wind instruments ..... Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte ..... Chopin
Overture, Freischuetz ..... Weber
Soloist, Miss Antoinette Szumowska.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 31.

The Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twentieth concert of the season, at Music Hall, last night. The programme was:

Overture, "Spring" (first time) ..... Goetz
Cahal of the Wine Red Rand (new) Horatio W. Parker
Variations (first time) ..... Knorr
Aria from the "Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
Symphony, No. 9, in C major ..... Schubert
Soloist, Mr. Max Heinrich.

The Goetz overture is a most attractive work, with a certain freshness and unlabored gayety, that are not strongly characteristic of modern composers. Goetz did not live long enough to exhaust his ideas or the romance of youth, and so there is always an inspiring touch of poetry in his music, a sincerity and a spontaniety, that cause one to forget the absence, perhaps, of higher art qualities.

Mr. Parker's "Cahal Mor of the Wine Red Hand" is a rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, and even in its title is suggestive of oriental lands, rose gardens and bulbuls, and leads one to suspect that the wine-red hand will receive some special illustrative touches in music, a belief which required strong imaginative powers to confirm; the poem to which the music is set deals simply with a golden age, where the climate was delightful and there were "thrones and circling fires," tones of silver lyres and voices "in wreathed swell." After awhile the climate changed, "kings and nobles all looked aghast" the sky "showed fleckt with blood, an 'alien sun glared from the north; amid his shorn beams stood a skeleton." This is the subject of Mr. Parker's rhapsody. The orchestral introduction suggests a storm, but it is doubtful if they had this in the golden age; but when the work suggests peace and beauty the orchestra is in a continual state of unrest, "circling fires" are represented on the harp, and the "heavenly hymn of an angel band" by drums and cymbals. The composer's intention was larger than his demonstration; there is a suggestion of mystery in both the words and the music, but it is the mystery of turgid thought and not of poetic imagination. Perhaps a rhapsody will excuse vagueness, exaggeration and affectation, and i may be that what is most incomprehensible is most profound. Mr. Heinrich's singing aroused the audience to great enthusiasm.

The Knorr variations are interesting without being over stimulating. They interest like the skill of the conjuror who turns one rabbit into two and extracts a canary bird from a thimble. The skill displayed is admirable, and unfortunately not impossible.

Mr. Heinrichs again aroused the enthusiasm of the audience by his singing of Pogner's address, the orchestra frequently overpowering his voice by its loudness, but probably this was the intention of the composer.

The programme for the next concert is: Haydn's Symphony No. 4; Mozart's Serenade for wind instruments; a Chopin Concerto for pianoforte, and Weber's Overture, "Der Frieschutz." Miss Antoinette Szumowska is the soloist.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 1, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goetz: Frühlings-Ouvertüre, in A major, opus 15. (First time.)
Horatio W. Parker: "Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand," rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, opus 40. (First time.)
Iwan Knorr: Variations on an Ukraine Folk-song, in F major, opus 7. (First time.)
Wagner: Pogner's Address, from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," act 1., scene iii.
Schubert: Symphony No. 9, in C major.
Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

Goetz's overture is a charming work, full of bright, melodic invention and well worked out; not a composition of the gigantic sort, but pure, delightful music. It was exceedingly well played.

Iwan Knorr is a new composer to our public; he is a man of forty-two, born in Western Prussia and brought up in the Leipzig school; after spending a good part of his life in Russia, he was called in 1883 to Hoch's Conservatorium in Frankfort as teacher of theory and composition. Judging from the set of variations played at this concert, his Leipzig teaching, under Reinecke and Richter, did not prevent his being strongly influenced by his Russian surroundings. The Ukrane theme is lovely in itself, and deliciously given out by the orchestra; the variations, however, did not impress us very strongly. The first one is based upon a sort of counterpoint of which one hoped that Meyerbeer had said the last word, and most of the others shine more by brilliancy of orchestration and a certain piquant fantasticism of style than by more solid musical qualities. There is, however, one variation, an Adagio in D-flat major, which is full of genuine musical beauty. The composition was admirably played.

The great Schubert symphony was played with a technical perfection up to the very best things our orchestra has done. The balance between all parts of the orchestra was perfect, even in those places where Schubert's somewhat reckless scoring might well have given undue prominence to certain parts, and even the most intricate passages were played with a distinctness and finish that left nothing to be desired. The performance was also full of vitality and vigor, certain details of accent being brought out with convincing distinctness. One point in the performance, on the other hand, was far less commendable. If there ever were a work, of which rhythmic persistency was a prime factor, this symphony of Schubert's is that work; each one of the four movements is an idealized dance. Mr. Paur's "modifications" of the tempo seemed to us without exception entirely out of place and disturbing; we had far rather have heard the symphony go as if by clock-work. No doubt some passages were thrown into stronger relief by the process, but only at the expense of cooling down the general temperature of the work, so to speak. The Finale suffered most, but there were also places in the slow movement in which a sudden slackening of the tempo was more irritating than anything else. The wonderful Trio of the Scherzo also suffered from dragging. Only the first movement went almost invariably lo our liking.

Mr. Parker's "Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand" is a work not to be judged too quickly. The composer has well caught the picturesque suggestiveness of Mangan's glowing verses, and rendered it musically with a wealth of fancy and richness of coloring that compel admiration at once. In regard to the composer's specifically melodic power, we still feel much as we did after hearing his "Hora novissima;" we are not yet sufficiently familiar with his general melodic style to judge of it. To us his phrases always bring the unexpected, and the unexpected in music is often of the nature of a disappointment. This trait in Mr. Parker's melody may quite as well be a sign of genuine originality as of mere searching after novelty; not one of the really great and original composers in history ever had his melodic style appreciated at first. We are as yet in the condition of finding Mr. Parker's phrases merely unusual; with time and better acquaintance we may get to seeing something else in them. But of the dramatic force shown in this Rhapsody there can be no question; it is enormously effective. One impression it made on us was, however, so distinct that we are tolerably sure of its being right; it is the impression that almost all American works have made upon us for the last two decades, not only American musical compositions, but American pictures, statues, stories, novels and poetry. This is the impression of being, like our national bread and biscuits, all too slack-baked. We do not feel this in "Cáhal Mór" more strongly than in a host of other native works; or, if we did, it would only be because there seems to be more talent, perhaps genius, shown here than in most of them; but we do feel it quite as strongly as in others. Like most of the younger American composers, painters, authors or poets, Mr. Parker has here put out a composition in just that condition in which one feels it to be ready for the composer to begin really to work on it. The plan and scheme of the work are admirable; they show fineness of conception, imaginativeness, poetic sympathy, even now and then a touch of genius. What could be finer, for instance, than Mr. Parker's way of treating the fourth stanza?—

I sought the hall, and, behold!—a change
From light to darkness, from weal to woe!
Kings, nobles, all looked aghast and strange,
The minstrel group sat in dumbest show!
Had some great crime wrought this dread amaze,
This terror? None seemed to understand!

Here the poet goes on with the ever-recurring refrain about—

This is the time, these be the days,
Of Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand!

or, rather, we suppose he does; for we have not seen the printed poem, and have the text only as it stands in Mr. Parker's score. Mr. Parker, with admirable musico-poetic instinct, cuts out this refrain; he leaves the explanation all in the vague and lets the orchestra tell what "none seemed to understand." This is a stroke of something very like genius. Nor is this by any means the only fine point in the work, which is one of the most brilliant we have yet heard from an American composer. And yet, with all its poetic imagery, brilliancy, gorgeous and picturesque coloring, the composition, even in the matter of orchestration, gives one the impression of being somehow unfinished, of needing to be worked over some more. Mr. Heinrich sang it splendidly, his perfect clearness of annunciation of the text never for a moment interfering with his fine expression of tone nor his admirable musical phrasing. In Pogner's Address, from the "Meistersinger," he was also at his very best, and made a profound impression. He is an artist like few!

The next programme is: Haydn, symphony in D major, "The Clock" (B. & H., No. 4; Peters, No. 3); Mozart, serenade for wind instruments, No. 11, in E-flat major (first time); Chopin, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in F minor, opus 21; Weber, overture to "Der Freischütz." Miss Antoinette Szumowska will be the pianist.

The Boston Traveler
MONDAY, APRIL 1, 1895.

THE TWENTIETH SYMPHONY.

SEVERAL COMPOSITIONS HEARD FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following programme was performed:

Overture, "Spring" ..... Goetz
Rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, "Cahal Mor of the Wine-Red Hand," ..... H. W. Parker
Variations on an Ukraine Folk-Song ..... Knorr
Pogner's Address, "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
Symphony No. 9, in C major ..... Schubert

Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist.

The Goetz Overture, the Rhapsody by Parker and the Variations by Knorr were heard for the first time in these concerts. Conductor Paur, as is often the case, was too generous in the quantity offered on this occasion. It is poor policy and bad art in programme arrangement and performance to be obliged to hurry from one number to another as was the case at this concert. The Knorr Variations could well have been omitted and given on some future occasion, if it was necessary to expose their protracted and not inspiring proportions. Mr. Paur could have then vouchsafed his audience a few minutes' rest between the remaining numbers, much to the advantage of the performance and the comfort of the listeners.

The "Spring" overture of Goetz proved to be a delightful composition, the composer having worked out his ideas in a skilful and coherent manner—ideas that are the result of inspiration on the part of the author, not invention, for they are fresh and spontaneous, and flow like a river between its banks, unobstructed and broadening in the course of development. It is a pleasure to listen to such genuine music devoid of the effort to paint a panorama of the earliest season, with its fitful changes, birds, buds and blossoms, as the modern composer too frequently attempts. It was splendidly read and played.

The element in Mr. Parker's Rhapsody that commands at once the attention of the listener is the characteristic display of imagination in the instrumentation, a mastery of means that renders the composition at times dramatic and effective in the extreme. The poem is abrupt in its changes and the effort of the composer to depict the poet's intention is probably the reason why the composer has appeared to be fragmentary and incoherent in his setting of the verses. The orchestral score is brilliant and effective almost to the extinction of the vocal part. One must listen, and admire the means employed, and at the same time regret that the composer has not behind this mastery of resources, something of greater import musically, to go hand in hand with his emotional adornment. Such compositions have not the lasting value that should accompany the sincere and ambitious effort of so admirable a workman.

Mr. Max Heinrich sang his part in a musicianlike and dramatic manner as he is wont to do upon all occasions. In the same proportion that he is admirable as a musician he is deficient as a vocalist. He has little or no idea of vowel forms, and has no logical method of voice production. His voice, which naturally is not of mellifluous quality, is located in his nose, his pharynx or his throat, as it happens to hit. His efforts are as if an instrumentalist had taken up singing at once without the least attempt at elementary training either in voice-building or vocal technique. Mr. Heinrich's intonation has of late become disagreeably false at times. The audience recalled Mr. Heinrich several times, although his effort in a vocal sense was not a commendable one. He met with similar recognition in the Wagner aria, which was overburdened by the accompaniment. But this matters little, as the aria is barely worth the effort Mr. Knorr, in his Variations, shows the knowledge, skill and ingenuity of the competent musician both in the composition and the instrumentation, but the Variations as a whole are ineffective and wearisome as a concert piece.

The great Schubert symphony was in many respects finely played. The wind, especially the wood-wind, was often too loud and wanting in delicacy, the fault of the conductor, who has a very poor appreciation of the necessity for dynamic gradation. Individually the flute, oboe and clarinet soloists played with delightful effect in the obligato passages. The wind and strings seesawed in the last movement at times. Mr. Paur is to be thanked for the repeats omitted and the "cuts" made in this work of "heavenly length." Generally speaking the orchestra played splendidly throughout the programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING APRIL 1. 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

Three New Works and Schubert's Tenth Symphony.

The Concert Distinguished by Varied Beauty of Selection.

That keen communication of sympathy that sometimes prevails in a concert hall has perhaps not been more noticeable in the symphony concert series this season than at the twentieth concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening. The concert was distinguished by a varied beauty of selection including much that was new; the vigor, delicacy and smoothness, and by the prompt and unanimous ensemble with which nearly everything was rendered. Appetizing at the start was the overture "Spring" by Hermann Goetz. Regarding the significance of its title this work like the pastoral music of Beethoven would seem to be feeling rather than painting. It is however, a sunny, bright and exhilerating product that, if anything, tends to illustrate the general awakening of animate nature at the arrival of spring. Following the overture came a rhapsody for baritone and orchestra to the words of a grotesque and visionary old Irish poem by James Clarence Mangan. The work is voluptuously scored, the composer unmistakably having found in the poem the widest desirable scope for his virtuosic tone painting. Its single shortcoming would appear to be with a proneness to present a "Carlylian wide weltering chaos" in an incessant sea of tones, yet even this slightly unfavorable impression might wholly disappear as the result of a second hearing. The succession of harmonies and modulations have often an appalling effect in outbursts of grim humor, while all possible orchestral means are applied so as to intensify to the utmost the weird and supernatural suggestions of James Mangan's poem. The charm of the coloring, the magical spirit which pervades the composition, and the dramatic picture presented of manly, passionate, and even in the dream, heroic conflict, are all in all productive of a truly beautiful and richly colored tone piece. The vocal part throughout is one of extreme difficulty, and it covers a wide range.

As regards pure vocalism there was perhaps as little of it in Mr. Max Heinrich's singing as there would have been in the art of some venerable cantor Emeritus. His naturally sympathetic voice seemed pitiably tired; but his interpretation was as usual that of the ideal musician. The mind and the heart of the singer were as one in one of the most artistic and masterly triumphs, attained nevertheless at no small disadvantage, that has been experienced in Music Hall this season. Bravo Max Heinrich.

The third novelty that the programme had to offer was a work by Irvan Knorr—eight melancholy variations on an Ukraine folk-song, in F major, op. 7. The variations are one and all ingeniously and correctly made: but the composer would seem to have used his profound musical knowledge not to intensify or to illustrate in any strong light the thoughts and images of a profoundly musical nature, but to obscure the same, possibly through fear of appearing commonplace. The work imposes not a little dreariness and unrest. A terrible deal of mind is made in it to subserve the interests of the theoretical bug-bear that the composer utilizes for the express purpose of making the musical expression seem secondary.

Following the symphony, Pogner's Address from the "Master Singers" was finely given by Mr. Max Heinrich; and then for a finale came the great symphony in C major by Schubert. This was stated on the programme to be Schubert's ninth symphony. So thought George Grove when this posthumous work was discovered many years ago; but in 1881 Mr. Grove does not hesitate to style the C major symphony as No. 10.

The proof seems indisputable to Grove that there was a symphony written by Schubert while in Gastein, which is doubtless his symphony No. 9. The symphony played Saturday evening, namely, the 10th, and not the 9th, as the programme stated, was written during the last year that Schubert lived. In no symphonic music of Schubert are the wind instruments so charmingly used as in the first two movements of this work.

Who shall say that it was to Schubert's disadvantage that he was unskilled in counterpoint, so long as he was such a complete master of orchestral effect, and such a fountainhead of the very purest melody. The stately, soul-stirring harmonies of the introduction and the rich, warm coloring in the allegro that follows were brought vividly into view by Conductor Paur, and in the form of a real picture.—so masterly was the reading and so unanimously con amore was the performance by the orchestra.

The rhapsodie referred to was also for the most part finely played; although there was an unhealthy pitch at times in some of the wind instruments which may possibly have arisen from a whole week's blow-out that must have been required for its interpretation. The harp effects of the work were exquisitely illustrated by Herr Schnecker.

C. L. Capen.

Note.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a fine programme in Cambridge, at Sanders Theatre, next Thursday evening. "An Island Fantasy" by J. K. Paine; symphony "Im Walde" by Raff; and ballet music from Silvia by Delibes will be performed; and there will be vocal selections rendered by Mr. Ben Davies.

[114]

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 30, 1895.

The most attractive gem of the Seventeenth Boston Symphony was the Doppler version of Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody. Two Boston composers were present and honored by recalls: Professor Paine after his Island Fantasy; and one of Paine's earliest pupils, Arthur Foote, after his overture, Francesca da Rimini. Both compositions have been heard here before, and both composers are Harvard men. Schroeder played two 'cello solos,—Waldesruhe, by Dvorak; and that wonderful aerial Caprice by Julius Klengel, op. 8. Beethoven's Second Symphony was delightful as ever; but to the ladies the supreme attraction was the unexpected advent of the great De Reszke in the audience. Mr. Mole was guilty of some wonderful flute-playing.

"Blessings brighten as they take their flight." The Symphony Concerts grow better as the season advances. At the nineteenth we had the Brahms Third, with portions of it so like Beethoven; but others so unlike, that a musician would not enter Music Hall till the Symphony was over, but declares he should like the latter composer if he copied note for note from the old. For an absolute novelty we had the bizarre entracte from Karl Reinecke's Governor of Tours; and almost as new was the interesting overture to Marschner's Hans Heiling. The soloist, rousing the usual enthusiasm, was Franz Kneisel, in Mendelssohn's great Violin Concerto, op. 64, finely played; but the more you know of the violinist, the more you respect him, not merely as a virtuoso, but for his loyalty to friends, kindred, and early associates, many of whom have joined the musical ranks of America, under his inspiring aid

Springtime Approaches.

Of rare excellence was the seventh concert of the Kneisel Quartet, at Christian Union Hall, before an audience of the finest musical quality Boston affords. Stavenhagen was the pianist, in Dvorak's magnificent quintet in A, op. 91. To say that Mr. Schroeder also did some particularly good work on the cello, especially in the opening passages, is only to say what must be added of all the musicians. The quartet was Schumann's in A, op. 11, No. 1, which contains some specially strong viola passages. Between the two great numbers came the singer of the evening, Gertrude Franklin, in Huete Dich, by Emil Paur, who was present to hear it; Aubade and April song, by Bizet; Spring, by Georg Henschel. Miss Franklin never did better. While vocalists round about us have been upset by the weather, her voice has been thr ving, and she never sang with clearer force and grace, especially in the ronades.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 7, 1895.

Symphony Program.

Miss Antoinette Szumoska, a young Polish pianist, made her debut in this city at last week's symphony. Aside from being a pupil of Paderewski her skill entitles her to respectful consideration, if one may rightly judge from a single hearing. Chopin's concerto in F minor was the chosen selection. The young artist has an attractive face, her demeanor is modest, and she prepossesses one in her favor immediately. She plays the piano with delicacy and freedom from affectation. Her runs, single and in octaves, are clear and even, though lacking somewhat in power, and she uses the pedal skilfully in producing singing tones, the latter work strongly showing the influence of her teacher. Many of her wrist movements, too, indicate her tutor's style. She plays with very flexible fingers, but with a rigidity of the wrist. Her touch is crisp and firm, and her technique well developed. Her playing of the Chopin number was spirited, many of the embellishments being given with exquisite finish. As is usual with pianists of the gentler sex, she was at times unable to cope with the orchestra, which frequently overshadowed and made her work indistinct.

Miss Szumoska's reception was most cordial, and doubtless her piano recitals here later in the month will enable her to display her abilities in a more advantageous manner.

The orchestra interpreted Haydn's "clock" symphony admirably. The andante in G major, the "clock" movement, proved, as usual, the most pleasing portion, although the elaborate rondo of the finale was fully as well performed. The overture from Weber's "Der Freischutz" was given impressively and with the necessary weird tone coloring.

Mozart's serenade for wind instruments is a novelty, and the double quartet of performers gave a most interesting interpretation of this century-old composition. The running phrases taken up by the different instruments in the first movement were very smooth and melodic, the peculiar combination in the trio of clarionets and horns in the second movement were oddly artistic in harmony. The delicate themes of the third part were tunefully presented by the clarionets, excepting in one instance, and in the last movement a Hungarian dance bit of melody and the finale were brilliantly worked up.

This week's rehearsal and concert will introduce Mr I. Schnitzer of the orchestra as violinist. The program will be as follows:

Symphony ..... Rubinstein
Overture Dornroschen ..... Langer
Violin ..... Bruch

[illegible] Herald.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 97.

SUNDAY, APRIL 7, 1895.

HAYDN AND MOZART.

Their Music Formed a Pleasing Feature of Last Evening's Symphony Concert.

After the drivel of recitative through which many of the Symphony concert patrons have doubtless felt called upon to wade during the past week, it was very considerate of Conductor Paur in selecting his programme for the 21st Symphony concert to go back to Haydn and Mozart—to the original sources, yea, to the very fountain-head, of all melody and pure harmony in all that regards instrumental music.

It is a healthy sign of musical progress when a Haydn symphony can be so attentively heard and heartily applauded as was the well-worn "Clock" symphony last evening. Truly has Brendel referred to Haydn as "the greatest master of jest and humor"; and who could doubt this while listening to the humorous and mirthful strains of the teasing presto and the vivace movements of the "Clock" symphony? The entire spirit of the work is one of mirth, jest and naive frolicksomeness, at the same time reflecting the thoughts and feelings of one so rich in genius and artistic command that no place seems too prominent for him among the first of the tone masters.

The Mozart serenade for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons, although a thoroughly charming work, seemed quite as much out of place in Music Hall as did a similar serenade—Mozart's Eleventh—given some years ago at one of the Philharmonic concerts under Listemann. Chamber music it surely is, and it is one of those works which only Mozart could have written, so richly does it combine science and fancy, and oft piquancy, in a genial, harmonious and attractive whole.

The pianist for Chopin's F minor concerto was Miss Antoinette Szumowski. Naturally she achieved a popular triumph, and the fact of her having been a pupil of Paderewski was enough to predispose almost any audience in her favor. That the artiste did some really admirable playing in her performance of the work is true. She has technique. Not only can she play with rare velocity, but also very clearly: oft with a sweetness and mellowness of tone, also, with which none could fail to be charmed. It was, nevertheless, evident at the start of her performance that the heart as well as the poetry of one of the most sensuously beautiful concertos ever written was not going to be touched.

As a whole, the work was given in miniature, and in the artiste's treatment of the first movement there were many rythmical shortcomings. Here was a deficiency in Miss Szumowski's playing that would seem rather to require the schooling of some Leipzig pedagogue, rather than that of a virtuoso like Paderewski. The balance and symmetry of the maestoso movement were thrown to the wind, and she strangely seemed to approach this movement with an old-fashioned idea of a concerto in mind, namely, as though it were a mere etude to be recited in the conservatory class, a mechanical show-piece for the solo instrument. Not so the larghetto which she played very beautifully; and, although the rythmical values of the first movement had been either neglected or distorted, such faults were with that movement only, the finale being given with rare lucidity, with buoyant, exquisite phrasing and lovely shading.

It may be that the gifted artiste possesses temperament, but she certainly needs more of this artistic desideratum to enable her to do justice to a work so peculiarly poetic in its demands as the Chopin concerto. The concerto, as a whole, presented itself with but a paucity of that genuine sentiment and poetic fancy that are native to it; and, in the artiste's treatment of the maestoso, it was, to say the least, difficult to discover that high degree of intelligently directed musical taste which would have borne testimony to her possession of a genuine musical nature. The feminine gender of the artiste's playing was, perhaps, the most conspicuous feature of her performance.

As regards the orchestra's playing at this concert, it would seem superfluous to say more than that the Haydn symphony was given in a broad, clear and effective manner, was justly interpreted by Herr Paur, and that the orchestra's work throughout the concert must have, as usual, satisfied even the most hypercritical of its unrivalled excellence.

C. L. C.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 7, 1895.

The program of the 21st Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony in D major (B. and H., No. 4)..Haydn
Serenade for wind instruments, No. 11, in E flat major (two oboes, two clarinets, two horns, two bassoons), first time.....Mozart
Concerto for piano, in F minor.....Chopin
Overture, "Der Freischuetz,".....Weber

Mr. Paur showed good sense in administering the cooling drinks of the classical period after the audience had drank through the week the fiery, madding potion prepared by Wagner. And yet Haydn wrote other symphonies than those played here over and over again. Why should they not be given? They are by no means of inferior worth.

This is the story of Mozart's serenade. A letter by him to his father, dated Nov. 3, 1781, is in existence, and Mozart tells of "Nacht musik" written for clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons, for the pleasure of the sister-in-law of von Hickl, a court painter at Vienna. As Mozart expected an influential man to be present at the informal concert, he says that he took considerable pains with the music. It was first produced on the feast day of Saint Theresa, which was Oct. 15. The players were roistering toss-pots, but, according to Mozart, they blew together beautifully. The serenade met with much favor, and it was played in three places that night. Indeed, just as Mozart was undressing himself for bed, the musicians in the courtyard surprised him by sounding the first chord. The oboes were not added before 1782. There is a version in which two English horns are also found.

The serenade was played in delightful fashion last evening. Once in a while it is a good thing to hear such amiable music, but a little of it goes a long way.

Miss Szumowska is said to be a pupil—"the only pupil" of Paderewski; and it has been announced, with a flourish of trumpets, that she is of a noble Polish family, a member of one of the oldest Polish families, etc., etc. Fortunately she needs neither prop. Famous pianists are not necessarily good teachers, and great singers and great performers on instruments come as a rule from what Abraham Lincoln once described as "the plain people."

This pianist has a thoroughly beautiful touch and a technique so well developed that you never think of that dire word when she plays. Her fidency is under artistic restraint. She has rare delicacy, and of a peculiar nature, for the faintest pianissimo carries. She is a player of exquisite taste. Far from her is thought of affectation or desire to impress an audience. Her performance of the concerto was eminently romantic. The summit of her art was the delivery of the larghetto, which was entrancing. Admirable, too, was her playing of the finale. Perhaps this composition by Chopin is peculiarly suited to her musical nature. She is only now to be judged by this performance. What she may be able to do and what she may not be able to do are not now to be considered. The purity of this pianist is not prudishness; her intelligence is not pedagogic. She does not apparently envy the strength of man, nor does she attempt to rival it. And what a pleasure it was to hear such crystalline and yet warm tones!

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 7.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the twenty-first rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra, given at Music Hall, on Friday afternoon, was:

Symphony, D major.....Haydn
Serenade for wind instruments, No. 11, E-flat major.....Mozart
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2, F minor.....Chopin
Overture "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Soloist, Miss Antoinette Szumowski.

Both on artistic grounds and out of courtesy to the soloist, the order of music on this programme should have been inverted; bad taste and thoughtlessness can alone excuse the mistake.

The soloist, Miss Szumowski, is an artist by instinct as well as by education, and it is pleasant to record that she is free from affectation of any kind. She plays with charming ease, grace and delicacy, and the tone she produces is clear, rich and full. There is no exaggeration in Miss Szumowski's playing, no morbidness, no affected sentimentalism. She does not treat Chopin as if he were a disease to be humored, nor on the other hand can she be charged with coldness. Nothing could be more gracious, finished, tender and refined than her interpretation of the second movement of the concerto. The touch was of the utmost delicacy and beauty, the tone clear, warm and most delightful in quality. Paderewski, himself, never produced finer pianissimo playing. The gradation of tone color and contrast were exquisite, and the artistic taste and self-reserve beyond praise. The third movement was given with dainty vivacity and freshness, and the difficulties in the first movement were conquered with masterful ease. Intellect and heart are equally combined in Miss Szumowski's playing; she does not yield to unreasoning impulse, nor ostentatiously indulge in tours de force to win applause. There are warmth and tenderness in abundance, but no trace of hysterical mawkishness. Since the time of Madame Essipoff there has been heard here no woman pianist who can be compared to Miss Szumowski. She has as yet given but one specimen of her skill; but, from the delightful manner in which the work was interpreted, it is not daring to prophesy that both from her talent and from her technical excellence, Miss Szumowski will win the warm admiration of all those who love piano playing as a high art.

Of the work of the orchestra in the rest of the programme it would not be fair to speak, as it was heard only at the final rehearsal.

The programme for the next concert is: Rubinstein's Russian symphony; a Prelude by Lauger; a Bruch Concerto for violin; Joh. Strauss's "Moto Perpetuo," and Auber's overture, "The Prodigal Child." The soloist selected is Mr. I. Schnitzler.

BOSTON [illegible]

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the twenty-first symphony concert at Music Hall last evening opened with the Haydn Symphony in D major, "The Clock." The first movement seems unusually grave and heavy for Haydn, but the second makes up for it in delicacy and nimbleness, and adds to all the characteristics of Haydn the peculiar ticking effect that gives the work its name. The second selection was a Mozart serenade for wind instruments, two each of oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons. The second movement is the most enjoyable to the average listener, and in the trio there are some beautiful color effects in the work of the horns and clarinets.

The third number introduced the soloist of the evening, Mlle. Szumowska. Her selection was Chopin's concerto for pianoforte No. 2 in F minor, opus 21. The soloist was evidently a trifle nervous, and was not heard at her best in the first movement. Her playing was well received, however, and encouraged by hearty applause she began the second movement with much more confidence, and gave it a brilliant rendering. The best point in Mlle. Szumowska's playing is her delicacy of touch and absolute clearness of every note in pianissimo passages, even the most rapid and difficult. Compared with other noted pianists who have lately been heard in this city, she seems to lack strength and force in forte passages. She would undoubtedly be heard to better advantage in a drawing room recital than in Music Hall. She is a pupil of Paderewski, and her splendid touch and perfect technique are doubtless due to his teaching. She has played with great success in Paris, London and other European cities, and is bound to make hosts of friends in this country.

The programme closed with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

Next week the public rehearsal will be on Thursday afternon.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 30, 1895.

The most attractive gem of the Seventeenth Boston Symphony was the Doppler version of Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody. Two Boston composers were present and honored by recalls: Professor Paine after his Island Fantasy; and one of Paine's earliest pupils, Arthur Foote, after his overture, Francesca da Rimini. Both compositions have been heard here before, and both composers are Harvard men. Schroeder played two 'cello solos,—Waldesruhe, by Dvorak; and that wonderful aerial Caprice by Julius Klengel, op. 8. Beethoven's Second Symphony was delightful as ever; but to the ladies the supreme attraction was the unexpected advent of the great De Reszke in the audience. Mr. Mole was guilty of some wonderful flute-playing.

"Blessings brighten as they take their flight." The Symphony Concerts grow better as the season advances. At the nineteenth we had the Brahms Third, with portions of it so like Beethoven; but others so unlike, that a musician would not enter Music Hall till the Symphony was over, but declares he should like the latter composer if he copied note for note from the old. For an absolute novelty we had the bizarre entracte from Karl Reinecke's Governor of Tours; and almost as new was the interesting overture to Marschner's Hans Heiling. The soloist, rousing the usual enthusiasm, was Franz Kneisel, in Mendelssohn's great Violin Concerto, op. 64, finely played; but the more you know of the violinist, the more you respect him, not merely as a virtuoso, but for his loyalty to friends, kindred, and early associates, many of whom have joined the musical ranks of America, under his inspiring aid

Springtime Approaches.

Of rare excellence was the seventh concert of the Kneisel Quartet, at Christian Union Hall, before an audience of the finest musical quality Boston affords. Stavenhagen was the pianist, in Dvorak's magnificent quintet in A, op. 91. To say that Mr. Schroeder also did some particularly good work on the cello, especially in the opening passages, is only to say what must be added of all the musicians. The quartet was Schumann's in A, op. 11, No. 1, which contains some specially strong viola passages. Between the two great numbers came the singer of the evening, Gertrude Franklin, in Huete Dich, by Emil Paur, who was present to hear it; Aubade and April song, by Bizet; Spring, by Georg Henschel. Miss Franklin never did better. While vocalists round about us have been upset by the weather, her voice has been thr ving, and she never sang with clearer force and grace, especially in the ronades.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 7, 1895.

Symphony Program.

Miss Antoinette Szumoska, a young Polish pianist, made her debut in this city at last week's symphony. Aside from being a pupil of Paderewski her skill entitles her to respectful consideration, if one may rightly judge from a single hearing. Chopin's concerto in F minor was the chosen selection. The young artist has an attractive face, her demeanor is modest, and she prepossesses one in her favor immediately. She plays the piano with delicacy and freedom from affectation. Her runs, single and in octaves, are clear and even, though lacking somewhat in power, and she uses the pedal skilfully in producing singing tones, the latter work strongly showing the influence of her teacher. Many of her wrist movements, too, indicate her tutor's style.

She plays with very flexible fingers, but with a rigidity of the wrist. Her touch is crisp and firm, and her technique well developed. Her playing of the Chopin number was spirited, many of the embellishments being given with exquisite finish. As is usual with pianists of the gentler sex, she was at times unable to cope with the orchestra, which frequently overshadowed and made her work indistinct.

Miss Szumoska's reception was most cordial, and doubtless her piano recitals here later in the month will enable her to display her abilities in a more advantageous manner.

The orchestra interpreted Haydn's "Clock" symphony admirably. The andante in G major, the "clock" movement, proved, as usual, the most pleasing portion, although the elaborate rondo of the finale was fully as well performed. The overture from Weber's "Der Freischutz" was given impressively and with the necessary weird tone coloring.

Mozart's serenade for wind instruments is a novelty, and the double quartet of performers gave a most interesting interpretation of this century-old composition. The running phrases taken up by the different instruments in the first movement were very smooth and melodic, the peculiar combination in the trio of clarionets and horns in the second movement were oddly artistic in harmony. The delicate themes of the third part were tunefully presented by the clarionets, excepting in one instance, and in the last movement a contra dance bit of melody and the finale were brilliantly worked up.

This week's rehearsal and concert will introduce Mr I. Schnitzer of the orchestra as solo violinist. The program will be as follows:

Russian symphony ..... Rubinstein
Prelude to the opera Dornroschen ..... Langer
First time
Concerto for violin, No 1 ..... Bruch
[illegible] ..... Joh Strauss
[illegible] ..... Auber

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 97.

SUNDAY, APRIL 7, 1895.

HAYDN AND MOZART.

Their Music Formed a Pleasing Feature of Last Evening's Symphony Concert.

After the drivel of recitative through which many of the Symphony concert patrons have doubtless felt called upon to wade during the past week, it was very considerate of Conductor Paur in selecting his programme for the 21st Symphony concert to go back to Haydn and Mozart—to the original sources, yes, to the very fountain-head, of all melody and pure harmony in all that regards instrumental music.

It is a healthy sign of musical progress when a Haydn symphony can be so attentively heard and heartily applauded as was the well-worn "Clock" symphony last evening. Truly has Brendel referred to Haydn as "the greatest master of jest and humor"; and who could doubt this while listening to the humorous and mirthful strains of the teasing presto and the vivace movements of the "Clock" symphony? The entire spirit of the work is one of mirth, jest and naive frolicksomeness, at the same time reflecting the thoughts and feelings of one so rich in genius and artistic command that no place seems too prominent for him among the first of the tone masters.

The Mozart serenade for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons, although a thoroughly charming work, seemed quite as much out of place in Music Hall as did a similar serenade—Mozart's Eleventh—given some years ago at one of the Philharmonic concerts under Listemann. Chamber music it surely is, and it is one of those works which only Mozart could have written, so richly does it combine science and fancy, and oft piquancy, in a genial, harmonious and attractive whole.

The pianist for Chopin's F minor concerto was Miss Antoinette Szumowski. Naturally she achieved a popular triumph, and the fact of her having been a pupil of Paderewski was enough to predispose almost any audience in her favor. That the artiste did some really admirable playing in her performance of the work is true. She has technique. Not only can she play with rare velocity, but also very clearly: oft with a sweetness and mellowness of tone, also, with which none could fail to be charmed. It was, nevertheless, evident at the start of her performance that the heart as well as the poetry of one of the most sensuously beautiful concertos ever written was not going to be touched.

As a whole, the work was given in miniature, and in the artiste's treatment of the first movement there were many rythmical shortcomings. Here was a deficiency in Miss Szumowski's playing that would seem rather to require the schooling of some Leipzig pedagogue, rather than that of a virtuoso like Paderewski. The balance and symmetry of the maestoso movement were thrown to the wind, and she strangely seemed to approach this movement with an old-fashioned idea of a concerto in mind, namely, as though it were a mere etude to be recited in the conservatory class, a mechanical show-piece for the solo instrument. Not so the larghetto which she played very beautifully; and, although the rythmical values of the first movement had been either neglected or distorted, such faults were with that movement only, the finale being given with rare lucidity, with buoyant, exquisite phrasing and lovely shading.

It may be that the gifted artiste possesses temperament, but she certainly needs more of this artistic desideratum to enable her to do justice to a work so peculiarly poetic in its demands as the Chopin concerto. The concerto, as a whole, presented itself with but a paucity of that genuine sentiment and poetic fancy that are native to it; and, in the artiste's treatment of the maestoso, it was, to say the least, difficult to discover that high degree of intelligently directed musical taste which would have borne testimony to her possession of a genuine musical nature. The feminine gender of the artiste's playing was, perhaps, the most conspicuous feature of her performance.

As regards the orchestra's playing at this concert, it would seem superfluous to say more than that the Haydn symphony was given in a broad, clear and effective manner, was justly interpreted by Herr Paur, and that the orchestra's work throughout the concert must have, as usual, satisfied even the most hypercritical of its unrivalled excellence.

C. L. C.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 7, 1895.

The program of the 21st Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony in D major (B. and H., No. 4)..Haydn
Serenade for wind instruments, No. 11, in E flat major (two oboes, two clarinets, two horns, two bassoons), first time.....Mozart
Concerto for piano, in F minor.....Chopin
Overture, "Der Freischuetz,".....Weber

Mr. Paur showed good sense in administering the cooling drinks of the classical period after the audience had drank through the week the fiery, madding potion prepared by Wagner. And yet Haydn wrote other symphonies than those played here over and over again. Why should they not be given? They are by no means of inferior worth.

This is the story of Mozart's serenade. A letter by him to his father, dated Nov. 3, 1781, is in existence, and Mozart tells of "Nacht musik" written for clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons, for the pleasure of the sister-in-law of von Hickl, a court painter at Vienna. As Mozart expected an influential man to be present at the informal concert, he says that he took considerable pains with the music. It was first produced on the feast day of Saint Theresa, which was Oct. 15. The players were roistering toss-pots, but, according to Mozart, they blew together beautifully. The serenade met with much favor, and it was played in three places that night. Indeed, just as Mozart was undressing himself for bed, the musicians in the courtyard surprised him by sounding the first chord. The oboes were not added before 1782. There is a version in which two English horns are also found.

The serenade was played in delightful fashion last evening. Once in a while it is a good thing to hear such amiable music, but a little of it goes a long way.

Miss Szumowska is said to be a pupil—"the only pupil" of Paderewski; and it has been announced, with a flourish of trumpets, that she is of a noble Polish family, a member of one of the oldest Polish families, etc., etc. Fortunately she needs neither prop. Famous pianists are not necessarily good teachers, and great singers and great performers on instruments come as a rule from what Abraham Lincoln once described as "the plain people."

This pianist has a thoroughly beautiful touch and a technique so well developed that you never think of that dire word when she plays. Her fluency is under artistic restraint. She has rare delicacy, and of a peculiar nature, for the faintest pianissimo carries. She is a player of exquisite taste. Far from her is thought of affectation or desire to impress an audience. Her performance of the concerto was eminently romantic. The summit of her art was the delivery of the larghetto, which was entrancing. Admirable, too, was her playing of the finale. Perhaps this composition by Chopin is peculiarly suited to her musical nature. She is only now to be judged by this performance. What she may be able to do and what she may not be able to do are not now to be considered. The purity of this pianist is not prudishness; her intelligence is not pedagogic. She does not apparently envy the strength of man, nor does she attempt to rival it. And what a pleasure it was to hear such crystalline and yet warm tones!

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 7.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the twenty-first rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra, given at Music Hall, on Friday afternoon, was:

Symphony, D-major.....Haydn
Serenade for wind instruments, No. 11, E-flat major.....Mozart
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2, F-minor.....Chopin
Overture "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Soloist, Miss Antoinette Szumowski.

Both on artistic grounds and out of courtesy to the soloist, the order of music on this programme should have been inverted; bad taste and thoughtlessness can alone excuse the mistake.

The soloist, Miss Szumowski, is an artist by instinct as well as by education, and it is pleasant to record that she is free from affectation of any kind. She plays with charming ease, grace and delicacy, and the tone she produces is clear, rich and full. There is no exaggeration in Miss Szumowski's playing, no morbidness, no affected sentimentalism. She does not treat Chopin as if he were a disease to be humored, nor on the other hand can she be charged with coldness. Nothing could be more gracious, finished, tender and refined than her interpretation of the second movement of the concerto. The touch was of the utmost delicacy and beauty, the tone clear, warm and most delightful in quality. Paderewski, himself, never produced finer pianissimo playing. The gradation of tone color and contrast were exquisite, and the artistic taste and self-reserve beyond praise. The third movement was given with dainty vivacity and freshness, and the difficulties in the first movement were conquered with masterful ease. Intellect and heart are equally combined in Miss Szumowski's playing; she does not yield to unreasoning impulse, nor ostentatiously indulge in tours de force to win applause. There are warmth and tenderness in abundance, but no trace of hysterical mawkishness. Since the time of Madame Essipoff there has been heard here no woman pianist who can be compared to Miss Szumowski. She has as yet given but one specimen of her skill; but, from the delightful manner in which the work was interpreted, it is not daring to prophesy that, both from her talent and from her technical excellence, Miss Szumowski will win the warm admiration of all those who love piano playing as a high art.

Of the work of the orchestra in the rest of the programme it would not be fair to speak, as it was heard only at the final rehearsal.

The programme for the next concert is: Rubinstein's Russian symphony; a Prelude by Langer; a Bruch Concerto for violin; Joh. Strauss's "Moto Perpetuo," and Auber's overture, "The Prodigal Child." The soloist selected is Mr. I. Schnitzler.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the twenty-first sympnony concert at Music Hall last evening opened with the Haydn Symphony in D major, "The Clock." The first movement seems unusually grave and heavy for Haydn, but the second makes up for it in delicacy and nimbleness, and adds to all the characteristics of Haydn the peculiar ticking effect that gives the work its name. The second selection was a Mozart serenade for wind instruments, two each of oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons. The second movement is the most enjoyable to the average listener, and in the trio there are some beautiful color effects in the work of the horns and clarinets.

The third number introduced the soloist of the evening, Mlle. Szumowska. Her selection was Chopin's concerto for pianoforte No. 2 in F minor, opus 21. The soloist was evidently a trifle nervous, and was not heard at her best in the first movement. Her playing was well received, however, and encouraged by hearty applause she began the second movement with much more confidence, and gave it a brilliant rendering. The best point in Mlle. Szumowska's playing is her delicacy of touch and absolute clearness of every note in pianissimo passages, even the most rapid and difficult. Compared with other noted pianists who have lately been heard in this city, she seems to lack strength and force in forte passages. She would undoubtedly be heard to better advantage in a drawing room recital than in Music Hall. She is a pupil of Paderewski, and her splendid touch and perfect technique are doubtless due to his teaching. She has played with great success in Paris, London and other European cities, and is bound to make hosts of friends in this country.

The programme closed with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

Next week the public rehearsal will be on Thursday afternon.

[115]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 8, 1895.

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert, the 80th, was as follows:

Overture, Spring.....Goetz
(First time.)
Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand, rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, op. 40.....H. W. Parker
(First time.)
Variations on an Ukraine folk song, F major, op. 7.....Ivan Knorr
(First time.)
Pogner's address, Die Meistersinger.....Wagner
Symphony, C major.....Schubert

I wonder if the poems of James Clarence Mangan are read in these days. There was an article about them in the Atlantic some time ago; but of course that appeal was to a limited audience. Besides, it is hard to imagine a genuine Atlantic reader in sympathy with Mangan. Then there was a reprint of the John Mitchel edition by Haverty in '87.

Never mind Mangan's translations from the German, admirable or otherwise. Read his poems on Irish themes.

There is the splendid Ode of O'Hussey to the Maguire, splendid as a glacier is splendid. Don't say at once Harrigan and mention Squatter Sovereignty.

Listen to just one verse:

Rolls real thunder? Or was that red, livid light
Only a meteor? I scarce know; but through the midnight dim
The pitiless ice-wind streams. Except the hate that persecutes him
Nothing hath crueler venomy might.

Then note the Avran, how genuinely Irish:

Hugh marched forth to the fight—I grieved to see him so depart;
And lo! to-night he wanders frozen, rain-drenched, sad, betrayed—
But the memory of the lime-white mansions his righth and hath laid
In ashes warms the hero's heart!

Or read The Saw Mill, The Wail and Warning of the Three Khalendeers, Siberia, The Nameless One.

Now, Mr. Parker choose for his text A Vision of Connaught in the Thirteenth Century, the motto of which is Et moi, j'ai été aussi en Arcadie. In this poem he made a few and slight changes to serve, perhaps, his musical purpose. Let me quote the first verse as Mangan wrote it, to show the musical suggestion:

I walked entranced
Through a land of Morn;
The sun, with wondrous excess of light,
Shone down and glanced
Over seas of corn
And lustrous gardens a-left and right.
Even in the clime
Of resplendent Spain
Beams no such sun upon such a land;
But it was the time,
'Twas in the reign
Of Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand."

There are certain lines, often by so-called minor poets, that haunt, that spring to the lips, apropos of nothing, in times of excessive joy or causeless depression. These lines almost become a part of the one repeating them. To every man such lines, as well as a damsel or two. Just as Fitz-James O'Brien's Wharf Rat includes:

And a girl in the Gallipagos isles is the burden of his song,

so in this fantastic poem of Mangan is the line,

Of Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand!

It's a simple, yet mysterious story. The dreamer asks "a man of princely aspect and port sublime" what clime and golden time, and he addresses him as "Lord and Khan." The stranger tells of Erin and Cáhal Mór. And the dreamer sees thrones and circling fires, and a Dome rose near him, and voices sang the praise of the time and of Cáhal Mór. Then came a horrible change. Why the darkness and the terror? None seemed to understand:

But lo! the sky
Showed fleckt with blood, and an alien sun
Glared from the North,
And there stood on high
Amid his shorn beams a skeleton!

It was by the stream
Of the Castled Maine,
One autumn eve, in the Teuton's land,
That I dreamed this dream
Of the time and reign
Of Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand.

Mr. Parker has solved a difficult problem in a most satisfactory manner. He wrote the rhapsody, which is dedicated to Mr. Max Heinrich, about a year ago. It is my impression that he thought at first of making a cantata out of the poem. As the piece now stands, it is an orchestral rhapsody with the baritone voice obligato. Someone complained that the descriptive music was in the orchestral score, not in the voice; but how could it be otherwise?

This Rhapsody is thus far in Mr. Parker's career the highest flight of his imagination. There is abandon that only comes from firm control of means. There is keen sense of dramatic values. There is splendor of thought. There is gorgeousness of expression. Mr. Parker has saved himself from the reproach of exciting and superb incoherence by clinging fast to the central idea of Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand. You should hear this line as declaimed by Mr. Heinrich and intensified by the orchestral treatment. Perhaps the highest pitch of æsthetic beauty is reached in the setting of:

Then saw I thrones
And circling fires,
And a Dome rose near me as by a spell.
Whence flowed the tones
Of silver lyres,
And many voices in wreathed swell.

There is here a sumptuousness of instrumentation with a touch of mysticism that is long, long to be remembered. Mr. Heinrich declaimed his lines with full artistic appreciation of the poet and the musician.

* * *

The Spring overture by Götz is a charming work, fresh, spontaneous, free from affectation, and not too jolly country, as George Moore said of Hardy's earlier novels. There is no attempt at woodwind-pastoral-business, but there is the elasticity as well as the buoyancy of the season as described by poets, students of climatic changes and travelers. Here in New England we ought to import spring, at least once a year.

* * *

Is Iwan Knorr the son of Schumann's friend? Somebody said so the other day, but I can find no confirmation of the report. The cyclopædias tell us that he was a pupil of Reinecke and Richter, and he now lives in Frankfort. Twenty years ago he was living in Southern Russia, hence, probably, his affection for folk songs of the Ukraine breed, for besides these orchestral variations, he has written Ukrainische Liebeslieder for mixed quartet and piano.

The variations are well made, as becomes an instructor in a conservatory, and they are also dull. Would it interest you to know that a rhythmic peculiarity of the theme is that it ends on the last beat of the penultimate measure, this beat being tied to the first of the next measure; or that the fifth variation, D flat major (6-8 time) is a cantabile variation in the muted strings, woodwind and horns? If you are consumed with longing, I'll send you the program-book of the concert. It contains a description of the seven other variations—only eight in all? It seemed as though there were eighty.

Here is the description of the sixth: Allegro molto in F major (6-8 time).

* * *

It is the fashion to praise the unfinished symphony of Schubert at the expense of his long one in C major. Probably one reason why the former is so popular is because it is unfinished.

It is easy to jest at the length of the great work, to speak of the strange monotony of its instrumentation, &c., &c., but there are passages that even after repeated hearings uplift the heart or at least reconcile to the plight of being alive. The very opening is still a thing of unearthly beauty. Marvelous still is the effect of those pianissimo trombone passages in the first allegro. If conductors would only take the second movement at a reasonable pace and not drag it out beyond endurance and turn sentiment into sentimentality.

* * *

The Damrosch Opera Company will open at the Boston Theatre to-morrow night in Tristan und Isolde. The advance sale for the short season has been very large. In certain quarters there has been active preparation for the hearing. Some have been studying the guide books; others have hired pianists to play from the piano versions at so much an hour.

I have been trying to find out the prescription of the brewage that worked such woe to Tristan, Isolde and doddering Marke. It is not in any of the notes to Paulus Aegineta, nor have I yet found it in Kristian Frantz Paullini's Heilsame Dreck-Apotheke.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1895.

There are scores of pianists wandering about the world and claiming to be pupils and representatives of Liszt who have none of the elements of his wonderfully varied style but a certain dash and fiery force. But the young lady, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, who made her Boston debut in the twenty-first Symphony programme, can rightly claim to be a better exponent than that of the principles and style of her master Paderewski. She chose Chopin's second concerto—the one in F minor, opus 21. It is not so exacting as the first; yet it still calls for more sustained strength than this modest-appearing and pleasant-faced young lady possesses; for in the last movement her tone grew faint at times and there was some effort evident in the holding-up of long passages to their very end. But that is a matter of minor importance compared to the gracefulness, the nice taste, the exquisite tone, the abstinence from exaggeration of phrase or sentiment and the quiet simplicity of technique which her playing evidenced. There was nothing of that personal fitfulness which is often imposed as "interpretation" in Chopin, and she was content with a light and dainty expressiveness rather inclined to seek for interior sentimentality or elaborated eloquence. She made a distinctly favorable impression which argued well for the attention she may expect when she gives—some ten days hence—a couple of independent recitals.

The programme began and ended with standard works of old acquaintance, of which the first was Haydn's D-major symphony, numbered Four by Breitkopf and Hartel and known in common parlance as the "clock," because of the reiterant and insistent little double-beat figure, which is found all through the second movement. It is not a very long work—for Haydn liked to be brief as well as merry—but it is unusually full and minute in scoring for him and rises often to a strength quite remarkable for his limited body of instruments. It was well played, clearly, decisively, brightly and with due spirit. The same may also be said of the dear, delightful old "Der Freischutz" overture, which was the other familiar number and brought the concert to a brilliant and fervid close, after a capitally gloomy and mysterious rendering of the spectral music with which it opens.

There was a fourth number, standard also, but new to Symphony programmes—a delicious Mozart serenade for eight wind instruments, viz., a pair each of oboes, clarinets, bassoons and horns. It has five movements, of which two are minuets, but Mr. Paur wisely omitted the first and longer of these. Each movement is short, individual in character, and as much varied in color as those voices will allow. It is often quite ornate and there were many such bits of response and counterpoint as only Mozart could write, being at once deeply artful and apparently ingenuous. It was exceedingly well played, with easy freedom and sweet tone.

The next programme reads thus:—Rubinstein, Russian Symphony; Langer, Prelude to the Opera "Dornroschen," (first time); Bruch, Concerto for Violin, No. 1; Joh. Strauss, Moto Perpetuo; Auber, Overture, L'Enfant Prodigue," (first time). Soloist, Mr. I. Schnitzler.

The rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, although some of the programme books said erroneously Friday.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY, APRIL 8, 1895.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT, THE GERMAN OPERA AND CONCERT.

A New Symphony Soloist—"Tannhauser" and "The Meistersingers" at the Boston Theatre—Sunday Evening Concert.

The programme of the 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony in D major.....Haydn
Serenade for wind instruments, No. 11, in E flat major.....Mozart
Concerto fer piano in F minor.....Chopin
Overture, "Der Freischutz".....Weber

The Mozart serenade is for two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons and two horns. It was played for the first time at these concerts. Miss Antoinette Szumowski was the soloist.

Miss Szumowski is a modest, serious looking maiden of about 22 summers, evidently. She was born in Poland, and was educated at the Conservatory of Warsaw. She latterly became the pupil of the famous Paderewski, and has played with success in Paris and London and in the principal cities of Great Britain as well. She has a beautiful touch, at once clear and elastic, and produces a tone upon the instrument that is mellow and musical in its quality. Her best playing was done in the larghetto of the concerto, and it was delightful in all else except that its poetic element was not revealed with much warmth of expression, a fact that induces one to believe that the fair player has a more active intellect than an impulsive and warm temperament. In other words, the head prevails, rather than the heart, in her playing. The first movement of the concerto also needed a more definite rhythmical delineation. The last movement, however, was played with clearness, splendid accent, and admirable phrasing. This young player kept always within the scope of her power, and did not attempt in the least to exceed her normal strength. Altogether, it was an enjoyable effort, and causes one to desire the opportunity of hearing her again, when she can play a varied programme.

Miss Szumowski was recalled many times by the enthusiastic audience.

The Haydn symphony was read and played in the manner that marks Mr. Paur's conception of the classics and his idea of their interpretation. The contrasts were exaggerated and the fortissimos were coarse and raspy. The delicacy of Haydn takes flight when subjected to such treatment. Technically the orchestra played finely.

The Mozart Serenade was a charming number and displayed the admirable ability of the wind players of our orchestra. The first oboe, Mr. Sautet, and the first clarinet, Mr. Pourton, had opportunities to show their rare skill, and the first horn as well, Mr. Hackenbarth. And in passing let it be said that the latter excellent artist has a beautiful tone, a splendid style, and is accurate as regards intonation. I know of no horn player who can surpass, if rival, his tone and skill combined, upon his instrument. He is an invaluable member of the orchestra. A splendid performance of the "Der Freischutz" overture closed an interesting concert on the whole.

The rehearsal for this week will take place on Thursday instead of Friday afternoon.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 8, 1895.

The Symphony Concert.

The 21st of this season's Symphony concerts Saturday evening was characterized by the introduction of anather foreign pianoforte artist to a Boston audience, and the performance for the first time in Boston of a Mozart piece, a serenade for wind instruments, No. 11, in E flat major. The Haydn Symphony in D major, "The Clock," with the overture to "Die Freischuetz," made up the programme, seemingly chosen with reference to the Wagner opera, not perhaps as a relief from a music that certainly makes demands upon one, but rather perhaps as an indication that there are other schools of harmony, and totally antagonistic ones at that.

It was the German opera, too, doubtless, that somewhat thinned the ranks of the season ticket holders, but there was a large audience just the same.

The "Clock" symphony, with its beautiful melody, its rhythm and its fun, a not too serious strain upon the intellect, but rather a revel of harmony for the ear, was an excellent introduction to a brief musical evening. It is a general favorite and was played by the orchestra in excellent time and concert.

The Mozart serenade is written for and was played by two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons. It seemed light by contrast with the preceding orchestral work and was somewhat marred by the size of the hall, but was excellently played by the musicians. It is not an especially tuneful piece, although there are two charming minuets and a melodious finale. There is, too, some fine passage work and an interesting tossing about of theme. The piece is elaborately worked out, although in a suitably condensed form.

Miss Antoinette Szumowska, a young Polish woman, who comes announced as the pupil of Paderewski, was heard in a concerto for the pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, Chopin, opus 21, a very difficult piece, not only for weak wrists, which she appears to possess but for a lack of sympathy with Chopin, or rather, perhaps, for a difficulty in interpreting temperamentally the poetry of Chopin. A very evident diffidence, despite a tour of recitals in London, Paris and Vienna, may have accounted in a large measure for the latter fault. On the other hand the artiste is to be credited with a very beautiful and delicate touch and a refined and always contained expression, wherein she resembles if not imitates her teacher.

[116]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 3, 1895.

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert, the 30th, was as follows:

Overture, Spring.....Goetz
(First time.)
Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand, rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, op. 40.....H. W. Parker
(First time.)
Variations on an Ukraine folk song, F major, op. 7.....Ivan Knorr
(First time.)
Pogner's address, Die Meistersinger.....Wagner
Symphony, C major.....Schubert

I wonder if the poems of James Clarence Mangan are read in these days. There was an article about them in the Atlantic some time ago; but of course that appeal was to a limited audience. Besides, it is hard to imagine a genuine Atlantic reader in sympathy with Mangan. Then there was a reprint of the John Mitchel edition by Haverty in '87.

Never mind Mangan's translations from the German, admirable or otherwise. Read his poems on Irish themes.

There is the splendid Ode of O'Hussey to the Maguire, splendid as a glacier is splendid. Don't say at once Harrigan and mention Squatter Sovereignty.

Listen to just one verse:

Rolls real thunder? Or was that red, livid light
Only a meteor? I scarce know; but through the midnight dim
The pitiless ice-wind streams. Except the hate that persecutes him
Nothing hath crueler venomy might.

Then note the Avran, how genuinely Irish:

Hugh marched forth to the fight—I grieved to see him so depart;
And lo! to-night he wanders frozen, rain-drenched, sad, betrayed—
But the memory of the lime-white mansions his righth and hath laid
In ashes warms the hero's heart!

Or read The Saw Mill, The Wail and Warning of the Three Khalendeers, Siberia, The Nameless One.

Now, Mr. Parker choose for his text A Vision of Connaught in the Thirteenth Century, the motto of which is Et moi, j'ai été aussi en Arcadie. In this poem he made a few and slight changes to serve, perhaps, his musical purpose. Let me quote the first verse as Mangan wrote it, to show the musical suggestion:

I walked entranced
Through a land of Morn;
The sun, with wondrous excess of light,
Shone down and glanced
Over seas of corn
And lustrous gardens a-left and right.
Even in the clime
Of resplendent Spain
Beams no such sun upon such a land;
But it was the time,
'Twas in the reign
Of Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand."

There are certain lines, often by so-called minor poets, that haunt, that spring to the lips, apropos of nothing, in times of excessive joy or causeless depression. These lines almost become a part of the one repeating them. To every man such lines, as well as a damsel or two. Just as Fitz-James O'Brien's Wharf Rat includes:

And a girl in the Gallipagos isles is the burden of his song,

so in this fantastic poem of Mangan is the line,

Of Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand!

It's a simple, yet mysterious story. The dreamer asks "a man of princely aspect and port sublime" what clime and golden time, and he addresses him as "Lord and Khan." The stranger tells of Erin and Cáhal Mór. And the dreamer sees thrones and circling fires, and a Dome rose near him, and voices sang the praise of the time and of Cáhal Mór. Then came a horrible change. Why the darkness and the terror? None seemed to understand:

But lo! the sky
Showed fleckt with blood, and an alien sun
Glared from the North,
And there stood on high
Amid his shorn beams a skeleton!

It was by the stream
Of the Castled Maine,
One autumn eve, in the Teuton's land,
That I dreamed this dream
Of the time and reign
Of Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand.

Mr. Parker has solved a difficult problem in a most satisfactory manner. He wrote the rhapsody, which is dedicated to Mr. Max Heinrich, about a year ago. It is my impression that he thought at first of making a cantata out of the poem. As the piece now stands, it is an orchestral rhapsody with the baritone voice obligato. Someone complained that the descriptive music was in the orchestral score, not in the voice; but how could it be otherwise?

This Rhapsody is thus far in Mr. Parker's career the highest flight of his imagination. There is abandon that only comes from firm control of means. There is keen sense of dramatic values. There is splendor of thought. There is gorgeousness of expression. Mr. Parker has saved himself from the reproach of exciting and superb incoherence by clinging fast to the central idea of Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand. You should hear this line as declaimed by Mr. Heinrich and intensified by the orchestral treatment. Perhaps the highest pitch of æsthetic beauty is reached in the setting of:

Then saw I thrones
And circling fires,
And a Dome rose near me as by a spell.
Whence flowed the tones
Of silver lyres,
And many voices in wreathed swell.

There is here a sumptuousness of instrumentation with a touch of mysticism that is long, long to be remembered. Mr. Heinrich declaimed his lines with full artistic appreciation of the poet and the musician.

* * *

The Spring overture by Götz is a charming work, fresh, spontaneous, free from affectation, and not too jolly country, as George Moore said of Hardy's earlier novels. There is no attempt at woodwind-pastoral-business, but there is the elasticity as well as the buoyancy of the season as described by poets, students of climatic changes and travelers. Here in New England we ought to import spring, at least once a year.

* * *

Is Iwan Knorr the son of Schumann's friend? Somebody said so the other day, but I can find no confirmation of the report. The cyclopædias tell us that he was a pupil of Reinecke and Richter, and he now lives in Frankfort. Twenty years ago he was living in Southern Russia, hence, probably, his affection for folk songs of the Ukraine breed, for besides these orchestral variations, he has written Ukrainische Liebeslieder for mixed quartet and piano.

The variations are well made, as becomes an instructor in a conservatory, and they are also dull. Would it interest you to know that a rhythmic peculiarity of the theme is that it ends on the last beat of the penultimate measure, this beat being tied to the first of the next measure; or that the fifth variation, D flat major (6-8 time) is a cantabile variation in the muted strings, woodwind and horns? If you are consumed with longing, I'll send you the program-book of the concert. It contains a description of the seven other variations—only eight in all? It seemed as though there were eighty.

Here is the description of the sixth: Allegro molto in F major (6-8 time).

* * *

It is the fashion to praise the unfinished symphony of Schubert at the expense of his long one in C major. Probably one reason why the former is so popular is because it is unfinished.

It is easy to jest at the length of the great work, to speak of the strange monotony of its instrumentation, &c., &c., but there are passages that even after repeated hearings uplift the heart or at least reconcile to the plight of being alive. The very opening is still a thing of unearthly beauty. Marvelous still is the effect of those pianissimo trombone passages in the first allegro. If conductors would only take the second movement at a reasonable pace and not drag it out beyond endurance and turn sentiment into sentimentality.

* * *

The Damrosch Opera Company will open at the Boston Theatre to-morrow night in Tristan und Isolde. The advance sale for the short season has been very large. In certain quarters there has been active preparation for the hearing. Some have been studying the guide books; others have hired pianists to play from the piano versions at so much an hour.

I have been trying to find out the prescription of the brewage that worked such woe to Tristan, Isolde and doddering Marke. It is not in any of the notes to Paulus Aegineta, nor have I yet found it in Kristian Frantz Paullini's Heilsame Dreck-Apotheke. PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1895.

There are scores of pianists wandering about the world and claiming to be pupils and representatives of Liszt who have none of the elements of his wonderfully varied style but a certain dash and fiery force. But the young lady, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, who made her Boston debut in the twenty-first Symphony programme, can rightly claim to be a better exponent than that of the principles and style of her master Paderewski. She chose Chopin's second concerto—the one in F minor, opus 21. It is not so exacting as the first; yet it still calls for more sustained strength than this modest-appearing and pleasant-faced young lady possesses; for in the last movement her tone grew faint at times and there was some effort evident in the holding-up of long passages to their very end. But that is a matter of minor importance compared to the gracefulness, the nice taste, the exquisite tone, the abstinence from exaggeration of phrase or sentiment and the quiet simplicity of technique which her playing evidenced. There was nothing of that personal fitfulness which is often imposed as "interpretation" in Chopin, and she was content with a light and dainty expressiveness rather inclined to seek for interior sentimentality or elaborated eloquence. She made a distinctly favorable impression which argued well for the attention she may expect when she gives—some ten days hence—a couple of independent recitals.

The programme began and ended with standard works of old acquaintance, of which the first was Haydn's D-major symphony, numbered Four by Breitkopf and Hartel and known in common parlance as the "clock," because of the reiterant and insistent little double-beat figure, which is found all through the second movement. It is not a very long work—for Haydn liked to be brief as well as merry—but it is unusually full and minute in scoring for him and rises often to a strength quite remarkable for his limited body of instruments. It was well played, clearly, decisively, brightly and with due spirit. The same may also be said of the dear, delightful old "Der Freischutz" overture, which was the other familiar number and brought the concert to a brilliant and fervid close, after a capitally gloomy and mysterious rendering of the spectral music with which it opens.

There was a fourth number, standard also, but new to Symphony programmes—a delicious Mozart serenade for eight wind instruments, viz., a pair each of oboes, clarinets, bassoons and horns. It has five movements, of which two are minuets, but Mr. Paur wisely omitted the first and longer of these. Each movement is short, individual in character, and as much varied in color as those voices will allow. It is often quite ornate and there were many such bits of response and counterpoint as only Mozart could write, being at once deeply artful and apparently ingenuous. It was exceedingly well played, with easy freedom and sweet tone.

The next programme reads thus:—Rubinstein, Russian Symphony; Langer, Prelude to the Opera "Dornroschen," (first time); Bruch, Concerto for Violin, No. 1; Joh. Strauss, Moto Perpetuo; Auber, Overture, L'Enfant Prodigue," (first time). Soloist, Mr. I. Schnitzler.

The rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, although some of the programme books said erroneously Friday. HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, APRIL 8, 1895.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT, THE GERMAN OPERA AND CONCERT.

A New Symphony Soloist—"Tannhauser" and "The Meistersingers" at the Boston Theatre—Sunday Evening Concert.

The programme of the 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony in D major.....Haydn
Serenade for wind instruments, No. 11, in E flat major.....Mozart
Concerto fer piano in F minor.....Chopin
Overture, "Der Freischutz".....Weber

The Mozart serenade is for two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons and two horns. It was played for the first time at these concerts. Miss Antoinette Szumowski was the soloist.

Miss Szumowski is a modest, serious looking maiden of about 22 summers, evidently. She was born in Poland, and was educated at the Conservatory of Warsaw. She latterly became the pupil of the famous Paderewski, and has played with success in Paris and London and in the principal cities of Great Britain as well. She has a beautiful touch, at once clear and elastic, and produces a tone upon the instrument that is mellow and musical in its quality. Her best playing was done in the larghetto of the concerto, and it was delightful in all else except that its poetic element was not revealed with much warmth of expression, a fact that induces one to believe that the fair player has a more active intellect than an impulsive and warm temperament. In other words, the head prevails, rather than the heart, in her playing. The first movement of the concerto also needed a more definite rhythmical delineation. The last movement, however, was played with clearness, splendid accent, and admirable phrasing. This young player kept always within the scope of her power, and did not attempt in the least to exceed her normal strength. Altogether, it was an enjoyable effort, and causes one to desire the opportunity of hearing her again, when she can play a varied programme.

Miss Szumowski was recalled many times by the enthusiastic audience.

The Haydn symphony was read and played in the manner that marks Mr. Paur's conception of the classics and his idea of their interpretation. The contrasts were exaggerated and the fortissimos were coarse and raspy. The delicacy of Haydn takes flight when subjected to such treatment. Technically the orchestra played finely.

The Mozart Serenade was a charming number and displayed the admirable ability of the wind players of our orchestra. The first oboe, Mr. Sautet, and the first clarinet, Mr. Pourton, had opportunities to show their rare skill, and the first horn as well, Mr. Hackenbarth. And in passing let it be said that the latter excellent artist has a beautiful tone, a splendid style, and is accurate as regards intonation. I know of no horn player who can surpass, if rival, his tone and skill combined, upon his instrument. He is an invaluable member of the orchestra. A splendid performance of the "Der Freischutz" overture closed an interesting concert on the whole.

The rehearsal for this week will take place on Thursday instead of Friday afternoon.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 8, 1895.

The Symphony Concert.

The 21st of this season's Symphony concerts Saturday evening was characterized by the introduction of another foreign pianoforte artist to a Boston audience, and the performance for the first time in Boston of a Mozart piece, a serenade for wind instruments, No. 11, in E flat major. The Haydn Symphony in D major, "The Clock," with the overture to "Die Freischuetz," made up the programme, seemingly chosen with reference to the Wagner opera, not perhaps as a relief from a music that certainly makes demands upon one, but rather perhaps as an indication that there are other schools of harmony, and totally antagonistic ones at that.

It was the German opera, too, doubtless, that somewhat thinned the ranks of the season ticket holders, but there was a large audience just the same.

The "Clock" symphony, with its beautiful melody, its rhythm and its fun, a not too serious strain upon the intellect, but rather a revel of harmony for the ear, was an excellent introduction to a brief musical evening. It is a general favorite and was played by the orchestra in excellent time and concert.

The Mozart serenade is written for and was played by two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons. It seemed light by contrast with the preceding orchestral work and was somewhat marred by the size of the hall, but was excellently played by the musicians. It is not an especially tuneful piece, although there are two charming minuets and a melodious finale. There is, too, some fine passage work and an interesting tossing about of theme. The piece is elaborately worked out, although in a suitably condensed form.

Miss Antoinette Szumowska, a young Polish woman, who comes announced as the pupil of Paderewski, was heard in a concerto for the pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, Chopin, opus 21, a very difficult piece, not only for weak wrists, which she appears to possess but for a lack of sympathy with Chopin, or rather, perhaps, for a difficulty in interpreting temperamentally the poetry of Chopin. A very evident diffidence, despite a tour of recitals in London, Paris and Vienna, may have accounted in a large measure for the latter fault. On the other hand the artiste is to be credited with a very beautiful and delicate touch and a refined and always contained expression, wherein she resembles if not imitates her teacher.

[116]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 8, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-first symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Haydn: Symphony in D major, "The Clock" (B. & H., No. 4; Peters, No. 3).

Mozart: Serenade for Wind Instruments, No. 11, in E-flat major. (First time.)

Chopin: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, opus 21.

Weber: Overture to "Der Freischütz," in C minor,

Miss Antoinette Szumowska was the pianist.

It is a good while, if we remember aright, since Haydn's "Clock" symphony has been given here. It is in more than one way a rather large symphony for Haydn; it is scored for as full an orchestra as Mozart used in many an opera, all the wood wind, horns and trumpets being employed in pairs; then the development of each one of the four movements is laid out on a particularly large scale for Haydn's day, and the Finale, instead of being the usual Haydnish "idealised contra dance," is based on a theme of quite sufficient breadth and seriousness for a first movement. The symphony is delightful from beginning to and; the little conceit of clock-ticking in the Andante (from which the work takes its current English name) is not so purely fanciful that it has no intrinsic musical value, and, like the "metronome-ticking" in the Allegretto scherzando of Beethoven's eighth symphony, would delight any musical listener, even if he had not been put upon the track of its mechanical allusion. The symphony was exquisitely played, only we could have spared the sudden slackings-up of the tempo in parts of the Minuet. Are Haydn's minuets to be treated like Strauss waltzes, which the composer conducts in strict metronomic time in the ball room, but with all sorts of modifications of tempo and rubato effects in the concert hall?

It was a daring venture to give the Mozart serenade in the Music Hall: this piece of chamber-music for 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 horns and 2 bassoons ran great risk of being swallowed up in that vast space. William H. Husk, librarian of the London Sacred Harmonic Society, writes of the orchestral Serenata in Grove's Dictionary: "The more perfect development of the Symphony put an end to the desire for its cultivation; the gradual diminution in the number of private Orchestras, to the necessity of its production." This hints strongly at the Serenade, or Serenata, being a form of composition written by composers, toward the end of the last century and at the beginning of the present one, especially for the private orchestras of their noble patrons; these private bands were considerably smaller than the grand opera and concert orchestras of the day, and played in far smaller rooms. But the intrinsic beauty of this serenade of Mozart's, coupled with the supreme excellence of the performance, well conquered the untoward conditions of the over-large hall, and the exquisite music could be thoroughly enjoyed. So rich in melody and harmony, so perfect in form and working-out, in a word, so full of genius is this modest little work, that one felt none of that sugary cloying of the musical palate which is so often the effect of extended compositions for a similar combination of wind instruments. It was a pure delight from beginning to end.

The over-brilliant and beautiful "Freischütz" overture was grandly played: tempi and effects of light and shade were all that could be desired. Mr. Paur here showed a rarely discriminating appreciation of Wagner's suggestions about the rendering of this overture, fully grasping their real artistic value, yet taking them at the same time with the due grain of salt. The delicate aforzando of the horns, near the close of their sylvan episode in the Introduction, was neither overdone nor unduly effaced; the lovely second theme, taken from Agatha's great scena in the second act, was played throughout in a beautiful legato, without any of that vulgarity of accent which Wagner so strongly deprecated, and a wise compromise was struck between the Wagnerian piano and the (apparently) prescribed fortissimo at its reappearance in the full orchestra after the great C-major chords which introduce the Coda. The only point in the rendering we felt like taking exception to, was the excessive toning-down of the famous, twice recurring E-flat-D of the second and third trombones in the working-out of the second theme; this seemed to us a bit of over-refining, for we think these exclamations of the trombones were meant by the composer to produce a terrifico-humorous effect, and that it is no harm if they provoke a smile.

Miss Szumowska made her first public appearance in Boston on this occasiou; and to make one's first appearance with Chopin's F minor concerto is no joke. The work is neither so generally familiar nor so much of a favorite as its earlier companion in E minor; although laid out on a somewhat grander scale, and touching a deeper note of emotion than the other, it is, on the whole, not quite so perfect a work. If its technical difficulty is somewhat less, its higher, intellectual difficulty is greater. We were especially glad that Miss Szumowska played it entirely in the original version, and had nothing to do with Klindworth's modern perversion of the text. Then this was to be expected of a pupil of Paderewski's. The impression made by Miss Szumowska, in spite of her nervousness (which was more real than apparent), was distinctly fine. Her technique is fully up to conquering all the difficulties of the work with ease, fluency, and perfect clearness; her quality of tone delightfully pure and sympathetic, and her use of the pedal shows that "bad pedalling" is no longer to be regarded as the distinctive badge of her sex. Here, too, one detects the Paderewski influence! She played the great music with a simplicity of style exceedingly rare nowadays, and all the more welcome that there was nothing of pedantry nor mièvrerie about it. One might feel at times that somewhat more could have been made out of this or that passage; for Chopin is not always perfectly plain sailing, and all sorts of arts of fascination and expressiveness are applicable to the performance of his music. But these arts fail utterly if they do not spring from the player's own inspiration; they are not to be learnt in any parrot way. Miss Szumowska is young yet, and they will come to her of themselves in time; it was far better for her to play sincerely and as she felt the music, than for her to mimic a power which is not yet her own. And, though her general style may have been somewhat more simple and straightforward than Chopin's, the benefit of its entire sincerity was to be felt in [illegible] she has all the distinctively Slavic sensibility and something more besides: she shows the already budding blossom of something larger, deeper, and more passionate. Her passion has nothing of the German "Sturm und Drang" in it; her very Slavic sensibility brings with it an innate refinement of perception which forbids anything excessive in the way of passionate expression. It is, after all, the passion of Chopin himself, burning as hotly as you please, but expressed always with elegance and grace. Indeed, the emotional side of Miss Szumowska's playing seemed to us of a very uncommon sort; and we fancy that it was the emotional element in herself that led her to a really deeper, more sympathetic, and exact understanding of the music than that of many a player of wider experience and more lavishly equipped with what we have called the arts of expression. In fact, her playing of the concerto was very beautiful indeed; it had also that indispensable characteristic of fine playing, the faculty of striking fire from the audience. Miss Szumowska was very warmly applauded and recalled, and amply deserved it.

The next programme is: Rubinstein, symphony No. 5, in G minor ("Russian"), opus 107; Langer, prelude to "Dornröschen" (first time); Bruch, concerto for violin, No. 1, in G minor, opus 26; Johann Strauss, "Moto perpetuo" (musical joke); Auber, overture to "L'Enfant prodigue" (first time). Mr. I. Schnitzler will be the violinist. The public rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, April 11.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, APRIL 9, 1895.

Union Hall: Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mrs. Emil Paur, gave the eighth, and last, concert of this, their tenth, season in Union Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Robert Kahn: Pianoforte Trio in E major, opus 19. (First time.)

Schubert: Fantasia for Pianoforte and Violin, in C major, opus 159.

Beethoven: Quartet in C-sharp minor, opus 131.

The new trio by Robert Kahn made a rather mixed impression upon us. That this young composer is a figure more than commonly interesting seems pretty evident; an unusually excellent overture of his was played a few weeks ago by the Symphony Orchestra, and this trio has many points in it to attract the attention and hold it. The man's individuality seems somewhat clouded and vague as yet; but he is by no means barren in musical invention and seems to have an inborn instinct for coherent musical development. The trio is eminently pleasant music to listen to, and shows in many places the well trained hand; the themes are natural, graceful, and flowing, and the construction unusually stout; of the real distinction of the work we have as yet some doubts. A good deal of it has a certain superficial, salon air, and we are not sure that the emotional sensibility shown in the Andante is much above the Abt and Kücken sort. But the work has much beauty in it notwithstanding, and shows some signs of strength. For one thing, it is musical throughout. It was excellently well played by Mrs. Paur, Mr. Kneisel, and Mr. Schroeder—with admirable unity of feeling, beauty of tone, and perfection of ensemble.

Schubert's C major violin fantasia has always seemed to us a work that had in it quite as much of the transient as of the eternal in the composer's genius. There are many moments in it which show the genuine, great Schubert, and that continually recurring refrain of "Sei mir gegrüsst" has something more than the beauty of association. But there is also much in the work which smacks of the now obsolete virtuosity of Schubert's day, and sounds merely old-fashioned and trivial. When a great composer has left behind him such an enormous, and as yet comparatively little exploited, legacy of music as Schubert has, one would think that a work like this one might safely be left to fall into oblivion. The best part of it is that it is Schubert's. Mrs. Paur and Mr. Kneisel played it capitally, with true sentiment and, when required, with great brilliancy.

Any hearing of Beethoven's great C-sharp minor quartet marks an epoch in one's musical life. The first movement alone is enough to walk ten miles for and be thankful. The movement is an exceptional one, even for Beethoven; one hears the old Palestrina speaking through it, if in a modernized dialect. Together with the E major fugue in Bach's Well-Tempered Clavichord, it represents to us a wonderful and almost unique survival of an old artistic point of view in modern circumstances. Palestrina and the old Italian contrapuntists have been imitated enough and to spare by more than one modern composer; and generally with rather irritating results. Liszt, for instance, has had many moments of "Palestrinizing." But, when he tried to write in the Palestrina vein, he did so with the greatest self-consciousness; he only skimmed the surface (in this case, by no means the cream) off Palestrina, and imitated that. All that seemed "characteristic" and of importance to Liszt was the harsh harmonic progressions of Palestrina's day, the cross-relations, of which his works are full; not seeing that just these harmonic characteristics were the most superficial and unimportant element in the great master's work. The wondrous contrapuntal web, by which these harmonies were explained and justified, which really cured them of their harshness, was ignored by him. But Bach, in his E major fugue, and Beethoven, in the first movement of the C-sharp minor quartet, caught the very gist of Palestrina's genius and style. Here Beethoven has written a movement which bears no trace of the sonata form; it is but the contrapuntal development of a phrase in the old Palestrina manner; even the first page, with its exposition of this phrase as a fuga reale, has something archaic about it. But, in taking this leaf out of Palestrina's book, Beethoven has none the less remained wholly himself; the movement is in Palestrina's style, but expresses nothing but Beethoven's spirit; it has nothing of Palestrina's impersonality. It is Palestrina's counterpoint (his most important and truly characteristic element) transferred to the modern tonal system; the harsh harmonic progressions (the merely skin-deep and superficial element in his style) no longer appear. It is as if a modern poet should write a thoroughly modern poem, full of modern thought and feeling, in pure Augustan Latin, and in the most authentic Horatian metres. Only the idiom is old; all else is Beethovenish and original. The whole quartet is one dream of beauty and poetry. It was played simply superbly; the Kneisel Quartet touched their high-water mark!

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

TUESDAY, APRIL 9, 1895.

The Kneisel Quartette

The Kneisel Quartette gave its 8th and last concert of the season at Union Hall last night. Mrs. Emil Paur assisted.

The first number on the programme was a piano trio in E major by Robert Kahn. This is a new work, heard here for the first time. The composer is a pupil of Brahms. The work was well received, and created a good impression. It is not too heavily written for the general musical public. Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Schroeder and Mrs. Paur each played, not only with individual, but with collective clearness. The andante seemed, at first hearing, the most pleasing movement.

Schubert's fantasie in C major for piano and violin was next in order, and received a splendid interpretation at the hands of Mr. Kneisel and Mrs. Paur. It is a beautiful work, abounding in melodious passages. The performers preserved an admirable balance of tone. Each instrumental part stood out clearly, and the ensemble was perfect. Mrs. Paur was heard to great advantage in these numbers, being most faithful in shading and tempo. The quartette brought a most successful season to a close with a grand performance of a great work. It needed the courage born of confidence to even attemt such a work as Beethoven's op. 131, the quartette n C sharp minor.

It needed the power which is given only to master artists to render it as it was rendered last night. The work belongs to Beethoven's 3rd period. Unless played by the most thorough musicians it appears without form ond void of meaning. It is scarcely too much to say that the Kneisel Quartt is the only of its kind in America which is capable of performing it adequately and intelligently. This work is the last music which Schubert heard in his lifetime, and during his last illness it was present in his mind, and his ravings were upon it.

The performance last night was a notable one. Every theme and phrase stood out with absolute clearness, even in the rapid presto. The audience, which included many prominent musicians, was very enthusiastic, and recalled the performers after each number, hough the usual custom of abstinence from encores was followed.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 99.

TUESDAY, APRIL 9, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET

The 10th season of the Kneisel quartet concerts, which terminated last evening in Union Hall, has been attended with such a rare and invaluable series of programmes that a reproduction of the entire list may well be given, as follows: Oct. 22, 1894—Haydn, quartet in G, op. 77; Sgambati, quartet in D flat; Mozart, quintet in G minor. Nov. 12—Cherubini, quartet in D minor; Beethoven, quartet in E flat major, op. 74; Rubinstein, piano trio in A minor, Mr. Ernest Perabo, pianist. Dec. 10—Mendelssohn, quartet in D major, op. 44, No. 1; Beethoven, piano trio in B flat major, op. 97, Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist; Brahms, quintet in B minor, op. 115, for clarinet (Mr. Leon Pourtan), two violins, viola and 'cello. Dec. 31—Beethoven, quartet, op. 132; Pfitzner, sonata for pianoforte and 'cello, op. 1, Mr. Arthur Whiting, pianist; Haydn, quartet in D minor, op. 64, No. 5. Jan. 21, 1895—Borodine, quartet in D major; Beethoven, quartet in B flat major; H. W. Parker quintet in D minor. Feb. 18—Schubert, quartet in D minor; Loeffler, quintet for three violins; Beethoven, septet. March 18—Schumann, quartet in A major; songs with piano, by Emil Paur, Bizet and Henschel, sung by Miss Gertrude Franklin; Dvorak, piano quintet, op. 81, Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen, pianist.

For the concert last evening, the following works were given: Robert Kahn, piano trio, op. 19; Schubert, fantasie for piano and violin, C major, op. 159, Mrs. Emil Paur, pianist, and Beethoven, quartet in C sharp minor, op. 131.

The piano trio by Kahn, while it was as clearly and effectively presented by Mrs. Paur, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder as the most captious could desire, did not impress one as being a creation of more than ordinary importance. Its first movement is a sterile and passionless allegro, and this is followed by an andante which, for the most part, is a hyper-sentimental and very cloying love song without words. The finale, an allegro con fuoco, is by far the worthiest movement. There is an abundance of skill shown in this portion of the work, and the composer has his say with far more effectiveness and piquancy than the first two movements of the work would lead one to anticipate. The well known fantasie in C major, by Schubert, was uncommonly well played by Mr. Kneisel and Mrs. Paur. Throughout the performance both artists seemed as one in thought and feeling, and at its conclusion they were recalled and greeted with some of the very heartiest plaudits of the season. Beethoven's C sharp minor quartet, op. 131, seemed as appropriate a finale for the season as could have well been selected, and its performance by Mr. Kneisel and his associates was in every respect admirable. Thus ended one of the most notable series of chamber concerts that has been given in Boston.

The Boston Traveler

TUESDAY, APRIL 9, 1895.

The last concert of this season's series by the Kneisel quartet was given in Union Hall last evening with the assistance of Mrs. Emil Paur. The programme performed embraced Piano trio, in E major, Kahn; Fantasie for piano and violin, Schubert; and the C sharp minor quartet of Beethoven, op. 131. It is needless to say that the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his associates was faultless in every respect, and the assistance of Mrs. Paur was of equal artistic value. The lovers of chamber music in London have something to look forward to with pleasant anticipations, for this now famous quartet is to give some concerts in that music-surfeited city during the month of June.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

TUESDAY MORNING, APR. 9 1895.

The Kneisel Quartette

The Kneisel Quartette gave its 8th and last concert of the season at Union Hall last night. Mrs. Emil Paur assisted.

The first number on the programme was a piano trio in E major by Robert Kahn. This is a new work, heard here for the first time. The composer is a pupil of Brahms. The work was well received, and created a good impression. It is not too heavily written for the general musical public. Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Schroeder and Mrs. Paur each played, not only with individual, but with collective clearness. The andante seemed, at first hearing, the most pleasing movement.

Schubert's fantasie in C major for piano and violin was next in order, and received a splendid interpretation at the hands of Mr. Kneisel and Mrs. Paur. It is a beautiful work, abounding in melodious passages. The performers preserved an admirable balance of tone. Each instrumental part stood out clearly, and the ensemble was perfect. Mrs. Paur was heard to great advantage in these numbers, being most faithful in shading and tempo. The quartette brought a most successful season to a close with a grand performance of a great work. It needed the courage born of confidence to even attemt such a work as Beethoven's op. 131, the quartette n C sharp minor.

It needed the power which is given only to master artists to render it as it was rendered last night. The work belongs to Beethoven's 3rd period. Unless played by the most thorough musicians it appears without form ond void of meaning. It is scarcely too much to say that the Kneisel Quartt is the only of its kind in America which is capable of performing it adequately and intelligently. This work is the last music which Schubert heard in his lifetime, and during his last illness it was present in his mind, and his ravings were upon it.

The performance last night was a notable one. Every theme and phrase stood out with absolute clearness, even in the rapid presto. The audience, which included many prominent musicians, was very enthusiastic, and recalled the performers after each number, hough the usual custom of abstinence from encores was followed.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, APRIL 9, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The eighth concert given in Union Hall by the Kneisel Quartet last evening, brought to a worthy close a series of chamber concerts, the rare attractiveness of which has not been surpassed in this city, not even by the Kneisel Quartet. The concert opened with a piano trio by Robert Kahn, op. 19. The first two movements of the trio are technically well made, but the music in attendance upon them is for the most part so saccharine, and so utterly void of either virility or passion, that the sterling finale which follows puts in its appearance as a genuine surprise. The finale is a most stirring piece of music; bears the impress of rare creative talent; and it could not have been composed except by one having a splendid command of the technical requirements of his art. Despite this, the trio is largely the product of the hand of an apprentice, and the first two movements are wanting in poignancy of feeling, are simply monotonous and tautological in what they have to say, and present but a very slight variety of tone color.

Mrs. Paur brought commendable intelligence and skill to bear upon her performance of the pianoforte part, and was actively in sympathy with the artistic playing of Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder in their scholarly interpretation of the work. In performing the Schubert fantasie op. 159 in C major Mr. Kneisel and Mrs. Paur were highly successful, so that at its conclusion the artists were rewarded with no inconsiderable number of bravi, and prolonged applause.

Worthily, indeed, did this memorable series of concerts end with an admirable performance of Beethoven's quartet op. 131. Who can listen to the opening adagio of this quartet without being impressed by a mastery of counterpoint shown; such as even J. S. Bach could not easily have surpassed; and how it pours forth a wonderful sweet peace into the soul. The architectural treatment of the subject is no less wonderful than are its ideal contents. The Kneisel Quartet has seldom played with more chaste purity, finish, expression and unity than at this concert, and there was even more warmth, spirit and verve in their playing than usual. C. L. C.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, APRIL 9, 1895.

Last Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The last of this season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given in Union hall last evening. The usual fashionable audience was present, and testified by cordial applause to its enjoyment of the thoroughly artistic performance. The program consisted of the following selections: Piano trio in E major, Robert Kahn; fantasie for piano and violin, Schubert; quartet in C-sharp minor, Op 131, Beethoven.

The playing of the quartet was irreproachable at all times, and the performance of the three works was listened to with strict attention. Mrs Emil Paur was the assisting artist, and in both the trio and fantasie her playing was brilliant and intelligent.

The Kneisel quartet will give several concerts in London next summer, and will no doubt there receive the recognition due the foremost organization of its kind in America.

---

[117]

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 15, 1895.

The Symphony Concert.

The Prodigal has come back, repentant that he has strayed into paths of Donizetti, Mascagni and Gounod, and feeling that it is better to listen to the kettledrums in the courts of the righteous, than to revel in high Cs in the halls of the ungodly. He had attained to this sanctified frame of mind when Mr. Paur turned on the bass drum, cymbals, trombones, and gave a finale that outheroded anything that Donizetti ever wrote, an overture that had more footlights in it than anything produced in Mechanics' Hall during the last month, a work that suggested the Cancan and all sorts of other worldly frivolities.

Spite of this meretricious ending, the programme was interesting, not too heavy, and admirably played. It began with Rubinstein's Russian Symphony. This is a work that is redolent of national effects, and suggests Bortzash, Qvass, Pirok, Vodki, and every other Russian compound. It begins with profound melancholy, quite a la Russe, and then gives a side theme that is quaintly Volks-thuemlich, and which played an interesting part in the Coda, coming in with a fragmentary style that reminded of some of Dvorak's touches in the Coda of his second movement in his "New World" symphony. Nor was this the only reminder of our so-called national symphony; one could have dubbed the rollicking second movement of Rubinstein's work—"In Mississippi," and palmed it off as a missing movement in the American symphony and few would have been the wiser; but this is probably the kinship of folk-music the world over. The third movement was not nearly so successful as the second, for it gave very prolix treatment of a single theme with few contrasted passages. There was some good horn work in this movement. The finale had better contrasts, as its dance-like chief theme had a well-contrasted countertheme and there was more than a suggestion of the hearty man's-dance which is called "Kamarinskaia." There was some important oboe work in this movement, which was well played, and some very quaint use of the bassoon both alone and in conjunction with the higher wood-wind. The symphony was well worth a place upon the programme, although, as is often the case with Rubinstein, it is (like a codfish) much head and little tail, the first two movements being much stronger than the last two.

Then came a new work—Langer's Introduction to "Dornroeschen," performed for the first time, and, if the reviewer may become prophetic, for the last also. It was full of soarings after the infinite, in which it succeeded about as well as the modern flying machines; it flapped its wings but did not rise; it had broad sweeps of tone which did not seem to lead anywhere in particular, and the whole composition left the impression that the composer had secured the rinsings of Wagner's bottles of nectar. There was a wonderfully well-played diminuendo at the end.

Now followed the solo of the evening, which was Bruch's G minor Violin Concerto, with Mr. I. Schnitzler as soloist. This is a work which cannot grow tame by repeated hearing; indeed it seems scarcely to have won its proper rank in the repertoire as yet. There are four very great violin concertos: Beethoven's may readily be acknowledged as the head of the list, but it is a moot point whether Mendelssohn's or Brahms' or Bruch's G minor concerto should come next; if skill in development counts, then Brahms' work may be ceded the place, but if dramatic instinct, rich melody and true inspiration are to rule, then this concerto may well precede the other two. It is a pity that the two other violin concertos of Bruch show such a falling off in power.

Mr. Schnitzler deserves great praise for the manner in which he played the concerto; there might have been more breadth in the first and last movements, but the Adagio was splendidly performed and every one of the three movements was given in a sure and masterly manner. When one bears in mind that the night was warm and damp (the worst possible weather for violin playing), the success becomes the more commendable. The Adagio was of course the chief success of the work apart from any questions of execution; its side theme is one of the most tender of violin melodies and altogether the movement is one of the truest Adagios since Beethoven,—and the spirit of the Adagio is one of the rarest things in modern composition. The finale is one of those warlike movements which Bruch delights in. What a martial composer this man is! He looks like a decayed schoolmaster, and composes with the spirit of an old Viking! There is one point in connection with the first movement of this concerto which has not been noted,—the first figure of the first movement was afterwards used by Bruch as the chief figure in "Penelope Weaving a Garment" in his "Odysseus."

After the solo, which of course evoked abundant enthusiasm, there came an innovation that was a most rapid jump from the sublime to the ridiculous; Johann Strauss appeared upon the programmes of these concerts for the first time, and in a "Musical Joke." One would almost as soon attempt jokes at a prayer meeting as at a Boston symphony concert, yet Mr. Paur has some precedent for the introduction of this bit of humor, for Haydn's "Surprise Symphony" has been given by a former conductor, and that contains one of the best known of musical jokes in its very sudden drum-stroke. But if musical jokes be allowed here, one would plead for a performance of Mozart's excellent "Musikalischer Spass" in which that great composer pictures a country band-leader trying to achieve a classical form and floundering about most woefully, being finally completely overthrown in an attempt at fugue. There was considerable humor in the orchestration of the Strauss number, the piccolo having some very showy work to do, and executing it remarkably well, and a very quaint duet between piccolo and bassoon calling for commendation also. The number was very crisply played, Mr. Paur proving that he is not without caprice or daintiness; his lightness of touch was marked throughout the later numbers of this concert. The applause following this number was adequate to show recognition, but one is glad to add that the audience did not put itself on record as appreciating a comical trifle above an earnest symphony or concerto. The chief enthusiasm of the evening was evoked by the lovely adagio above de-ugliness and a great deal of oddity. The first movement begins in a semi-cynical fashion, which makes one think of Jaques's description of his own melancholy, with quaint themes which have just begun to receive concentrated attention when there apparently swoops down a whirlwind with snow and thunder which upsets everything. When this has passed, the voices try to take up the subjects of conversation again; but there are too many airy shrieks, too many wails and groans, and so the movement ends. The second movement, which is unusually long for its place, is in the scherzo form, and in it are noticeable many strange figures and fashions assigned to the middle instruments, which have a variety of thrums and rumbles and roars to intersperse with the rattling and bobbing themes. The andante comes third and consists chiefly of a large and appealing melody, which is first stated at length by the horn and is afterwards heard from the flute and oboe amid the accented accompaniments of the strings. The finale is long, active and vigorous, with a turn here and there that suggests the Irish modes, and with quite a stormy and exciting close.

The orchestra did some of their best work on this programme and especial praise should be accorded to the first horn, clarinet, flute and oboe for virtually perfect renderings of the long obbligati assigned them. There was unusual delicacy in the lighter episodes and a bright sense of comedy in the Strauss.

This will be next Saturday's programme: Schumann, Symphony No. 4, in D minor; Lachner, Aria, "Vineta;" Esser, Suite No. 2; Songs with piano; Cherubini, Overture, "The Water Carrier." Soloist, Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1895.

The Symphony Orchestra is favored in that each of its solo violinists has a style and a merit peculiarly his own and each can be praised in his turn without so much as a suggestion of invidious comparison between him and his brethren. For the twenty-second concert Mr. Schnitzler was appointed as the soloist and he did himself honor and gratified his audience by a thoroughly fine and earnest performance of Bruch's brief and beautiful first concerto. Mr. Schnitzler is the most fervid of the Symphony violinists, and it will be remembered that this quality was in excess, almost to the degree of impetuous excitement, upon his first appearance. He has now tempered his ardor and ordered his energy until his playing, losing nothing of its natural and due warmth, has become more clarified and symmetrical. There is occasionally a little asperity in his tone, but this is hardly worth mentioning against his general fulness and suavity and the notable grace of his softer passages. He was particularly agreeable in the first and second movement, for the third, although keenly and readily delivered, lacked something of the sparkle for which its themes and their treatment call.

Mr. Paur made a liberal draft upon his portfolio of things unheard before in these concerts and brought out three novelties. The first was Ferdinand Langer's introduction to his opera of "The Sleeping Beauty," a study in tones, rising from smooth placidity to a broadly swelling and imperious climax, and then subsiding slowly as if to prepare for the lifting of the curtain upon a story reposeful at first, and only rising by degrees to its chivalric height and glad surprise. The second was a delicious bit of instrumental humor by Johann Strauss, who calls it a "Perpetuum Mobile" because it goes chasing a funny little bit of a tune through all sorts of queer and unexpected combinations and contrivances. The third, which ended the concert spiritedly, was Auber's "Prodigal Son" overture, beginning with a few touches of conventional Orientalism, followed by a short mood of despondency, and then giving way to noisy and lively gayety, with all the drums going and the wind blowing lustily through wood and brass.

The symphony, which was placed at the head of the programme, was Rubinstein's fifth, commonly known as the "Russian," because of the prevalence in it of Russian themes and, as we should think, of Russian tempers. It has much beauty, very little ugliness and a great deal of oddity. The first movement begins in a semi-cynical fashion, which makes one think of Jaques's description of his own melancholy, with quaint themes which have just begun to receive concentrated attention when there apparently swoops down a whirlwind with snow and thunder which upsets everything. When this has passed, the voices try to take up the subjects of conversation again; but there are too many airy shrieks, too many wails and groans, and so the movement ends. The second movement, which is unusually long for its place, is in the scherzo form, and in it are noticeable many strange figures and fashions assigned to the middle instruments, which have a variety of thrums and rumbles and roars to intersperse with the rattling and bobbing themes. The andante comes third and consists chiefly of a large and appealing melody, which is first stated at length by the horn and is afterwards heard from the flute and oboe amid the accented accompaniments of the strings. The finale is long, active and vigorous, with a turn here and there that suggests the Irish modes, and with quite a stormy and exciting close.

The orchestra did some of their best work on this programme and especial praise should be accorded to the first horn, clarinet, flute and oboe for virtually perfect renderings of the long obbligati assigned them. There was unusual delicacy in the lighter episodes and a bright sense of comedy in the Strauss.

This will be next Saturday's programme: Schumann, Symphony No. 4, in D minor; Lachner, Aria, "Vineta;" Esser, Suite No. 2; Songs with piano; Cherubini, Overture, "The Water Carrier." Soloist, Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 104.

SUNDAY, APRIL 14, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. I. Schnitzler the Soloist—Fine Work by the Orchestra.

The programme for the 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Musical Hall, last night, was:

Symphony No. 5 (Russian).....Rubinstein
Introduction to the opera "Dornroeschen" F. Langer
(First time.)
Concerto for violin, No. 1.....Max Bruch
Moto Perpetuo, "Musical Joke"..Johann Strauss
(First time.)
Overture, "The Prodigal Son".....Auber

The soloist was Mr. I. Schnitzler. The Rubinstein symphony has been heard at these concerts once before, during the regime of Mr. Henschel. It is brilliant and interesting in spots, but it is often tedious, especially in the "working out" of the first movement and of the finale. In the latter this feature is prolonged until it becomes indescribably wearisome. The themes of the sympathy are all interesting, the second subject in the opening movement being fascinatingly Haydnesque in melody and orchestration. No use, however, is made of it, for it flashes out only for a brief moment, and then disappears until near the close of the movement, when it is tossed to and fro through the orchestra. The scherzo is the brightest and most attractive portion of the work, by reason of its piquant animation. The andante is warm and graceful, but at length becomes overgarrulous. The reading and performance of the symphony were in the best vein of both Mr. Paur and his orchestra.

The "Dornroschen" prelude has a brief and sensuous theme that appears and reappears under various changes of tone color until it is torn to tatters. It is clearly Wagnerian in inspiration, not only in melody, but in orchestration. It is a pretty trifle, but of no great musical value. The musical "Joke" by Strauss suggests a galop. It is tuneful, ingeniously scored and is vivacious in effect. It ends suddenly on the dominant. It is more notable for the skill of its orchestration than for anything else. Its performance displayed the virtuosity of the orchestra and was greatly applauded. The Auber overture is the weakest and most uninteresting of its composer's works in kind. It is little less than a medley bunglingly put together, is dull and commonplace in effect and could have been well spared for any other of Auber's overtures. It was spiritedly and well played, but it was not worth the playing.

Mr. Schnitzler, who was cordially received, played the first and second movements of the concerto very beautifully, and developed a large and pure tone, a broad style, perfect intonation and excellent taste. In the finale, however, he was less successful, for he was not always clear, and was not always well in tune. As he approached the end of the work he seemed to become more and more nervous. Nevertheless, when he was at his best he made it clear that he is an artist of fine powers, with a fluent and admirable technique and true musicianly sentiment. He was tremendously applauded and twice recalled.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Schumann; aria, "Vineta," Lachner; suite No. 2, Esser; Songs with piano, and overture, "The Water Carrier," Cherubini. Miss Caroline Gradner Clarke will be the soloist.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1895.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-second symphony at Music Hall last night presented a variety of styles of orchestral composition, and of the five numbers three were heard for the first time at these concerts.

Rubinstein's Russian symphony opened the programme, and to many in the audience it was doubtless heard for the first time, since it has not been given in this city for a number of years. Generally it is rather an uninteresting composition, though in places it demands the earnest attention of an audience, because of some charming effects, notably in the second movement when a couple of Russian dance tunes are introduced and developed in various forms. The third movement gives some splendid opportunities for the flute, which Mr. Mole was not slow in making the most of.

Following came the introduction to Lagner's "Dornroschen," which is written in fine form, very stately, and with several pretty melodies. Mr. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra, was heard in a Bruch concerto for violin in three movements, which was played with a great amount of feeling and rare beauty. His admirable work was rewarded by several recalls.

"Perpetuum Mobile," by Strauss, proved a genuine novelty. It is styled a musical joke, and proved a bright, catchy and ingenious composition, and if it was a "trifle light as air," the audience went en rapport over it, and would have liked to hear it repeated. The piece consists of a single theme with many variations and continuously new developments, and ends with a sudden stop in the middle of a phrase. The overture to "The Prodigal Son," by Auber, is an inspiring and martial composition. It is very showy, elaborately worked out, and the brasses are used freely throughout to heighten the effect. At the concert next week, Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke will be the soloist, singing a group of songs by Esser.

Symphony Concert.

Conductor Paur presented three novelties at last week's symphony: the introduction to Langer's opera, "Sleeping Beauty," "A Musical Joke," by Johann Strauss, and the overture to Auber's opera, "The Prodigal Son." Mr Schnitzler, violin soloist, performed Bruch's concerto in G minor. Rubinstein's Russian symphony completed the program.

Mr Schnitzler gave the familiar Bruch concerto with musicianly intelligence, but without special brilliancy. The figural work was correct, the runs true, but not crisp and firm, and the passionate themes of the first part were presented broadly and with a pure intonation. The strongly accentuated march movement, with the pizzicato accompaniment, was specially good, the touch being forceful and the chord ringering melodic. Mr Schnitzler was warmly applauded by his auditors and associate artists.

The Rubinstein symphony was effective in a characteristic way. The oboe and horn duos were smoothly played, and the weird harmonies of the dance tunes were vigorously performed. The "Musical Joke," by Strauss, was a pleasing trifle with a humorous rhythm accompanying the galop.

This Lander composition contained nothing of special musical value. The work is scored for the modern orchestra, and the instrumentation shows considerable skill in the treatment of the different instruments. The introduction is bold, and the variations in the themes are evidently tone pictures of situations in the opera.

"The Prodigal Son" overture, by Auber, suggests but faintly the biblical foundation for the plot of the opera. The opening passages are spirited, and throughout the work the background of accompaniment is full of curious elaborations by contrasting instruments. The strings did admirably in the legato passages, and the summons by the brasses were also clear and resonant as one could wish. The clarinet phrases were very true to the pitch. There appears to be but little of a religious nature in the composition.

This week's program is as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in D minor .....Schumann
Aria, Vineta .....Lachner
Suite No. 2 .....Esser
Overture, The Water Carrier .....Cherubini

Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke will be the soloist.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 14, 1895.

Twenty-second Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall—Close of the Operatic Season at Mechanics' Building.

This was the program of the Symphony Concert last evening:

Symphony No. 5, G minor, "Russian"..Rubinstein
Introduction to the Opera, "Dornroeschen" Langer
(First time.)
Concerto for violin, No. 1, G minor.....Bruch
Musical Joke, "Moto Perpetuo".....Strauss
(First time.)
Overture to "L'Enfant Prodigue".....Auber
(First time.)

There is no doubt that Rubinstein took a peculiar interest in his "Russian" symphony. He built it on folk-song foundations and dedicated it to a woman who was kind to him, who recognized his great talent—perhaps genius would not be too strong a word—and who believed firmly in Russian music. And has the symphony the marks and signs of undoubted long and healthy life? Possibly the Russian to whom the themes may be hallowed by association will always hear it gladly. But will any work that is so intensely national in character be of vital interest to the world at large? Here enters a question that is today almost fiercely discussed.

I do not believe that any orchestral composition which is intended frankly to exploit national character as displayed in music will be of vital force in the great repertoire of the world. There is nothing that palls so surely as an exotic tune treated with exotic harmonies. At first there is surprise at melody, scale and rhythm. After the surprise, comes the desire to hear that which is normal. The surprise only comes once. The desire is lasting. Nor are the melodies and the rhythms in this particular work of such fragrance or pungency that they overmaster the listener. Tschaikowski ordered this matter better. When he visited Little Russia, the hearer went with him and heard with the composer's ears.

Rubinstein, in this symphony, commits the gravest of faults: he is not interesting. The instrumentation does not make amends. The second movement has color and it is not without a melancholy charm. One movement, however, does not make a symphony.

The Introduction to "Dornröschen" is in modern form; there is a free development of a phrase. Langer has shown ingenuity and a sense of color, but there is no personal note. The piece is the result of patient labor in the manner of Wagner. Passages may excite an amiable mood for the moment, but the Introduction makes no lasting impression.

The Strauss joke has one great merit: the composer stopped before he became a bore. 'Tis an agreeable trifle; but if the music of Strauss is to be heard at a symphony concert, let it be a waltz, in which the Viennese shows his genius.

What was Mr. Paur thinking about when he put Auber's overture to "L'Enfant Prodigue" in rehearsal?

The master of opéra-comique wrote many charming overtures, graceful in melody, logical in structure, charming in instrumentation. The one played last night is not among them. It is thrown together as at random; it is without distinction, except in that it is brutal and vulgar. It is, if I am not mistaken, a misch-masch of ballet airs, a most unsuitable prelude to the opera. Such a selection by Mr. Paur is an injury to the composer, to the influence of a Symphony concert, and to the taste of the conductor.

Mr. Schnitzler played the first two movements of the concerto by Bruch with breadth, fine feeling, intelligence and technical skill. In the last movement he was not as successful. He was at times a little coarse in delivery, and his intonation was not always faultless. He was heartily applauded.

[118]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APR. 15, 1895.

The Symphony Concert.

The Prodigal has come back, repentant that he has strayed into paths of Donizetti, Mascagni and Gounod, and feeling that it is better to listen to the kettledrums in the tents of the righteous, than to revel in high Cs in the halls of the ungodly. He had attained to this sanctified frame of mind when Mr. Paur turned on the bass drum, cymbals, trombones, and gave a finale that outheroded anything that Donizetti ever wrote, an overture that had more footlights in it than anything produced in Mechanics' Hall during the last month, a work that suggested the Cancan and all sorts of other worldly frivolities.

Spite of this meretricious ending, the programme was interesting, not too heavy, and admirably played. It began with Rubinstein's Russian Symphony. This is a work that is redolent of national effects, and suggests Bortzsch, Qvass, Pirok, Vodki, and every other Russian compound. It begins with profound melancholy, quite a la Russe, and then gives a side theme that is quaintly Volks-thuemlich, and which played an interesting part in the Coda, coming in with a fragmentary style that reminded of some of Dvorak's touches in the Coda of his second movement in his "New World" symphony. Nor was this the only reminder of our so-called national symphony; one could have dubbed the rollicking second movement of Rubinstein's work—"In Mississippi," and palmed it off as a missing movement in the American symphony and few would have been the wiser; but this is probably the kinship of folk-music the world over. The third movement was not nearly so successful as the second, for it gave very prolix treatment of a single theme with few contrasted passages. There was some good horn work in this movement. The finale had better contrasts, as its dance-like chief theme had a well-contrasted countertheme and there was more than a suggestion of the hearty men's dance which is called "Kamarinskaia." There was some important oboe work in this movement, which was well played, and some very quaint use of the bassoon both alone and in conjunction with the higher wood-wind. The symphony was well worth a place upon the programme, although, as is often the case with Rubinstein, it is (like a codfish) much head and little tail, the first two movements being much stronger than the last two.

Then came a new work—Langer's Introduction to "Dornroeschen," performed for the first time, and, if the reviewer may become prophetic, for the last also. It was full of soarings after the infinite, in which it succeeded about as well as the modern flying machines; it flapped its wings but did not rise; it had broad sweeps of tone which did not seem to lead anywhere in particular, and the whole composition left the impression that the composer had secured the rinsings of Wagner's bottles of nectar. There was a wonderfully well-played diminuendo at the end.

Now followed the solo of the evening, which was Bruch's G minor Violin Concerto, with Mr. I. Schnitzler as soloist. This is a work which cannot grow tame by repeated hearing; indeed it seems scarcely to have won its proper rank in the repertoire as yet. There are four very great violin concertos: Beethoven's may readily be acknowledged as the head of the list, but it is a moot point whether Mendelssohn's or Brahms' or Bruch's G minor concerto should come next; if skill in development counts, then Brahms' work may be ceded the place, but if dramatic instinct, rich melody and true inspiration are to rule, then this concerto may well precede the other two. It is a pity that the two other violin concertos of Bruch show such a falling off in power.

Mr. Schnitzler deserves great praise for the manner in which he played the concerto; there might have been more breadth in the first and last movements, but the Adagio was splendidly performed and every one of the three movements was given in a sure and masterly manner. When one bears in mind that the night was warm and damp (the worst possible weather for violin playing), the success becomes the more commendable. The Adagio was of course the chief success of the work apart from any questions of execution; its side theme is one of the most tender of violin melodies and altogether the movement is one of the truest Adagios since Beethoven,—and the spirit of the Adagio is one of the rarest things in modern composition. The finale is one of those warlike movements which Bruch delights in. What a martial composer this man is! He looks like a decayed schoolmaster, and composes with the spirit of an old Viking! There is one point in connection with the first movement of this concerto which has not been noted,—the first figure of the first movement was afterwards used by Bruch as the chief figure in "Penelope Weaving a Garment" in his "Odysseus."

After the solo, which of course evoked abundant enthusiasm, there came an innovation that was a most rapid jump from the sublime to the ridiculous; Johann Strauss appeared upon the programmes of these concerts for the first time, and in a "Musical Joke." One would almost as soon attempt jokes at a prayer meeting as at a Boston symphony concert, yet Mr. Paur has some precedent for the introduction of this bit of humor, for Haydn's "Surprise Symphony" has been given by a former conductor, and that contains one of the best known of musical jokes in its very sudden drum-stroke. But if musical jokes be allowed here, one would plead for a performance of Mozart's excellent "Musikalischer Spass" in which that great composer pictures a country band-leader trying to achieve a classical form and floundering about most woefully, being finally completely overthrown in an attempt at fugue. There was considerable humor in the orchestration of the Strauss number, the piccolo having some very showy work to do, and executing it remarkably well, and a very quaint duet between piccolo and bassoon calling for commendation also. The number was very crisply played, Mr. Paur proving that he is not without caprice or daintiness; his lightness of touch was marked throughout the later numbers of this concert. The applause following this number was adequate to show recognition, but one is glad to add that the audience did not put itself on record as appreciating a comical trifle above an earnest symphony or concerto. The chief enthusiasm of the evening was evoked by the Bruch adagio above described. Already indicated, the last number, Auber's overture to "L'Enfant Prodigue," was not of a character to please the judicious auditor; it had not the playfulness of the Strauss number, nor had it anything earnest to impart, it was neither fish, flesh nor fowl. So far as it had any affiliations it represented the school of Offenbach, and its coda had all the vulgarity without any of the brightness of the Opera Bouffe school. such juxtaposition of different kinds of music might lead eventually to something like the following:—

Symphony No. 3 (Eroica), Beethoven.
Potpourri, "Petit Faust," Herve.
Tragic Overture, Brahms.
"Beautiful Blue Danube Waltzes," Strauss.
Pastorale (Christmas Oratorio), Bach.

The orchestra played with excellent ensemble throughout the concert of varying moods, and Mr. Paur demonstrated a versatility that shows him to be much more than a mere drill-master.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1895.

The Symphony Orchestra is favored in that each of its solo violinists has a style and a merit peculiarly his own and each can be praised in his turn without so much as a suggestion of invidious comparison between him and his brethren. For the twenty-second concert Mr. Schnitzler was appointed as the soloist and he did himself honor and gratified his audience by a thoroughly fine and earnest performance of Bruch's brief and beautiful first concerto. Mr. Schnitzler is the most fervid of the Symphony violinists, and it will be remembered that this quality was in excess, almost to the degree of impetuous excitement, upon his first appearance. He has now tempered his ardor and ordered his energy until his playing, losing nothing of its natural and due warmth, has become more clarified and symmetrical. There is occasionally a little asperity in his tone, but this is hardly worth mentioning against his general fulness and suavity and the notable grace of his softer passages. He was particularly agreeable in the first and second movement, for the third, although keenly and readily delivered, lacked something of the sparkle for which its themes and their treatment call.

Mr. Paur made a liberal draft upon his portfolio of things unheard before in these concerts and brought out three novelties. The first was Ferdinand Langer's introduction to his opera of "The Sleeping Beauty," a study in tones, rising from smooth placidity to a broadly swelling and imperious climax, and then subsiding slowly as if to prepare for the lifting of the curtain upon a story reposeful at first, and only rising by degrees to its chivalric height and glad surprise. The second was a delicious bit of instrumental humor by Johann Strauss, who calls it a "Perpetuum Mobile" because it goes chasing a funny little bit of a tune through all sorts of queer and unexpected combinations and contrivances. The third, which ended the concert spiritedly, was Auber's "Prodigal Son" overture, beginning with a few touches of conventional Orientalism, followed by a short mood of despondency, and then giving way to noisy and lively gayety, with all the drums going and the wind blowing lustily through wood and brass.

The symphony, which was placed at the head of the programme, was Rubinstein's fifth, commonly known as the "Russian," because of the prevalence in it of Russian themes and, as we should think, of Russian tempers. It has much beauty, very little ugliness and a great deal of oddity. The first movement begins in a semi-cynical fashion, which makes one think of Jaques's description of his own melancholy, with quaint themes which have just begun to receive concentrated attention when there apparently swoops down a whirlwind with snow and thunder which upsets everything. When this has passed, the voices try to take up the subjects of conversation again; but there are too many airy shrieks, too many wails and groans, and so the movement ends. The second movement, which is unusually long for its place, is in the scherzo form, and in it are noticeable many strange figures and fashions assigned to the middle instruments, which have a variety of thrums and rumbles and roars to intersperse with the rattling and bobbing themes. The andante comes third and consists chiefly of a large and appealing melody, which is first stated at length by the horn and is afterwards heard from the flute and oboe amid the accented accompaniments of the strings. The finale is long, active and vigorous, with a turn here and there that suggests the Irish modes, and with quite a stormy and exciting close.

The orchestra did some of their best work on this programme and especial praise should be accorded to the first horn, clarinet, flute and oboe for virtually perfect renderings of the long obbligati assigned them. There was unusual delicacy in the lighter episodes and a bright sense of comedy in the Strauss.

This will be next Saturday's programme: Schumann, Symphony No. 4, in D minor; Lachner, Aria, "Vineta;" Esser, Suite No. 2; Songs with piano; Cherubini, Overture, "The Water Carrier." Soloist, Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 104.

SUNDAY, APRIL 14, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. I. Schnitzler the Soloist—Fine Work by the Orchestra.

The programme for the 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Musical Hall, last night, was:

Symphony No. 5 (Russian).....Rubinstein
Introduction to the opera "Dornroschen"
F. Langer
(First time.)
Concerto for violin, No. 1.....Max Bruch
Moto Perpetuo, "Musical Joke"..Johann Strauss
(First time.)
Overture, "The Prodigal Son".....Auber

The soloist was Mr. I. Schnitzler. The Rubinstein symphony has been heard at these concerts once before, during the regime of Mr. Henschel. It is brilliant and interesting in spots, but it is often tedious, especially in the "working out" of the first movement and of the finale. In the latter this feature is prolonged until it becomes indescribably wearisome. The themes of the sympathy are all interesting, the second subject in the opening movement being fascinatingly Haydnesque in melody and orchestration. No use, however, is made of it, for it flashes out only for a brief moment, and then disappears until near the close of the movement, when it is tossed to and fro through the orchestra. The scherzo is the brightest and most attractive portion of the work, by reason of its piquant animation. The andante is warm and graceful, but at length becomes overgarrulous. The reading and performance of the symphony were in the best vein of both Mr. Paur and his orchestra.

The "Dornroschen" prelude has a brief and sensuous theme that appears and reappears under various changes of tone color until it is torn to tatters. It is clearly Wagnerian in inspiration, not only in melody, but in orchestration. It is a pretty trifle, but of no great musical value. The musical "Joke" by Strauss suggests a galop. It is tuneful, ingeniously scored and is vivacious in effect. It ends suddenly on the dominant. It is more notable for the skill of its orchestration than for anything else. Its performance displayed the virtuosity of the orchestra and was greatly applauded. The Auber overture is the weakest and most uninteresting of its composer's works in kind. It is little less than a medley bunglingly put together, is dull and commonplace in effect and could have been well spared for any other of Auber's overtures. It was spiritedly and well played, but it was not worth the playing.

Mr. Schnitzler, who was cordially received, played the first and second movements of the concerto very beautifully, and developed a large and pure tone, a broad style, perfect intonation and excellent taste. In the finale, however, he was less successful, for he was not always clear, and was not always well in tune. As he approached the end of the work he seemed to become more and more nervous. Nevertheless, when he was at his best he made it clear that he is an artist of fine powers, with a fluent and admirable tecnique and true musicianly sentiment. He was tremendously applauded and twice recalled.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Schumann; aria, "Vineta," Lachner; suite No. 2, Esser; Songs with piano, and overture, "The Water Carrier," Cherubini. Miss Caroline Gradner Clarke will be the soloist.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1895.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-second symphony at Music Hall last night presented a variety of styles of orchestral composition, and of the five numbers three were heard for the first time at these concerts.

Rubinstein's Russian symphony opened the programme, and to many in the audience it was doubtless heard for the first time, since it has not been given in this city for a number of years. Generally it is rather an uninteresting composition, though in places it demands the earnest attention of an audience, because of some charming effects, notably in the second movement when a couple of Russian dance tunes are introduced and developed in various forms. The third movement gives some splendid opportunities for the flute, which Mr. Mole was not slow in making the most of.

Following came the introduction to Lagner's "Dornroschen," which is written in fine form, very stately, and with several pretty melodies. Mr. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra, was heard in a Bruch concerto for violin in three movements, which was played with a great amount of feeling and rare beauty. His admirable work was rewarded by several recalls.

"Perpetuum Mobile," by Strauss, proved a genuine novelty. It is styled a musical joke, and proved a bright, catchy and ingenious composition, and if it was a "trifle light as air," the audience went en rapport over it, and would have liked to hear it repeated. The piece consists of a single theme with many variations and continuously new developments, and ends with a sudden stop in the middle of a phrase. The overture to "The Prodigal Son," by Auber, is an inspiring and martial composition. It is very showy, elaborately worked out, and the brasses are used freely throughout to heighten the effect. At the concert next week, Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke will be the soloist, singing a group of songs by Esser.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 14, 1895.

Symphony Concert.

Conductor Paur presented three novelties at last week's symphony: the introduction to Langer's opera, "Sleeping Beauty," "A Musical Joke," by Johann Strauss, and the overture to Auber's opera, "The Prodigal Son." Mr Schnitzler, violin soloist, performed Bruch's concerto in G minor. Rubinstein's Russian symphony completed the program.

Mr Schnitzler gave the familiar Bruch concerto with musicianly intelligence, but without special brilliancy. The figural work was correct, the runs true, but not crisp and firm, and the passionate themes of the first part were presented broadly and with a pure intenation. The strongly accentuated march movement, with the pizzicato accompaniment, was specially good, the touch being forceful and the chord fingering melodic. Mr Schnitzler was warmly applauded by his auditors and associate artists.

The Rubinstein symphony was effective in a characteristic way. The oboe and horn duos were smoothly played, and the weird harmonies of the dance tunes were vigorously performed. The "Musical Joke," by Strauss, was a pleasing trifle with a humorous rhythm accompanying the galop.

This Lander composition contained nothing of special musical value. The work is scored for the modern orchestra, and the instrumentation shows considerable skill in the treatment of the different instruments. The introduction is bold, and the variations in the themes are evidently tone pictures of situations in the opera.

"The Prodigal Son" overture, by Auber, suggests but faintly the biblical foundation for the plot of the opera. The opening passages are spirited, and throughout the work the background of accompaniment is full of curious elaborations by contrasting instruments. The strings did admirably in the legato passages, and the summons by the brasses were also clear and resonant as one could wish. The clarinet phrases were very true to the pitch. There appears to be but little of a religious nature in the composition.

This week's program is as follows:

Symphony No.4, in D minor .....Schumann
Aria, Vineta .....Lachner
Suite No. 2 .....Esser
Overture, The Water Carrier .....Cherubini

Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke will be the soloist.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 14, 1895.

Twenty-second Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall—Close of the Operatic Season at Mechanics' Building.

This was the program of the Symphony Concert last evening:

Symphony No. 5, G minor, "Russian"..Rubinstein
Introduction to the Opera, "Dornroeschen"
Langer
(First time.)
Concerto for violin, No. 1, G minor.....Bruch
Musical Joke, "Moto Perpetuo".....Strauss
(First time.)
Overture to "L'Enfant Prodigue".....Auber
(First time.)

There is no doubt that Rubinstein took a peculiar interest in his "Russian" symphony. He built it on folk-song foundations and dedicated it to a woman who was kind to him, who recognized his great talent—perhaps genius would not be too strong a word—and who believed firmly in Russian music. And has the symphony the marks and signs of undoubted long and healthy life? Possibly the Russian to whom the themes may be hallowed by association will always hear it gladly. But will any work that is so intensely national in character be of vital interest to the world at large? Here enters a question that is today almost fiercely discussed.

I do not believe that any orchestral composition which is intended frankly to exploit national character as displayed in music will be of vital force in the great repertoire of the world. There is nothing that palls so surely as an exotic tune treated with exotic harmonies. At first there is surprise at melody, scale and rhythm. After the surprise, comes the desire to hear that which is normal. The surprise only comes once. The desire is lasting. Nor are the melodies and the rhythms in this particular work of such fragrance or pungency that they overcome the listener. Tschaikowski ordered this matter better. When he visited Little Russia, the hearer went with him and heard with the composer's ears.

Rubinstein, in this symphony, commits the gravest of faults: he is not interesting. The instrumentation does not make amends. The second movement has color and it is not without a melancholy charm. One movement, however, does not make a symphony.

The Introduction to "Dornröschen" is in modern form; there is a free development of a phrase. Langer has shown ingenuity and a sense of color, but there is no personal note. The piece is the result of patient labor in the manner of Wagner. Passages may excite an amiable mood for the moment, but the Introduction makes no lasting impression.

The Strauss joke has one great merit; the composer stopped before he became a bore. 'Tis an agreeable trifle; but if the music of Strauss is to be heard at a symphony concert, let it be a waltz, in which the Viennese shows his genius.

What was Mr. Paur thinking about when he put Auber's overture to "L'Enfant Prodigue" in rehearsal?

The master of opéra-comique wrote many charming overtures, graceful in melody, logical in structure, charming in instrumentation. The one played last night is not among them. It is thrown together as at random; it is without distinction, except in that it is brutal and vulgar. It is, if I am not mistaken, a misch-masch of ballet airs, a most unsuitable prelude to the opera. Such a selection by Mr. Paur is an injury to the composer, to the influence of a Symphony concert, and to the taste of the conductor.

Mr. Schnitzler played the first two movements of the concerto by Bruch with breadth, fine feeling, intelligence and technical skill. In the last movement he was not as successful. He was at times a little coarse in delivery, and his intonation was not always faultless. He was heartily applauded.

* * *

[118]

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1885.

Here and There.

The Twenty-first Symphony Concert gave a beautiful "first time" in Mozart's Serenade, number eleven, E-flat, for two oboes, clarinets, horns, and bassoons. Haydn's Clock Symphony is ever delightsome; and so is the Der Freischutz overture. Paderewski admirers were more than glad to hear his commended pupil, Antoinette Szumowska, with her velvetty touch, in Chopin's Second Concerto, in F minor, op. 21. How young and pretty she is for so ripe a pianist.

Tennyson's Dream of Fair Women, read by Gertrude Capen, and illustrated by living and moving pictures, was recently given very successfully in the New South Vestry, under the direction of Miss Vancy Joy. There was good singing by Lucy Proctor, piano-playing by Miss Mahr, and Mandolin playing by Hattie B. Cardell; and Miss Joy having been in Japan, there would have been oriental music by a gentleman in his rich native costume, had not the time been lost by the luckless Japanese party in a cab, driving about Boston, in vain endeavors to find the New South Church. You see we have an Old South, a New South, a New Old South, and a South Congregational Church; and this quartet of eccelesiastical names is slightly confusing to the uninitiated.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 14, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The last of this season's series of eight concerts took place in Union hall on Monday evening. As usual, a large audience, representative of Boston at her musical best, was in attendance. The programme was:

Piano trio in E, op. 19.....Kahn
Fantasie for Piano and Violin, op. 159.....Schubert
Quartette, op. 131.....Beethoven

The new trio of Kahn's was a disappointment. Its author is very well spoken of by trustworthy critics, and we know him to have been busy with works of serious artistic purpose ever since we heard of his opus 1, some eight years ago. But his music seems to possess only the quality of extremely good manufacture. His melodies are pleasant, but his musical vocabulary is decidedly limited. The same devices of composition were to be detected in all three movements of the trio. In short, Kahn seems to be a plodder with a modicum of soulfulness,—nothing more.

The Schubert number was a delight from beginning to end; an uninterrupted flow of spontaneous inspiration. Mrs. Paur was the pianist in both this and the opening number. While the performance of the trio was not without a slip or two of the string players, the rendering of the duet was, like the music, ideal. Mrs. Paur again showed herself to be thoroughly in command of the technique of both classical and modern piano compositions.

The quartette's season was fittingly closed by a great performance of one of Beethoven's last compositions. It is said that the Kneisels are to give a series of concerts in London during the summer. We are sure that their finest laurels will be won in their Beethoven playing.

Boston Courier

MONDAY, APRIL 15, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Rubinstein: Symphony No. 5, in G minor ("Russian"), opus 107.
Ferdinand Langer: Introduction to "Dornröschen." (First time.)
Max Bruch: Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in G minor, opus 26.
Johann Strauss: "Mota perpetuo," Musical Joke, opus 257. (First time.)
Auber: Overture to "L'Enfant prodigue."
Mr. I. Schnitzler was the violinist.

A programme which, as Angelo Cyrus Bantam, Esquire, puts it, is, "to say the least, remarkable!" Rubinstein's "Russian" symphony was not marked "first time" on the programme, but we do not remember hearing it before, and it seems impossible that anyone could hear the work and ever forget it. The score is dedicated to the memory of the Grand Duchess Hélène Pawlowna. Happy Grand Duchess! No Macbeth can say of her: "She should have died hereafter." One last misery was spared her; that of hearing this symphony. For one thing, the work is perfectly clear and afflicts the listener's mind with no doubts; even the orchestration, though often (probably intentionally) rough and unbeautiful, is clearness itself; Rubinstein has not here, as he sometimes does, stifled his orchestra with trombones; you hear everything! But, as a perfect Cobi-Shamo, Great Salt Desert, Sahara of dismal dreariness, this symphony beats all else we have ever heard. What in it is not trivial and commonplace is irredeemably ugly; the development of each one of the four movements is carried out on Rubinstein's self-deceiving principle that so many notes written represent so much work; it shows a tediously laborious shirking of work. The last movement, which is fully as long as the cyclone in the "Ocean" symphony, is especially exasperating in its apotheosis of boredom. May be, this symphony can awaken familiar and cherished associations in the Russian mind; if so, one trembles to think with what associations the Russian mind must be stocked! Why, oh why, should we have been called upon to bear this infliction? we who have already this season paid Rubinstein's memory the tribute of listening to the whole of his "Ocean?"

Ferdinand Langer few of us had ever heard of; only those of us who had taken the trouble to look him up in an encyclopædia knew anything about him. But the title of "Dornröschen" sounded familiar and cheering after the Rubinstein vale of tears: whose heart does not leap sympathetically when he recalls the delights of Ferrault's "La Belle au Bois dormant" and Grimm's "Dornröschen"? We looked to Langer and his introduction to cheer us up a bit. But the introduction was a bitter disappointment; mere threadbare phrases from Abt's and Kücken's waste-basket, cooked up in the modern chromatic style and scored for grand orchestra as if by one who had gone to market to buy a Wagnerian receipt, and got cheated. Seriously now, what have we here in Boston to do with Langer, or he with us? The man is a local celebrity—if celebrity at all—in Mannheim, where he conducts the orchestra; he has never done the first thing to win him the right to a hearing in this country. His "Dornröschen" introduction is but a waste of time.

At last, in Max Bruch's concerto, one had something worth listening to. Mr. Schnitzler played it very beautifully indeed. We should have preferred to hear the first movement go a little faster, with more passion and force; Mr. Schnitzler took it very broadly indeed, but, to our thinking, somewhat at the expense of energy of effect. But he played the slow movement exquisitely, and was brilliancy itself in the Finale. He was enthusiastically applauded and recalled. But, as we have made up our minds to write a croaking article, we must go on croaking. The concerto was not well placed on the programme. To be sure, one may well doubt whether anything could have been well placed on such a programme—anything but one thing alone, of which more later on. But both the Bruch concerto and the Rubinstein symphony are in G minor, and both have their slow movement in E-flat major; this of itself gave a tinge of sameness. Then another consideration forces itself upon us, one of which we have often thought before, but have as yet said little. Mr. Schnitzler had to play his part in the Rubinstein symphony and the Langer "Dornröschen" before appearing in an important and taxing solo, and must consequently have been far from fresh for his task. This sort of thing has occurred more than once before under Mr. Paur's régime; let us look at the record.

Last season Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder played Brahms's A minor concerto for violin and 'cello after Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony; Mr. Adamowski played the two movements from Tschaikowsky's D major concerto after Brahms's C minor symphony and Mozart's overture to the "Zauberflöte;" Mr. Kneisel played Beethoven's D major concerto after Dvorák's symphony "From the New World;" Mr. Schroeder played Loeffler's "Fantastic" concerto after Beethoven's eighth symphony; Mr. Loeffler played the Bruch romanza and Saint-Saëns's concert-piece after Brahms's D major symphony; Mr. Leo Schult played Bruch,s "Kol Nidrei" after Liszt's "Faust" symphony and Clayton Johns's berceuse and scherzo; Mr. Roth played the two movements from Molique's A minor concerto after Bülow's "Funerale" and Beethoven's "Eroica."

This season Mr. Loeffler played his own divertimento in A minor after Mozart's D major symphony; Mr. Schroeder played Dvorák's "Waldesruke" and the Klengel capriccio after Foote's "Francesca da Rimini" and Paine's "Island Fantasy;" Mr. Kneisel played Mendelssohn's E minor concerto after Brahms's F major symphony; Mr. Schnitzler played Bruch's G minor concerto after Rubinstein's "Russian" symphony and Langer's introduction to "Dornröschen."

In most, if not in all, of these cases the solo player had to play through all that preceded his piece on the programme before playing his own solo selection. The only case to the contrary we are sure of was, when Mr. Molé (last year) played Benoît's symphonic poem for flute and orchestra, it was preceded by Mozart's E-flat symphony, and, there being but one flute-part in the symphony, it was played by Mr. Heindl, and Mr. Molé could come on fresh for his solo.

Now, let us look through ... season of 1892-93, Mr. Nikisch's last year here. Mr. Adamowski played Ernst's F-sharp minor concerto after Saint-Saëns's A-minor symphony; Mr. Schroeder played the Davidoff concerto after Dvorák's "Husitska" overture; Mr. Schnitzler played Vieuxtemps's D minor concerto after Berlioz's overture to Benvenuto Cellini;" Mr. Loeffler played Saint-Saëns's A major concerto after Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture; Mr. Roth played Raff's "Fée d'Amour" after Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture; Mr. Kneisel played Brahms's D major concerto after Schumann's overture to "Manfred." Now, in not one of these cases did the solo player have to play also in the piece preceding his own; and, moreover, the first piece on the programme was, with one exception, short, so that the solo player did not have to wait long, chewing the cud of nervousness, in the ante-room.

The pieces Mr. Paur has put on the programme before the solos played by members of the orchestra have often been exceedingly long and taxing, and in almost every case, if not in every case, the solo player has had to play his part in them before appearing in his own piece. This may be the rule in Germany, though we find it hard to believe it; for do we not have it on the authority of Mr. Brodsky that, in German orchestras, the Conzertmeister, or leader, does not even play in the accompaniment to solos? But, whether it be the rule in Germany or not, it is a bad one and is, moreover, utterly at variance with our customs here. It places the solo player in an entirely false position; whether a member of the orchestra or not, he is a "soloist" (confound the word!) for that evening, and should be treated as one.

Strauss's musical joke was a ray of sunlight; to be sure, it had no business whatever on a symphony programme—by which we do not necessarily mean a programme of the Symphony Orchestra—but its brightness and go were unspeakably grateful. It is, perhaps, a good earnest of what most of the rest of the programme was, that this flimsy little café-concert tune should have been really welcome.

Auber's overture to "L'Enfant prodigue" is the worst thing by him we have yet heard.

The next programme is: Schumann, symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120; Vincenz Lachner, concert aria, "Vineta," opus 80; Esser, suite No. 2 (first time); Handel, air, "As when the dove," from "Acis and Galatea;" Cherubini, overture to "Les deux journées." Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke will be the singer.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, APRIL 15, 1895.

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme included the following numbers:

Symphony No. 5, "Russian"....Rubinstein
Introduction to the opera "Dornroschen".....Langer
Concerto for Violin, No. 1.....Bruch
Musical Joke, "Moto Perpetuo"..J. Strauss
Overture to "L'Enfant Prodigue"..Auber

The Langer, Strauss and Auber numbers were played for the first time at these concerts.

Mr. I. Schnitzler was the soloist.

The attendance at this concert was the lightest of any of this season's series.

The Rubinstein symphony, which at intervals introduces Russian folk-songs and dance tunes, like most of this famous composer's larger works, varies in interest, and yet, everything considered, there is nothing of Rubinstein's that does not repay the hearing. The vital element always exists, and there is also enough of healthy sentiment and sustained, original melody to keep the attention from flagging, although there are places occasionally where in the working out the duration of the effort might produce weariness, did not the composer command such inexhaustible resources of technical variety and melodic and harmonic beauty.

Mr. Paur read the work finely, and the orchestra responded to his conducting with a unity of effort that vouchsafed a superb performance. The horn solo in the andante, and the flute solo, also, were delightfully played by those excellent artists, Messrs. Hackenbarth and Mole.

The introduction to "Dornroschen," by Langer, is little else than an essay upon the modes of Wagner. It does not require a great deal of knowledge to invent such a piece. If one can produce a theme or two, has pondered over the scores of the mighty Richard, and has some technical faculty in writing for the orchestra, such pieces are easily accomplished. It was given a splendid performance by the orchestra.

The "Musical Joke," by Johann Strauss, was entirely out of place in a symphony programme. Mr. Paur should have chosen one of this composer's waltzes, compositions that of their kind are classics, and are worthy of association with the higher of any form of musical composition.

Mr. Schnitzler is an admirable player, and in the Adagio of the Bruch concerto achieved an artistic success. There was much to praise, also, in the rendering of the first movement, but in the playing of the last movement there was much left to be desired. His associates accompanied his efforts in a commendable manner. Mr. Schnitzler was enthusiastically applauded and recalled after the concerto was finished.

Mr. Paur did not choose well in selecting Auber's overture to "L'Enfant Prodigue," as it is little less than a potpourri. Mr. Paur is to be praised for his inclination to lighten his programmes with less serious material than one usually finds in the make-up of selections for a Symphony concert, but he should give his listeners the best of the works of composers in the lighter forms of orchestral writing.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was a large and enthusiastic audience gathered at City Hall last evening to listen to the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestsa, conducted by Mr. Emil Paur, his first appearance in this city. The band was augumented to 70 musicians, we think the largest number that has ever appeared here in concert.

Mr. Paur has a tall, commanding figure and he conducts with much vigor. Every muscle in his body, like the lamented Jullien's, has a share in the task. He is evidently an excellent drill master, and he reads intelligently and to the approbation of his audience. We could only regret that the house was not crowded, as it would have been if the freshets had not disturbed the plans of many music lovers, because there was so many who desired to see Mr. Paur and hear the orchestra under its new master.

While the programme was not exactly what many would have chosen, it contained two numbers of more than usual attraction. The one was a symphony poem, "An Island Fantasy," by Prof. Paine of Harvard College, a Portland boy, and the other Divorak's symphony in B minor, "From the New World." It was to be regretted that the descriptive programmes, such as are used in Boston, were not used last evening here since they give an audience a clear idea of the composer's treatment of his subject.

Prof. Paine's charming symphonic poem, promoted in the expression of feelings by the "remebrance of summer days at the seaside, amid the varying moods of ocean life, the soothing calm and murmur of the sea, gentle breezes and rippling waves, alternating with surge and storm," displayed in its wealth of melodic beauty, its fascinating harmonies, its broad and flowing rhmyths, its delightful episode with opportunities for the English horn, clarinet, harp and French horn in solo passages, the masterly hand of the musician and romantic composer.

The Diorak symphony was a magnificent piece of orchestration. Its melodic forms, its classical purity, its romance and poetry combined, its superb coloring, marked as one of the most delightful musical compositions that has been heard in Portland for years. Its snatches of old negro tunes handled with consummate taste, its delicate shades of expression, its grand crescendos, completely charmed its hearers. The minor key always appeals to the emotions, and the audience sat so quiet and still during each movement that the proverbial pin could have been heard to drop. Both the Diorak symphony and the Paine fantasy received the heartiest applause for the superb rendering by the orchestra.

The other orchestral numbers, the prelude to "Tannhauser," act III, then the prelude to "Lohengrin," act III, and the Liszt-Doppler Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, were admirably given.

Mr. Ben Davies's fine voice and excellent method, drew a storm of applause by his remarkably fine rendering of the prize song from "The Meistersinger," and he sang "Salve Dinova" with much power and sweetness, although his use of the falsetto in the latter aria was not so agreeable. He was called and recalled, but declined an encore.

After the concert, Prof. Paine met a number of the members of the Rossini Club and some of his old musical friends at the residence of his niece, Mrs. John Bowers.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, assisted by Mr. Ben Davies, soloist, was enthusiastically received at City Hall last evening. This was Mr. Paur's first appearance in this city and his reception was flattering in the extreme. Mr. Davies was heard in the Eames concert last season and was recalled again and again last evening but adhered rigidly to the law of "no encore." The concert was a treat for lovers of classical music. The programme follows:

Symphonic Poem, "An Island Fantasy," op. 45. (by request)..J. K. Paine
This composition was suggested by the remembrance of summer days at the seaside, amid the varying moods of ocean life:—the soothing calm and murmur of the sea, gentle breezes and rippling waves, alternating with surge and storm.
Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"..Wagner
Symphony in E minor, op. 95, "From the New World"....
I. Adagio—Allegro molto.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace,—Trio.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.
Aria, "Salve Dimora" from "Faust"....Gounod
a. Prelude to Act III., "Tannhauser."....Wagner
b. Prelude to Act III., "Lohengrin" (by request).....Wagner
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2..Liszt-Doppler

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1895.

Here and There.

The Twenty-first Symphony Concert gave a beautiful "first time" in Mozart's Serenade, number eleven, E-flat, for two oboes, clarinets, horns, and bassoons. Haydn's Clock Symphony is ever delightsome; and so is the Der Freischutz overture. Paderewski admirers were more than glad to hear his commended pupil, Antoinette Szumowska, with her velvetty touch, in Chopin's Second Concerto, in F minor, op. 21. How young and pretty she is for so ripe a pianist.

Tennyson's Dream of Fair Women, read by Gertrude Capen, and illustrated by living and moving pictures, was recently given very successfully in the New South Vestry, under the direction of Miss Vancy Joy. There was good singing by Lucy Proctor, piano-playing by Miss Mahr, and Mandolin playing by Hattie B. Cardell; and Miss Joy having been in Japan, there would have been oriental music by a gentleman in his rich native costume, had not the time been lost by the luckless Japanese party in a cab, driving about Boston, in vain endeavors to find the New South Church. You see we have an Old South, a New South, a New Old South, and a South Congregational Church; and this quartet of eccelesiastical names is slightly confusing to the uninitiated.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 14, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The last of this season's series of eight concerts took place in Union hall on Monday evening. As usual, a large audience, representative of Boston at her musical best, was in attendance. The programme was:

Piano trio in E, op. 19.....Kahn
Fantasie for Piano and Violin, op. 159....
.....Schubert
Quartette, op. 131.....Beethoven

The new trio of Kahn's was a disappointment. Its author is very well spoken of by trustworthy critics, and we know him to have been busy with works of serious artistic purpose ever since we heard of his opus 1, some eight years ago. But his music seems to possess only the quality of extremely good manufacture. His melodies are pleasant, but his musical vocabulary is decidedly limited. The same devices of composition were to be detected in all three movements of the trio. In short, Kahn seems to be a plodder with a modicum of soulfulness,—nothing more.

The Schubert number was a delight from beginning to end; an uninterrupted flow of spontaneous inspiration. Mrs. Paur was the pianist in both this and the opening number. While the performance of the trio was not without a slip or two of the string players, the rendering of the duet was, like the music, ideal. Mrs. Paur again showed herself to be thoroughly in command of the technique of both classical and modern piano compositions.

The quartette's season was fittingly closed by a great performance of one of Beethoven's last compositions. It is said that the Kneisels are to give a series of concerts in London during the summer. We are sure that their finest laurels will be won in their Beethoven playing.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 16, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Rubinstein: Symphony No. 5, in G minor ("Russian"), opus 107.
Ferdinand Langer: Introduction to "Dornröschen." (First time.)
Max Bruch: Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in G minor, opus 26.
Johann Strauss: "Mota perpetuo," Musical Joke, opus 257. (First time.)
Auber: Overture to "L'Enfant prodigue."
Mr. I. Schnitzler was the violinist.

A programme which, as Angelo Cyrus Bantam, Esquire, puts it, is, "to say the least, remarkable!" Rubinstein's "Russian" symphony was not marked "first time" on the programme, but we do not remember hearing it before, and it seems impossible that anyone could hear the work and ever forget it. The score is dedicated to the memory of the Grand Duchess Hélène Pawlowna. Happy Grand Duchess! No Macbeth can say of her: "She should have died hereafter." One last misery was spared her; that of hearing this symphony. For one thing, the work is perfectly clear and afflicts the listener's mind with no doubts; even the orchestration, though often (probably intentionally) rough and unbeautiful, is clearness itself; Rubinstein has not here, as he sometimes does, stifled his orchestra with trombones; you hear everything! But, as a perfect Cobi-Shamo, Great Salt Desert, Sahara of dismal dreariness, this symphony beats all else we have ever heard. What in it is not trivial and commonplace is irredeemably ugly; the development of each one of the four movements is carried out on Rubinstein's self-deceiving principle that so many notes written represent so much work; it shows a tediously laborious shirking of work. The last movement, which is fully as long as the cyclone in the "Ocean" symphony, is especially exasperating in its apotheosis of boredom. May be, this symphony can awaken familiar and cherished associations in the Russian mind; if so, one trembles to think with what associations the Russian mind must be stocked! Why, oh why, should we have been called upon to bear this infliction? we who have already this season paid Rubinstein's memory the tribute of listening to the whole of his "Ocean?"

Ferdinand Langer few of us had ever heard of; only those of us who had taken the trouble to look him up in an encyclopædia knew anything about him. But the title of "Dornröschen" sounded familiar and cheering after the Rubinstein vale of tears: whose heart does not leap sympathetically when he recalls the delights of Ferrault's "La Belle au Bois dormant" and Grimm's "Dornröschen"? We looked to Langer and his introduction to cheer us up a bit. But the introduction was a bitter disappointment; mere threadbare phrases from Abt's and Kücken's waste-basket, cooked up in the modern chromatic style and scored for grand orchestra as if by one who had gone to market to buy a Wagnerian receipt, and got cheated. Seriously now, what have we here in Boston to do with Langer, or he with us? The man is a local celebrity—if celebrity at all—in Mannheim, where he conducts the orchestra; he has never done the first thing to win him the right to a hearing in this country. His "Dornröschen" introduction is but a waste of time.

At last, in Max Bruch's concerto, one had something worth listening to. Mr. Schnitzler played it very beautifully indeed. We should have preferred to hear the first movement go a little faster, with more passion and force; Mr. Schnitzler took it very broadly indeed, but, to our thinking, somewhat at the expense of energy of effect. But he played the slow movement exquisitely, and was brilliancy itself in the Finale. He was enthusiastically applauded and recalled. But, as we have made up our minds to write a croaking article, we must go on croaking. The concerto was not well placed on the programme. To be sure, one may well doubt whether anything could have been well placed on such a programme—anything but one thing alone, of which more later on. But both the Bruch concerto and the Rubinstein symphony are in G minor, and both have their slow movement in E-flat major; this of itself gave a tinge of sameness. Then another consideration forces itself upon us, one of which we have often thought before, but have as yet said little. Mr. Schnitzler had to play his part in the Rubinstein symphony and the Langer "Dornröschen" before appearing in an important and taxing solo, and must consequently have been far from fresh for his task. This sort of thing has occurred more than once before under Mr. Paur's régime; let us look at the record.

Last season Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder played Brahms's A minor concerto for violin and 'cello after Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony; Mr. Adamowski played the two movements from Tschaikowsky's D major concerto after Brahms's C minor symphony and Mozart's overture to the "Zauberflöte;" Mr. Kneisel played Beethoven's D major concerto after Dvorák's symphony "From the New World;" Mr. Schroeder played Loeffler's "Fantastic" concerto after Beethoven's eighth symphony; Mr. Loeffler played the Bruch romanza and Saint-Saëns's concert-piece after Brahms's D major symphony; Mr. Leo Schult played Bruch,s "Kol Nidrei" after Liszt's "Faust" symphony and Clayton Johns's berceuse and scherzo; Mr. Roth played the two movements from Molique's A minor concerto after Bülow's "Funerale" and Beethoven's "Eroica."

This season Mr. Loeffler played his own divertimento in A minor after Mozart's D major symphony; Mr. Schroeder played Dvorák's "Waldesruke" and the Klengel capriccio after Foote's "Francesca da Rimini" and Paine's "Island Fantasy;" Mr. Kneisel played Mendelssohn's E minor concerto after Brahms's F major symphony; Mr. Schnitzler played Bruch's G minor concerto after Rubinstein's "Russian" symphony and Langer's introduction to "Dornröschen."

In most, if not in all, of these cases the solo player had to play through all that preceded his piece on the programme before playing his own solo selection. The only case to the contrary we are sure of was, when Mr. Molé (last year) played Benoît's symphonic poem for flute and orchestra, it was preceded by Mozart's E-flat symphony, and, there being but one flute-part in the symphony, it was played by Mr. Heindl, and Mr. Molé could come on fresh for his solo.

Now, let us look through the record of the season of 1892-93, Mr. Nikisch's last year here. Mr. Adamowski played Ernst's F-sharp minor concerto after Saint-Saëns's A-minor symphony; Mr. Schroeder played the Davidoff concerto after Dvorák's "Husitska" overture; Mr. Schnitzler played Vieuxtemps's D minor concerto after Berlioz's overture to Benvenuto Cellini;" Mr. Loeffler played Saint-Saëns's A major concerto after Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture; Mr. Roth played Raff's "Fée d'Amour" after Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture; Mr. Kneisel played Brahms's D major concerto after Schumann's overture to "Manfred." Now, in not one of these cases did the solo player have to play also in the piece preceding his own; and, moreover, the first piece on the programme was, with one exception, short, so that the solo player did not have to wait long, chewing the cud of nervousness, in the ante-room.

The pieces Mr. Paur has put on the programme before the solos played by members of the orchestra have often been exceedingly long and taxing, and in almost every case, if not in every case, the solo player has had to play his part in them before appearing in his own piece. This may be the rule in Germany, though we find it hard to believe it; for do we not have it on the authority of Mr. Brodsky that, in German orchestras, the Conzertmeister, or leader, does not even play in the accompaniment to solos? But, whether it be the rule in Germany or not, it is a bad one and is, moreover, utterly at variance with our customs here. It places the solo player in an entirely false position; whether a member of the orchestra or not, he is a "soloist" (confound the word!) for that evening, and should be treated as one.

Strauss's musical joke was a ray of sunlight; to be sure, it had no business whatever on a symphony programme—by which we do not necessarily mean a programme of the Symphony Orchestra—but its brightness and go were unspeakably grateful. It is, perhaps, a good earnest of what most of the rest of the programme was, that this flimsy little café-concert tune should have been really welcome.

Auber's overture to "L'Enfant prodigue" is the worst thing by him we have yet heard.

The next programme is: Schumann, symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120; Vincenz Lachner, concert aria, "Vineta," opus 80; Esser, suite No. 2 (first time); Handel, air, "As when the dove," from "Acis and Galatea;" Cherubini, overture to "Les deux journées." Miss Carpline Gardner Clarke will be the singer.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, APRIL 15, 1895.

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme included the following numbers:

Symphony No. 5, "Russian"....Rubinstein
Introduction to the opera "Dornroschen".....Langer
Concerto for Violin, No. 1.....Bruch
Musical Joke, "Moto Perpetuo"..J. Strauss
Overture to "L'Enfant Prodigue"..Auber

The Langer, Strauss and Auber numbers were played for the first time at these concerts.

Mr. I. Schnitzler was the soloist.

The attendance at this concert was the lightest of any of this season's series.

The Rubinstein symphony, which at intervals introduces Russian folk-songs and dance tunes, like most of this famous composer's larger works, varies in interest, and yet, everything considered, there is nothing of Rubinstein's that does not repay the hearing. The vital element always exists, and there is also enough of healthy sentiment and sustained, original melody to keep the attention from flagging, although there are places occasionally where in the working out the duration of the effort might produce weariness, did not the composer command such inexhaustible resources of technical variety and melodic and harmonic beauty.

Mr. Paur read the work finely, and the orchestra responded to his conducting with a unity of effort that vouchsafed a superb performance. The horn solo in the andante, and the flute solo, also, were delightfully played by those excellent artists, Messrs. Hackenbarth and Mole.

The introduction to "Dornroschen," by Langer, is little else than an essay upon the modes of Wagner. It does not require a great deal of knowledge to invent such a piece. If one can produce a theme or two, has pondered over the scores of the mighty Richard, and has some technical faculty in writing for the orchestra, such pieces are easily accomplished. It was given a splendid performance by the orchestra.

The "Musical Joke," by Johann Strauss, was entirely out of place in a symphony programme. Mr. Paur should have chosen one of this composer's waltzes, compositions that of their kind are classics, and are worthy of association with the higher of any form of musical composition.

Mr. Schnitzler is an admirable player, and in the Adagio of the Bruch concerto achieved an artistic success. There was much to praise, also, in the rendering of the first movement, but in the playing of the last movement there was much left to be desired. His associates accompanied his efforts in a commendable manner. Mr. Schnitzler was enthusiastically applauded and recalled after the concerto was finished.

Mr. Paur did not choose well in selecting Auber's overture to "L'Enfant Prodigue," as it is little less than a potpourri. Mr. Paur is to be praised for his inclination to lighten his programmes with less serious material than one usually finds in the make-up of selections for a Symphony concert, but he should give his listeners the best of the works of composers in the lighter forms of orchestral writing.

Bos

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was a large and enthusiastic audience gathered at City Hall last evening to listen to the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Emil Paur, his first appearance in this city. The band was augumented to 70 musicians, we think the largest number that has ever appeared here in concert.

Mr. Paur has a tall, commanding figure and he conducts with much vigor. Every muscle in his body, like the lamented Jullien's, has a share in the task. He is evidently an excellent drill master, and he reads intelligently and to the approbation of his audience. We could only regret that the house was not crowded, as it would have been if the freshets had not disturbed the plans of many music lovers, because there was so many who desired to see Mr. Paur and hear the orchestra under its new master.

While the programme was not exactly what many would have chosen, it contained two numbers of more than usual attraction. The one was a symphony poem, "An Island Fantasy," by Prof. Paine of Harvard College, a Portland boy, and the other Divorak's symphony in B minor, "From the New World." It was to be regretted that the descriptive programmes, such as are used in Boston, were not used last evening here since they give an audience a clear idea of the composer's treatment of his subject.

Prof. Paine's charming symphonic poem, promoted in the expression of feelings by the "remebrance of summer days at the seaside, amid the varying moods of ocean life, the soothing calm and murmur of the sea, gentle breezes and rippling waves, alternating with surge and storm," displayed in its wealth of melodic beauty, its fascinating harmonies, its broad and flowing rhmyths, its delightful episode with opportunities for the English horn, clarinet, harp and French horn in solo passages, the masterly hand of the musician and romantic composer.

The Diorak symphony was a magnificent piece of orchestration. Its melodic forms, its classical purity, its romance and poetry combined, its superb coloring, marked as one of the most delightful musical compositions that has been heard in Portland for years. Its snatches of old negro tunes handled with consummate taste, its delicate shades of expression, its grand crescendos, completely charmed its hearers. The minor key always appeals to the emotions, and the audience sat so quiet and still during each movement that the proverbial pin could have been heard to drop. Both the Diorak symphony and the Paine fantasy received the heartiest applause for the superb rendering by the orchestra.

The other orchestral numbers, the prelude to "Taunhauser," act III, then the prelude to "Lohengrin," act III, and the Liszt-Doppler Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, were admirably given.

Mr. Ben Davies's fine voice and excellent method, drew a storm of applause by his remarkably fine rendering of the prize song from "The Meistersinger," and he sang "Salve Dinova" with much power and sweetness, although his use of the falsetto in the latter aria was not so agreeable. He was called and recalled, but declined an encore.

After the concert, Prof. Paine met a number of the members of the Rossini Club and some of his old musical friends at the residence of his niece, Mrs. John Bowers.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, assisted by Mr. Ben Davies, soloist, was enthusiastically received at City Hall last evening. This was Mr. Paur's first appearance in this city and his reception was flattering in the extreme. Mr. Davies was heard in the Eames concert last season and was recalled again and again last evening but adhered rigidly to the law of "no encore." The concert was a treat for lovers of classical music. The programme follows:

Symphonic Poem, "An Island Fantasy," op. 45. (by request)..J. K. Paine
This composition was suggested by the remembrance of summer days at the seaside, amid the varying moods of ocean life:—the soothing calm and murmur of the sea, gentle breezes and rippling waves, alternating with surge and storm.
Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"...Wagner
Symphony in E minor, op. 95, "From the New World".....
I. Adagio—Allegro molto.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace,—Trio.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.
Aria, "Salve Dimora" from "Faust"...Gounod
a. Prelude to Act III., "Tannhauser"...Wagner
b. Prelude to Act III., "Lohengrin" (by request).....Wagner
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2..Liszt-Doppler

The concert at City Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Mr. Ben Davies, the celebrated English tenor, was one of the finest of the many rare musical treats to which Mr. Stockbridge has treated his patrons. It is three years since the Symphony orchestra has been heard here. Mr. Emil Paur the new conductor, is of the Zerrahn type and under his animated baton the waves o sound rose and fell with the delicate shadings which characterizes the artistic execution of the difficult masterpieces by this justly celebrated company of musicians.

Mr. Davis sang here last season in the Eames concert with great acceptance. After the song from the Meistersinger he was recalled three times, but after the Aria, Salve Demora, a perfect storm of applause shook the house. The inexorble law of no encore was unbroken, notwithstanding the enthusiasm. Mr. Davies voice has a wonderful range, as was evidenced in the Aaia when he suddenly soared from the deep chest tones to a high and remarkably sweet tenor, gracefully descending again to the rich full tones in which he excels.

Portland music lovers trust that we are not to be limited to triennial concerts in future.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

Ben Davies sang at Portland last evening, as no one in Maine ever heard him before, so magnificently, with so opulent a voice. He sung the prize song from the Meistersinger and "Salve Dimora." The orchestra drowned him out in the first, in spite of Mr. Davies' wonderful compass and body of tone, and this was Mr. Paur's fault. In the "Faust" number nothing was at fault, except perhaps Mr. Davies high C which came out a falsetto of such size and strength as to startle us. However, nothing in our memory of the concert stage in this State equaled the general effect of Mr. Davies's singing, so pure and sweet a quality, so flexible and delicate an organ, so sure of itself. The audience recalled him no less than eight times perhaps ten times, but he would not sing again. In the storm of applause Mr. Paur stood smiling and as Mr. Davies forced his way through the crowd of musicians they whispered to him and smiled. Many of the orchestra joined the applause at Mr. Davies's singing. All in all, the English tenor is as satisfactory a tenor as you will find anywhere on the face of the earth today. He is just arrived from England and this is one of his first engagements. His voice seemed in perfect trim.

We noticed Prof. J. K. Paine in the audience, drawn undoubtedly by the performance of his "Island Fantasy."

The Boston Symphony, as led by Mr. Paur, is not at its happiest in the romantic school, falling, it seems, a trifle short of the memories of early days in its interpretation of the melodies of the idyllic and romantic. Dvorak's "From the New World" was more to the taste, and the new symphony was a novelty and a delight to all. The orchestra renewed the prelude to Act III of Tannhauser and the prelud to Act III of Lohengrin. The latter it took at a rapid tempo and with great dash and go. The closing number was an adaptation of Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody.

The audience was of moderate size, and about twenty-five from Lewiston and Auburn were present.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At City hall last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra gave one of the most artistic and pleasing concerts ever heard in Portland. It was, perhaps, the best this orchestre has ever produced here. Mr. Paur, the conductor, is very vigorous and imparts much of his life to the players. The Paine fantasy was of course well played, likewise the Dvorak symphony. The two Wagner selections and the Hungarian Rhapsody brought out the full power of the orchestra. Mr. Ben Davies, the eminent tenor, was at his best and in the "Salve Dinora" from Faust fairly set his audience wild. Again and again they called him out but he could not be induced to sing again. It has not been often within the past 25 years that a better singer has been heard in Portland. In short his singing left very little to be wished for. It was superb in every way.

Boston [illegible]

SUNDAY, APRIL 21, 1895.

Twenty-third Concert of the Symphony Orchestra, With Miss Caroline Clarke as Soloist—Miss Szumowska's Piano Recital.

This was the program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur, conductor:

Overture to "The Water Carrier".....Cherubini
Air, "As when the dove," from "Acis and Galatea".....Handel
Symphonic Poem No. 4, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule".....Saint-Saens
Concert Aria, "Vineta," op. 80.....V. Lachner
(First time.)
Symphony No. 4, in D minor.....Schumann

Cherubini's overture to "The Water Carrier" has long been counted among the great overtures of the world, and yet it is not as large and noble a work as his "Anacreon" overture. The latter, with all its contrapuntal ingenuity, has classic simplicity, a chaste beauty that is almost severe, and yet woos the admiration and challenges the variable tastes of the ages. The overture to "The Water Carrier" is more dry and formal; the wig is more in evidence; there is not as much serene coloring obtained by simple means; and yet it is a composition to be heard with respectful attention even if the rapture provoked is very moderate. It was finely played, and Mr. Paur worked up with thrilling effect the climax that ends the introduction.

"La Jeunesse d'Hercule" is the least spontaneous and the least interesting of Saint-Saëns's symphonic poems. In a way it seems sophomorical. It reminds one of the old reading book piece, "Tact and Talent," where antithesis becomes a bore. "Least interesting," however, is to be understood discreetly, for Saint-Saëns in his music for orchestra is almost always interesting. His methods of instrumentation alone repay careful study and give enjoyment even when the scheme of the composition may not be wholly a delight. It would be instructive in the class room to compare the music of "seductive nymphs and Bacchantes" who tempt Hercules with the strains that Wagner wrote for the scene in the Venusberg. Richly sensuous as are the many passages given by Saint-Saëns to Pleasure, the music of Virtue is wanting in solemnity or nobility, and "the glimpse of the reward of immortality" is not unlike the final transformation scene, so far as the music is concerned. Mr. Paur, last evening, took perhaps the wiser course and favored Virtue. The bacchantic music might have been a little more furious, more reckless. But as some insist on the educational value of these concerts to the young, Mr. Paur is, after all, to be commended in refraining from making Pleasure too alluring. The orchestra gave an admirable performance from the purely technical standpoint.

The symphonies of Schumann are not loved in France by the majority of musicians, who complain of the dryness of the instrumentation, and the attention paid at times by the composer to the mere working out of a contrapuntal problem without regard for tonal coloring or strong dramatic effect. The Symphony in D minor is the one that best answers these objections. Surely the romanza and the scherzo are creations of haunting and imperishable beauty. They were played delightfully last evening. But the performance of the first movement was not wholly satisfactory. The rhythm at times seemed lumbering, and there was the thought of the stern resolve to accomplish a task. There was a lack of elasticity. The color was monochromatic.

Miss Caroline G. Clarke sang Handel's air "As when the Dove" and a concert aria by Vincenz Lachner. In the performance of the first, the additional accompaniments by the late Otto Dresel were used. Many have tinkered the accompaniments of Handel, and Mr. Dresel no doubt went to work in all sincerity and reverence. The result of his labor was not fortunate. The accompaniment seemed muddy, prejudicial to the voice, and often un-Handelian. I admit the thinness of the original score. I admit the gravity of the problem. But it must never be forgotten that when such masters of counterpoint as Handel and Alessandro Scarlatti wrote arias, they wrote accompaniments of great simplicity. To them the singer was the all-important person. We have wandered far in these days from that sane practice. Now, the result of Mr. Dresel's thick, distracting and anachronistic accompaniment was that Miss Clarke, although she has a strong and full voice, was at times only one voice, not distinctly heard, among many voices.

Miss Clarke has improved in certain respects since she sang at the last Worcester Festival. She is not as much given to scooping or to unmeaning explosions. It is true that last evening her intonation was not always pure and her attack was not always irreproachable. But she had greater and more artistic control of her fine voice. This praise is to be applied especially to her singing of the air by Lachner. She did comparatively little with the air by Handel, and her enunciation was not clear. The "Vineta," on the other hand, was sung with breadth and with no small degree of passion, and the delivery of certain phrases was admirable and impressive. Miss Clarke has still something to do with her upper tones, for occasionally they are cloudy. It is to be regretted that the words of Lachner's aria were not printed in the program book; as it was, probably not six persons in the audience had any idea of what Miss Clarke was singing about. She was applauded generously.

PHILIP HALE.

[illegible] Herald.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 111.

SUNDAY, APRIL 21, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, the Soloist, Wins Enthusiastic Applause.

The selections for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall were:

Overture, "The Water Carrier".....Cherubini
Air, "As When the Dove".....Handel
"The Youth of Hercules".....Saint-Saens
Concert aria, "Vineta".....V. Lachner
(First time.)
Symphony No. 4, D-minor.....Schumann

The soloist was Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke. The programme was interesting and well balanced. The Cherubini overture ranks among the masterpieces in its class, and is always delightful in the hearing. On this occasion it had an exceptionally fine reading at the hands of Mr. Paur. The introduction, in particular, was given with noble emphasis and effect. The interpretation throughout was notably impressive; not a point was missed, and the finer movements in the orchestration came out with unwonted clearness. The performance generally was among the brilliant overture successes of the season, and the vigorous applause that rewarded it was as appreciative as it was fairly earned. The Saint-Saens Symphonic Poem is perhaps the least striking of the composer's works in kind, despite its charm of melody and of instrumentation, and its masterly originality in many of its harmonic devices. It has been frequently heard at these concerts, but it is doubtful if at any of its earlier renderings here it received as clear, as richly colored and as poetic an interpretation as that which Mr. Paur gave it last evening. The performance was faultless, the orchestra being heard at its very best. Through the whole of the concert the playing was wonderfully fine, and it is impossible to resist the temptation to repeat what has been so often said in this column that under none of its previous conductors has this splendid body of performers reached as high a point of efficiency in every way as it has attained under Mr. Paur. The symphony was brilliantly and impressively given from beginning to end, the lovely andante, which irresistibly recalls the pathetic old Irish melody, "The Pretty Girl Milking Her Cow," receiving especially sympathetic treatment. The first allegro and the finale were read and played with immense fire and effectiveness, and with stirringly emphatic rhythmic force.

Miss Clarke has a beautiful, natural voice, warm and resonant in quality, and sympathetic in its middle register. She sang the Handel air smoothly and tastefully, but with an absence of that sustained or legato style which is necessary to do full justice to Handelian cantabile. The effort, however, was conscientious, and if it was lacking somewhat in artistic warmth, was, in the main, pleasing. It met with much applause, and won two hearty recalls for the artist. The air was given with an orchestral accompaniment by the late Mr. Otto Dresel, but it was over noisy, and the generous use of the horns and other wind instruments was by no means in Handel's manner. The master was fully acquainted with the horn, and if he had thought it advisable to use it, he knew well how to do so to the best advantage. The suave and graceful character of this song was not favorably emphasized by the additional accompaniments that were furnished on this occasion. The Lachner air suited Miss Clarke much better than the other, and she sang it with marked spirit and effectiveness, and in certain moments with admirable breadth. It was wholly new to the concert stage here, and is excellent music, but unfortunately the words were not given in the programme book, and hence its meaning was not clear, especially as it was sung in German, and with no very distinct enunciation. However, Miss Clarke sang it with an impulsiveness that brought forth enthusiastic applause, and earned three recalls for her.

The programme for the next and last concert of the season is: "Passacaglia," Bach; "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; overture, "Melusine," Mendelssohn; "Menuet des Fen-Follets," and "Valse des Sylphes," from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; and overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner. There will be no soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1895.

The Symphony Orchestra played in Mr. Paur's last programme but one the following standard selections, and in this order: Cherubini's "Water Carrier" overture; Saint Saens's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," which is painted from about the same palette of tone-colors as "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and may be quoted with it; and Schumann's fourth, or D minor, symphony.

The performance of these works was excellently characteristic and nicely elaborated and governed. The gravity, purity and mellifluousness of the overture were preserved blandly and smoothly until the very close, which that unconscionable kettle-drummer vulgarized with heavy noise. The distinction between the languorous sensuousness, the broad gravity, the decision, the conflict and the fiery immolation implied in the "Hercules" was made clear and true, and there was great daintiness in the fascinating phrases of persuasion as well as romanticism and stir in the baccanalian episodes. The noble symphony had dignity for its deeper and grander movements, tenderness for its long, sweet romance, and the due lightness for the less positive passages.

Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke sang from Handel's "Acis and Galatea," presumably in English, as those words were printed, the air beginning "As When the Dove," and from Lachner a concert air entitled "Vineta," about which the programme book did not deign to say a word, apparently to a German text. This latter is espe ially favorable to an extended soprano voice and was particularly advantageous to the group of richly beautiful tones above the staff which Miss Clarke possesses. She sang with more smoothness and reserve than usually and was calm and even almost to impassiveness in the Handel air. In the other song she was explosive on single tones here and there, while her phrase-delivery was far too often infected with that German—or perhaps we should say more narrowly, Wagnerian—disproportion which was so obtrusive and objectionable in Brema's vocalization. The voice itself was clear, sweet and voluminous, and one could only wish that Miss Clarke's style might be chastened and beautified by some strict and serious adviser.

The last programme is thus announced: Bach, Passacaglia; Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 (Eroica); Mendelssohn, Overture, "Melusine"; Berlioz, a. "Menuet des Fen-Follets," b. "Valse des Sylphes," From the "Damnation of Faust"; Wagner, Overture, "Tannhaeuser."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 21, 1895.

Twenty-third Concert by Symphony Orchestra.

The usual large audience was present at last evening's symphony concert, the 23d and last but one of the season. The following varied program was played by the orchestra: Overture to "The Water-Carrier," by Luigi Cherubini; symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," by Camille Saint-Saens, and the fourth Schumann symphony. Miss Caroline Gardiner Clarke was the soloist and she sang the air "As When the Dove," from "Acis and Galatea," by George Frideric Handel and the aria, "Vineta," by Vincens Lachner.

The Cherubini overture is a graceful and melodious writing, and considering the date of its composition, is notable for the variety and elaborateness of its orchestration. It was splendidly played last evening.

The symphonic poem by Saint-Saens is distinctly descriptive music and many of the passages are strikingly effective in suggesting the text of the composition, which deals with the temptation offered Hercules at the time when he was beset by nymphs and bacchantes who sought to lead him from the paths of virtue to the highways of pleasure and sin.

The first movement is remarkable for rich tone color, developed for the most part in soft harmonies. A melodious theme is sustained throughout this first part, and then comes a new theme which is developed with great elaboration, first by the wood-wind and later by the full orchestra. Especially delightful last evening was the work of the reed players. The latter portions of the work are exceedingly tempestuous in character and tax the resources of the full modern orchestra. Its performance was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience.

The Schumann symphony was splendidly interpreted under Mr Paur's intelligent direction. It was a forceful, expressive and faithful performance. Rarely has a work by this composer been more satisfactorily played by the symphony orchestra.

Miss Clarke, the soloist, was kindly received and generously applauded. She has a voice of good range and power and rather flexible and pleasing in quality. She sings with considerable expression, and generally uses her voice in a skilful manner. The aria by Lachner was heard here for the first time. It is an agreeable but not especially important writing.

The program for the next and last of the season's symphony concerts will be as follows:

Passacaglia.....Bach
Symphony No. 3 (Eroica).....Beethoven
Overture, Melusine.....Mendelssohn
(a) Menuet des Feu-Follets.....Berlioz
(b) Valse des Sylphes.....Berlioz
From the Damnation of Faust.
Overture, Tannhaeuser.....Wagner

[120]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert at City Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Mr. Ben Davies, the celebrated English tenor, was one of the finest of the many rare musical treats to which Mr. Stockbridge has treated his patrons. It is three years since the Symphony orchestra has been heard here. Mr. Emil Paur the new conductor, is of the Zerrahn type and under his animated baton the waves o sound rose and fell with the delicate shadings which characterizes the artistic execution of the difficult masterpieces by this justly celebrated company of musicians.

Mr. Davie sang here last season in the Eames concert with great acceptance. After the song from the Meistersinger he was recalled three times, but after the Aria, Salve Demora, a perfect storm of applause shook the house. The inexorble law of no encore was unbroken, notwithstanding the enthusiasm. Mr. Davies voice has a wonderful range, as was evidenced in the Aaia when he suddenly soared from the deep chest tones to a high and remarkably sweet tenor, gracefully descending again to the rich full tones in which he excels.

Portland music lovers trust that we are not to be limited to triennial concerts in future.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

Ben Davies sang at Portland last evening, as no one in Maine ever heard him before, so magnificently, with so opulent a voice. He sung the prize song from the Meistersinger and "Salve Dimora." The orchestra drowned him out in the first, in spite of Mr. Davies' wonderful compass and body of tone, and this was Mr. Paur's fault. In the "Faust" number nothing was at fault, except perhaps Mr. Davies' high C which came out a falsetto of such size and strength as to startle us. However, nothing in our memory of the concert stage in this State equaled the general effect of Mr. Davies's singing, so pure and sweet a quality, so flexible and delicate an organ, so sure of itself. The audience recalled him no less than eight times perhaps ten times, but he would not sing again. In the storm of applause Mr. Paur stood smiling and as Mr. Davies forced his way through the crowd of musicians they whispered to him and smiled. Many of the orchestra joined the applause at Mr. Davies's singing. All in all, the English tenor is as satisfactory a tenor as you will find anywhere on the face of the earth today. He is just arrived from England and this is one of his first engagements. His voice seemed in perfect trim.

We noticed Prof. J. K. Paine in the audience, drawn undoubtedly by the performance of his "Island Fantasy."

The Boston Symphony, as led by Mr. Paur, is not at its happiest in the romantic school, falling, it seems, a trifle short of the memories of early days in its interpretation of the melodies of the idyllic and romantic. Dvorak's "From the New World" was more to the taste, and the new symphony was a novelty and a delight to all. The orchestra renewed the prelude to Act III of Tannhauser and the prelud to Act III of Lohengrin. The latter it took at a rapid tempo and with great dash and go. The closing number was an adaptation of Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody.

The audience was of moderate size, and about twenty-five from Lewiston and Auburn were present.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At City hall last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra gave one of the most artistic and pleasing concerts ever heard in Portland. It was, perhaps, the best this orchestre has ever produced here. Mr. Paur, the conductor, is very vigorous and imparts much of his life to the players. The Paine fantasy was of course well played, likewise the Dvorak symphony. The two Wagner selections and the Hungarian Rhapsody brought out the full power of the orchestra. Mr. Ben Davies, the eminent tenor, was at his best and in the "Salve Dinora" from Faust fairly set his audience wild. Again and again they called him out but he could not be induced to sing again. It has not been often within the past 25 years that a better singer has been heard in Portland. In short his singing left very little to be wished for. It was superb in every way.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 21, 1895.

Twenty-third Concert of the Symphony Orchestra, With Miss Caroline Clarke as Soloist—Miss Szumowska's Piano Recital.

This was the program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur, conductor:

Overture to "The Water Carrier".....Cherubini
Air, "As when the dove," from "Acis and Galatea" .....Handel
Symphonic Poem No. 4, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule" .....Saint-Saens
Concert Aria, "Vineta," op. 80.....V. Lachner (First time.)
Symphony No. 4, in D minor.....Schumann

Cherubini's overture to "The Water Carrier" has long been counted among the great overtures of the world, and yet it is not as large and noble a work as his "Anacreon" overture. The latter, with all its contrapuntal ingenuity, has classic simplicity, a chaste beauty that is almost severe, and yet woos the admiration and challenges the variable tastes of the ages. The overture to "The Water Carrier" is more dry and formal; the wig is more in evidence; there is not as much serene coloring obtained by simple means; and yet it is a composition to be heard with respectful attention even if the rapture provoked is very moderate. It was finely played, and Mr. Paur worked up with thrilling effect the climax that ends the introduction.

"La Jeunesse d'Hercule" is the least spontaneous and the least interesting of Saint-Saëns's symphonic poems. In a way it seems sophomorical. It reminds one of the old reading book piece, "Tact and Talent," where antithesis becomes a bore. "Least interesting," however, is to be understood discreetly, for Saint-Saëns in his music for orchestra is almost always interesting. His methods of instrumentation alone repay careful study and give enjoyment even when the scheme of the composition may not be wholly a delight. It would be instructive in the class room to compare the music of "seductive nymphs and Bacchantes" who tempt Hercules with the strains that Wagner wrote for the scene in the Venusberg. Richly sensuous as are the many passages given by Saint-Saëns to Pleasure, the music of Virtue is wanting in solemnity or nobility, and "the glimpse of the reward of immortality" is not unlike the final transformation scene, so far as the music is concerned. Mr. Paur, last evening, took perhaps the wiser course and favored Virtue. The bacchantic music might have been a little more furious, more reckless. But as some insist on the educational value of these concerts to the young, Mr. Paur is, after all, to be commended in refraining from making Pleasure too alluring. The orchestra gave an admirable performance from the purely technical standpoint.

The symphonies of Schumann are not loved in France by the majority of musicians, who complain of the dryness of the instrumentation, and the attention paid at times by the composer to the mere working out of a contrapuntal problem without regard for tonal coloring or strong dramatic effect. The Symphony in D minor is the one that best answers these objections. Surely the romanza and the scherzo are creations of haunting and imperishable beauty. They were played delightfully last evening. But the performance of the first movement was not wholly satisfactory. The rhythm at times seemed lumbering, and there was the thought of the stern resolve to accomplish a task. There was a lack of elasticity. The color was monochromatic.

Miss Caroline G. Clarke sang Handel's air "As when the Dove" and a concert aria by Vincenz Lachner. In the performance of the first, the additional accompaniments by the late Otto Dresel were used. Many have tinkered the accompaniments of Handel, and Mr. Dresel no doubt went to work in all sincerity and reverence. The result of his labor was not fortunate. The accompaniment seemed muddy, prejudicial to the voice, and often un-Handelian. I admit the thinness of the original score. I admit the gravity of the problem. But it must never be forgotten that when such masters of counterpoint as Handel and Alessandro Scarlatti wrote arias, they wrote accompaniments of great simplicity. To them the singer was the all-important person. We have wandered far in these days from that sane practice. Now, the result of Mr. Dresel's thick, distracting and anachronistic accompaniment was that Miss Clarke, although she has a strong and full voice, was at times only one voice, not distinctly heard, among many voices.

Miss Clarke has improved in certain respects since she sang at the last Worcester Festival. She is not as much given to scooping or to unmeaning explosions. It is true that last evening her intonation was not always pure and her attack was not always irreproachable. But she had greater and more artistic control of her fine voice. This praise is to be applied especially to her singing of the air by Lachner. She did comparatively little with the air by Handel, and her enunciation was not clear. The "Vineta," on the other hand, was sung with breadth and with no small degree of passion, and the delivery of certain phrases was admirable and impressive. Miss Clarke has still something to do with her upper tones, for occasionally they are cloudy. It is to be regretted that the words of Lachner's aria were not printed in the program book; as it was, probably not six persons in the audience had any idea of what Miss Clarke was singing about. She was applauded generously.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 111.

SUNDAY, APRIL 21, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, the Soloist, Wins Enthusiastic Applause.

The selections for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall were:

Overture, "The Water Carrier".....Cherubini
Air, "As When the Dove".....Handel
"The Youth of Hercules".....Saint-Saens
Concert aria, "Vineta".....V. Lachner (First time.)
Symphony No. 4, D-minor.....Schumann

The soloist was Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke. The programme was interesting and well balanced. The Cherubini overture ranks among the masterpieces in its class, and is always delightful in the hearing. On this occasion it had an exceptionally fine reading at the hands of Mr. Paur. The introduction, in particular, was given with noble emphasis and effect. The interpretation throughout was notably impressive; not a point was missed, and the finer movements in the orchestration came out with unwonted clearness. The performance generally was among the brilliant overture successes of the season, and the vigorous applause that rewarded it was as appreciative as it was fairly earned. The Saint-Saens Symphonic Poem is perhaps the least striking of the composer's works in kind, despite its charm of melody and of instrumentation, and its masterly originality in many of its harmonic devices. It has been frequently heard at these concerts, but it is doubtful if at any of its earlier renderings here it received as clear, as richly colored and as poetic an interpretation as that which Mr. Paur gave it last evening. The performance was faultless, the orchestra being heard at its very best. Through the whole of the concert the playing was wonderfully fine, and it is impossible to resist the temptation to repeat what has been so often said in this column that under none of its previous conductors has this splendid body of performers reached as high a point of efficiency in every way as it has attained under Mr. Paur. The symphony was brilliantly and impressively given from beginning to end, the lovely andante, which irresistibly recalls the pathetic old Irish melody, "The Pretty Girl Milking Her Cow," receiving especially sympathetic treatment. The first allegro and the finale were read and played with immense fire and effectiveness, and with stirringly emphatic rhythmic force.

Miss Clarke has a beautiful, natural voice, warm and resonant in quality, and sympathetic in its middle register. She sang the Handel air smoothly and tastefully, but with an absence of that sustained or legato style which is necessary to do full justice to Handelian cantabile. The effort, however, was conscientious, and if it was lacking somewhat in artistic warmth, was, in the main, pleasing. It met with much applause, and won two hearty recalls for the artist. The air was given with an orchestral accompaniment by the late Mr. Otto Dresel, but it was over noisy, and the generous use of the horns and other wind instruments was by no means in Handel's manner. The master was fully acquainted with the horn, and if he had thought it advisable to use it, he knew well how to do so to the best advantage. The suave and graceful character of this song was not favorably emphasized by the additional accompaniments that were furnished on this occasion. The Lachner air suited Miss Clarke much better than the other, and she sang it with marked spirit and effectiveness, and in certain moments with admirable breadth. It was wholly new to the concert stage here, and is excellent music, but unfortunately the words were not given in the programme book, and hence its meaning was not clear, especially as it was sung in German, and with no very distinct enunciation. However, Miss Clarke sang it with an impulsiveness that brought forth enthusiastic applause, and earned three recalls for her.

The programme for the next and last concert of the season is: "Passacaglia," Bach; "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; overture, "Melusine," Mendelssohn; "Menuet des Fen-Follets," and "Valse des Sylphes," from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; and overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner. There will be no soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1895.

The Symphony Orchestra played in Mr. Paur's last programme but one the following standard selections, and in this order: Cherubini's "Water Carrier" overture; Saint Saens's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," which is painted from about the same palette of tone-colors as "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and may be quoted with it; and Schumann's fourth, or D minor, symphony.

The performance of these works was excellently characteristic and nicely elaborated and governed. The gravity, purity and mellifluousness of the overture were preserved blandly and smoothly until the very close, which that unconscionable kettle-drummer vulgarized with heavy noise. The distinction between the languorous sensuousness, the broad gravity, the decision, the conflict and the fiery immolation implied in the "Hercules" was made clear and true, and there was great daintiness in the fascinating phrases of persuasion as well as romanticism and stir in the baccanalian episodes. The noble symphony had dignity for its deeper and grander movements, tenderness for its long, sweet romance, and the due lightness for the less positive passages.

Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke sang from Handel's "Acis and Galatea," presumably in English, as those words were printed, the air beginning "As When the Dove," and from Lachner a concert air entitled "Vineta," about which the programme book did not deign to say a word, apparently to a German text. This latter is espe ially favorable to an extended soprano voice and was particularly advantageous to the group of richly beautiful tones above the staff which Miss Clarke possesses. She sang with more smoothness and reserve than usually and was calm and even almost to impassiveness in the Handel air. In the other song she was explosive on single tones here and there, while her phrase-delivery was far too often infected with that German—or perhaps we should say more narrowly, Wagnerian—disproportion which was so obtrusive and objectionable in Brema's vocalization. The voice itself was clear, sweet and voluminous, and one could only wish that Miss Clarke's style might be chastened and beautified by some strict and serious adviser.

The last programme is thus announced:
Bach, Passacaglia; Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 (Eroica); Mendelssohn, Overture, "Melusine"; Berlioz, a. "Menuet des Feu-Follets," b. "Valse des Sylphes," From the "Damnation of Faust"; Wagner, Overture, "Tannhaeuser."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 21, 1895.

Twenty-third Concert by Symphony Orchestra.

The usual large audience was present at last evening's symphony concert, the 23d and last but one of the season. The following varied program was played by the orchestra: Overture to "The Water-Carrier," by Luigi Cherubini; symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," by Camille Saint-Saens, and the fourth Schumann symphony. Miss Caroline Gardiner Clarke was the soloist and she sang the air "As When the Dove," from "Acis and Galatea," by George Frideric Handel and the aria, "Vineta," by Vincenz Lachner.

The Cherubini overture is a graceful and melodious writing, and considering the date of its composition, is notable for the variety and elaborateness of its orchestration. It was splendidly played last evening.

The symphonic poem by Saint-Saens is distinctly descriptive music and many of the passages are strikingly effective in suggesting the text of the composition, which deals with the temptation offered Hercules at the time when he was beset by nymphs and bacchantes who sought to lead him from the paths of virtue to the highways of pleasure and sin.

The first movement is remarkable for rich tone color, developed for the most part in soft harmonies. A melodious theme is sustained throughout this first part, and then comes a new theme which is developed with great elaboration, first by the wood-wind and later by the full orchestra. Especially delightful last evening was the work of the reed players. The latter portions of the work are exceedingly tempestuous in character and tax the resources of the full modern orchestra. Its performance was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience.

The Schumann symphony was splendidly interpreted under Mr Paur's intelligent direction. It was a forceful, expressive and faithful performance. Rarely has a work by this composer been more satisfactorilly played by the symphony orchestra.

Miss Clarke, the soloist, was kindly received and generously applauded. She has a voice of good range and power and rather flexible and pleasing in quality. She sings with considerable expression, and generally uses her voice in a skilful manner. The aria by Lachner was heard here for the first time. It is an agreeable but not especially important writing.

The program for the next and last of the season's symphony concerts will be as follows:

Passacaglia .....Bach
Symphony No. 3 (Eroica) .....Beethoven
Overture, Melusine .....Mendelssohn
(a) Menuet des Feu-Follets .....Berlioz
(b) Valse des Sylphes .....Berlioz
From the Damnation of Faust.
Overture, Tannhaeuser .....Wagner

[120]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 21.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall, last night, with the following programme;

Overture, "Water Carrier,".....Cherubini
Air, "As When the Dove,".....Handel
"The youth of Hercules,".....Saint-Saëns
Concert Aria, "Vineta,".....Lachner
Symphony No. 4, D minor.....Schumann
Soloist, Miss Caroline G. Clarke.

The brilliant Cherubini overture was brilliantly played and caused one to wonder why the fine opera, to which it is an introduction, is not played in our novelty seeking days; an opera that for interesting plot and music of a high quality might be imitated, but not equalled. Cherubini, like his operas, is too much neglected, but it may happen some day that when our eyes are accustomed to the blaze of Beethoven we many see some of the secondary stars that are now blazing unnoticed all around him.

Mr. Paur gave a fine reading of the Saint-Saens symphonic poem, but the brilliant work would be better enjoyed if we were allowed to forget the legend and so be saved the exasperation of watching the good Hercules struggling between the whispers of the virtuous clarinet and oboe, and the evil suggestions of the bad flute, drum and cymbals. Forcing the legend on the attention causes one to helplessly think of Shenstone's dreary poem and of the school days in which it was forced on one as a model of art and of conduct, and under the stress one's taste for music temporarily vanishes.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, who has a voice of fine quality, especially in its upper half, and whose singing is founded on a most excellent method, built on sound artistic principles. The Handel air was sung with taste and with a most praiseworthy absence of display for mere display's sake. Poor Handel has for so long been used as a test for screaming, roulading and trilling, that one joyously hails the artist who treats him with respect. Miss Clarke was equally excellent in Lachner's concert aria, which was interpreted with dignity, largeness and perfect taste, with fine expression and feeling, and with dramatic power. Miss Clarke's worth as an artist was speedily recognized by an enthusiastic audience, and after each song she was recalled again and again to bow her thanks.

The programme for the next concert is a Passacaglia, by Bach; Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Mendelssohn's overture, "Melusine;" Berlioz's "Minuet des Feu-Follets," and "Valse des Sylphes," from his "Damnation of Faust," and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1895.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert of last night opened with the overture to Cherubini's "The Water Carrier," which has not been heard here many times. It is characteristically Itanian and consists in large part of recitation-like passages with two principal themes intricately developed at different points. The overture is strongly dramatic and brilliant and was read with exquisite taste.

The gem of the evening, instrumentally, was Saint-Saen's symphonic poem, "La Jeunnesse d'Hercule," which was played with earnestness, spirit and the greatest care. The number is highly descriptive, and knowing the story on which the poem is based one does not need a key to follow the varying emotions, so happily and clearly are they expressed by the orchestration, which is rich and ful lat every point. The gradual development into the tempestuous and stormy climax was simply grand, and the whole, as already stated, was played in .. masterly and skilful manner.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 4 in D minor, played with one walt in the four movements. Though rich and effective, it is perhaps one of the least interesting written by this composer.

The soloist on this occasion was Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke of this city. She was heard first in the Handel aria, "As when the dove," from "Acis and Galatea," and she may be said to have been successful in this and in her second number, the concert aria, "Vineta," by Vincenz Lachuer, if cordial approval by the audience and recalls were an indication. She possesses a voice of great strength in the upper notes, albeit they are smitted with much explosiveness, which is made more prominent from the fact that her middle register is weak. The Lachner aria is a very difficult selection to render and requires an artist of more experience than Miss Clarke, who is a young singer, has yet gained. However, her singing showed her to possess much in the way of artistic ability, which promises well for the future.

The next concert, which is the last of the season, will include compositions by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Berlioz and Wagner, whose overture to "Tannhaeuser" will be played as the final number.

MONDAY, APRIL 22, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twenty-third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Cherubini: Overture to "Les Deux Journées."
Handel: Air, "As when the dove," from "Acis and Galatea."
(Additional accompaniments by Otto Dresel.)
Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem No. 4, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," opus 50.
Vincenz Lachner: Concert Aria, "Vineta," opus 80.
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120.
Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke was the singer.

Cherubini's overture to "Les Deux Journées" came fresh, bright and beautiful after its few years' rest. The work is a masterpiece in its way, full of the most genial melodic invention and of that other inventiveness which is too often set down as mere skill. The second theme and its treatment will ever remain as a gem of beauty and perfection of style. The somewhat long, but very dramatic, introduction was admirably played; but, with the setting-in of the Allegro, we were astonished to find Mr. Paur suddenly begin beating a rapid Alla breve, instead of the four regular beats to a measure which are as fixed a tradition in this overture as anything in all music. The result was that the main body of the overture was taken at a tempo for which we doubt if there be any precedent. To us it well-nigh spoiled it. And where does Mr. Paur find authority for adding two trumpets to the score in the Coda? We had always considered the pecular sombreness of color, which comes from the union of three horns and one trombone as the only brass, one of the characteristic traits of the work.

Saint-Saëns's "Jeunesse d'Hercule" has always been rather a puzzling composition to us. When a piece sets out to illustrate a definite "programme," one can not well ignore it; and the way the music here illustrates the conflicting ideas of heroic duty and voluptuous pleasure seems hard to understand. It reminds us a little of something the elder Salvini once said about his acting in this country with English-speaking companies. He, who does not understand a word of English, said that everything would have been perfectly easy for him, but for one curious circumstance: he did not have to understand what the other people on the stage said in English, because he knew it already, knowing, as he did, the whole play in the original Italian; but the great trouble was that the difference between the English and the Italian emphasis and inflection of voice was so enormous, that the other people always seemed to him to be saying just the opposite of what he knew they really were saying. Just so, to our perception, in this symphonic poem of Saint-Saëns's: the "Duty-and-Virtue" themes seem to us to be of the most seductive sensuousness imaginable; whereas the "Bacchanalian Pleasure" theme has about as much seductiveness as a Jacobin mob. The whole musical treatment of the "programme" seems at cross purposes. Taken as pure music, there are many brilliant and beautiful moments in the work, although it does not seem to us to stand on quite as high a level as the composer's earlier symphonic poems, which are full of exquisite trouvailles.

Schumann's D-minor symphony was, it seemed to us, decidedly better and more sympathetically given than it was last season. There was less of disturbing meddling with the tempo, and the playing was full of fire and vim. At times it seemed as if it were impossible to persuade the violins and first wood-wind to play bits of cantilena in a true piano; to be sure, the second themes in the first and last movements are of a sort sorely to tempt the players to use a good deal of tone, but when passages are marked "piano dolce," one likes to hear them played so. Looking over Hanslick's criticism of the first performance of this symphony in Vienna in 1857, one is tempted to think that we nowadays incline to look at the work from a somewhat different point of view from that of musicians then, and that it means something different to us from it meant to them. Hanslick writes, "Full of genius and sparkle in the quick movements, delicately graceful in the moderate ones, this blooming web of tones stays in that happy earthly region where the lightly moved joy of life neither knocks too high at the gate of heaven nor forces its way too deep into dark abysses. In this gracious temperate zone does this fourth symphony show itself," etc. Now to our modern perception the work seems to be quite as full of intense passionate heat as of the "lightly moved joy of life," and allusions to "temperate zones" are somewhat hard for us to understand in connection with it. Perhaps the lack of delicacy in playing certain cantabile passages in the work, which we have felt in almost all performances of it for the last several years (especially under Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur) may come from players nowadays trying to put more of intense passion into the music than there is really there, and somewhat obliterating its "lightly moved" side.

Neither Miss Clarke's friends nor herself could have wished for a more brilliant success than she had last Saturday evening. Her singing of the air from Handel's "Acis and Galatea" was simply admirable. She was for years a member of Mr. Dresel's Monday evening Bach Club, and has plainly profited by what she learned there. Contrary to the confused and ever-degenerating English Handel traditions (the result of Handel's arias passing through the hands of generation upon generation of singers, each one more eager than the other for his or her own personal glory), Miss Clarke shows that she has well appreciated the truth of Robert Franz's criticism on the prevalent style of singing Bach and Handel: "As vocal music since Mozart has its centre of gravity in the cantilena, people think they may apply this to compositions of earlier periods also, which are almost without exception written polyphonically—whereby the remaining web of voices comes off badly enough." Miss Clarke sang the air in strict time, without any would-be-expressive rubato, and in a way to allow the voice part to maintain its supremacy as prima inter pares, but not so as to interfere with the autonomy of the very elaborate and intricate accompaniment. In the matter of expression, too, she showed a fine appreciation of the wholly general way in which Handel lets his music reflect the character of the text, and did not allow herself to be betrayed into trying to make special dramatic or expressive points, such as would be quite in place in a great deal of more modern music, but entirely out of place in Handel. She sang thoroughly musically, in which the beauty of her voice was of no little aid to her. It was remarkably good, too, to hear the ...

...followed Franz in plan with considerable mastery and, as it seemed to us, with somewhat a more delicate sense of specific orchestral color than he. Quite apart from the primary and more important element in his task, filling out the bare places in Handel's score in an appropriate polyphonic style, he has treated the secondary and less important element, that of orchestration per se, in a way that is no less than perfect. Orchestration at once so rich and so sober, so beautifully transparent and unclo...ing, is almost a lost art nowadays.

Vincenz Lachner is a composer of whom most of us have heard, but of whom few of us have ever heard the first note. His reputation has always been more or less overshadowed by that of his e'der and better known brother Franz—and Franz Lachner's glory is pretty nearly on its last legs by this time! The air "Vineta" was the one successful number in a deadly unsuccessful opera; the composer saved it from the general wreck of his work, and published it as a concert aria. Of its effectiveness there can be no doubt. Scrutinize it closely, and you find it to be little less than the broken meat from innumerable musical waste-baskets: there is not an original idea, not even an original trait, in it; but both in the matters of development and orchestration it is written with a certain dash and savoir faire that make it very telling—for once. Miss Clarke sang it admirably, with fine fire and dramatic force.

The next programme is—Bach, organ passacaglia, scored for orchestra by Esser; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55; Mendelssohn, overture to "Die schöne Melusine," opus 32; Berlioz, Menuet des Feufollets, and Valse des Sylphes, from "La Damnation de Faust," opus 24; Wagner, overture to "Tannhäuser."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 22, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

Cherubini's "Deux Journees" Leads the Programme.

St. Saens' Symphonic Poem and a Schumann Symphony the Other Pieces.

If Mozart is regarded as a German who wrote Italian music, then it may be claimed, with equal show of justice, that Cherubini was an Italian, who wrote German music. Cherubini's works show a thorough appreciation of the classical spirit, combined with a warmth of tone-color that is remarkable in one who wrote so soon after Handel. The overture to "Les Deux Journees," which came first on Saturday's programme, was a good illustration of his power, and the first theme of the allegro was vivid enough to have been the work of any mriter of the modern schol. The overture as a whole was played in a very spirited maner, and the orchestra was held up to a pace that seemed presto rather than allegro, with scarcely any sacrifice of clearness.

Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke was the soloist of the evening. In her first number, Handel's aria, "As When the Dove," she sang with commendable sweetness and fullness of tone. But it was her other selection, Vincenz Lachner's concert aria, "Vineta," that she won the most recognition. This is a work of earnestness and power, and demands some dramatic fervor in its presentation. Miss Clarke was fully adequate in this respect, and made the aria very interesting, in spite of the fact that the audience were not permited to know the text. In both selections the richness of her tones showed out well, giving the lower register of her voice a somewhat contralto character. This richness was not always present in her upper notes, some of which seemed comparatively thin, but on the whole her voice was full and resonant, and she sang with thorough musicianship and won several recalls.

Saint-Saens' symphonic poem was a worthy exponent of the modern school of instrumental writing. Fervid tone-color and rich harmony are characteristic of this school, and were to be expected in the work; but this particular piece showed, besides these traits, an avoidance of direct programme music, and an unusual clearness and balance in the treatment and development of the themes. The middle part, the wild allegro, full of fury and suggestive of combat, is striking enough, but is rather too full of modern instrumental spice to be the equal of the other parts in musical worth. The work was given with appropriate dash and animation.

The orchestra showed at its best, however, in the Schumann symphony. Mr. Paur's readings of Schumann are always eminently beautiful, and this one was no exception to the rule. Every one of the four moyements was well played, the allegro and the finale being given with especial liveliness. This symphony is perhaps the least powerful of the four that Schumann wrote, and lacks the grandeur and massive strength of the B-flat or C-major symphony, but it displays consummate grace and brightness, and it formed a fitting climax for the concert.

The programme, while of shorter duration that usual, was very well arranged, and presented some excellent contrasts. The symphony suffered nothing by comparison with the more free symphonic poem, and the concert may well be taken as proof that the older form is still the standard of expression.

Arthur Elson.

The Boston Courier

MONDAY, APRIL 22, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

CHERUBINI'S OVERTURE TO "LES DEUX JOURNEES" A FEATURE.

A Symphonic Poem by St. Saens and a Schumann Symphony—The Other Numbers—The Second Szumowska Recital.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following was the programme:

Overture to "The Water Carriers"...Cherubini
Air, "As When the Dove," "Acis and Galatea" .....Handel
Symphonic Poem No. 4, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule".....Saint Saens
Concert Aria, "Vineta".....V. Lachner
Symphony No. 4.....Schumann
Miss Caroline Gardner Clark was the soloist.

Cherubini's overture, which is familiar to our concert-goers, was read by Mr. Paur, and played by the orchestra with splendid success.

The Saint-Saens number, which is, perhaps, the least interesting of the set of Poems composed by this master, was, nevertheless, interesting enough to command the listeners' attention throughout its rendering. Saint-Saens is never dull; he always has something to say, and says it with eloquence. What a wonderful imagination has this famous composer; what a fund of spontaneous melody and rich and varied harmony; and then what infinite variety does his instrumentation present and how warm is the color that glows constantly from the marvelous and masterly combinations that flow from the fount of his inexhaustible resources in painting the emotions kindled by his subject matter. The performance of this work by the orchestra was little less than perfect under Mr. Paur's intelligent direction.

In the rendering of the Schumann Symphony, however, there was opportunity for criticism, for it was played in a too heavy and robust manner, that is the first and last movements, but there was much to commend in the manner in which the beauties of the middle movements were displayed. Mr. Paur always lays a heavy hand on Schumann, as if he would have the virility of this composer made more evident than the delightful romance which permeates all his works and touches them with a beauty that if but partially revealed must make them immortal. The orchestra played the symphony in a manner that was faultless, technically speaking.

Miss Caroline Gardner Clark is a new-comer on our concert stage. She has a good soprano voice and a deal of enthusiasm that causes her too often to overshoot the mark of artist command. This forced effort renders her voice dry in its quality and uncertain in its intonation; in fact, her process of voice production is erroneous in that it is not based upon a continuous flow rather than on a constant pushing and forcing of the column of air. The effort seems to be one of a constant desire to sing loud—consequently the middle tones are much emaciated and there is a tendency to "scoop" for intervals rather than to sing them with acute attack and in a sustained manner. In the Handel aria the constantly recurring upward interval always fell short of the pitch, and in the Lachner air the phrases were pumped or squeezed out. The articulation also suffers in such a case. If Miss Clark was to study to overcome these inartistic and false processes and thereby normally employ her voice, she ought to succeed in her art, particularly as she seems possessed of aesthetic instincts in a marked degree. The audience applauded loudly and recalled the singer after each number, but then one high note at the end of an aria, fierce and violent in its intensity, will often, yes, most always, evoke the most rapturous applause from even a Boston symphony audience, regardless of its bosted cultivation and its claimed artistic discrimination. It has been known to shout on such occasions when the singer has made a sad mess of what had been undertaken.

The concert next Saturday evening will close this season's series. The programme will include: Passacaglia, Bach; symphony No. 3, Beethoven; overture, "Melusine," Mendelssohn; "Menuet des Fen-Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes," Berlioz, and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

[121]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 21.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall, last night, with the following programme:

Overture, "Water Carrier,".....Cherubini
Air, "As When the Dove,".....Handel
"The youth of Hercules,".....Saint-Saëns
Concert Aria, "Vineta,".....Lachner
Symphony No. 4, D minor.....Schumann
Soloist, Miss Garoline G. Clarke.

The brilliant Cherubini overture was brilliantly played and caused one to wonder why the fine opera, to which it is an introduction, is not played in our novelty seeking days; an opera that for interesting plot and music of a high quality might be imitated, but not equalled. Cherubini, like his operas, is too much neglected, but it may happen some day that when our eyes are accustomed to the blaze of Beethoven we many see some of the secondary stars that are now blazing unnoticed all around him.

Mr. Paur gave a fine reading of the Saint-Saens symphonic poem, but the brilliant work would be better enjoyed if we were allowed to forget the legend and so be saved the exasperation of watching the good Hercules struggling between the whispers of the virtuous clarinet and oboe, and the evil suggestions of the bad flute, drum and cymbals. Forcing the legend on the attention causes one to helplessly think of Shenstone's dreary poem and of the school days in which it was forced on one as a model of art and of conduct, and under the stress one's taste for music temporarily vanishes.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, who has a voice of fine quality, especially in its upper half, and whose singing is founded on a most excellent method, built on sound artistic principles. The Handel air was sung with taste and with a most praiseworthy absence of display for mere display's sake. Poor Handel has for so long been used as a test for screaming, roulading and trilling, that one joyously hails the artist who treats him with respect. Miss Clarke was equally excellent in Lachner's concert aria, which was interpreted with dignity, largeness and perfect taste, with fine expression and feeling, and with dramatic power. Miss Clarke's worth as an artist was speedily recognized by an enthusiastic audience, and after each song she was recalled again and again to bow her thanks.

The programme for the next concert is a Passacaglia, by Bach; Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Mendelssohn's overture, "Melusine;" Berlioz's "Minuet des Feu-Follets," and "Valse des Sylphes," from his "Damnation of Faust," and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1895.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert of last night opened with the overture to Cherubini's "The Water Carrier," which has not been heard here many times. It is characteristically Itanian and consists in large part of recitation-like passages with two principal themes intricately developed at different points. The overture is strongly dramatic and brilliant and was read with exquisite taste.

The gem of the evening, instrumentally, was Saint-Saen's symphonic poem, "La Jeunnesse d'Hercule," which was played with earnestness, spirit and the greatest care. The number is highly descriptive, and knowing the story on which the poem is based one does not need a key to follow the varying emotions, so happily and clearly are they expressed by the orchestration, which is rich and ful lat every point. The gradual development into the tempestuous and stormy climax was simply grand, and the whole, as already stated, was played in .. masterly and skilful manner.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 4 in D minor, played with one wait in the four movements. Though rich and effective, it is perhaps one of the least interesting written by this composer.

The soloist on this occasion was Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke of this city. She was heard first in the Handel aria, "As when the dove," from "Acis and Galatea," and she may be said to have been successful in this and in her second number, the concert aria, "Vineta," by Vincenz Lachuer, if cordial approval by the audience and recalls were an indication. She possesses a voice of great strength in the upper notes, albeit they are emitted with much explosiveness, which is made more prominent from the fact that her middle register is weak. The Lachner aria is a very difficult selection to render and requires an artist of more experience than Miss Clarke, who is a young singer, has yet gained. However, her singing showed her to possess much in the way of artistic ability, which promises well for the future.

The next concert, which is the last of the season, will include compositions by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Berlioz and Wagner, whose overture to "Tannhaeuser" will be played as the final number.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 22, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Cherubini: Overture to "Les Deux Journées."
Handel: Air, "As when the dove," from "Acis and Galatea."
(Additional accompaniments by Otto Dresel.)
Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem No. 4, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," opus 50.
Vincenz Lachner: Concert Aria, "Vineta," opus 80.
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120.
Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke was the singer.

Cherubini's overture to "Les Deux Journées" came fresh, bright and beautiful after its few years' rest. The work is a masterpiece in its way, full of the most genial melodic invention and of that other inventiveness which is too often set down as mere skill. The second theme and its treatment will ever remain as a gem of beauty and perfection of style. The somewhat long, but very dramatic, introduction was admirably played; but, with the setting-in of the Allegro, we were astonished to find Mr. Paur suddenly begin beating a rapid Alla breve, instead of the four regular beats to a measure which are as fixed a tradition in this overture as anything in all music. The result was that the main body of the overture was taken at a tempo for which we doubt if there be any precedent. To us it well-nigh spoiled it. And where does Mr. Paur find authority for adding two trumpets to the score in the Coda? We had always considered the pecular sombreness of color, which comes from the union of three horns and one trombone as the only brass, one of the characteristic traits of the work.

Saint-Saëns's "Jeunesse d'Hercule" has always been rather a puzzling composition to us. When a piece sets out to illustrate a definite "programme," one can not well ignore it; and the way the music here illustrates the conflicting ideas of heroic duty and voluptuous pleasure seems hard to understand. It reminds us a little of something the elder Salvini once said about his acting in this country with English-speaking companies. He, who does not understand a word of English, said that everything would have been perfectly easy for him, but for one curious circumstance: he did not have to understand what the other people on the stage said in English, because he knew it already, knowing, as he did, the whole play in the original Italian; but the great trouble was that the difference between the English and the Italian emphasis and inflection of voice was so enormous, that the other people always seemed to him to be saying just the opposite of what he knew they really were saying. Just so, to our perception, in this symphonic poem of Saint-Saëns's: the 'Duty-and-Virtue' themes seem to us to be of the most seductive sensuousness imaginable; whereas the "Bacchanalian Pleasure" theme has about as much seductiveness as a Jacobin mob. The whole musical treatment of the "programme" seems at cross purposes. Taken as pure music, there are many brilliant and beautiful moments in the work, although it does not seem to us to stand on quite as high a level as the composer's earlier symphonic poems, which are full of exquisite trouvailles.

Schumann's D-minor symphony was, it seemed to us, decidedly better and more sympathetically given than it was last season. There was less of disturbing meddling with the tempo, and the playing was full of fire and vim. At times it seemed as if it were impossible to persuade the violins and first wood-wind to play bits of cantilena in a true piano; to be sure, the second themes in the first and last movements are of a sort sorely to tempt the players to use a good deal of tone, but when passages are marked "piano dolce," one likes to hear them played so. Looking over Hanslick's criticism of the first performance of this symphony in Vienna in 1857, one is tempted to think that we nowadays incline to look at the work from a somewhat different point of view from that of musicians then, and that it means something different to us from it meant to them. Hanslick writes, "Full of genius and sparkle in the quick movements, delicately graceful in the moderate ones, this blooming web of tones stays in that happy earthly region where the lightly moved joy of life neither knocks too high at the gate of heaven nor forces its way too deep into dark abysses. In this gracious temperate zone does this fourth symphony show itself," etc. Now to our modern perception the work seems to be quite as full of intense passionate heat as of the "lightly moved joy of life," and allusions to "temperate zones" are somewhat hard for us to understand in connection with it. Perhaps the lack of delicacy in playing certain cantabile passages in the work, which we have felt in almost all performances of it for the last several years (especially under Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur) may come from players nowadays trying to put more of intense passion into the music than there is really there, and somewhat obliterating its "lightly moved" side.

Neither Miss Clarke's friends nor herself could have wished for a more brilliant success than she had last Saturday evening. Her singing of the air from Handel's "Acis and Galatea" was simply admirable. She was for years a member of Mr. Dresel's Monday evening Bach Club, and has plainly profited by what she learned there. Contrary to the confused and ever-degenerating English Handel traditions (the result of Handel's arias passing through the hands of generation upon generation of singers, each one more eager than the other for his or her own personal glory), Miss Clarke shows that she has well appreciated the truth of Robert Franz's criticism on the prevalent style of singing Bach and Handel: "As vocal music since Mozart has its centre of gravity in the cantilena, people think they may apply this to compositions of earlier periods also, which are almost without exception written polyphonically—whereby the remaining web of voices comes off badly enough." Miss Clarke sang the air in strict time, without any would-be-expressive rubato, and in a way to allow the voice part to maintain its supremacy as prima inter pares, but not so as to interfere with the autonomy of the very elaborate and intricate accompaniment. In the matter of expression, too, she showed a fine appreciation of the wholly general way in which Handel lets his music reflect the character of the text, and did not allow herself to be betrayed into trying to make special dramatic or expressive points, such as would be quite in place in a great deal of more modern music, but entirely out of place in Handel. She sang thoroughly musically, in which the beauty of her voice was of no little aid to her. It was unspeakably good, too, to hear the air given with Otto Dresel's admirable Bearbeitung of the accompaniment. Here Dresel has followed Franz's plan with consummate mastery and, as it seemed to us, with somewhat a more delicate sense of specific orchestral color than he. Quite apart from the primary and more important element in his task, filling out the bare places in Handel's score in an appropriate polyphonic style, he has treated the secondary and less important element, that of orchestration per se, in a way that is no less than perfect. Orchestration at once so rich and so sober, so beautifully transparent and uncloying, is almost a lost art nowadays.

Vincenz Lachner is a composer of whom most of us have heard, but of whom few of us have ever heard the first note. His reputation has always been more or less overshadowed by that of his elder, and better known, brother Franz—and Franz Lachner's glory is pretty nearly on its last legs by this time! The air "Vineta" was the one successful number in a deadly unsuccessful opera; the composer saved it from the general wreck of his work, and published it as a concert aria. Of its effectiveness there can be no doubt. Scrutinize it closely, and you find it to be little less than the broken meat from innumerable musical waste-baskets: there is not an original idea, not even an original trait, in it; but both in the matters of development and orchestration it is written with a certain dash and savoir faire that make it very telling—for once. Miss Clarke sang it admirably, with fine fire and dramatic force.

The next programme is—Bach, organ passacaglia, scored for orchestra by Esser; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55; Mendelssohn, overture to "Die schöne Melusine," opus 32; Berlioz, Menuet des Feufollets, and Valse des Sylphes, from "La Damnation de Faust," opus 24; Wagner, overture to "Tannhäuser."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 22, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

Cherubini's "Deux Journees" Leads the Programme.

St. Saens' Symphonic Poem and a Schumann Symphony the Other Pieces.

If Mozart is regarded as a German who wrote Italian music, then it may be claimed, with equal show of justice, that Cherubini was an Italian, who wrote German music. Cherubini's works show a thorough appreciation of the classical spirit, combined with a warmth of tone-color that is remarkable in one who wrote so soon after Handel. The overture to "Les Deux Journees," which came first on Saturday's programme, was a good illustration of his power, and the first theme of the allegro was vivid enough to have been the work of any mriter of the modern schol. The overture as a whole was played in a very spirited maner, and the orchestra was held up to a pace that seemed presto rather than allegro, with scarcely any sacrifice of clearness.

Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke was the soloist of the evening. In her first number, Handel's aria, "As When the Dove," she sang with commendable sweetness and fullness of tone. But it was her other selection, Vincenz Lachner's concert aria, "Vineta," that she won the most recognition. This is a work of earnestness and power, and demands some dramatic fervor in its presentation. Miss Clarke was fully adequate in this respect, and made the aria very interesting, in spite of the fact that the audience were not permited to know the text. In both selections the richness of her tones showed out well, giving the lower register of her voice a somewhat contralto character. This richness was not always present in her upper notes, some of which seemed comparatively thin, but on the whole her voice was full and resonant, and she sang with thorough musicianship and won several recalls.

Saint-Saens' symphonic poem was a worthy exponent of the modern school of instrumental writing. Fervid tone-color and rich harmony are characteristic of this school, and were to be expected in the work; but this particular piece showed, besides these traits, an avoidance of direct programme music, and an unusual clearness and balance in the treatment and development of the themes. The middle part, the wild allegro, full of fury and suggestive of combat, is striking enough, but is rather too full of modern instrumental spice to be the equal of the other parts in musical worth. The work was given with appropriate dash and animation.

The orchestra showed at its best, however, in the Schumann symphony. Mr. Paur's readings of Schumann are always eminently beautiful, and this one was no exception to the rule. Every one of the four movements was well played, the allegro and the finale being given with especial liveliness. This symphony is perhaps the least powerful of the four that Schumann wrote, and lacks the grandeur and massive strength of the B-flat or C-major symphony, but it displays consummate grace and brightness, and it formed a fitting climax for the concert.

The programme, while of shorter duration that usual, was very well arranged, and presented some excellent contrasts. The symphony suffered nothing by comparison with the more free symphonic poem, and the concert may well be taken as proof that the older form is still the standard of expression.

Arthur Elson.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, APRIL 22, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

CHERUBINI'S OVERTURE TO "LES DEUX JOURNEES" A FEATURE.

A Symphonic Poem by St. Saens and a Schumann Symphony—The Other Numbers—The Second Szumowska Recital.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following was the programme:

Overture to "The Water Carriers"...Cherubini
Air, "As When the Dove," "Acis and Galatea" .....Handel
Symphonic Poem No. 4, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule".....Saint Saens
Concert Aria, "Vineta".....V. Lachner
Symphony No. 4.....Schumann
Miss Caroline Gardner Clark was the soloist.

Cherubini's overture, which is familiar to our concert-goers, was read by Mr. Paur, and played by the orchestra with splendid success.

The Saint-Saens number, which is, perhaps, the least interesting of the set of Poems composed by this master, was, nevertheless, interesting enough to command the listeners' attention throughout its rendering. Saint-Saens is never dull; he always has something to say, and says it with eloquence. What a wonderful imagination has this famous composer; what a fund of spontaneous melody and rich and varied harmony; and then what infinite variety does his instrumentation present and how warm is the color that glows constantly from the marvelous and masterly combinations that flow from the fount of his inexhaustible resources in painting the emotions kindled by his subject matter. The performance of this work by the orchestra was little less than perfect under Mr. Paur's intelligent direction.

In the rendering of the Schumann Symphony, however, there was opportunity for criticism, for it was played in a too heavy and robust manner, that is the first and last movements, but there was much to commend in the manner in which the beauties of the middle movements were displayed. Mr. Paur always lays a heavy hand on Schumann, as if he would have the virility of this composer made more evident than the delightful romance which permeates all his works and touches them with a beauty that if but partially revealed must make them immortal. The orchestra played the symphony in a manner that was faultless, technically speaking.

Miss Caroline Gardner Clark is a new-comer on our concert stage. She has a good soprano voice and a deal of enthusiasm that causes her too often to overshoot the mark of artist command. This forced effort renders her voice dry in its quality and uncertain in its intonation; in fact, her process of voice production is erroneous in that it is not based upon a continuous flow rather than on a constant pushing and forcing of the column of air. The effort seems to be one of a constant desire to sing loud—consequently the middle tones are much emaciated and there is a tendency to "scoop" for intervals rather than to sing them with acute attack and in a sustained manner. In the Handel aria the constantly recurring upward interval always fell short of the pitch, and in the Lachner air the phrases were pumped or squeezed out. The articulation also suffers in such a case. If Miss Clark was to study to overcome these inartistic and false processes and thereby normally employ her voice, she ought to succeed in her art, particularly as she seems possessed of aesthetic instincts in a marked degree. The audience applauded loudly and recalled the singer after each number, but then one high note at the end of an aria, fierce and violent in its intensity, will often, yes, most always, evoke the most rapturous applause from even a Boston symphony audience, regardless of its bosted cultivation and its claimed artistic discrimination. It has been known to shout on such occasions when the singer has made a sad mess of what had been undertaken.

The concert next Saturday evening will close this season's series. The programme will include: Passacaglia, Bach; symphony No. 3, Beethoven; overture, "Melusine," Mendelssohn; "Menuet des Fen-Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes," Berlioz, and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

[121]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 28, 1895.

FINAL SYMPHONY.

Tannhauser Overture Winds Up the Season.

The prpogram of the 24th Symphony Concert was as follows:

Passacaglia for Organ.....Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by Heinrich Esser.)
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica".....Beethoven
Overture to "The Fair Melusina."...Mendelssohn
Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps.....Berlioz
Waltz of Sylphs .....Berlioz
From "The Damnation of Faust."
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

Mr. Paur may well plume himself on the success of the last Symphony Concert of the season. In previous concerts he has given ample proofs of his abilities as a disciplinarian. Last evening he revealed the higher characteristics of the great conductor: Fire, poetic feeling, enthusiasm that never ran to extravagance, and yet was contagious; in a word, he exposed fully the artistic temperament. The program was well chosen. It was logical from beginning to end. And in spite of the position of the symphony there was no anti-climax. A very large audience, applausive at the start, waxed steadily more and more enthusiastic. With sound sense Mr. Paur refused a repetition of the "Waltz of Sylphs." After the "Tannhauser" overture there was a storm of applause, and Mr. Paur was recalled again and again.

This enthusiasm was a just tribute to orchestra and conductor. Any review of the concert must be written largely in the superlative vein.

Orchestral arrangements of pieces written by Bach for solo instruments are not unwisely regarded as a rule with suspicion. There is Raff's arrangement of the D minor chaconne, and the hearer is obliged constantly to think of Raff. There is Abert's arrangement of the famous organ fugue, prefaced by a prelude and an interpolated chorale. There is Esser's arrangement of the great organ toccata. No one of these pieces seems so full of the spirit of Bach as this arrangement of the Passacaglia, written for the organ during Bach's second stay in Weimar. It is true that some question whether Bach ever intended this piece for the organ; whether it was not composed for a clavecin with two keyboards and pedals. The theme was a wandering melody, older than Bach; for it appears in the "Livre d' Orgue" of André Raison, who was organist at St. Genevieve, Paris, in 1687. Organists in Germany quarrel concerning the proper registration of the Passacaglia.

Some believe that there should be a gradual crescendo until the fugue is played with full organ. Others, and they are undoubtedly correct, see variations that demand contrasts of treatment. Now, Esser has arranged these variations with the same sense of color and dynamics that is displayed by several of the great organists of Europe. It would be a pleasing task to speak of the skill shown throughout by the arranger, but time and space forbid. Yet I cannot refrain from calling attention to the fact that Bach's music here tells of the great influence of Buxtehude, an organist who was far in advance of his time, a mighty contrapuntist with a romantic soul. The Passacaglia was read admirably. The tempo, a little faster than the old fashioned minuet, was observed steadily throughout. There was no trickery of rubato; there was no impertinent sentimentalism.

The other selections are familiar, and yet it seemed last evening as though there were passages of beauty and grandeur that had hitherto escaped the attention. Most impressive was the performance of the Funeral March, and the variations in the finale of the Symphony were admirably given. The wood-wind was most excellent in the overture by Mendelssohn, where the clarinets and flutes have a thankful task. The brilliant minuet by Berlioz was a triumph of orchestral playing, and Mr. Paur was very fortunate in the tempo chosen for the vaporous, dreamy waltz. Some might question the advantage of the effect gained in the first delivery of the Pilgrim chorus in the "Tannhäuser" overture by a slight retard and sudden diminuendo, as inconsistent with the flow of the rhythm, but there was no doubt of the effect itself. The rest of the overture was given with unusual largeness, sweep and passion.

The first concert of the fifteenth season will be given Oct. 19.

PHILIP HALE.

Review of the 14th Season of Symphony Concerts.

Comments on the Soloists and Programs and Conductors.

Foreign and Domestic News About Singers and Players.

Last evening Mr. Paur conducted the closing concert of the 14th season of the Symphony concerts in Music Hall. It was the final concert of his second yaar as conductor. It is therefore not impertinent to speak of the character of the programs and the performances.

***

The soloist—although some protest earnestly against the word—is demanded by the general audience; for personality appeals more strongly to the majority than does absolute music played by an orchestra led by an untheatrical conductor. The manager of any orchestra knows this fact full well, and as bills must be paid, and as there is always hope of gain, the soloist has undue prominence in so-called classical concerts.

Now the singers at the Symphony concerts of the last season were, in order of appearance, Mrs. Juch, Mrs. Eaton, Miss Franklin, Mr. Schott, Mrs. Melba, Mr. Max Heinrich and Miss Clarke. The violinists were Messrs. Ysaye, Loeffler, Thomson, Kneisel and Schnitzler. The pianists were Mr. Baermann, Mrs. Lent, Mr. Huss, Mrs. Beach, Miss Szumowska. The other soloists were Mr. Molé, the flute player, and Mr. Schroeder, the 'cellist. Of the nineteen soloists, five are members of the orchestra.

It may be said that this list, as a whole, may well excite comment. No one will quarrel with the choice of violinists, and Messrs. Molé and Schroeder have an indisputable right to a hearing. But the list of singers as well as the list of pianists is not distinguished. There was a time when an appearance at a Symphony concert was regarded as a great honor. The ability to say, "I sang," or, "I played the piano at a Symphony concert" was formerly the strongest recommendation an artist could give, so far as this section of the United States is concerned. It must be confessed that Mr. Paur did not always show keen judgment in his choice. There were soloists—it is not necessary to name them—who were not worthy of an appearance in the concerts. For neither in technical proficiency nor in display of temperament were they equal to the appointed task. To appear at a Symphony concert should be regarded as the goal of ambition, as a prize awarded to the most fit. Permission should not be granted as a gift of charity or as a token of friendship.

***

Mr. Paur is not a skillful maker of programs. Several concerts were yawn-provoking, simply because he blundered in selection or in arrangement. True, the art of making a program is not learned by every one. When Mr. Gericke was here, complaints concerning the character of the programs were loud and frequent.

It is true that Mr. Paur evidently tried to show a catholic spirit in selection. Perhaps he looked too favorably on Leipsic, but the list of novelties, as well as the list of familiar pieces, is a proof that he was not parochial in his choice. Among the most important new works produced last season were Chabrier's Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline," Chadwick's 3d Symphony, Sgambati's 1st Symphony, Benoit's Symphonic poem for flute and orchestra, Goldmark's overture "Sappho," Tschaikowsky's 6th Symphony, a piano concerto by Huss, Dvorak's "Carnaval" overture, Loeffler's Divertimento for violin and orchestra, Straube's overture to "The Maid of Orleans," a serenade by Mozart for wind instruments and Parker's "Cahal Mohr."

If the reader, however, should look over the list of novelties played last season by the leading orchestras of Europe, he would find that many pieces which excited attention and were reviewed favorably were ignored utterly by Mr. Paur. In Boston our novelties come late, in orchestral music as well as in opera.

Mr. Paur has been blamed by some for introducing "dance music" and playing light overtures, as those by Auber. There is dance music that is worthy of performance in any concert of serious purpose. Mr. Paur is to be praised for his open acknowledgment of this fact. It is to be regretted that his choice of overtures by Auber, the great master of opéra-comique, the composer of several delightful overtures that are triumphs of graceful instrumentation, was singularly unfortunate.

In one respect at least Mr. Paur has shown good sense in his program making. He did not think it necessary to give all the symphonies of Beethoven or Schumann during the season. This, indeed, was a blessed relief. For there is nothing more unendurable, nothing more prejudicial to true musical cultivation than perfunctory familiarity with masterpieces. A season devoted exclusively to "great works" leads inevitably to weariness and consequent scepticism. No thoughtful reader wishes constantly to commune with the giants of literature.

***

The performances have shown high technical proficiency. The ensemble has almost always been wholly admirable. The new first clarinet and the new first bassoon have strengthened materially the wood-wind, which is now most excellent. The virility of the strings is not as brutal as it was under the reign of the Romantic Hungarian; and yet no one can complain justly of any loss of force and power. No longer do the dealers in brass crack their cheeks and split the ceiling in response to a leader's imperious demand. In a word, the orchestra is a noble musical body of well-drilled musicians under a discipline that does not suggest the martinet. Its performance is seldom rigid; it is almost always free and elastic.

***

There will always be dispute concerning the readings of a conductor, whether his name be Mottl, Weingartner, Lamoureux, Paur, or Thomas. Such dispute is inevitable. It is good for the musical public. It is good for the conductor. All this, provided of course that the discussion be fair and conducted with intelligence. Perhaps Mr. Paur is inclined a little too much toward conservatism; and yet he has led works of the romantic school with freedom, if not with heaven-illuminating brilliancy. He very seldom errs hopelessly in the choice of a tempo, and his treatment of the detail is not often so pedantic or finicky that the effect of the whole is frittered away.

Mr. Paur is not a révolutionnaire. He is not even a "brilliant" conductor. He is an earnest, sincere, industrious man, who believes that he has a duty to perform, according to the best of his ability. A good musician, an excellent drill-master, he performs his duties in simple, modest, manly manner. It is a marked tribute to his worth that the organization, which is an honor to the city, is now known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not "Paur's Orchestra."

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 28.

Symphony Concert.

Last night the twenty-fourth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall. The following was the programme:

Passacaglia for organ, C-minor.....Bach
(Arranged for Orchestra by H. Esser.)
Symphony No. 3, E-flat major.....Beethoven
Overture, "Melusina," .....Mendelssohn
Minuet of Will o'-the-Wisps' Waltz of Sylphs.....} Berlioz
Overture, "Tannhauser" .....Wagner

Mr. Paur was greeted with unusual enthusiasm, which increased to the end of the concert, when it became tumultuous. Both he and the orchestra were determined to show the good that was in them, and the result was work of a very fine quality. The Bach Passacaglia received a faultless reading, though whether some of its color and beauty are not lost in the transcription is a question; still nobler was the interpretation of the Beethoven symphony, which, in its dignity, largeness and grandeur spoiled the ears for Berlioz's dainty, little musical jewels, and utterly incapacitated the hearer for the "Tannhauser" overture. The audience, however, was in its most amiable mood, and a trifle like a programme turned upside down—a fault presently to be considered—did not disturb it, and the applause was most liberally bestowed on the works played and on the players.

With this concert the Symphony Orchestra ended its labors for the current season. Indulging in a retrospect, it may be truthfully said that the work of this organization has been of a high art quality throughout. Mr. Paur has shown that he possesses rare skill as a conductor; the rendering of the works played demonstrates that he has broad catholic taste, and the efficiency of the orchestra that he is an excellent drill master. The work done, with some few exceptions, could not have been better done, and to this may be added that Mr. Paur has shown a sympathetic interest in American composers, and he has further practically proved that he does not literally believe that art begins and ends in Germany. Mr. Paur went still farther in his daring by twice putting Auber's name on his programme, and many worshippers of routine shook their heads ominously, as at the appearance of a world-threatening comet, but Music Hall remained firm on its foundation, and those who expected the statue of Beethoven to play a part similar to that of the Commandant in "Don Giovanni," were pleasantly disappointed.

The programmes, as the rule, were not remarkable for skilful arrangement; they were lacking in variety, and, as intellectual and emotional food, were not appetizing in their contrast. And then it frequently happened that Mr. Paur inverted the usual order of things; serving up an overture soup after a venison symphony, and ending with the oyster music with which the musical bill-of-fare should have begun. At first sight, it may seem hypercritical to object to this sequence; but the objection is based on sound physiological and psychological reasoning. A symphony coming first on the programme demands for its proper enjoyment the expenditure of so much energy, that very little is left for the items that follow; and then the emotion that it arouses are so deep and far reaching, that a lighter work coming after it is trivial by contrast. It is like looking at a huge altar picture by Rubens, and then turning to a cabinet study by Meissonier; in the one case the eye, in the other case, the ear has been exhausted by the large, and is, in consequence, prevented from enjoying the smaller work of art.

It is an exacting rule in æsthetics that pleasure must be aroused by contrasts and differences working outwards in crescendo manner from the small to the large. If an author were to give the climax of his story in his first chapter, and then work backward toward the causes that brought it about, he must do something similar to that which Mr. Paur does with his programmes. Mr. Paur fires off his doubly charged cannon first, and then asks you to admire the voice of the canary bird perched on his finger. It would seem as if programme making were a lost art, at least as far as our Symphony concerts are concerned; but there has been some improvement in the matter, and the visionary may solace themselves with the belief that the time is not far distant when an artistically arranged programme will be a reality, instead of a yearning aspiration.

Mr. Paur has been liberal with soloists and, with very rare exceptions, they have been worthy of the choice; the artists of the orchestra have received a large amount of this patronage, and it m ay reasonabl be contended that this is only just. Granting this, for the moment, it may still be asked what becomes of the orchestra artists who are not violinists or 'cellists? Why, every year, trot out the same fiddle players? Are there no other instruments fit to be heard in solo or concerto?

Then why not increase the number of soloists, so that native composers like Mr. McDowell, and native pianists like Mr. Perabo might be heard? Of course it is impossible to please everybody, and when art casts aside its conservatism, there is no telling on what unimagined height it may end; but, at the same time, there is no harm in asking questions which are stimulating to thought and to art. Perhaps, however, it would be more just to judge the orchestra and its conductor by the work done; and under these circumstances nothing but the most hearty and unstinted praise can be given. The work has been of the highest quality, and of all the conducters of the Symphony Orchestra Mr. Paur has demonstrated that he is the best, not only as a disciplinarian, but also in broadness of taste and largeness of sympathy with musical art generally and for special fitness for the position which he fills as master.

Boston Evening Transcript.

SUNDAY, APRIL 28, 1895.

Last Symphony Concert of the Season.

The last of this season's symphony concerts was given yesterday evening. An immense throng was present to bid goodby to conductor Paur, and testify appreciation of the valuable services he has given during this, the second year of his leadership of the orchestra.

The audience at the Friday afternoon rehearsal was equally numerous and demonstrative in expression of good will. There was enthusiastic applause after the performance of each selection, and at the end of the concert Mr Paur was recalled again and again.

Mr Paur is thoroughly deserving of all the praises that have been lavished upon him. During the two years that he has been in charge of the orchestra he has not only kept the band up to its former standard of efficiency, but has actually improved it.

Lack of thorough discipline in the organization was becoming evident when he assumed control, but this was very soon corrected, and today the Boston symphony orchestra is without a peer.

While it is quite true that Mr Paur has not at all times pleased every patron of the concerts, it must be admitted that he has given general satisfaction.

It can be said of Mr Paur that every work played under his direction has received faithful and intelligent interpretation. He has always striven to present as clearly as possible the meaning of a conductor, never attempting to "improve" a work by the introduction of "original readings."

In the matter of program arrangement and selections there has naturally been more or less adverse criticism, but it is impossible to satisfy the taste of all. His selections have been chosen from a wide field, but he has always given prominence to works of recognized classic character.

From the summary published in the last program it is learned that 116 compositions, representing 52 composers, were performed. There were 24 symphonies, six suites and serenades, 37 overtures, preludes and symphonic poems, 14 concertos and instrumental solos, 14 scenas, arias, etc, and 21 miscellaneous works.

Wagner was given the most prominence, 15 of his works being performed. Beethoven came next with 10 works, then Berlioz, Handel, Mozart and Schubert, with 5 each. There were an unusually large number of novelties and most of them proved acceptable.

The soloists heard at the 24 concerts numbered 19, the majority of whom were heard with pleasure, but, generally speaking, Mr Paur cannot be warmly commended for his selection of soloists. None but the foremost artists of the day should be permitted to appear at the symphony concerts, and it is to be hoped that this will be remembered next year.

Following is the program played last evening:

Passacaglia for organ, in C minor .....
Johann Sebastian Bach
Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, Eroica, op 55
Ludwig van Beethoven
Overture to The Fair Melusina, op 32 .....
Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
(a) Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps..Hector Berlioz
(b) Waltz of Sylphs .....Hector Berlioz
From The Damnation of Faust, op 24.
Overture to Tannhauser .....Richard Wagner

The Bach passacaglia is a remarkably impressive work and is esteemed as one of the finest examples in existence of a theme and variations, but to the average auditor its performance is not especially entertaining. The arrangement for orchestra played yesterday is the work of Heinrich Esser.

Beethoven's magnificent "Heroic" symphony was magnificently played. In not a few respects it was the best performance of a Beethoven work ever given here under Mr Paur's direction. It was an intelligent, expressive, spirited and altogether artistic interpretation. The performance of the grandly impressive funeral march was indescribably beautiful, and the sumptuous harmonies of the final movement were superbly portrayed.

"The Fair Melusina" overture is a pleasing work, gracefully written and rich in simple melody. It was charmingly interpreted.

The lovely minuet and the dainty waltz from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" pleased the audience immensely. They were both played with exquisite grace and delicacy.

The "Tannhauser" overture, splendidly played, brought to an end the 14th season of the Boston symphony orchestra concerts.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 28, 1895.

LAST OF THE SEASON.

The Symphony Orchestra gave the closing concert of the season last evening. In selecting his programme Mr. Paur probably made up his mind to satisfy all sorts and kinds of music lovers, and the person who couldn't find in that programme something to like must be hard to suit, for it began with Bach and ended with Wagner, with Beethoven, Bartholdy and Berlioz between the extremes. It was an unusually good concert, and the audience, a trifle unappreciative at first, waxed more and more enthusiastic as the concert proceeded, until there was a perfect storm of applause as the last strains of the Tannhauser overture died away. Mr. Paur was forced to bow his acknowledgments many times before his audience was satisfied. It was a fitting close to a successful season.

Last night's programme began with a Passacaglia by Bach, written for the organ and arranged for the orchestra by Esser. It consists of a series of twenty variations on a single theme. No. 2 was Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, a great favorite with music lovers and well given under Mr. Paur's direction. No. 3 was Bartholdy's overture to "The Fair Melusina." It was enjoyable, but a trifle cloying with its sweetness. Then came two selections from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the dainty minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps and the gossamer-like waltz of sylphs. The concert closed with the Tannhauser overture.

[122]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 28, 1895.

FINAL SYMPHONY.

Tannhauser Overture Winds Up the Season.

The prpogram of the 24th Symphony Concert was as follows:

Passacaglia for Organ.....Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by Heinrich Esser.)
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica" .....Beethoven
Overture to "The Fair Melusina,"...Mendelssohn
Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps.....Berlioz
Waltz of Sylphs .....Berlioz
From "The Damnation of Faust."
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

Mr. Paur may well plume himself on the success of the last Symphony Concert of the season. In previous concerts he has given ample proofs of his abilities as a disciplinarian. Last evening he revealed the higher characteristics of the great conductor: Fire, poetic feeling, enthusiasm that never ran to extravagance, and yet was contagious; in a word, he exposed fully the artistic temperament. The program was well chosen. It was logical from beginning to end. And in spite of the position of the symphony there was no anti-climax. A very large audience, applausive at the start, waxed steadily more and more enthusiastic. With sound sense Mr. Paur refused a repetition of the "Waltz of Sylphs." After the "Tannhauser" overture there was a storm of applause, and Mr. Paur was recalled again and again.

This enthusiasm was a just tribute to orchestra and conductor. Any review of the concert must be written largely in the superlative vein.

Orchestral arrangements of pieces written by Bach for solo instruments are not unwisely regarded as a rule with suspicion. There is Raff's arrangement of the D minor chaconne, and the hearer is obliged constantly to think of Raff. There is Abert's arrangement of the famous organ fugue, prefaced by a prelude and an interpolated chorale. There is Esser's arrangement of the great organ toccata. No one of these pieces seems so full of the spirit of Bach as this arrangement of the Passacaglia, written for the organ during Bach's second stay in Weimar. It is true that some question whether Bach ever intended this piece for the organ; whether it was not composed for a clavecin with two keyboards and pedals. The theme was a wandering melody, older than Bach; for it appears in the "Livre d' Orgue" of André Raison, who was organist at St. Genevieve, Paris, in 1687. Organists in Germany quarrel concerning the proper registration of the Passacaglia.

Some believe that there should be a gradual crescendo until the fugue is played with full organ. Others, and they are undoubtedly correct, see variations that demand contrasts of treatment. Now, Esser has arranged these variations with the same sense of color and dynamics that is displayed by several of the great organists of Europe. It would be a pleasing task to speak of the skill shown throughout by the arranger, but time and space forbid. Yet I cannot refrain from calling attention to the fact that Bach's music here tells of the great influence of Buxtehude, an organist who was far in advance of his time, a mighty contrapuntist with a romantic soul. The Passacaglia was read admirably. The tempo, a little faster than the old fashioned minuet, was observed steadily throughout. There was no trickery of rubato; there was no impertinent sentimentalism.

The other selections are familiar, and yet it seemed last evening as though there were passages of beauty and grandeur that had hitherto escaped the attention. Most impressive was the performance of the Funeral March, and the variations in the finale of the Symphony were admirably given. The wood-wind was most excellent in the overture by Mendelssohn, where the clarinets and flutes have a thankful task. The brilliant minuet by Berlioz was a triumph of orchestral playing, and Mr. Paur was very fortunate in the tempo chosen for the vaporous, dreamy waltz. Some might question the advantage of the effect gained in the first delivery of the Pilgrim chorus in the "Tannhäuser" overture by a slight retard and sudden diminuendo, as inconsistent with the flow of the rhythm, but there was no doubt of the effect itself. The rest of the overture was given with unusual largeness, sweep and passion.

The first concert of the fifteenth season will be given Oct. 19.

PHILIP HALE.

Review of the 14th Season of Symphony Concerts.

Comments on the Soloists and Programs and Conductors.

Foreign and Domestic News About Singers and Players.

Last evening Mr. Paur conducted the closing concert of the 14th season of the Symphony concerts in Music Hall. It was the final concert of his second year as conductor. It is therefore not impertinent to speak of the character of the programs and the performances.

***

The soloist—although some protest earnestly against the word—is demanded by the general audience; for personality appeals more strongly to the majority than does absolute music played by an orchestra led by an untheatrical conductor. The manager of any orchestra knows this fact full well, and as bills must be paid, and as there is always hope of gain, the soloist has undue prominence in so-called classical concerts.

Now the singers at the Symphony concerts of the last season were, in order of appearance, Mrs. Juch, Mrs. Eaton, Miss Franklin, Mr. Schott, Mrs. Melba, Mr. Max Heinrich and Miss Clarke. The violinists were Messrs. Ysaye, Loeffler, Thomson, Kneisel and Schnitzler. The pianists were Mr. Baermann, Mrs. Lent, Mr. Huss, Mrs. Beach, Miss Szumowska. The other soloists were Mr. Molé, the flute player, and Mr. Schroeder, the 'cellist. Of the nineteen soloists, five are members of the orchestra.

It may be said that this list, as a whole, may well excite comment. No one will quarrel with the choice of violinists, and Messrs. Molé and Schroeder have an indisputable right to a hearing. But the list of singers as well as the list of pianists is not distinguished. There was a time when an appearance at a Symphony concert was regarded as a great honor. The ability to say, "I sang," or, "I played the piano at a Symphony concert" was formerly the strongest recommendation an artist could give, so far as this section of the United States is concerned. It must be confessed that Mr. Paur did not always show keen judgment in his choice. There were soloists—it is not necessary to name them—who were not worthy of an appearance in the concerts. For neither in technical proficiency nor in display of temperament were they equal to the appointed task. To appear at a Symphony concert should be regarded as the goal of ambition, as a prize awarded to the most fit. Permission should not be granted as a gift of charity or as a token of friendship.

***

Mr. Paur is not a skillful maker of programs. Several concerts were yawn-provoking, simply because he blundered in selection or in arrangement. True, the art of making a program is not learned by every one. When Mr. Gericke was here, complaints concerning the character of the programs were loud and frequent.

It is true that Mr. Paur evidently tried to show a catholic spirit in selection. Perhaps he looked too favorably on Leipsic, but the list of novelties, as well as the list of familiar pieces, is a proof that he was not parochial in his choice. Among the most important new works produced last season were Chabrier's Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline," Chadwick's 3d Symphony, Sgambati's 1st Symphony, Benoit's Symphonic poem for flute and orchestra, Goldmark's overture "Sappho," Tschaikowsky's 6th Symphony, a piano concerto by Huss, Dvorak's "Carnaval" overture, Loeffler's Divertimento for violin and orchestra, Straube's overture to "The Maid of Orleans," a serenade by Mozart for wind instruments and Parker's "Cáhál Mohr."

If the reader, however, should look over the list of novelties played last season by the leading orchestras of Europe, he would find that many pieces which excited attention and were reviewed favorably were ignored utterly by Mr. Paur. In Boston our novelties come late, in orchestral music as well as in opera.

Mr. Paur has been blamed by some for introducing "dance music" and playing light overtures, as those by Auber. There is dance music that is worthy of performance in any concert of serious purpose. Mr. Paur is to be praised for his open acknowledgment of this fact. It is to be regretted that his choice of overtures by Auber, the great master of opéra-comique, the composer of several delightful overtures that are triumphs of graceful instrumentation, was singularly unfortunate.

In one respect at least Mr. Paur has shown good sense in his program making. He did not think it necessary to give all the symphonies of Beethoven or Schumann during the season. This, indeed, was a blessed relief. For there is nothing more unendurable, nothing more prejudicial to true musical cultivation than perfunctory familiarity with masterpieces. A season devoted exclusively to "great works" leads inevitably to weariness and consequent scepticism. No thoughtful reader wishes constantly to commune with the giants of literature.

***

The performances have shown high technical proficiency. The ensemble has almost always been wholly admirable. The new first clarinet and the new first bassoon have strengthened materially the wood-wind, which is now most excellent. The virility of the strings is not as brutal as it was under the reign of the Romantic Hungarian; and yet no one can complain justly of any loss of force and power. No longer do the dealers in brass crack their cheeks and split the ceiling in response to a leader's imperious demand. In a word, the orchestra is a noble musical body of well-drilled musicians under a discipline that does not suggest the martinet. Its performance is seldom rigid; it is almost always free and elastic.

***

There will always be dispute concerning the readings of a conductor, whether his name be Mottl, Weingartner, Lamoureux, Paur, or Thomas. Such dispute is inevitable. It is good for the musical public. It is good for the conductor. All this, provided of course that the discussion be fair and conducted with intelligence. Perhaps Mr. Paur is inclined a little too much toward conservatism; and yet he has led works of the romantic school with freedom, if not with heaven-illuminating brilliancy. He very seldom errs hopelessly in the choice of a tempo, and his treatment of the detail is not often so pedantic or finicky that the effect of the whole is frittered away.

Mr. Paur is not a révolutionnaire. He is not even a "brilliant" conductor. He is an earnest, sincere, industrious man, who believes that he has a duty to perform, according to the best of his ability. A good musician, an excellent drill-master, he performs his duties in simple, modest, manly manner. It is a marked tribute to his worth that the organization, which is an honor to the city, is now known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not "Paur's Orchestra."

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 28.

Symphony Concert.

Last night the twenty-fourth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall. The following was the programme:

Passacaglia for organ, C-minor.....Bach
(Arranged for Orchestra by H. Esser.)
Symphony No. 3, E-flat major.....Beethoven
Overture, "Melusina," .....Mendelssohn
Minuet of Will o'-the-Wisps' Waltz of Sylphs.....Berlioz
Overture, "Tannhauser" .....Wagner

Mr. Paur was greeted with unusual enthusiasm, which increased to the end of the concert, when it became tumultuous. Both he and the orchestra were determined to show the good that was in them, and the result was work of a very fine quality. The Bach Passacaglia received a faultless reading, though whether some of its color and beauty are not lost in the transcription is a question; still nobler was the interpretation of the Beethoven symphony, which, in its dignity, largeness and grandeur spoiled the ears for Berlioz's dainty, little musical jewels, and utterly incapacitated the hearer for the "Tannhauser" overture. The audience, however, was in its most amiable mood, and a trifle like a programme turned upside down—a fault presently to be considered—did not disturb it, and the applause was most liberally bestowed on the works played and on the players.

With this concert the Symphony Orchestra ended its labors for the current season. Indulging in a retrospect, it may be truthfully said that the work of this organization has been of a high art quality throughout. Mr. Paur has shown that he possesses rare skill as a conductor; the rendering of the works played demonstrates that he has broad catholic taste, and the efficiency of the orchestra that he is an excellent drill master. The work done, with some few exceptions, could not have been better done, and to this may be added that Mr. Paur has shown a sympathetic interest in American composers, and he has further practically proved that he does not literally believe that art begins and ends in Germany. Mr. Paur went still farther in his daring by twice putting Auber's name on his programme, and many worshippers of routine shook their heads ominously, as at the appearance of a world-threatening comet, but Music Hall remained firm on its foundation, and those who expected the statue of Beethoven to play a part similar to that of the Commandant in "Don Giovanni," were pleasantly disappointed.

The programmes, as the rule, were not remarkable for skilful arrangement; they were lacking in variety, and, as intellectual and emotional food, were not appetizing in their contrast. And then it frequently happened that Mr. Paur inverted the usual order of things; serving up an overture soup after a venison symphony, and ending with the oyster music with which the musical bill-of-fare should have begun. At first sight, it may seem hypercritical to object to this sequence; but the objection is based on sound physiological and psychological reasoning. A symphony coming first on the programme demands for its proper enjoyment the expenditure of so much energy, that very little is left for the items that follow; and then the emotion that it arouses are so deep and far reaching, that a lighter work coming after it is trivial by contrast. It is like looking at a huge altar picture by Rubens, and then turning to a cabinet study by Meissonier; in the one case the eye, in the other case, the ear has been exhausted by the large, and is, in consequence, prevented from enjoying the smaller work of art.

It is an exacting rule in æsthetics that pleasure must be aroused by contrasts and differences working outwards in crescendo manner from the small to the large. If an author were to give the climax of his story in his first chapter, and then work backward toward the causes that brought it about, he must do something similar to that which Mr. Paur does with his programmes. Mr. Paur fires off his doubly charged cannon first, and then asks you to admire the voice of the canary bird perched on his finger. It would seem as if programme making were a lost art, at least as far as our Symphony concerts are concerned; but there has been some improvement in the matter, and the visionary may solace themselves with the belief that the time is not far distant when an artistically arranged programme will be a reality, instead of a yearning aspiration.

Mr. Paur has been liberal with soloists and, with very rare exceptions, they have been worthy of the choice; the artists of the orchestra have received a large amount of this patronage, and it m ay reasonabl be contended that this is only just. Granting this, for the moment, it may still be asked what becomes of the orchestra artists who are not violinists or 'cellists? Why, every year, trot out the same fiddle players? Are there no other instruments fit to be heard in solo or concerto?

Then why not increase the number of soloists, so that native composers like Mr. McDowell, and native pianists like Mr. Perabo might be heard? Of course it is impossible to please everybody, and when art casts aside its conservatism, there is no telling on what unimagined height it may end; but, at the same time, there is no harm in asking questions which are stimulating to thought and to art. Perhaps, however, it would be more just to judge the orchestra and its conductor by the work done; and under these circumstances nothing but the most hearty and unstinted praise can be given. The work has been of the highest quality, and of all the conductors of the Symphony Orchestra Mr. Paur has demonstrated that he is the best, not only as a disciplinarian, but also in broadness of taste and largeness of sympathy with musical art generally and for special fitness for the position which he fills as master.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 28, 1895.

Last Symphony Concert of the Season.

The last of this season's symphony concerts was given yesterday evening. An immense throng was present to bid goodby to conductor Paur, and testify appreciation of the valuable services he has given during this, the second year of his leadership of the orchestra.

The audience at the Friday afternoon rehearsal was equally numerous and demonstrative in expression of good will. There was enthusiastic applause after the performance of each selection, and at the end of the concert Mr Paur was recalled again and again.

Mr Paur is thoroughly deserving of all the praises that have been lavished upon him. During the two years that he has been in charge of the orchestra he has not only kept the band up to its former standard of efficiency, but has actually improved it.

Lack of thorough discipline in the organization was becoming evident when he assumed control, but this was very soon corrected, and today the Boston symphony orchestra is without a peer.

While it is quite true that Mr Paur has not at all times pleased every patron of the concerts, it must be admitted that he has given general satisfaction.

It can be said of Mr Paur that every work played under his direction has received faithful and intelligent interpretation. He has always striven to present as clearly as possible the meaning of a composer, never attempting to "improve" a work by the introduction of "original readings."

In the matter of program arrangement and selections there has naturally been more or less adverse criticism, but it is impossible to satisfy the taste of all. His selections have been chosen from a wide field, but he has always given prominence to works of recognized classic character.

From the summary published in the last program it is learned that 116 compositions, representing 52 composers, were performed. There were 24 symphonies, six suites and serenades, 37 overtures, preludes and symphonic poems, 14 concertos and instrumental solos, 14 scenas, arias, etc, and 21 miscellaneous works.

Wagner was given the most prominence, 15 of his works being performed. Beethoven came next with 10 works, then Berlioz, Handel, Mozart and Schubert, with 5 each. There were an unusually large number of novelties and most of them proved acceptable.

The soloists heard at the 24 concerts numbered 19, the majority of whom were heard with pleasure, but, generally speaking, Mr Paur cannot be warmly commended for his selection of soloists. None but the foremost artists of the day should be permitted to appear at the symphony concerts, and it is to be hoped that this will be remembered next year.

Following is the program played last evening:

Passacaglia for organ, in C minor .....
Johann Sebastian Bach
Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, Eroica, op 55
Ludwig van Beethoven
Overture to The Fair Melusina, op 32 .....
Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
(a) Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps..Hector Berlioz
(b) Waltz of Sylphs .....Hector Berlioz
From The Damnation of Faust, op 24.
Overture to Tannhauser .....Richard Wagner

The Bach passacaglia is a remarkably impressive work and is esteemed as one of the finest examples in existence of a theme and variations, but to the average auditor its performance is not especially entertaining. The arrangement for orchestra played yesterday is the work of Heinrich Esser.

Beethoven's magnificent "Heroic" symphony was magnificently played. In not a few respects it was the best performance of a Beethoven work ever given here under Mr Paur's direction. It was an intelligent, expressive, spirited and altogether artistic interpretation. The performance of the grandly impressive funeral march was indescribably beautiful, and the sumptuous harmonies of the final movement were superbly portrayed.

"The Fair Melusina" overture is a pleasing work, gracefully written and rich in simple melody. It was charmingly interpreted.

The lovely minuet and the dainty waltz, from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" pleased the audience immensely. They were both played with exquisite grace and delicacy.

The "Tannhauser" overture, splendidly played, brought to an end the 14th season of the Boston symphony orchestra concerts.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 28, 1895.

LAST OF THE SEASON.

The Symphony Orchestra gave the closing concert of the season last evening. In selecting his programme Mr. Paur probably made up his mind to satisfy all sorts and kinds of music lovers, and the person who couldn't find in that programme something to like must be hard to suit, for it began with Bach and ended with Wagner, with Beethoven, Bartholdy and Berlioz between the extremes. It was an unusually good concert, and the audience, a trifle unappreciative at first, waxed more and more enthusiastic as the concert proceeded, until there was a perfect storm of applause as the last strains of the Tannhauser overture died away. Mr. Paur was forced to bow his acknowledgments many times before his audience was satisfied. It was a fitting close to a successful season.

Last night's programme began with a Passacaglia by Bach, written for the organ and arranged for the orchestra by Esser. It consists of a series of twenty variations on a single theme. No. 2 was Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, a great favorite with music lovers and well given under Mr. Paur's direction. No. 3 was Bartholdy's overture to "The Fair Melusina." It was enjoyable, but a trifle cloying with its sweetness. Then came two selections from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the dainty minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps and the gossamer-like waltz of sylphs. The concert closed with the Tannhauser overture.

[122]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 118.

SUNDAY, APRIL 28, 1895.

THE FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Large Audience Bids the Musicians Adieu Until October.

The 24th and last of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was given last night before a very large audience. The programme was:

Passacaglia for organ, in C minor.....Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by Esser.)
Symphony No 3, in E flat major, "Eroica" Beethoven
Overture to "Die Schone Melusine"..... Mendelssohn
"Menuet des Follets".....Berlioz
"Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust".....Berlioz
Overture "Tannhauser".....Wagner

The intention of Mr. Paur was evidently to mark the mutations in musical style from the time of Bach down to the present day. If so, he was particularly felicitous in his selections; but whether so or not, the programme was one of the best and most interesting of the season. The contrasts were admirable, and though there is a wide, almost an immeasureable, gap between Bach and Wagner, the progression from the one to the other was gradual, and did no violence to any canon of pure artistic taste. Esser's arrangement of the Bach work has been heard before at these concerts, and always with renewed admiration for the skill and fine judgment with which the arranger has done his by no means easy task.

The performance was faultless; in truth, through the whole evening the work of the orchestra was surpassingly magnificent, and as fine as its playing has been the entire season, the culminating concert excelled all the others in the splendid results achieved. The symphony had one of the most impressive and satisfying interpretations that has ever been given it at these concerts. Mr. Paur's reading was equally brilliant and masterly. The funeral march was taken a trifle faster than has been usual, but it lost nothing in impressiveness of effect thereby. The scherzo was given with stirring spirit, and the horn passages in the trio were played with a smoothness and a clearness that have been seldom equalled. There was a glorious fire in the reading of the finale, and for once the poco andante was accorded its proper movement and color instead of being taken too slow. The break into the joyous coda was beautifully managed, and the judicious tempo that was observed permitted the brilliant passages for the wind instruments to come out with perfect distinctness. Mr. Paur has done nothing more sympathetic in the way of Beethoven reading than his interpretation of this symphony.

The lovely "Melusine" overture was exquisitely rendered, especially by the wind instruments, which were heard to exceptional advantage. Here again Mr. Paur is to be complimented on his judgment in regard to tempo, which forbade him to avoid that sickly sentimentality of style that is conventionally imparted to the work. The "Will-o'-the Wisp" minuet has never been heard here when it was given with such striking beauty of color and such strength of effect as marked its presentation on this occasion. It was a perfect bit of tone-painting, and was wonderfully played, notably by the wind instruments in the rollicking presto.

The performance of the "Waltz of Sylphs" was exquisitely delicate. In fact, the occasion was a "field night" for both conductor and orchestra. The applause, which had been very enthusiastic after every selection, broke into a frenzied demonstration of delight after this number, and indicated a strong desire for an encore, but it was not accorded. The familiar Wagner overture was rendered with sumptuous richness of color and largeness of effect, bringing the season gloriously to a close. When all was over the audience thundered forth plaudits, and recalled Mr. Paur three times to receive their approval of his efforts and to bid him a cordial auf wiedersehen. He could not have wished a more hearty indorsement, nor a more emphatic proof of the high place he has fairly won in the esteem of the patrons of the Symphony concert.

The opening concert of the 15th season of the orchestra will take place on Saturday evening, Oct. 19.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 28, 1895.

END OF THE SYMPHONY SEASON, ETC.

The last concert of the fourteenth Symphony season was given last night according to this programme, which stood exactly as it had been announced:—Bach, Passacaglia, in the orchestration of Esser; Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 (Eroica); Mendelssohn, Overture, "Melusine"; Berlioz, a. "Menuet des Feux-Follets," b. "Valse des Sylphes," from the "Damnation of Faust"; Wagner, Overture, "Tannhauser."

That was a sufficiently standard and familiar provision, and no single number requires any examination on its own account. The symphony has been known ever since there were orchestras, or even groups of dilettante instrumentalists, in Boston, and each of the others came hither in its earliest days and has stood by us faithfully to this hour. Comment may then confine itself to the performance and express itself in commendation.

Mr. Paur directed and the men obeyed as if they wanted to leave the best of impressions as a hopeful anticipation for next autumn and even the kettle-drummer got a little more flexibility than usual into his wrists and a little more rebound to his blows. The rolling, resonant organ character of the Bach was kept all through the variations, and these spoke out clearly both in theme and counterpoint; there was a sense of passion in the funereal adagio of the symphony, and a light spirit for its final allegro and its genially gay scherzo; the sea-strains of the "Melusine," hinting faintly at their great congeners of "Fingal's Cave," sounded sweetly and the fuller romance was warmly read; in the Berlioz excerpts there were fantasy and nicety of shading, and the waltz was so daintily touched that it fairly melted away into silence; and the Wagner overture brought all to a conclusion with tremendous tonality and energy. The large audience was much delighted and called Mr. Paur forward several times.

A summing up of the season shows that although the concerts have seldom been long, about the usual number of separate selections has been performed, the list including one hundred and sixteen. Of these Germany had more than the just share of even a very able-bodied and sound-stomached lion—eighty-nine. France claimed the majority of the remainder—fifteen; America got six chances; Russia and Scandinavia five; Italy one and England, Spain and the rest of the world, none. Only eighteen numbers were heard for the first time, which was too small a proportion; and of these a few were more curious than meritorious. There were nineteen soloists, of whom these only could claim celebrity because of a European, or even an extended American, reputation,—M. Ysaye, M. Thomson, Mr. Baermann, Mme. Melba and Miss Juch. Miss Szumoska is as yet rather in "posse" than in "esse," and the members of the Kneisel Quartette are now going to London in search of fame against next season.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, APRIL 29, 1895.

The Twenty-Fourth Concert of the Season Given in Music Hall.

The 24th and last of this season's series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Passacaglia in C minor.....Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by Heinrich Esser.)
Symphony No. 3.....Beethoven
Overture to "The Fair Melusina"....Mendelssohn
Minuet of "Will-o'-the-Wisp".....Berlioz
Waltz of Sylphs.....Berlioz
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

There are many that do not believe that the arrangement of Bach's organ compositions for the orchestra is an admirable undertaking, and the writer quite heartily agrees with this opinion. The distinctive character of the works is lost in such a proceeding, and as the repertoire of orchestral pieces is such an extensive one, there is no call for these selections, then it must be said to hear polyphony displayed there is a multiplicity of orchestral compositions that will furnish the desired opportunity.

If one accepts the Bach number in these selections then it must be said that Mr. Paur provided an excellent programme. In the matter of his reading of the numbers and the orchestra's renderings, nothing but praise can be accorded the performance. The audience was demonstrative throughout the evening, and after the magnificent performance of the "Tannhauser" overture recalled Mr. Paur many times.

The spirit of the applause was the effort on the part of the audience to impress Mr. Paur with its hearty approval of his work during the season just finished, and it was a sincere tribute to a modest, serious musician, devoid of any form of trickery; one with a musical soul and an artistic nature that stimulates him to the noblest purposes in his art. Mr. Paur may well be assured that he has gained the respect and confidence of the patrons of the symphony concerts after his two years' asssociation with the superb organization at his command.

Mr. Paur's least satisfactory work has been with the classics, which he has handled in a too robust and exaggerated manner. The performance of the third symphony of Beethoven on this occasion, however, was a decided improvement in the matter of a less boisterous interpretation and as regards a better gradation of dynamics. Could Mr. Paur study to be more delicate in the exposition of the classics and improve his ability as a programme maker, he would fill his position to the complete satisfaction of the more critical listeners, for he has few equals in the art of conducting modern compositions. At all events, Mr. Paur will be heartily welcomed when he presents himself on the evening of Saturday, Oct. 19, to begin his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a creation of our honored townsman, Mr. H. L. Higginson, whose munificence in founding and supporting this permanent organization has earned for him the gratitude of our musical community and made for him a niche high in the archives of public benefaction.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

STANDARD JUNIOR.

FRIDAY, APRIL 26, 1895.

MUSICAL BRIEFLETS.

An Old Boston Musician Talks About the Symphony Orchestra.

(Written for The Standard Junior.)

Now that you have been told, in a previous sketch, how many players constitute that great musical body, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, you, very naturally, would like to know something about the instruments that are used, what they are and how many of each separate kind are played up at these grand concerts.

There are lots of one kind—the strings—and not as many of the others, if taken separately. Now you all, of course, know what a violin is. A violin and a fiddle are generally supposed to be one and the same thing. The distinction is made only when it falls into different hands. There are violin players, and there are fiddlers. The latter will please pardon me when I say that I am now writing of violinists and true artists. Of the violins there are 16 first violins (violin primo), and 14 second violins (violin secondo).

All of the first violins sit at the left, and the second violins at the right hand of the conductor. Of violas there are 10, who sit in front and at the right of the conductor.

Now we come to the violoncellos, or 'cellos. Of these there are eight. The last of the stringed instruments, aside from the harp, which stands by itself an individual instrument, are the double basses (contra bass), of which there are eight. Then you see, including the harp, there are in all 57 stringed instruments in this immense orchestra.

Now we come to the wood-wind instruments, which are next in orchestral order. We will begin with the flutes, of which there are three—first, second, third. Often times the third flutetist has occasion to play the octave flute (kleine flöte, or piccalo, so-called in German and Italian. All the remaining wood-wind instruments are the reed instruments. Of these the first in order are the clarinets (clarinette). There are of this instrument usually two—first and second. Sometimes the score calls for three, or even four. The third is often the bass clarinet. Wagner's works often call for the later. The oboe (hautbois) is the next. There are two of these—first and second. Now follows the English horn (como-anglaise), a truly magnificent instrument.

Berlioz in his charming works uses it with most thrilling effects. The last of the woodwind is the bassoon (fagott or fagotto). This is also a splendid instrument. You will know this instrument when you go to hear a symphony concert, by seeing just front of the conductor a little in the rear, two, or perhaps three, round sticks like small smokestacks pointing to the roof. It has by some been vulgarly called the "horses' leg." When three are used the added one is the bass bassoon.

Now we come to the brass wind instruments. First of these are the trumpets (trompete), of which there are three, usually, first, second, third, though sometimes four are used. Next we find the horn. Of the French horn (corno), there are a quartet, first, second, third, fourth. Eight or a double horn quartet were used in a Wagner programme of the past season. The extra four horns were brought from New York expressly to play in a Wagner selection. I speak of this as an illustration of the perfect system upon which the symphony concerts are conducted. Neither pains nor money are spared in order to insure a perfect rendering of a musical work.

Next in order are the trombones (pasaune), of which there are three—tenor, alto and bass. Four are sometimes used, the last to be mentioned of the brass wind, but by no means the least, is the bass-tuba. This is like an organ in fullness of tone; and in the hands of an artist, as in this case it is, as in truth are all the others, is a truly grand instrument.

Finishing the wind choirs, so-called, we will take up the instruments of percussion, the last to be mentioned, but usually the first to be heard, as this department in the orchestra is the home of the writer; he feels that for very many years past he has made some noise in the world, and he anxiously hopes that he may be forgiven for creating such a hubbub. First in this department must be mentioned the kettle-drum (pauken tympani). In my description of some instruments in a future article I shall dwell particularly upon the tympani, as the use of this prominent instrument is but little known. Lastly we must mention the snare drum (kleine trommel), bass drum (grosse trommel), cymbals (piatta), triangle (triangolo), tambourin, castanetts, bells(glockenspiel), and gong. Thus we have all of the orchestral instruments entire. The array of percussion instruments has been the writer's constant companion for 35 years.

Now think of it, for herein is the wonder to many, but it is only the result of thought and perfect discipline. All of these players, of so many different instruments, move at once like a huge but well-oiled machine. But, like the machine, in order to produce good results there must be a clear, brainy head and a firm guiding hand at the lever.

This the symphony orchestra bar, and the lever which guides this immense human machine, is a simple little stick of hickory in the hands of a talented artist.

WILLIAM A. FIELD.

MONDAY, APRIL 29, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-fourth symphony concert, the closing one of the season, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Bach: Passacaglia for Organ, in C minor.
(Arranged for Orchestra by Esser.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55.
Mendelssohn: Overture to "Die schöne Melusine," opus 32.
Berliez: Menuet des Follets and Valse des Sylphes, from "La Damnation de Faust," opus 24.
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Before saying anything about this concert, we would correct an error in our article on the preceding one. In speaking of the performance of Cherubini's overture to "Les Deux Journées," we said in last Monday's paper: "With the setting-in of the Allegro we were astonished to find Mr. Paur suddenly begin beating a rapid Alla breve, instead of the four regular beats to the measure which are as fixed a tradition in this overture as anything in all music." Mr. Paur has since proved to us that no such tradition exists, but that, on the contrary, conductors have always beaten two beats to the measure in this Allegro. What we should have said, to express our idea exactly, was that Mr. Paur's beat (i. e., his tempo) was so rapid that it destroyed the effect to the ear of the movement's being in 4-4 time, and gave the impression of 2-2, or alla breve, time. To our question, "Where does Mr. Paur find authority for adding two trumpets to the score in the coda?" Mr. Paur replies that in his score of the overture, a very old MS. (not autograph) copy, there are two trumpet parts in the coda, and that there are printed trumpet parts among the published orchestral parts of the work. Moreover, that the overture has, certainly of late years, always been played here with trumpets. It is somewhat curious, however, that there are no trumpet parts in the original Paris (Gaveaux) edition of the full score, neither are there any in the more recent editions of Breitkopf and Härtel, and Peters. This seems to us to cast some doubt upon the authenticity of the trumpet parts. Their not being in the original edition is no decisive proof against them, for they might have been added later by the composer. But their not being included in the edition of such careful editors as Breitkopf and Härtel—even though they are included in the published "orchestral parts,"—looks as if there were some reason for doubting their authenticity. Their being in an old MS. copy of the score proves nothing; for it is well known what liberties of this sort opera conductors have taken, time out of mind. Sir Michael Costa added parts for three trombones, bass-tuba, and big-drum and cymbals to the score of Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and these spurious parts were at one time a tradition at Covent Garden in London; it is by no means unlikely that some other conductor may have taken upon himself to add trumpets to "Les Deux Journées," and that his additions have become traditional in the same way.

But, to our muttons! Esser's orchestral version of the great Bach passacaglia we have never wholly liked. No doubt the orchestra adds a good deal to an organ work of this sort; variety in coloring and at times something of greater clearness of effect in complex polyphonic passages. But it also tends to efface one of the primary features of the organ, its impassive evenness of tone and lack of accent. For one thing, it has no approximate substitute to offer for the inexhaustible solidity of tone of the organ pedals. Still, were this the only objection to Esser's arrangement, it might well be deemed unnecessarily hair-splitting; especially as an orchestral version of a work like the C minor passacaglia has the manifest advantage of bringing the stupendous composition within reach of a far larger public than would ever hear a note of it in its original shape. But we have another objection to it: considering it purely in the light of an arrangement, we find it a rather dreary and uneffective one. When Esser had made up his mind that it was really worth while to score the passacaglia for orchestra at all, we wish he had taken hold of his task more boldly and carried it out more brilliantly. He has stroked the nettle too tender-handed; his scoring, especially in the closing fugue, is too dull-sounding and devoid of brilliancy. His orchestration is like an organ with all the mixtures left out. On the organ, with the full power of the mighty instrument gradually coming on toward the end, the passacaglia is one of the most overwhelming things we know in all music; with Esser's orchestration it sounds comparatively tame.

The "Eroica" symphony was, upon the whole, grandly played. The tempo of the Marcia funebre was particularly good, and imparted no Victor Hugo-Wagnerian flavor of grandiosity to Beethoven's grandeur. Now and then Mr. Paur brings in a rather superfine effect of accent (especially in parts of the first movement), which jars one a little; not so much of and by itself as because its preciosity seems out of keeping with his generally simple and straightforward conception of the work. But it is the fashion nowadays for conductors, so to speak, to carve their initials on every great trunk they climb in the musical forest; and perhaps we should thank Mr. Paur for carving his as inconspicuously as he has on the "Eroica," instead of covering the whole bark with them.

It was good to hear Mendelssohn's "Melusine" again. As a whole, we should hardly rank the overture with those to "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," let alone the incomparable "Hebrides"; it is a less perfectly rounded whole than any of these. But, although we find a good deal of Mendelssohn's "perishable" side in the F minor theme and the ensuing cantilena in A-flat major, "all the fresh-water mermaid" music is a dream of poetic beauty and sensuous color. And it was just these mermaid portions of the overture that the orchestra played especially well; that delicious arpeggio figure is seldom played so smoothly and flowingly and with so little obtrusive accent. The other parts seemed a thought over-hurried, and were at times rather raggedly played. The first violins added nothing to their reputation by some ungracefully jerky phrasing in the cantilena of the third theme.

The two little pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust" were simply delightfully given; nothing could have been finer than the playing, in conception as well as in execution.

Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture brought the concert to a glorious close, and was, for the most part, splendidly played. Mr. Pourtau did wonders with the episodic clarinet passage in the middle. Now and then, to be sure, Mr. Paur would take a dip into the superfine, as he did in parts of the "Eroica." That sudden pianissimo on the D-sharp major chord in the twelfth measure—making the chord come in a trifle late, to clinch the effect—is, we believe, to be credited to von Bülow; it is not indicated by Wagner (at least not in the first edition), but produces so fine an effect as to be fairly permissible. Mr. Paur perhaps overdid it a little, but that would not have mattered much, had he not taken all the zest out of the effect by unaccountably anticipating it on the F-sharp minor chord, two measures earlier. Twice is too much. But the final apotheosis of the pilgrims' chant on the six brass instruments in unison against the whirlwind in the violins was superbly done. We missed Mr. Nikisch's forcing of the horn on the F-double-sharp in the D-sharp major chord (already mentioned), which seems to us an inspiration worth perpetuating; but this, too, is an effect not down in the score, and its omission is not criticisable.

The audience's "farewell and au revoir" to Mr. Paur at the close of the concert was of the heartiest and pertinaciously expansive description. He was repeatedly called out, and with the greatest enthusiasm. We shall allow ourselves some summarizing remarks on the entire past season in a day or two.

[123]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVII., NO. 118.

SUNDAY, APRIL 28, 1895.

THE FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Large Audience Bids the Musicians Adieu Until October.

The 14th and last of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was given last night before a very large audience. The programme was:

Passacaglia for organ, in C minor.....Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by Esser.)
Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica"
Beethoven
Overture to "Die Schone Melusine".....
Mendelssohn
"Menuet des Follets".....Berlioz
"Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust".....Berlioz
Overture "Tannhauser".....Wagner

The intention of Mr. Paur was evidently to mark the mutations in musical style from the time of Bach down to the present day. If so, he was particularly felicitous in his selections; but whether so or not, the programme was one of the best and most interesting of the season. The contrasts were admirable, and though there is a wide, almost an immeasureable, gap between Bach and Wagner, the progression from the one to the other was gradual, and did no violence to any canon of pure artistic taste. Esser's arrangement of the Bach work has been heard before at these concerts, and always with renewed admiration for the skill and fine judgment with which the arranger has done his by no means easy task.

The performance was faultless; in truth, through the whole evening the work of the orchestra was surpassingly magnificent, and as fine as its playing has been the entire season, the culminating concert excelled all the others in the splendid results achieved. The symphony had one of the most impressive and satisfying interpretations that has ever been given it at these concerts. Mr. Paur's reading was equally brilliant and masterly. The funeral march was taken a trifle faster than has been usual, but it lost nothing in impressiveness of effect thereby. The scherzo was given with stirring spirit, and the horn passages in the trio were played with a smoothness and a clearness that have been seldom equalled. There was a glorious fire in the reading of the finale, and for once the poco andante was accorded its proper movement and color instead of being taken too slow. The break into the joyous coda was beautifully managed, and the judicious tempo that was observed permitted the brilliant passages for the wind instruments to come out with perfect distinctness. Mr. Paur has done nothing more sympathetic in the way of Beethoven reading than his interpretation of this symphony.

The lovely "Melusine" overture was exquisitely rendered, especially by the wind instruments, which were heard to exceptional advantage. Here again Mr. Paur is to be complimented on his judgment in regard to tempo, which forbade him to avoid that sickly sentimentality of style that is conventionally imparted to the work. The "Will-o'-the Wisp" minuet has never been heard here when it was given with such striking beauty of color and such strength of effect as marked its presentation on this occasion. It was a perfect bit of tone-painting, and was wonderfully played, notably by the wind instruments in the rollicking presto.

The performance of the "Waltz of Sylphs" was exquisitely delicate. In fact, the occasion was a "field night" for both conductor and orchestra. The applause, which had been very enthusiastic after every selection, broke into a frenzied demonstration of delight after this number, and indicated a strong desire for an encore, but it was not accorded. The familiar Wagner overture was rendered with sumptuous richness of color and largeness of effect, bringing the season gloriously to a close. When all was over the audience thundered forth plaudits, and recalled Mr. Paur three times to receive their approval of his efforts and to bid him a cordial auf wiedersehen. He could not have wished a more hearty indorsement, nor a more emphatic proof of the high place he has fairly won in the esteem of the patrons of the Symphony concert.

The opening concert of the 15th season of the orchestra will take place on Saturday evening, Oct. 19.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 28, 1895.

END OF THE SYMPHONY SEASON, ETC.

The last concert of the fourteenth Symphony season was given last night according to this programme, which stood exactly as it had been announced:—Bach, Passacaglia, in the orchestration of Esser; Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 (Eroica); Mendelssohn, Overture, "Melusine"; Berlioz, a. "Menuet des Feux-Follets," b. "Valse des Sylphes," from the "Damnation of Faust"; Wagner, Overture, "Tannhauser."

That was a sufficiently standard and familiar provision, and no single number requires any examination on its own account. The symphony has been known ever since there were orchestras, or even groups of dilettante instrumentalists, in Boston, and each of the others came hither in its earliest days and has stood by us faithfully to this hour. Comment may then confine itself to the performance and express itself in commendation.

Mr. Paur directed and the men obeyed as if they wanted to leave the best of impressions as a hopeful anticipation for next autumn and even the kettle-drummer got a little more flexibility than usual into his wrists and a little more rebound to his blows. The rolling, resonant organ character of the Bach was kept all through the variations, and these spoke out clearly both in theme and counterpoint; there was a sense of passion in the funereal adagio of the symphony, and a light spirit for its final allegro and its genially gay scherzo; the sea-strains of the "Melusine," hinting faintly at their great congeners of "Fingal's Cave," sounded sweetly and the fuller romance was warmly read; in the Berlioz excerpts there were fantasy and nicety of shading, and the waltz was so daintily touched that it fairly melted away into silence; and the Wagner overture brought all to a conclusion with tremendous tonality and energy. The large audience was much delighted and called Mr. Paur forward several times.

A summing up of the season shows that although the concerts have seldom been long, about the usual number of separate selections has been performed, the list including one hundred and sixteen. Of these Germany had more than the just share of even a very able-bodied and sound-stomached lion—eighty-nine. France claimed the majority of the remainder—fifteen; America got six chances; Russia and Scandinavia five; Italy one and England, Spain and the rest of the world, none. Only eighteen numbers were heard for the first time, which was too small a proportion; and of these a few were more curious than meritorious. There were nineteen soloists, of whom these only could claim celebrity because of a European, or even an extended American, reputation,—M. Ysaye, M. Thomson, Mr. Baermann, Mme. Melba and Miss Juch. Miss Szumoska is as yet rather in "posse" than in "esse," and the members of the Kneisel Quartette are now going to London in search of fame against next season.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, APRIL 29, 1895.

The Twenty-Fourth Concert of the Season Given in Music Hall.

The 24th and last of this season's series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Passacaglia in C minor.....Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by Heinrich Esser.)
Symphony No. 3.....Beethoven
Overture to "The Fair Melusina"....Mendelssohn
Minuet of "Will-o'-the-Wisp".....Berlioz
Waltz of Sylphs.....Berlioz
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

There are many that do not believe that the arrangement of Bach's organ compositions for the orchestra is an admirable undertaking, and the writer quite heartily agrees with this opinion. The distinctive character of the works is lost in such a proceeding, and as the repertoire of orchestral pieces is such an extensive one, there is no call for these selections, then it must be said to hear polyphony displayed there is a multiplicity of orchestral compositions that will furnish the desired opportunity.

If one accepts the Bach number in these selections then it must be said that Mr. Paur provided an excellent programme. In the matter of his reading of the numbers and the orchestra's renderings, nothing but praise can be accorded the performance. The audience was demonstrative throughout the evening, and after the magnificent performance of the "Tannhauser" overture recalled Mr. Paur many times.

The spirit of the applause was the effort on the part of the audience to impress Mr. Paur with its hearty approval of his work during the season just finished, and it was a sincere tribute to a modest, serious musician, devoid of any form of trickery; one with a musical soul and an artistic nature that stimulates him to the noblest purposes in his art. Mr. Paur may well be assured that he has gained the respect and confidence of the patrons of the symphony concerts after his two years' asssociation with the superb organization at his command.

Mr. Paur's least satisfactory work has been with the classics, which he has handled in a too robust and exaggerated manner. The performance of the third symphony of Beethoven on this occasion, however, was a decided improvement in the matter of a less boisterous interpretation and as regards a better gradation of dynamics. Could Mr. Paur study to be more delicate in the exposition of the classics and improve his ability as a programme maker, he would fill his position to the complete satisfaction of the more critical listeners, for he has few equals in the art of conducting modern compositions. At all events, Mr. Paur will be heartily welcomed when he presents himself on the evening of Saturday, Oct. 19, to begin his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a creation of our honored townsman, Mr. H. L. Higginson, whose munificence in founding and supporting this permanent organization has earned for him the gratitude of our musical community and made for him a niche high in the archives of public benefaction.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

STANDARD JUNIOR.

FRIDAY, APRIL 26, 1895.

MUSICAL BRIEFLETS.

An Old Boston Musician Talks About the Symphony Orchestra.

(Written for The Standard Junior.)

Now that you have been told, in a previous sketch, how many players constitute that great musical body, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, you, very naturally, would like to know something about the instruments that are used, what they are and how many of each separate kind are played up at these grand concerts.

There are lots of one kind—the strings—and not as many of the others, if taken separately. Now you all, of course, know what a violin is. A violin and a fiddle are generally supposed to be one and the same thing. The distinction is made only when it falls into different hands. There are violin players, and there are fiddlers. The latter will please pardon me when I say that I am now writing of violinists and true artists. Of the violins there are 16 first violins (violin primo), and 14 second violins (violin secondo).

All of the first violins sit at the left, and the second violins at the right hand of the conductor. Of violas there are 10, who sit in front and at the right of the conductor.

Now we come to the violoncellos, or 'cellos. Of these there are eight. The last of the stringed instruments, aside from the harp, which stands by itself an individual instrument, are the double basses (contra bass), of which there are eight. Then you see, including the harp, there are in all 57 stringed instruments in this immense orchestra.

Now we come to the wood-wind instruments, which are next in orchestral order. We will begin with the flutes, of which there are three—first, second, third. Often times the third fluteist has occasion to play the octave flute (kleine flote, or piccalo, so-called in German and Italian. All the remaining wood-wind instruments are the reed instruments. Of these the first in order are the clarinets (clarinette). There are of this instrument usually two—first and second. Sometimes the score calls for three, or even four. The third is often the bass clarinet. Wagner's works often call for the later. The oboe (hautbois) is the next. There are two of these—first and second. Now follows the English horn (como-anglaise), a truly magnificent instrument.

Berlioz in his charming works uses it with most thrilling effects. The last of the woodwind is the bassoon (fagott or fagotto). This is also a splendid instrument. You will know this instrument when you go to hear a symphony concert, by seeing just front of the conductor a little in the rear, two, or perhaps three, round sticks like small smokestacks pointing to the roof. It has by some been vulgarly called the "horses' leg." When three are used the added one is the bass bassoon.

Now we come to the brass wind instruments. First of these are the trumpets (trompete), of which there are three, usually, first, second, third, though sometimes four are used. Next we find the horn. Of the French horn (corno), there are a quartet, first, second, third, fourth. Eight or a double horn quartet were used in a Wagner programme of the past season. The extra four horns were brought from New York expressly to play in a Wagner selection. I speak of this as an illustration of the perfect system upon which the symphony concerts are conducted. Neither pains nor money are spared in order to insure a perfect rendering of a musical work.

Next in order are the trombones (pasaune), of which there are three—tenor, alto and bass. Four are sometimes used, the last to be mentioned of the brass wind, but by no means the least, is the bass-tuba. This is like an organ in fullness of tone; and in the hands of an artist, as in this case it is, as in truth are all the others, is a truly grand instrument.

Finishing the wind choirs, so-called, we will take up the instruments of percussion, the last to be mentioned, but usually the first to be heard, as this department in the orchestra is the home of the writer; he feels that for very many years past he has made some noise in the world, and he anxiously hopes that he may be forgiven for creating such a hubbub. First in this department must be mentioned the kettle-drum (pauken tympani). In my description of some instruments in a future article I shall dwell particularly upon the tympani, as the use of this prominent instrument is but little known. Lastly we must mention the snare drum (kleine trommel), bass drum (grosse trommel), cymbals (piatta), triangle (triangolo), tambourin, castanetts, bells(glockenspiel), and gong. Thus we have all of the orchestral instruments entire. The array of percussion instruments has been the writer's constant companion for 35 years.

Now think of it, for herein is the wonder to many, but it is only the result of thought and perfect discipline. All of these players, of so many different instruments, move at once like a huge but well-oiled machine. But, like the machine, in order to produce good results there must be a clear, brainy head and a firm guiding hand at the lever.

This the symphony orchestra bar, and the lever which guides this immense human machine, is a simple little stick of hickory in the hands of a talented artist.

WILLIAM A. FIELD.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 29, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-fourth symphony concert, the closing one of the season, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Bach: Passacaglia for Organ, in C minor.
(Arranged for Orchestra by Esser.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55.
Mendelssohn: Overture to "Die schöne Melusine," opus 32.
Berlioz: Menuet des Follets and Valse des Sylphes, from "La Damnation de Faust," opus 24.
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Before saying anything about this concert, we would correct an error in our article on the preceding one. In speaking of the performance of Cherubini's overture to "Les Deux Journées," we said in last Monday's paper: "With the setting-in of the Allegro we were astonished to find Mr. Paur suddenly begin beating a rapid Alla breve, instead of the four regular beats to the measure which are as fixed a tradition in this overture as anything in all music." Mr. Paur has since proved to us that no such tradition exists, but that, on the contrary, conductors have always beaten two beats to the measure in this Allegro. What we should have said, to express our idea exactly, was that Mr. Paur's beat (i. e., his tempo) was so rapid that it destroyed the effect to the ear of the movement's being in 4-4 time, and gave the impression of 2-2, or alla breve, time. To our question, "Where does Mr. Paur find authority for adding two trumpets to the score in the coda?" Mr. Paur replies that in his score of the overture, a very old MS. (not autograph) copy, there are two trumpet parts in the coda, and that there are printed trumpet parts among the published orchestral parts of the work. Moreover, that the overture has, certainly of late years, always been played here with trumpets. It is somewhat curious, however, that there are no trumpet parts in the original Paris (Gaveaux) edition of the full score, neither are there any in the more recent editions of Breitkopf and Härtel, and Peters. This seems to us to cast some doubt upon the authenticity of the trumpet parts. Their not being in the original edition is no decisive proof against them, for they might have been added later by the composer. But their not being included in the edition of such careful editors as Breitkopf and Härtel—even though they are included in the published "orchestral parts,"—looks as if there were some reason for doubting their authenticity. Their being in an old MS. copy of the score proves nothing; for it is well known what liberties of this sort opera conductors have taken, time out of mind. Sir Michael Costa added parts for three trombones, bass-tuba, and big-drum and cymbals to the score of Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and these spurious parts were at one time a tradition at Covent Garden in London; it is by no means unlikely that some other conductor may have taken upon himself to add trumpets to "Les Deux Journées," and that his additions have become traditional in the same way.

But, to our muttons! Esser's orchestral version of the great Bach passacaglia we have never wholly liked. No doubt the orchestra adds a good deal to an organ work of this sort; variety in coloring and at times something of greater clearness of effect in complex polyphonic passages. But it also tends to efface one of the primary features of the organ, its impassive evenness of tone and lack of accent. For one thing, it has no approximate substitute to offer for the inexhaustible solidity of tone of the organ pedals. Still, were this the only objection to Esser's arrangement, it might well be deemed unnecessarily hair-splitting; especially as an orchestral version of a work like the C minor passacaglia has the manifest advantage of bringing the stupendous composition within reach of a far larger public than would ever hear a note of it in its original shape. But we have another objection to it: considering it purely in the light of an arrangement, we find it a rather dreary and uneffective one. When Esser had made up his mind that it was really worth while to score the passacaglia for orchestra at all, we wish he had taken hold of his task more boldly and carried it out more brilliantly. He has stroked the nettle too tenderhanded; his scoring, especially in the closing fugue, is too dull-sounding and devoid of brilliancy. His orchestration is like an organ with all the mixtures left out. On the organ, with the full power of the mighty instrument gradually coming on toward the end, the passacaglia is one of the most overwhelming things we know in all music; with Esser's orchestration it sounds comparatively tame.

The "Eroica" symphony was, upon the whole, grandly played. The tempo of the Marcia funebre was particularly good, and imparted no Victor Hugo-Wagnerian flavor of grandiosity to Beethoven's grandeur. Now and then Mr. Paur brings in a rather superfine effect of accent (especially in parts of the first movement), which jars one a little; not so much of and by itself as because its preciosity seems out of keeping with his generally simple and straightforward conception of the work. But it is the fashion nowadays for conductors, so to speak, to carve their initials on every great trunk they climb in the musical forest; and perhaps we should thank Mr. Paur for carving his as inconspicuously as he has on the "Eroica," instead of covering the whole bark with them.

It was good to hear Mendelssohn's "Melusine" again. As a whole, we should hardly rank the overture with those to "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," let alone the incomparable "Hebrides"; it is a less perfectly rounded whole than any of these. But, although we find a good deal of Mendelssohn's "perishable" side in the F minor theme and the ensuing cantilena in A-flat major, "all the fresh-water mermaid" music is a dream of poetic beauty and sensuous color. And it was just these mermaid portions of the overture that the orchestra played especially well; that delicious arpeggio figure is seldom played so smoothly and flowingly and with so little obtrusive accent. The other parts seemed a thought over-hurried, and were at times rather raggedly played. The first violins added nothing to their reputation by some ungracefully jerky phrasing in the cantilena of the third theme.

The two little pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust" were simply delightfully given; nothing could have been finer than the playing, in conception as well as in execution.

Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture brought the concert to a glorious close, and was, for the most part, splendidly played. Mr. Pourtau did wonders with the episodic clarinet passage in the middle. Now and then, to be sure, Mr. Paur would take a dip into the superfine, as he did in parts of the "Eroica." That sudden pianissimo on the D-sharp major chord in the twelfth measure—making the chord come in a trifle late, to clinch the effect—is, we believe, to be credited to von Bülow; it is not indicated by Wagner (at least not in the first edition), but produces so fine an effect as to be fairly permissible. Mr. Paur perhaps overdid it a little, but that would not have mattered much, had he not taken all the zest out of the effect by unaccountably anticipating it on the F-sharp minor chord, two measures earlier. Twice is too much. But the final apotheosis of the pilgrims' chant on the six brass instruments in unison against the whirlwind in the violins was superbly done. We missed Mr. Nikisch's forcing of the horn on the F-double-sharp in the D-sharp major chord (already mentioned), which seems to us an inspiration worth perpetuating; but this, too, is an effect not down in the score, and its omission is not criticisable.

The audience's "farewell and au revoir" to Mr. Paur at the close of the concert was of the heartiest and pertinaciously expansive description. He was repeatedly called out, and with the greatest enthusiasm. We shall allow ourselves some summarizing remarks on the now past season in a day or two.

[12?]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APR. 29, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Brilliant Concert Closes the Winter's Series.

Bach's Passacaglia in C Minor, and Beethoven's Heroic Symphony Given.

Blessings brighten as they take their flight. The last concert of the symphonic series of 1894-5 seemed one of the most attractive of the season. Spite of the fact that no soloist was present, the audience was of great size, and not only remained until the end, but gave a degree of applause that grew with a steady crescendo, culminatin at the close with three enthusiastic recalls of Mr. Paur. Surely such signs are unmistakeable, the public are more than ever interested in these concerts and are satisfied with the conductor.

The programme was not made up with a view to any especial significance, but represented many schools, was chronologically progressive from Bach to Wagner, and was calculated to display the many-sided talents of the conductor and the versatility of the orchestra in a thorough fashion. It began with Esser's arrangement of Bach's "Passacaglia" in C minor, which, doleful though the theme might be, was yet very interesting in its contrapuntal devices and served to pass each department of the orchestra in review in the different variations. Bach seems to have had an affection for the slow-paced Passacaglia although he never gives the inflated style of the old dance. The Passacaglia has been much misunderstood ;when one remembers that it was a posturing dance rendered by one or two Spanish grandees at the court, and given in full costume, with plumed hat, velvet mantle, belted sword and spurred boots, one can readily understand that the Spanish words, "Passer Calle" ("running the streets") do not give the origin of the movement. The name is probably of Latin or Italian origin, and if we derive it from "Passo Gallo" ("Rooster step") we shallb e much nearer its true spirit, which was decidedly bombastic, a more emphatic and grandiloquent Sarabande.

The work, which is excellently scored, was remarkably well performed and received much applause.

Then came Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony," which was given a most spirited performance. This work might be called the beginning of the modern symphonic school as well as the first revelation of the true Beethoven. Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony,"the loftiest symphony of the 18th century, still leans to the antique spirit in its fugal touches, and Beethoven's first and second symphonies still cling to the skirts of Hadyn. The first movement was the best read of the work; here Mr. Paur gave all the struggleand combat that any one could desire, yet with good discretion, too, for that disonant entrance of the horn, with the chief figure against an irreconcileable harmony in the strings, was toned down by making the former prominent and the violins almost inaudible.

The second movement (the Funeral March) was taken at a brisk pace, more rapid that we have yet heard it; compared with Mr. Henschel's reading in years gone by, it was a greyhound against a snail. There were no tears in the interpretation, spite of the excellent playing of that instrument of grief, the oboe. One cannot but admire the discretion with which the oboe is employed; a tearful maiden is indicated, but no Mrs. Gummidge, and the feminine sorrow of the oboe is immediately contrasted with the masculine brooding of the cello. It is strange that Beethoven never used the true instrument of melancholy, the English horn(his Trio, Op. 87, scarcely worth the playing, probably had an Oboe di Caccia, instead of English horn, for its bass), for here he would have found one appropriate use for this greater oboe, and in the horn-calls after the thunder-storm of the Pastoral symphony (another). The mourners in this performance of the Funeral March planted their hero with a haste that suggested a death from Asiatic cholera, and that final sigh of the whole orchestra was made emphatic enough to fulfil Pope's sigh "from Indus to the pole;" it was a cyclonic upheaval of grief.

Then came the Scherzo, splendidly played, bright as summer and clear as an Italian lake; a puzzling Scherzo in so earnest a work, but perhaps Berlioz's solution is right, and it represents the chattering world going on with its bargaining, its hilarity, its everyday pleasures, after the hero is dead, but one can hear the clash of swords in some of its measures spite of the Frenchman's estimate. The horn trio was again more rapid than it is generally performed, and it was rather powerful than pensive, but there were no breaks to condone in these difficult measures. Yet these same measures cannot be heard today with the Beethoven tone-color. The reviewer may heave one sigh (as strong as that which blew out the Funeral March) for the natural horn (Wald-horn) which was in vogue in the early part of the century; today the players do not even set their ventil-horns in E flat, but transpose the whole affair upon their horns in F, thus giving key-tones (always poorer than those played on brasses as natural tones, without the use of keys) almost all through the passage.

A powerful and generally well-played finale followed. A few slips of ensemble were noticeable, but not enough to spoil the undoubted virility of the reading. Mr. Paur brought out the latent heroism of this movement much more than mny conductors do. Generally one wonders why Beethoven did not fit the Finale of the fifth symphony (trombones and all) to this warlike work. We have not often heard the variations so clearly given as they were on this occasion. Delightfully contrasted with such stern measures was the "Melusina" overture, which followed. Here everything was daintiness and grace, and the wood-wind (which is largely in the foreground) distinguished itself. It spoke volumes for the versatility of both conductor and orchestra that they could turn from the "Eroica" to such an overture and make a success in both. Here is programme music in the best guise; one need not follow Schumann and see coral-caves, marine monsters and singing mermaids in its measures, nor need one accept the dry and sarcastic remark of its composer, Mendelssohn, (rebuking the preceding opinion)—"It only pictures a mesalliance!"—but steer between these two extremes and enjoy its suggestions and its romantic themes and the symmetery of their treatment.

Now came Berlioz's Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps, which we have heard much more daintily given in these concerts. Everything was clear, but those will-o'-the-wisps were as powerful and prosaic as New Jersey mosquitoes, although one must pay tribute to the crisp, spicy performance of the piccolo. The Waltz of the Sylphs went much better, although it began rather loudly, but the work of the muted violins and the harp deserves enthusiastic adjectives, and the ending was ineffably dainty.

That splendid example of the wedding of classical form and dramatic fervor, the "Tannhaeuser" overture, closed the concert and the season. It was finely played, its only fault being that in the great climax (one of the finest in all the overture repertoire) the violins anticipated the conductor's beat and were disposed to hurry the pace, and they were somewhat overshadowed by the great force of the trombones. But it was an inspiring performance altogether, and at its end the audience recalled Mr. Paur to the platform three times with every indication of appreciation and gratitude. One would have been glad to have seen the founder of these concerts, who has unostentatiously done so much for our musical progress, by his side.

It is scarcely necessary to sum up the results of the orchestral season since Mr. Paur's work stands for itself. Lacking Mr. Gericke's hand of iron in a glove of velvet(and Mr. Gericke must ever be remembered as the man who weeded our mucical garden and first made a Boston orchestra that was really great) without the caprice and elasticity of Nikisch, not possessing the programme-making power of a Henschel, fightin against peculiar difficulties unknown to any of these conductors and scarcely dreamed of by the public, Mr. Paur has still made definite progress and has elevated the orchestra from the slough into which it was falling; its discipline is restored, its ensemble has returned. Mr. Paur is not a man who is likely to stand still; constant growth is one of his characteristics, and our orchestra and symphonic programmes are likely to grow with him as the difficulties in his path grow less. The chief points in which one might expect betterment in the immediate future are in the matter of programme-making (for some of the lists have been very heterogeneous) and in a display of greater care, or of less good-heartedness, in the selection of soloists for such dignified concerts as are given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Louis C. Elson.

STANDARD JUNIOR.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 24, 1895.

MUSICAL BRIEFLETS.

An Old Boston Musician Talks About the Symphony Orchestra.

(Written for The Standard Junior.)

Music!—the tender child of rudest times,—
The gentle native of all land and climes,—
Who hymns alike man's cradle and his grave,
Lulls the low cot or peals along the wave.
—Norton.

As one who, for a number of years, has been a player in that grand musical organization famously known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I desire for the benefit and, as well, for the information of the readers of The Junior to herein relate some doings of interest regarding this great body of musicians which it is hoped will serve both to amuse and instruct. In this series of sketches I shall describe many things which you really ought to know, provided you desire to keep posted on prominent affairs.

First, I shall inform you how the orchestra is made up, or, technically speaking, its ensemble. In subsequent sketches I shall speak of other interesting matters, as for example, the many and various nations that are represented therein; the instruments used and something about them; its great and world-renowned directors and conductors; its concerts at home and in distant cities; the orchestra on its southern trips, and all about how we travel, together with incidents of the same. In fact, such will be related concerning the great orchestra as will interest not only those of a musical turn of mind but all of the young readers who desire information regarding one of the grandest instrumental organizations in the known world.

The Symphony orchestra numbers 85 performers, and is consequently the largest concrete body of musicians under one lead in the United States or in all America. Extra players are sometimes added, augmenting it to 90 or more. The latter number is sometimes required in the works of Wagner (pronounced Varkner), Berlioz—the latter a famous French composer—and others.

Now, for one to say that our little—so called by New Yorkers—village of Boston has, in this musical body of men, one of the very best orchestras in the country, seems like big talk, doesn't it? Well, if the words of many of the great musical artists and critics as well are to be believed, such is the fact. Moreover, many who have travelled abroad, and as well many European musicians—Paderewski the great pianist being one of the number— say that the magnificent and finished playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never been surpassed by any orchestra in the world.

Now, my young friends, are you not proud of the fact that, through the untiring energy and the persistent efforts of a highly distinguished and noble hearted citizen of Boston, we have here, in slow going New England, in the capital city of glorious old Massachusetts, a permanent musical institution in the Boston Symphony Orchestra which, as well as being a lasting honor to its generous founder, is the pride of the citizens of our grand old commonwealth.

W. A. FIELD.
Stoneham, Mass.

STANDARD JUNIOR.
TUESDAY, APRIL 30, 1895.

MUSICAL BRIEFLETS.

An Old Boston Musician Talks About the Symphony Orchestra.

Now, that we have given the several different choirs of musicians, with their respective instruments, their positions in this great orchestra, it is fitting that our readers should be made acquainted with some of the prominent personages.

We will begin with the officials who are in charge of the business end of the organization, and upon whom rests much of the responsibility regarding its movements.

The first, whom courtesy demands should be mentioned is Boston's public-spirited citizen, Mr. Henry L. Higginson, who, at great personal sacrifice, established this great musical body and made it what it now is, a permanent Boston institution, whose mission it is, and ever has been, to both entertain and educate.

Mr. Higginson's first officer and a thoroughly efficient one, is Mr. Charles A. Ellis. His duties are manifold and are of a nature that requires most skilful judgment and executive ability, both of which he possesses in full. Mr. Ellis as a grand concert manager is well and widely known.

The next in command as second officer and assistant manager is Mr. F. R. Comee, whose duty is principally to act as manager of the out-of-town concerts, and those of the trips. Upon these occasions the managerial mantle well becomes him, and he bears it in a manner which is creditable both to his superior officer, Mr. Ellis, and to himself. Genial and facetious Fred! Long may he live to "trip" it!

Now we will return to the orchestra. Before proceeding further, allow me, please, to introduce one, who of all others is the central figure of the orchestra and upon whom rests responsibilities that but few would care to be encumbered with—Mr. Emil Paur.

Now, please don't call this name Pawr. Give the a u the same sound as o w; add an e, and you have it—Power. And a power he most assuredly is when he stands before the orchestra with that wee little stick, his baton, in hand. Mr. Paur, as all must know, is the orchestral director or conductor.

In Germany the conductor of a grand concert is called Kappelle-meister. But this title, I am told, is in most cases applied to conductors of the court orchestras in concerts and theatres that are patronized by the royal families and the nobility. It may not be out of place at this point to state that the former conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, holds the position of court orchestra conductor at Budapest, Hungary.

Of Mr. Pauer's great ability as a conductor and of his kindly nature I shall speak in future sketches.

Next I will introduce Mr. Kneisel. Now some pronounce it "Nisel," others "Neesel." Properly, it is nither nor nether, but it is "Ka-nisel," as if one would say ka-nife in the place of "nife." I am not a German tutor, or even scholar, but I desire to post the readers of The Junior on German names in order that they may be up with the times.

Mr. Kneisel, who, as a violinist, ranks among the first and best of the world's great artists, is the concert-meister or concert leader, and is, as well, the leading solo violinist. Many of you, presumably, have listened to his delightful and soulful playing.

We will now bring forward the name of one, who from the nature of his duties, is but seldom seen, but who is, none the less, a very essential personage, Mr. Johann Sanerquell! There's a name for you, my young friends. As the English translation of it is not quite as sweet as some, I will ask you to look it up. Quell translated is spring-of-water, and sour is not sweet.

It is Mr. Sanerquell who has the entire charge of the enormous library of music, and, in consequence, is the librarian. Room No. 10 is his workshop, the library. In this room are to be seen all of the works which are performed at the Symphony concerts. There are large shelves loaded down with scores and orchestral parts each and every one catalogued. So methodically arranged are they that our friend, the librarian, could go in the dark and select, at a moment's notice, any work which might hastily be required.

The orchestral parts and the scores,—the latter are used by Mr. Paur to conduct from,—each have their separate shelves. The system is absolutely perfect. Mr. Sanerquell is very sedate and earnest, when attending to his duties. But, when off duty is as hilarious and frolicsome as a youth.

As we have now everything ready I think we might have a rehearsal. We will appoint our rehearsal—on paper—for next Friday morning, and we hope all of the Junior readers will be on hand to attend it.

W. A. FIELD.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 1, 1895.

BOSTON, Mass., April 28, 1895.

THIS was the program of the 24th and the last concert of the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony concert, the second year of the reign of Mr. Emil Paur: Passacaglia for organ, Bach-Esser; Eroica Symphony, Beethoven; overture, The Fair Melusina, Mendelssohn; Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, and Waltz of Sylphs, from Damnation of Faust, Berlioz; overture to Tannhäuser, Wagner.

* * *

The last concert of the Symphony Orchestra is regarded as the end of the season. It is true the Cecelia will give a concert with a miscellaneous program next week, and there may be a scattering of pianists or singers who will chirp now that the rage and the fury of the storm are over.

It is generally the custom to review the season. The day may come when such reviews will be on the stage and not in print. Thus the last Symphony concert of a series might be devoted to a good natured burlesque of the more striking features of preceding concerts, imitations of Thomson and Ysaye, view of the kettledrum man at practice or Mr. Paur in the act of imitating himself. Was there not such a custom in the free days of antiquity on the Island of Selpos after a trilogy had moved mightily the men and quickened women? Such a review would disarm all retroactive or reminiscent criticisms, promote general hilarity and insure the delights of Jamaica Plain to Mr. Paur. For if anybody—some foreigner, some stray critic from New York—should say, "But don't you find your Mr. Paur a little logy, pardon me, just a little awkward in the impassioned moments, and I don't see how the players always understand his beat," the Bostonian could say to the envious man, "Don't you suppose Mr. Paur knows all this? You should see his imitation of himself directing a romantic tone picture."

Of course preparations should be made very carefully for this summing up. A variety star should be in Music Hall during the season, whenever a woman sings or plays, that the imitations may be particular, not general. The prices of admission should of course be raised. I wonder why Mr. Higginson has not thought of such an entertainment. I fear he is too conservative. Just because there has never been such a review in the Gewandhaus, we are now deprived of the pleasure.

* * *

Looking over the files of a newspaper in order to sum up the results of a musical season is dreary work, not unlike the perfunctory attention paid to mutton the third day by the victim of harassing domesticity. These artists, the talk of the hour, are so quickly forgotten! These masterpieces of composition are soon so vague and shadowy! You start in conscientiously, and rub your eyes, and say, "Why, did Jones play that concerto? I had no recollection of it." You find you wrote warm paragraphs about Smith's great symphonic poem Oscar Wilde, and for the life of you you cannot remember the first theme or the canon recte et retro that so pleased the professors.

Now it would be a far more delightful task to review Pansebêia, or a View of all Religions in the World, by Alexander Ross. I picked up a sixth edition the other day. It has a fleur-de-lis on each cover. As it appeared in 1683 a detailed criticism might appear as belated to those weak in understanding. And yet the account of John Buckhold or John of Leyden might be used in commenting on the revival of Meyerbeer's Prophet. It would be a pleasure to recall the adventures of John Tuysent-Schrever, who went sounding a trumpet through all the streets, thereby inviting to Buckhold's palace, and how when the guests were assembled, the great prophet "gave to everyone a loaf of unleavened bread, saying, 'Take, eat and celebrate the Lord's death'; which done, the Queen in like manner carried about a cup, by which ceremony, the Supper of the Lord, or rather that Scene of pleasure, wantonness, and temerity, was certainly very frolickly celebrated."

Or I should like to talk about a "Dissertation on the Art of Singing and its Teaching" that I read the other day. Here are one or two extracts from this learned work:

"For the piano, one must examine the bearing, and the mechanism which gives vigor, and the skill necessary to arrive at good execution.

"Many people, if asked, discountenance singing in a young girl, with the excuse that she is weak in the chest.

"The pupil is tired even in speaking. The professor becomes afraid, accuses his temperament or some other cause. Error!!! It is he who is the author of all these disorders, by his ignorance and his indelicacy in teaching what he has never understood.

"I come to establish myself in——. I wished in this manner to announce my intention. The experience and the results I obtained, as an artist and as a professor, enable me to dispense with all false modesty. I am, and I know, and shall prove it here, or elsewhere."

* * *

We do not prepare ourselves artistically for the hearing of music. The concert is at 8. The hearer is full of meat. Unless he has his own carriage or is fond of walking, and so has an earlier dinner, he is the sport of the street car. Nine cases out of ten he enters the hall flurried, with arrested, complaining digestion. The hall—say it is Music Hall, Boston. There are draughts, or the air still retains the athletic flavor of the panting crowd that saw violently the tenth round between "The Red Eyed Whirlwind" and "Mysterious Billy Smith"; for Music Hall, oh! foreign wondering reader, is not exclusively the Temple of Music. At concerts men come out upon the platform. They are all in swallow-tail coats. They wear white neckties. The leader appears. The hearer is pitched suddenly into a sea of music.

There is an artist—painter, not tonsorial, not chiropodical—by the name of Simmons—Edward Emerson Simmons. He lives in New York, I believe, and you would probably find him this very night at the Players.' Simmons was fond of saying that the sight of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the stage of Music Hall was profoundly inartistic. Costume, arrangement, background, the obtrusiveness of the instruments—all these almost prevented any genuine æsthetic enjoyment. Call him not whimsical. Quote not Pudor and say "Plagiarist"; for Simmons formulated these thoughts before Pudor's book excited the ridicule of the conventional. Simmons is right. Music is enjoyed in spite of its conditions.

Now I do not say that Mr. Otto Roth should wear a red wig, or that the legs of Mr. Timothée Adamowski should be incased in bloom-colored breeches, or that Mr. Paur should wear a sword (for ornament, of course, not discipline); but it would be fairer and better for music if the players were not seen. Not that they should be buried; but let them play behind tapestry or thick folds of stage-gauze and in a half-light. The applause, the flowers, the bowing and the scraping, the gossip, the flutter caused by the knowledge that the conductor's hair was cut during the week, the sight of men with puffed cheeks blowing into instruments of brass and wood, the juggler with drumsticks, the gloved hand of the tuba player—all these, and such as these, rob music of its subtle and pervasive power.

The hearer should prepare himself for the concert; he should chasten or stimulate his body and his mind. Is the orchestra to play the overture Phèdre or Sakuntala? Champagne and oysters should precede; or a midday breakfast at a French restaurant and an afternoon spent with a French novelist of the school that delighted Gray. If you see announced on the program a 'cello concerto by Johannes Losbein (cadenza by Carl Reinecke), eat a boiled New England dinner at 1, smoke a pipe of perique, sleep till 6:30, then take an absinthe. The better music of Beethoven should be heard near the ocean. The Pastoral symphony would be heard to complete advantage in Putney, Vermont. I have never been there, but the town and the symphony surely go together.

* * *

Crack! We are far away from the Symphony concert, the twenty-fourth, the last of the season. Mr. Paur, by the way, goes to Europe in a fortnight, and his wife goes with him. The Promenade concerts will begin Saturday evening, May 11. Mr. Antonio De Novellis will be the conductor. The program will no doubt be well chosen, and the orchestra, made up of Symphony players, will surely be be excellent. I have great faith in Mr. De Novellis. I hope that the beer will be better, and it should be cheaper. But as regards beer Boston is a village, in spite of its arrogant boast that it is the musical centre of the universe. I know of only two places in town where the beer is fit to drink, and in one of these it is imported.

* * *

Apropos of beer, let me call your attention to the fact that Mr. Paur ended his second year with a pyrotechnical display in which he was the chief figure. The orchestra played superbly and the conductor showed a fire as well as a poetic spirit that surprised me. He was momentarily possessed of a large stock of temperament.

"Yet who would have thought the old man to have had so much blood in him?"

I hear Mr. Krehbiel murmuring "A dallier with dances," and the Tribune sage goes back to his beloved volumes on folk lore. As for Mr. Henderson, he would not believe this statement concerning temperament were I to send on sworn affidavits of some of the most respectable citizens of Boston.

The concert was really a fine one. So far, it was the best of the season. Perhaps it is unfortunate, then, that it was the last.

* * *

Bach's Passacaglia in its original form is a stumbling block to many organists, not so much for the difficulty of performance as for the problem of registration. I do not believe the piece was written for the organ, but let us waive that question. In Germany there is a quarrel about the variations. Some say, "Make a gradual crescendo from the beginning, and play the Thema fugatum with full organ." Stuff and nonsense! In the first place, is there any fugue that should be proclaimed as to its dux with full organ, 16 foot stops and mixtures? Perish the thought! To me Esser solved his problem admirably without introducing impertinent modernity. The discreet instrumentation furnishes sufficient contrasts without inducing forgetfulness of Bach.

How Buxtehudisch this Passacaglia is! Do you know the Passacaglio (sic), the ciacona in C minor, and the ciacona in E minor by Dietrich Buxtehude, the Dane, born in Elsinor, of a father who was organist of Saint-Olaf? No wonder that Dietrich was a romanticist, born out of due time. How modern, for instance, are measures 86–93 of the ciacona in E minor; how full of vague longing, twilight confessions, unconscious sensuousness are passages in fugues, as well as in the freer pieces!

"Perhaps the plaintive numbers flow
For old, unhappy, far-off things."

And does anyone claim for a moment that these pieces by Buxtehude should be played in the full organ throughout? Yes there are German pedants, with dust stuffed eyes and horny ears, that so insist.

In some of the music of the father I hear the complaining voice of the daughter. Here is the title of the story for you: "The Love-Longings of Miss Buxtehude." You remember that whoever succeeded the father as organist at Lubeck was obliged to marry the organist's daughter. Händel, Mattheson, Bach were all in Lubeck; no one of them yearned for the place. When the two first saw her she was thirty-four years old; when Bach went to Lubeck she was thirty-six. Was the poor girl fair or foul? Did she care for organ playing? Think of her lot. She was set apart, reserved for an organist. Mattheson was a dashing blade; did she not cast favorable eyes on him? Perhaps the man she really loved played so badly that the father shook his head. There was one that was braver than the others, Johann Christian Schieferdecker. She did not long survive the marriage.

But I am wandering again. 'Tis the spring.

"Make me over, Mother April,
When the sap begins to stir."

* * *

A man named Pirro has written an interesting book entitled "L'Orgue de Jean-Sebastian Bach." It is published by the Libraire Fischbacher, Paris, 1895, and Widor has contributed to it a capital preface.

* * *

I have heard organists—and good ones—make in the Passacaglia an accelerando, very gradually, of course. Mr. Paur was wiser. With the exception of a natural ritard the tempo, a little slower than that of the old fashioned minuet, was inexorably maintained.

* * *

Admirable, thoroughly admirable was the performance of the Eroica. The pieces played were all familiar. To speak of the performance of them in detail would be to indulge in eulogy. And the music itself is after all of more importance than the manner in which it was played, unless the performance stultifies the music and makes it a vain thing.

* * *

I intended to write you a long review of the season. Perhaps you will receive it next week. Perhaps you will never receive it. For the season was in the main uneventful. The soloists at the symphony concerts were: Singers, Miss Juch, Mrs. Eaton, Miss Franklin, Mr. Schott, Mrs. Melba, Mr. Max Heinrich, Moss Clarke; pianists, Mr. Baermann, Mrs. Lent, Mr. Huss, Mrs. Beach, Miss Szumowska; violinists, Messrs. Ysaye, Thomson, Loeffler, Kneisel, Schnitzler; flutist, Mr. Molé; 'cellist, Mr. Schroeder. Of these nineteen soloists, five are members of the Symphony orchestra. The list of singers as well as that of pianists is remarkably weak. To name names would be unnecessarily unkind, but several who appeared on the stage of Music Hall had no business to take part in a Symphony concert.

Mr. Paur is not a skillful program maker. At one time he seems to be a victim to the belief that a concert should be an educational matter, and so there is the idea of "epoch grouping" and "the history of music told in an evening." At another time he draws apparently at random, and, like the bassoonist in the minstrel show, when asked "What are you going to play?" he answers, "Anything that comes out."

The music heard for the first time at these concerts was: Chadwick—Symphony No. 3. Sgambati—Symphony No. 1. Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6 (Pathétique). Benoit—Symphonic poem for flute and orchestra. Smetana—Symphonic poem, Sarka. Goldmark—Overture, Sappho. Dvorák—Overture, Carneval. Strube—Overture, Maid of Orleans. Reinecke—Overture, Der Gouverneur von Tours. Goetz—Overture, Spring. Schubert—Overture in Italian style, in D. Auber—Overture, Le Part du Diable. Auber—Overture, L'Enfant Prodigue. Marschner—Overture, Hans Heiling. Langer—Introduction to opera, Dornroschen. Mozart—Serenade for wind instruments. Brahms—Serenade for small orchestra. Huss—Concerto for piano, B major. Loeffler—Divertimento for violin, A minor. Kahn—Elegy, in C minor. H. W. Parker—Cahal Mór. Dvorák—Waldesruhe, for 'cello. Klengel—Capriccio for 'cello. Monsigny—Chaconne and Rigodon. Strauss—Moto Perpetuo. Knorr—Variations on Ukraine folk song.

You see our novelties come late.

Mr. Paur was applauded most enthusiastically last evening. The tribute was undoubtedly sincere. The Symphony audience respects his sincerity, modesty, industry and sound musical qualities. They that do not join in this tribute are certain composers and certain members—one or two of them prominent—of the orchestra.

PHILIP HALE.

BRATTLE HALL, : : CAMBRIDGE.

:::::1895:::::

Monday Evening, April 15, at 8.

Second Concert

BY

The :: Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL. L. SVECENSKI.
OTTO ROTH. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Programme.

SGAMBATI. QUARTET in D-flat major, op. 17.
Adagio. — Vivace ma non troppo. — Prestissimo. — Andante sostenuto. — Allegro.

C. M. LOEFFLER. QUINTET (in one movement) for three VIOLINS, VIOLA, and VIOLONCELLO.
Third Violin, Mr. WILLIAM KRAFFT.

SCHUBERT. QUARTET in D minor, op. posth.
Allegro. — Andante con moto. — Molto vivace. — Presto.

The Third and last Concert is Tuesday, April 23.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

THURSDAY, APRIL 25, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

PAINE. SYMPHONIC POEM. "An Island Fantasy." op. 45.
This composition was suggested by the remembrance of summer days at the sea-side, amid the varying moods of ocean-life:—the soothing calm and murmur of the sea, gentle breezes and rippling waves, alternating with surge and storm.

SCHUBERT. UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.

BEETHOVEN. a) CLÄRCHEN'S DEATH, from "Egmont," op. 84,
b) MARCIA ALLA TURCA, from "Die Ruinen von Athen," op. 113.

LISZT. RHAPSODIE HONGROISE No. 2, in D minor.
(Scored for ORCHESTRA by LISZT and DOPPLER).

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 4, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

WEBER. OVERTURE. "Der Freischütz."

HANDEL. RECITATIVE AND ARIA. "Deeper and Deeper Still," and "Waft Her Angels."

RAFF. SYMPHONY No. 3, in F major. "In the Woods."
PART I. IN THE DAYTIME. Impressions and sensations: Allegro.
PART II. AT TWILIGHT. a) Revery: Largo.
b) Dance of Dryads: Allegro assai. — Poco meno mosso.
PART III. AT NIGHT. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt, with FRAU HOLLE (Hulda) and WOTAN. Daybreak: Allegro.

GOUNOD. ARIA. "Salve Dimora," from "Faust."

DELIBES. BALLET MUSIC. "Sylvia."
a) Prelude, Les Chasseuresses.
b) Intermezzo et Valse lente.
c) Pizzicati.
d) Cortege de Bacchus.

Soloist:

Mr. BEN. DAVIES.

The Piano is a Steinway.

Owing to the unavoidable absence of a principal player, the "Island Fantasy," announced for this Concert, cannot be performed. The Overture "Der Freischütz" is substituted.

Tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 25.

BRATTLE HALL, : : CAMBRIDGE.

:::::1895:::::

Wednesday Evening, March 27, at 8.

First Concert

BY

The : : Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL. L. SVECENSKI.
OTTO ROTH. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Mr. Leon Pourtau, assisting.

Programme.

BORODINE. QUARTET in D major.
Allegro moderato.—Scherzo (Allegro).—Notturno (Andante).—Finale (Andante: Vivace.)

BRAHMS. QUINTET FOR CLARINET, TWO VIOLINS, VIOLA, AND VIOLONCELLO, in B minor, op. 115.
Allegro.—Adagio.—Andantino.—Con moto.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in C minor, op. 18.
Allegro ma non tanto.—
Andante scherzoso quasi allegretto.—
Scherzo (Allegretto).—Allegro.

The date of the next Concert is April 15.

City Hall, Portland.

SEASON 1894--95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

(HIS FIRST APPEARANCE IN PORTLAND.)

ONLY CONCERT.

TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 16, AT 8.

Programme.

J. K. PAINE. SYMPHONIC POEM, "An Island Fantasy," op. 45.
(By request.)

This composition was suggested by the remembrance of summer days at the seaside, amid the varying moods of ocean-life:—the soothing calm and murmur of the sea, gentle breezes and rippling waves, alternating with surge and storm.

WAGNER. PRIZE SONG from "Die Meistersinger."

DVOŘÁK. SYMPHONY in E minor, op. 95, "From the New World."
I. Adagio. — Allegro molto.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace, — Trio.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.

GOUNOD. ARIA. "Salve Dimora," from "Faust."

WAGNER. a) PRELUDE TO ACT III., "Tannhäuser."

WAGNER. b) PRELUDE TO ACT III., "Lohengrin."
(By request.)

LISZT-DOPPLER. HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY, No. 2.

Soloist:

Mr. BEN DAVIES.

EDWARD BRADBURY, PRINTER, 248 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, April 8, at 8.

Eighth Concert

[The Last of the Season.]

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

Mrs. Emil Paur assisting.

Programme.

ROBERT KAHN. PIANO TRIO in E major, op. 19,
Allegro. — Andante. — Allegro con fuoco.
(First time.)

SCHUBERT. FANTASIE for PIANO and VIOLIN, in C major, op. 159.
Andante molto. — Allegretto. — Andantino. — Allegro.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in C-sharp minor, op. 131,
Adagio ma non troppo e molto espressivo;
Allegro molto vivace; Allegro moderato;
Andante ma non troppo e molto cantabile. —
Presto; Adagio quasi un poco andante; Allegro.

The Piano is a Steinway.

[127]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, March 12, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, March 20, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Single tickets for the sixth concert, at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall. . . . . .

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, March 18, at 8.

Seventh Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

Miss Gertrude Franklin, Soprano,
Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen, Pianist.

Programme.

SCHUMANN. — QUARTET in A major op. 41, No. 1.
Assai sostenuto. — Allegro molto moderato.— Assai agitato. — Adagio molto. — Molto allegro.

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a) EMIL PAUR. — HUETE DICH.
b) BIZET. — AUBADE.
c) BIZET. — CHANSON D' AVRIL.
d) HENSCHEL. — SPRING.

DVOŘÁK. — PIANO QUINTET in A major, op. 81.
Allegro ma non tanto. — Dumka, (Andante con moto). — Scherzo, (Furiant, molto vivace.) — Finale. (Allegro).

THE PIANO IS A KNABE.

Eighth and Last Concert, Monday, April 8.

BRATTLE HALL
CAMBRIDGE

Wednesday, March 27
Monday, April 15
Tuesday, April 23
} Evenings at 8 o'clock

Three Concerts
by the
Kneisel Quartet

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin
L. SVECENSKI, Viola
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of three concerts, $3.00. On sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, March 23.

C. A. ELLIS,

[128]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, March 12, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

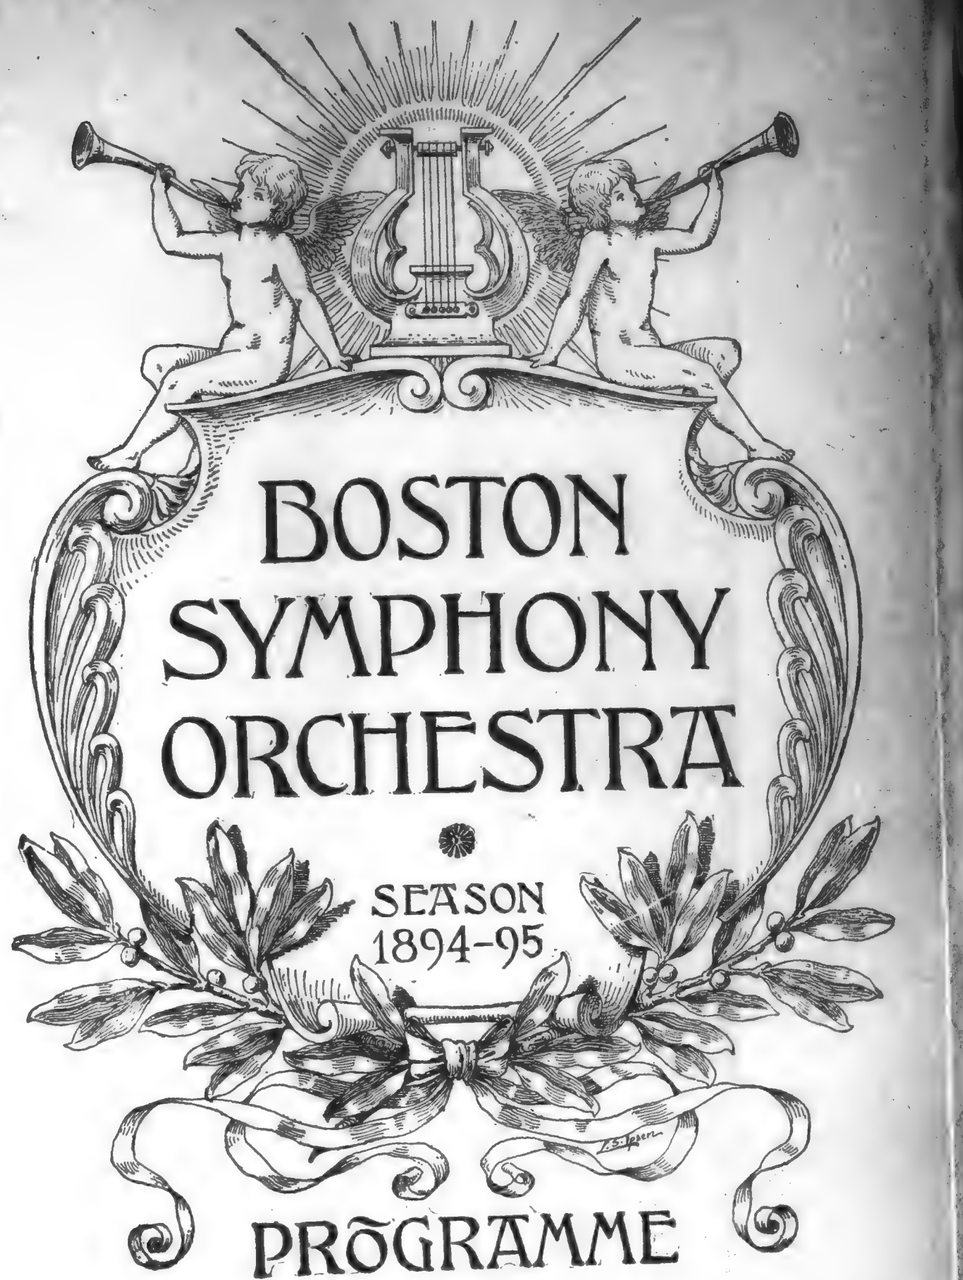
5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, March 20, at 8 o'clock.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Single tickets for the sixth concert, at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall. . . . . .

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, March 18, at 8.

Seventh Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

Miss Gertrude Franklin, Soprano,
Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen, Pianist.

Programme.

SCHUMANN. QUARTET in A major op. 41, No. 1.
Assai sostenuto. — Allegro molto moderato. — Assai agitato. — Adagio molto. — Molto allegro.

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a) EMIL PAUR. HUETE DICH.
b) BIZET. AUBADE.
c) BIZET. CHANSON D' AVRIL.
d) HENSCHEL. SPRING.

DVORÁK. PIANO QUINTET in A major, op. 81.
Allegro ma non tanto. — Dumka, (Andante con moto). — Scherzo, (Furiant, molto vivace.) — Finale. (Allegro).

THE PIANO IS A KNABE.

Eighth and Last Concert, Monday, April 8.

BRATTLE HALL
——— CAMBRIDGE

Wednesday, March 27
Monday, April 15
Tuesday, April 23
} Evenings at 8 o'clock

Three Concerts
by the
Kneisel Quartet

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin
L. SVECENSKI, Viola
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

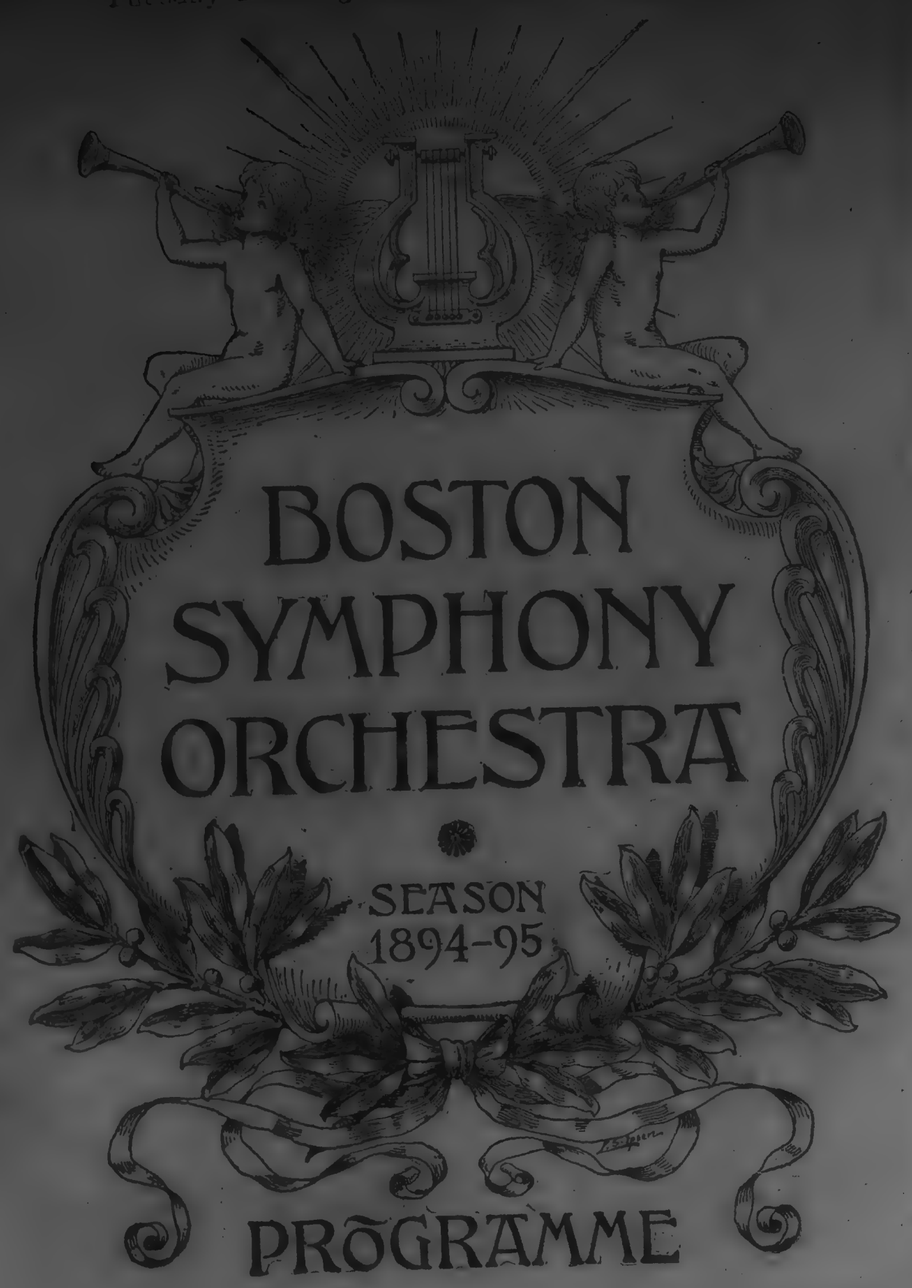
Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of three concerts, $3.00. On sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, March 23.

C. A. ELLIS,

[128]

METZEROTT'S MUSIC HALL, . . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, March 12, at 8.15 precisely.



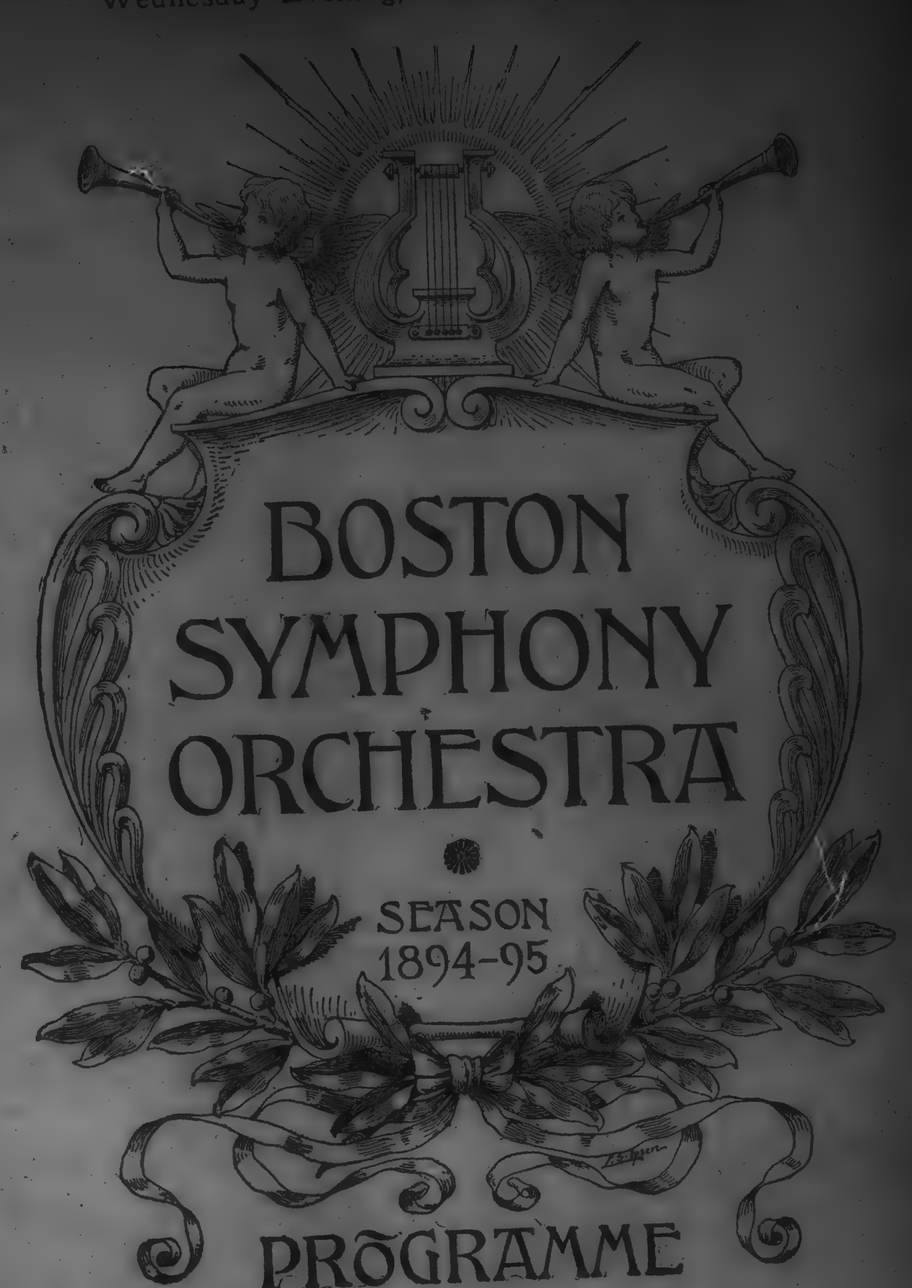
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, March 20, at 8 o'clock.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Single tickets for the sixth concert, at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall. . . . . .

"In all these works the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his fellows was quite beyond praise, altogether lovely in tone and sentiment, and finished in execution. The audience was rapturous in its applause, after each movement."— N. Y. Tribune.

"It is not too much to say that the Beethoven quartet was played divinely."— N. Y. Times.

"This Quartet [Kneisel] is the greatest in America; and, allied to its beauty of tone production,— a true quartet tone,— its interpretations are always significant and truthful."— N. Y. Recorder.

"Everything that Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski, and Schroeder select is sure to be well played."— N. Y. Evening Post.

"The fifth quartet of the series which forms Beethoven's Op. 18 was given with a perfection that aroused the audience (which was as large as the hall would allow) to the most fervid applause at the end of each movement. Such marvellous ensemble, such exquisite shading, require something more graphic than type for adequate description."— Boston Advertiser.

"The Dvořák quartet was given with a perfection that makes all criticism ridiculous. Never have the Kneisels done a finer piece of artistic work."— Boston Transcript.

"It is no hyperbole to say that the playing of the Kneisel Quartet at their fourth concert was perfect."— Boston Beacon.

I. CONCERT.

Wednesday Evening, March 27.

PROGRAMME.

BORODINE . . . . . Quartet in D major

Allegro moderato — Scherzo (Allegro) — Notturno (Andante) — Finale (Andante; Vivace).

BRAHMS Quintet for Clarinet, two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello, in B minor, Op. 115

(Clarinet, Mr. LEON POURTAU.)

Allegro — Adagio — Andantino — Con moto.

BEETHOVEN . . . . . Quartet in C minor, Op. 18

Allegro ma non tanto — Andante scherzoso quasi allegretto — Scherzo (Allegretto) — Allegro.

II. CONCERT.

Monday Evening, April 15.

PROGRAMME.

SGAMBATI . . . . . Quartet in D-flat major, Op. 17

C. M. LOEFFLER Quintet (in one movement) for three Violins, Viola, and Violoncello

(Third Violin, Mr. WM. KRAFFT.)

SCHUBERT . . . . . Quartet in D minor, Op. posth.

III. CONCERT.

Tuesday Evening, April 23.

PROGRAMME.

HANS KOESSLER . . . . . Quartet

BEETHOVEN . . . . . Quartet in E-flat major, Op. 47

SCHUMANN . . . . Quartet in A major, Op. 41, No. 3

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, March 13, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, March 11, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN.

Friday Afternoon, Mar. 15, at 3; Saturday Evening, Mar. 16, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

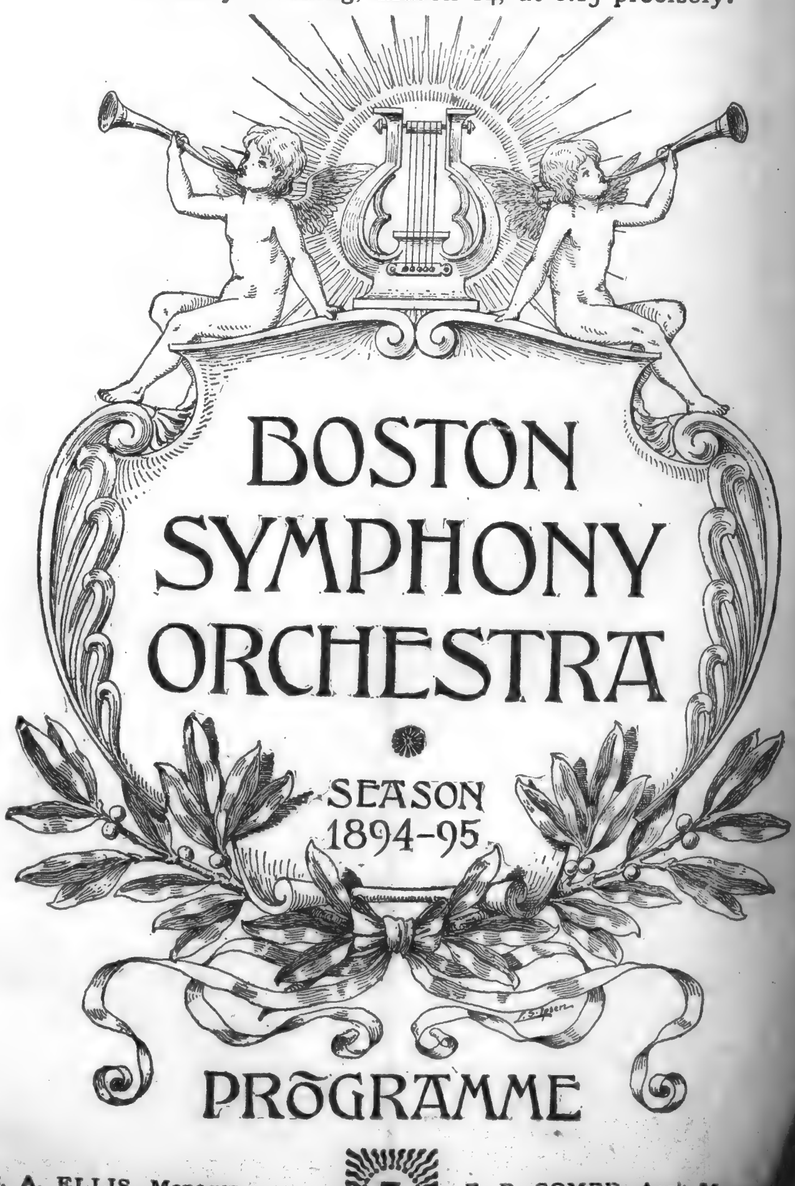
4

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street. : : : :

[129]

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, March 14, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

5

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

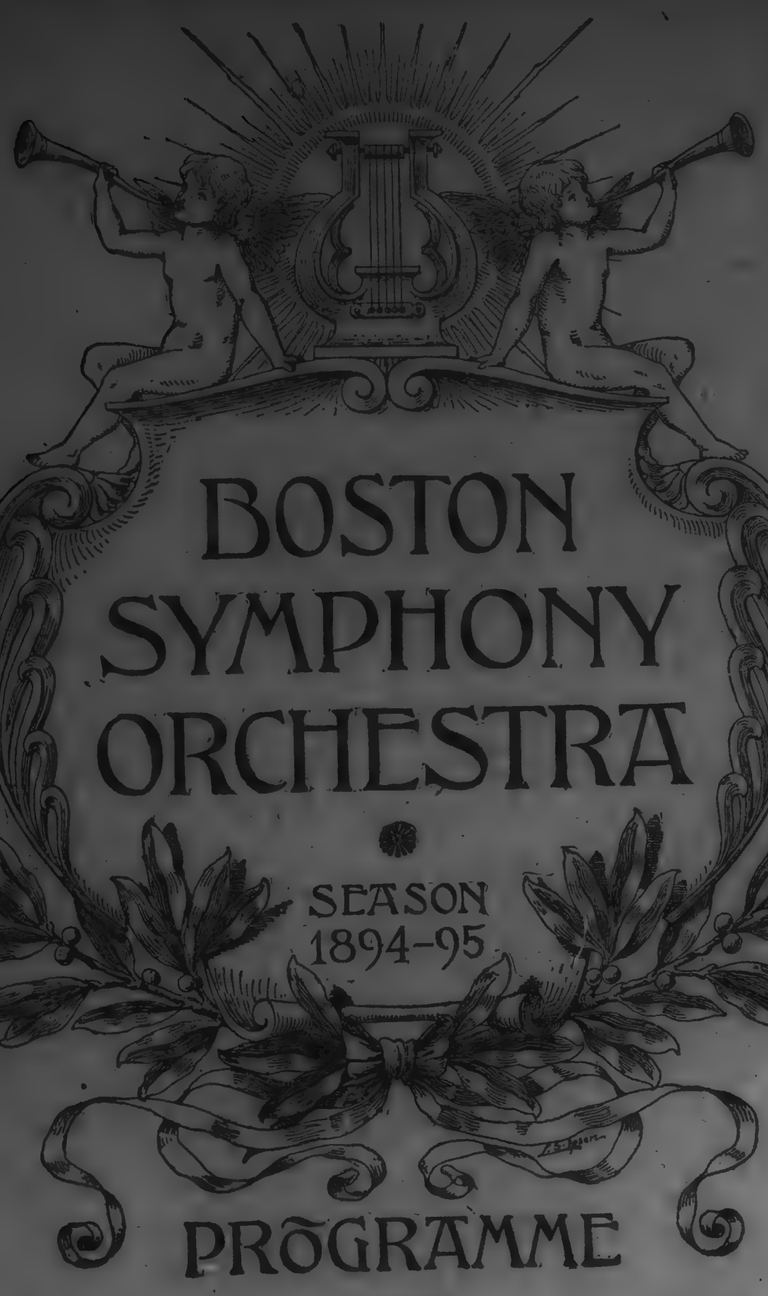
Copies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, February 20, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

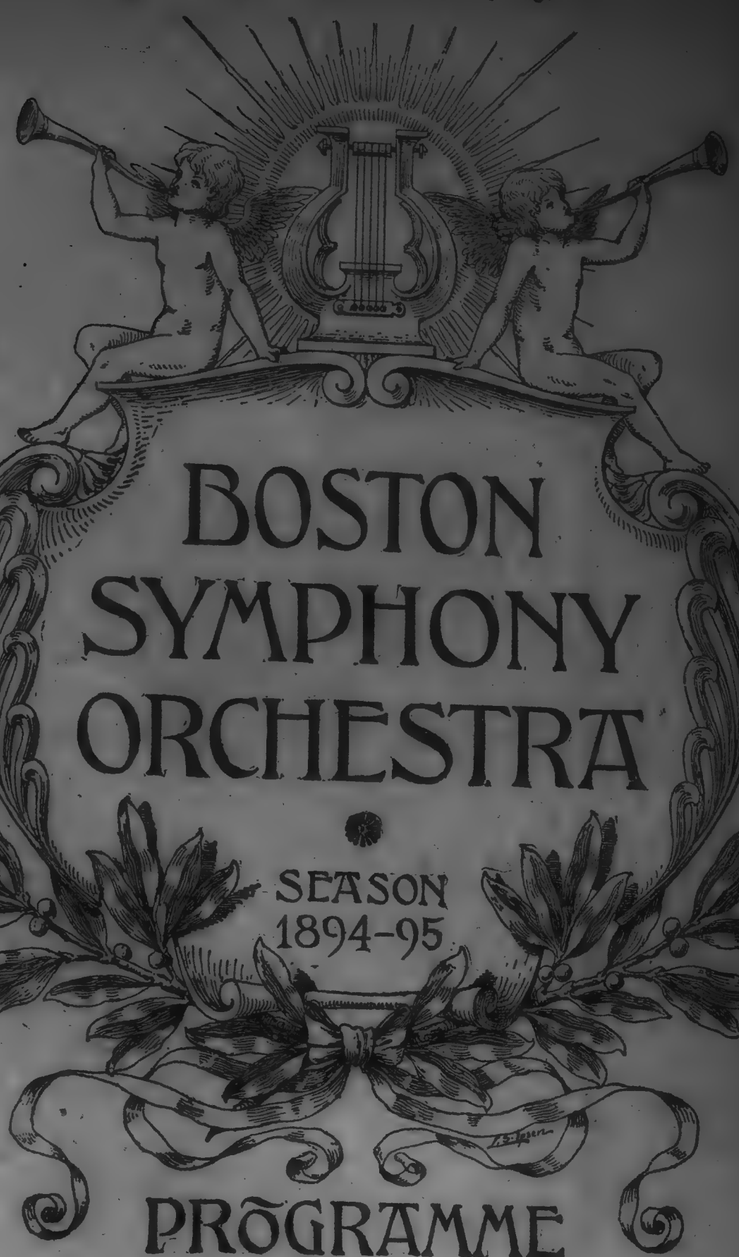
5

Single tickets for the fifth concert, at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall. . . . . .

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... FALL RIVER.

Monday Evening, February 25, at 8.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Mendelssohn Glee Club
Hall
(119 West 40th Street)

FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 15
AT 8.15

LAST CONCERT OF THE SERIES BY

The Kneisel Quartet of Boston

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin
L. SVECENSKI, Viola
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

Assisting Artists
Messrs. POURTAU, LITKE,
HACKEBARTH, and GOLDE

Tickets, with reserved seats, $1.50, now on sale at SCHUBERTH'S, 23 Union Square.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 7, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

C. P. EMANUEL BACH. SYMPHONY in D major.
I. Allegro di molto.
II. Largo.
III. Presto.

HAYDN. ARIA from "The Creation."

J. SEBASTIAN BACH. SINFONIA. "Hirten-Musik," from the "Christmas Oratorio."

HAYDN. SYMPHONY in G major. (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 13; Peters, No. 8).
I. Adagio. — Allegro.
II. Largo.
III. Menuetto: Allegretto. — Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito.

MOZART. ZERLINA'S ARIA. "Batti, batti." from "Don Giovanni."

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE. "Egmont."

Soloist:

Miss GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

Ninth Concert, Thursday, April 4.

[130]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, February 20, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Single tickets for the fifth concert, at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall. . . . . .

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... FALL RIVER.

Monday Evening, February 25, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Mendelssohn Glee Club
Hall
(119 West 40th Street)

FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 15
AT 8.15

LAST CONCERT OF THE SERIES BY

The Kneisel Quartet of Boston

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin
L. SVECENSKI, Viola
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

Assisting Artists
Messrs. POURTAU, LITKE,
HACKEBARTH, and GOLDE

Tickets, with reserved seats, $1.50, now on sale at SCHUBERTH'S, 23 Union Square.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95

[redacted]

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 7, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

C. P. EMANUEL BACH. SYMPHONY in D major.
I. Allegro di molto
II. Largo
III. Presto

HAYDN. ARIA from "The Creation."

J. SEBASTIAN BACH. SINFONIA. "Hirten Musik," from the "Christmas Oratorio."

HAYDN. SYMPHONY in G major. (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 13; Peters, No. 8).
I. Adagio. — Allegro
II. Largo.
III. Menuetto: Allegretto. — Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito

MOZART. ZERLINA'S ARIA. "Batti, batti." from "Don Giovanni."

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE. "Egmont."

Soloist:

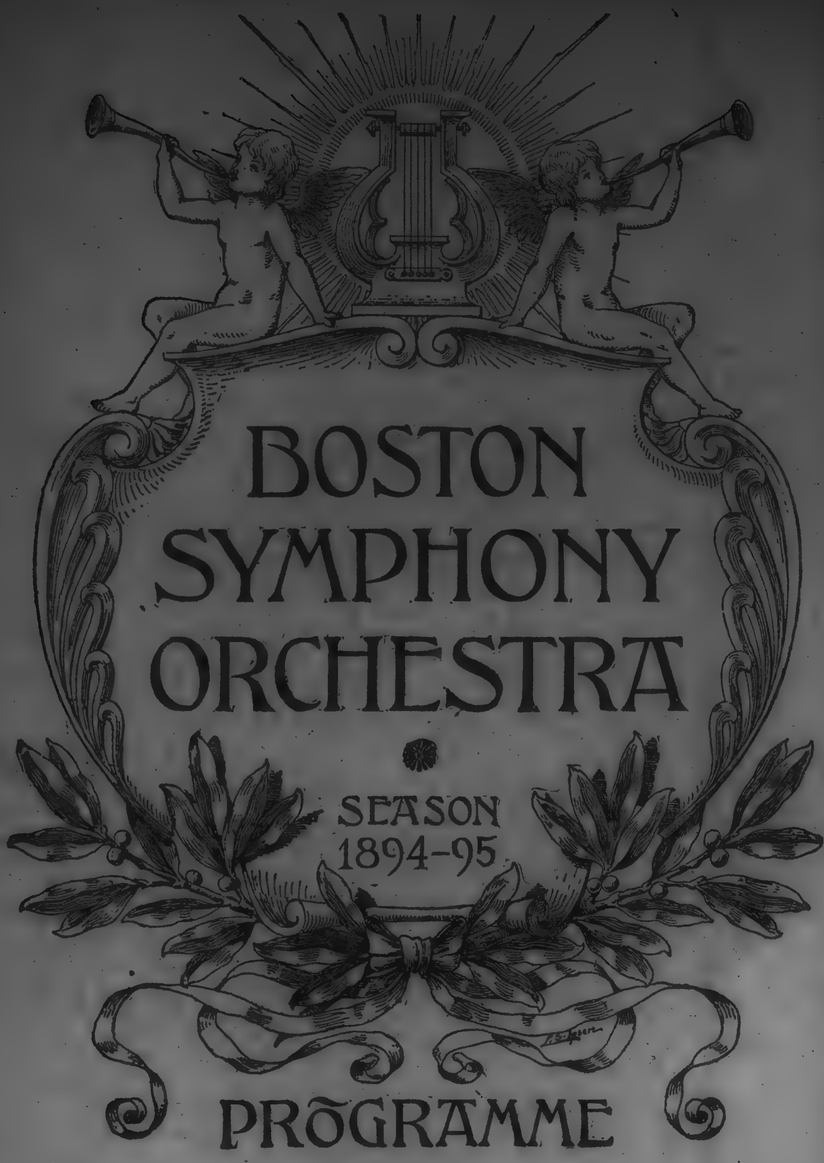
Miss GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

Ninth Concert, Thursday, April 4.

[130]

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, February 20, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Single tickets for the fifth concert, at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall. . . . . .

ACADEMY OF MU

Monday

B SY
ORC
PR

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

PRESS NOTICES.

"The superlative qualities of the players as a body were admirably displayed in a superb performance of the great Beethoven A minor quartet. Rich tone, great elasticity of tempo, allied to a perfect surety, a sentiment that never became petty any more than it became individual,— for every nuance of expression colored the four parts simultaneously,— insight of the composition, and perfect technical execution, all contributed to the beautiful rendering of what is a colossal imaginative creation."— N. Y. Herald.

"It would be idle, indeed, to attempt to characterize anew the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his colleagues. Superlatives are the only terms that can be used, and they have been applied so often that they seem in danger of losing their virtue. Nevertheless it may be said of last night's concert that, in comparison with the concerts of preceding seasons, it showed an improvement in richness and nobility of tone on account of the change of instruments in the hands of the leader. Mr. Kneisel's new Stradivarius is a marvellous instrument,— one of the finest specimens of the famous lutier's art; and its superb tone supplies the one want which was noticeable in the club's ensemble last year. The voices of the quartet are now delightfully homogeneous and opulent."— N. Y. Tribune.

"Last night's concert was in every respect delightful. . . . These players have a wonderful variety of styles, and each is correct. They play Beethoven and Haydn as they ought to be played, and their work is a constant source of delight. In the words of Rip Van Winkle, may they 'live long and prosper.'" — N. Y. Times.

"The large hall was filled with the admirers of this superb organization. The enthusiastic applause and appreciative comments that followed the rendering of each number showed that no one had been disappointed, and that the coming concerts of the Boston players will be looked forward to as a musical treat of the highest order."— N. Y. Evening Post.

Kneisel Quartet
of Boston

FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 15, 1895

AT 8.15

PROGRAMME

BORODINE . . . . . Quartet in D major

Allegro moderato — Scherzo (Allegro) —
Notturno (Andante) — Finale (Andante — Vivace)

SCHUBERT . . . . . Quartet in D minor, Op. posth.

Allegro — Andante con moto —
Molto vivace — Presto

BEETHOVEN . . Septet for Violin, Viola, Clarinet, Horn, Bassoon, Violoncello, and Double-bass

Adagio — Allegro con brio — Adagio cantabile —
Tempo di menuetto — Andante con moto alla marcia —
Presto

Clarinet, Mr. LEON POURTAU

Horn, Mr. ALBERT HACKEBARTH

Bassoon, Mr. HUGO LITKE

Double-bass, Mr. EMIL GOLDE

[130]

Sanders The

SEAS

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL P

VIII. C

THURSDAY, MAR

PROG

C. P. EMANUEL BACH. SYMPHO
I. Allegro di
II. Largo.
III. Presto.

HAYDN. ARIA from

J. SEBASTIAN BACH. SINFONIA
Oratorio."

HAYDN. SYMPHON
13; Peters, N
I. Adagio. — Al
II. Largo.
III. Menuetto: Al
IV. Finale: Alleg

MOZART. ZERLINA'S
Giovanni."

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE.

Soloi

Miss GERTRUDE

Ninth Concert, Thursday, April 4.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK

Thursday Evening, February 7, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 4 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Copies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN.

Friday Afternoon, Feb. 8, at 3. Saturday Evening, Feb. 9, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3 Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street. : : : :

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, February 18, at 8.

Sixth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

Programme.

SCHUBERT. QUARTET in D minor. op. posth.
Allegro. — Andante con moto. — Molto vivace. — Presto.

C. M. LOEFFLER. QUINTET (in one movement) for three VIOLINS, VIOLA, and VIOLONCELLO.
(MS. First time.)
Third Violin, Mr. WILLIAM KRAFFT.

BEETHOVEN. SEPTET for VIOLIN, VIOLA, CLARINET, HORN, BASSOON, VIOLONCELLO, and DOUBLE-BASS,
Adagio. — Allegro con brio. — Adagio cantabile. — Tempo di menuetto. — Andante con moto alla marcia. — Presto.
Clarinet, Mr. LEON POURTAU.
Horn, Mr. ALBERT HACKEBARTH.
Bassoon, Mr. HERMAN LITKE.
Double-bass, Mr. EMIL GOLDE.

Seventh Concert, Monday, March 18.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 14, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE. "Leonore," No. 2, op. 72.

GOUNOD. ARIA from "Sappho."

LACHNER. SUITE No. 1, in D minor, op. 113.
I. Praeludium: Allegro non troppo.
III. Variations and March.
IV. Introduction and Fugue.

IOMELLI. SONG. "Chi vuol comprar la bella Calandrina."

DVOŘÁK. SYMPHONY No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95.
I. Adagio. — Allegro molto.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. — Trio.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.

Soloist:

Mrs. JULIE L. WYMAN.

Eighth Concert, Thursday, March 7.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK

Thursday Evening, February 7, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 4 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Copies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN.

Friday Afternoon, Feb. 8, at 3. Saturday Evening, Feb. 9, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager. 3

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, February 18, at 8.

Sixth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

Programme.

SCHUBERT. QUARTET in D minor. op. posth.
Allegro. — Andante con moto. —
Molto vivace. — Presto.

C. M. LOEFFLER. QUINTET (in one movement) for three VIOLINS, VIOLA, and VIOLONCELLO.
(MS. First time.)
Third Violin, Mr. WILLIAM KRAFFT.

BEETHOVEN. SEPTET for VIOLIN, VIOLA, CLARINET, HORN, BASSOON, VIOLONCELLO, and DOUBLE-BASS,
Adagio. — Allegro con brio. — Adagio cantabile. —
Tempo di menuetto. — Andante con moto alla marcia. —
Presto.
Clarinet, Mr. LEON POURTAU.
Horn. Mr. ALBERT HACKEBARTH.
Bassoon, Mr. HERMAN LITKE.
Double-bass, Mr. EMIL GOLDE.

Seventh Concert, Monday, March 18.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 18[illegible]95

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 14, AT 7.45, P.M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE. "Leonore," No. [illegible] op. [illegible]

GOUNOD. ARIA from "Sappho."

LACHNER. SUITE No. 1, in D minor, op. 113.
I. Praeludium. Allegro ma [illegible]
III. Variations and Marcia.
IV. Introduction and Fugue.

TOMELLI. SONG. "Chi vuol comprar la bella Colombina."

DVOŘÁK. SYMPHONY No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95.
I. Adagio. — Allegro molto.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. — Trio.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.

Soloist:

Mrs. JULIE D. WYMAN.

Eighth Concert, Thursday, March 7.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, January 21, at 8.

Fifth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. LEO SCHULZ, 2d Violoncello.

Programme.

BORODINE. QUARTET in D major.
Allegro moderato.—Scherzo (Allegro).
Notturno (Andante).—Finale, (Andante.—Vivace.)
(First time.)

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in B-flat major, op. 18.
Allegro con brio.—Adagio ma non troppo.—
Scherzo, (Allegro).—La Malinconia (Adagio).—
Allegretto quasi Allegro.

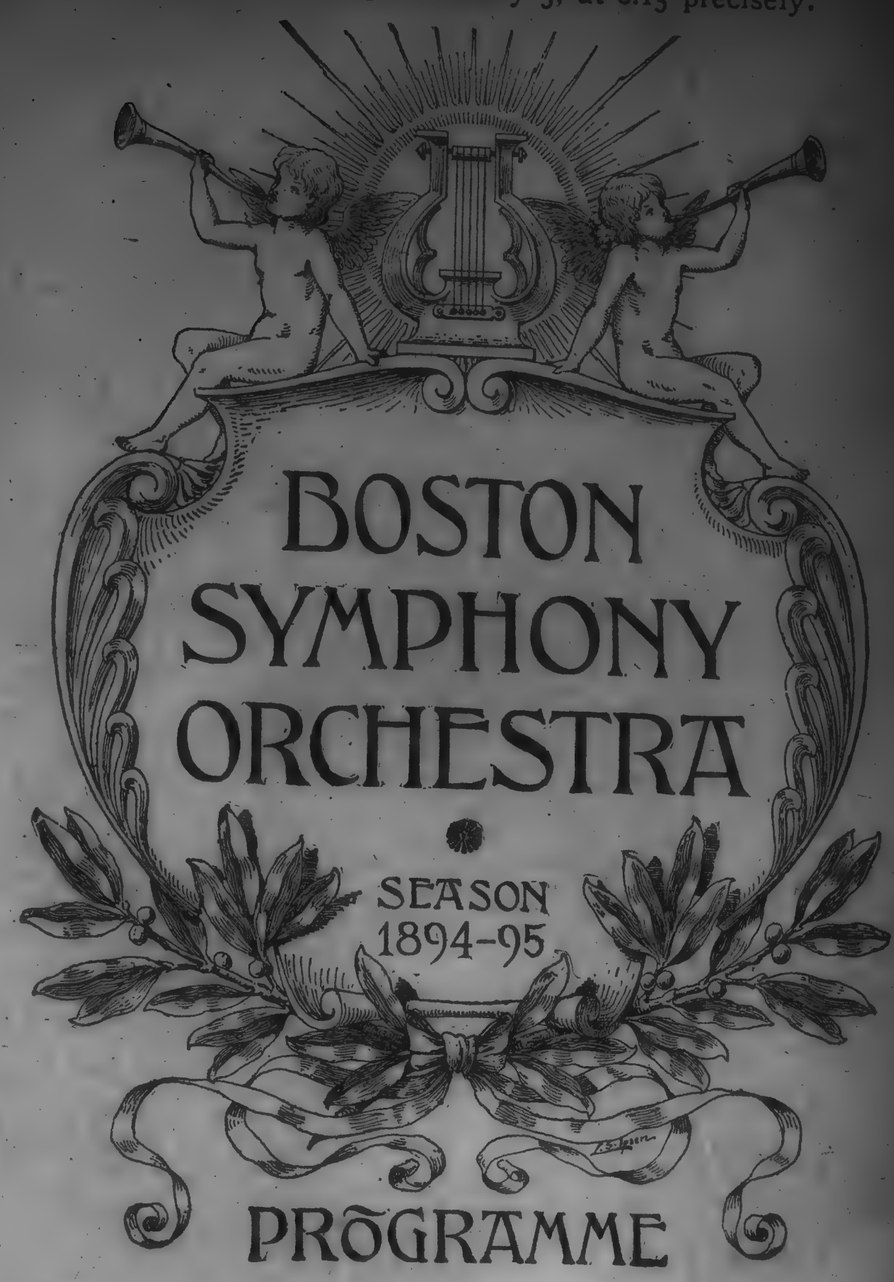
HORATIO W. PARKER. QUINTET in D minor, op. 38.
Allegro moderato.—Andante lento.—
Allegro.—Finale.
(MS.) First time.)

Sixth Concert, Monday, February 18.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, February 5, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, February 4, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

[132]

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, February 6, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles Street.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, January 21, at 8.

Fifth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. LEO SCHULZ, 2d Violoncello.

Programme.

BORODINE. QUARTET in D major.
Allegro moderato.—Scherzo (Allegro).
Notturno (Andante).—Finale, (Andante.—Vivace.)
(First time.)

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in B-flat major, op. 18.
Allegro con brio.—Adagio ma non troppo.—
Scherzo, (Allegro).—La Malinconia (Adagio).—
Allegretto quasi Allegro.

HORATIO W. PARKER. QUINTET in D minor, op. 38.
Allegro moderato.—Andante lento.—
Allegro.—Finale.
(MS.) First time.)

Sixth Concert, Monday, February 18.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, February 5, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, February 4, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

[132]

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, February 6, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

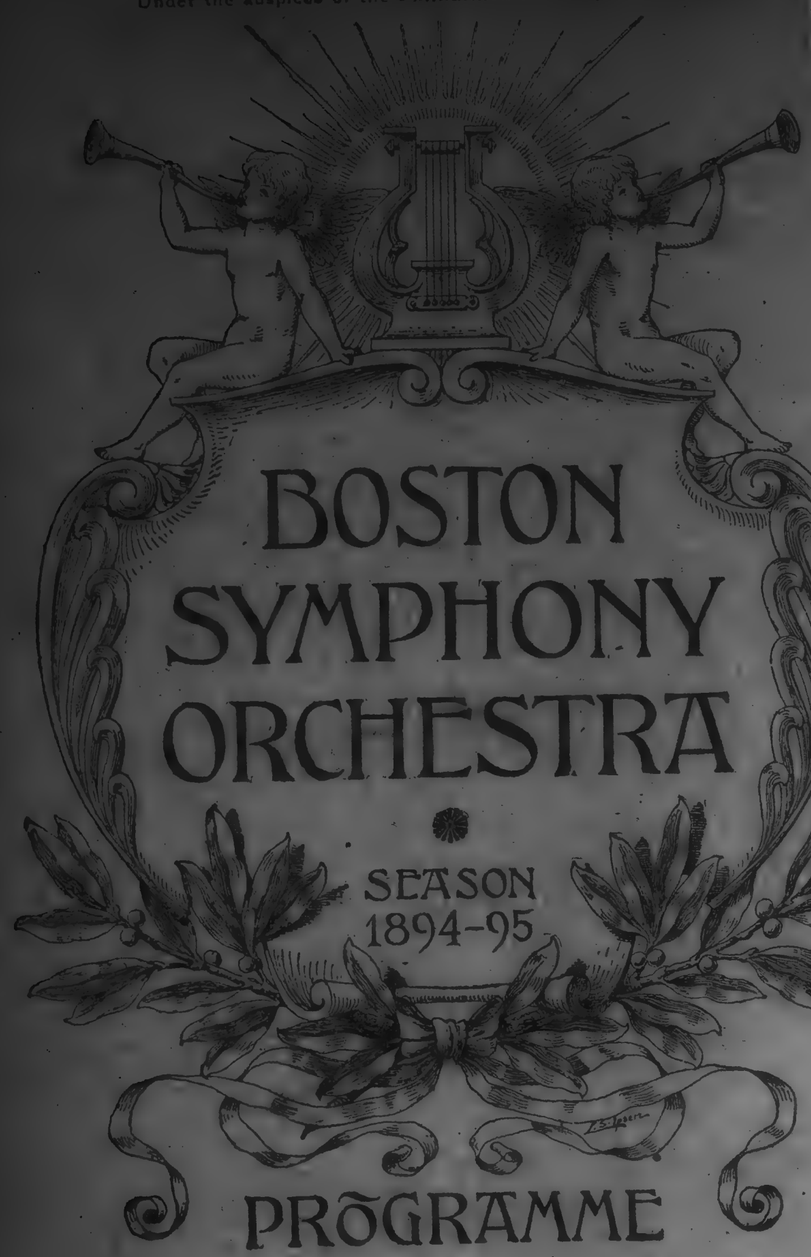
4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Friday Afternoon, Jan. 11, at 3. Saturday Evening, Jan. 12, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street. : : : :

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, January 10, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

3

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Copies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 24, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MENDELSSOHN.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in A major. "Italian." Allegro vivace.—Andante con moto.— Con moto moderato.—Saltarello: Presto.
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a) DVOŘÁK.	"WALDESRUHE,"
b) KLENGEL.	CAPPRICCIO.
SCHUBERT.	BALLET-MOVEMENT and ENTR' ACTE, from "Rosamunde." I. BALLET: Andantino. II. ENTR' ACTE: Andantino.
DVOŘÁK.	OVERTURE. "Carnival."

Soloist:

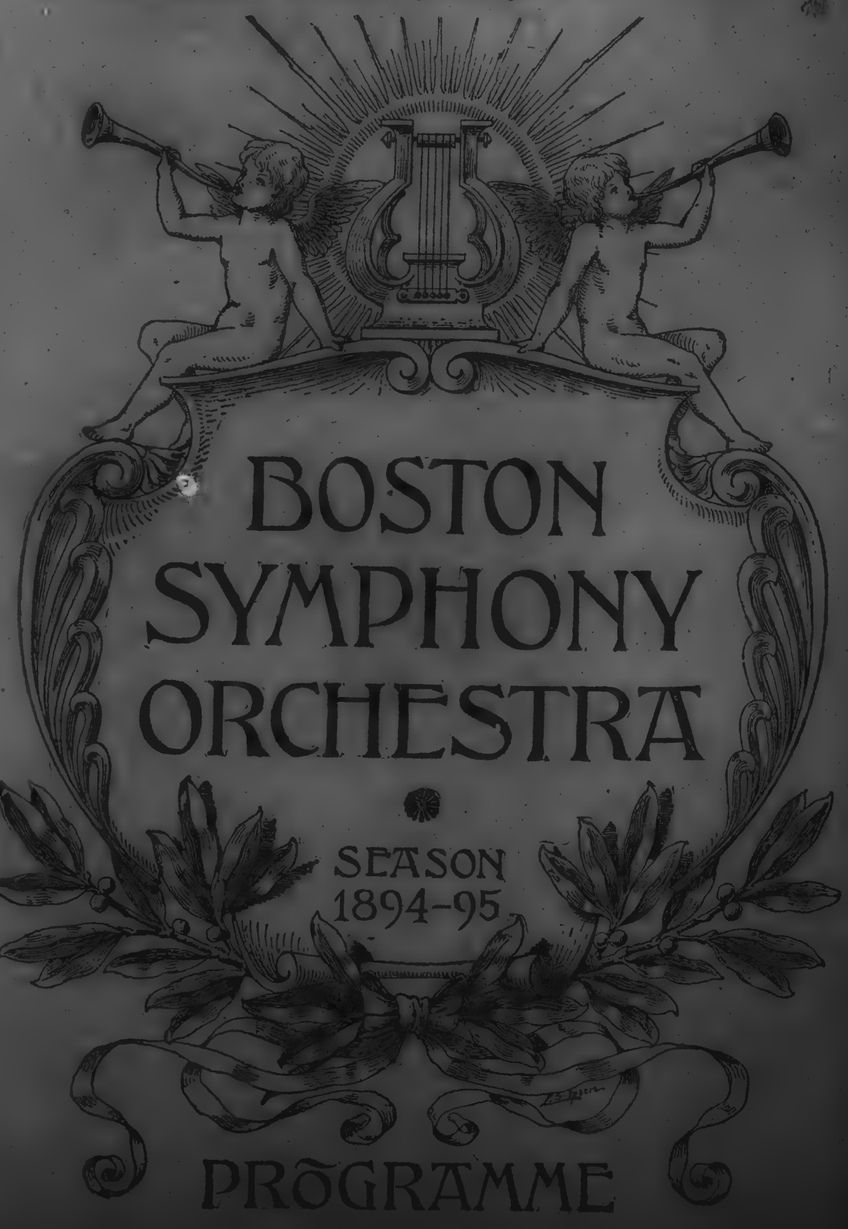
Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Seventh Concert, Thursday, February 14.

[133]

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, January 16, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Single tickets for the fourth concert at Shepard's on sale as follows:

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN.

Friday Afternoon, Jan. 11, at 3. Saturday Evening, Jan. 12, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

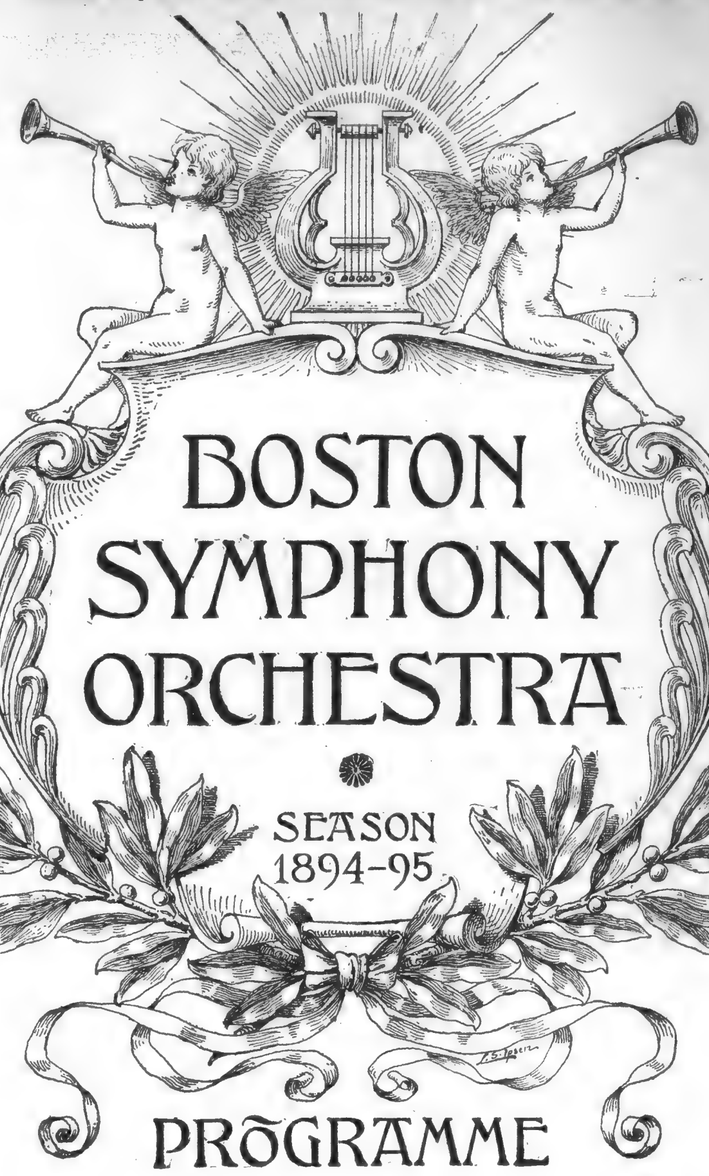
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street. : : : :

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, January 10, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Copies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 24, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MENDELSSOHN.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in A major. "Italian." Allegro vivace.—Andante con moto.— Con moto moderato.—Saltarello: Presto
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a) DVOŘÁK.	"WALDESRUHE."
b) KLENGEL.	CAPPRICCIO.
SCHUBERT.	BALLET-MOVEMENT and ENTR' ACTE, from "Rosamunde." I. BALLET: Andantino. II. ENTR' ACTE: Andantino
DVORÁK.	OVERTURE. "Carnival."

Soloist:

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Seventh Concert, Thursday, February 14.

[133]

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, January 16, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Single tickets for the fourth concert, at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall.

Kneisel Quartet Concerts

Arrangements have been made for three concerts of Classical and Modern Chamber Music to be given by

The Kneisel Quartet of Boston

in the hall of the Mendelssohn Glee Club, No. 119 West Fortieth Street, on the evenings of the following days, namely:

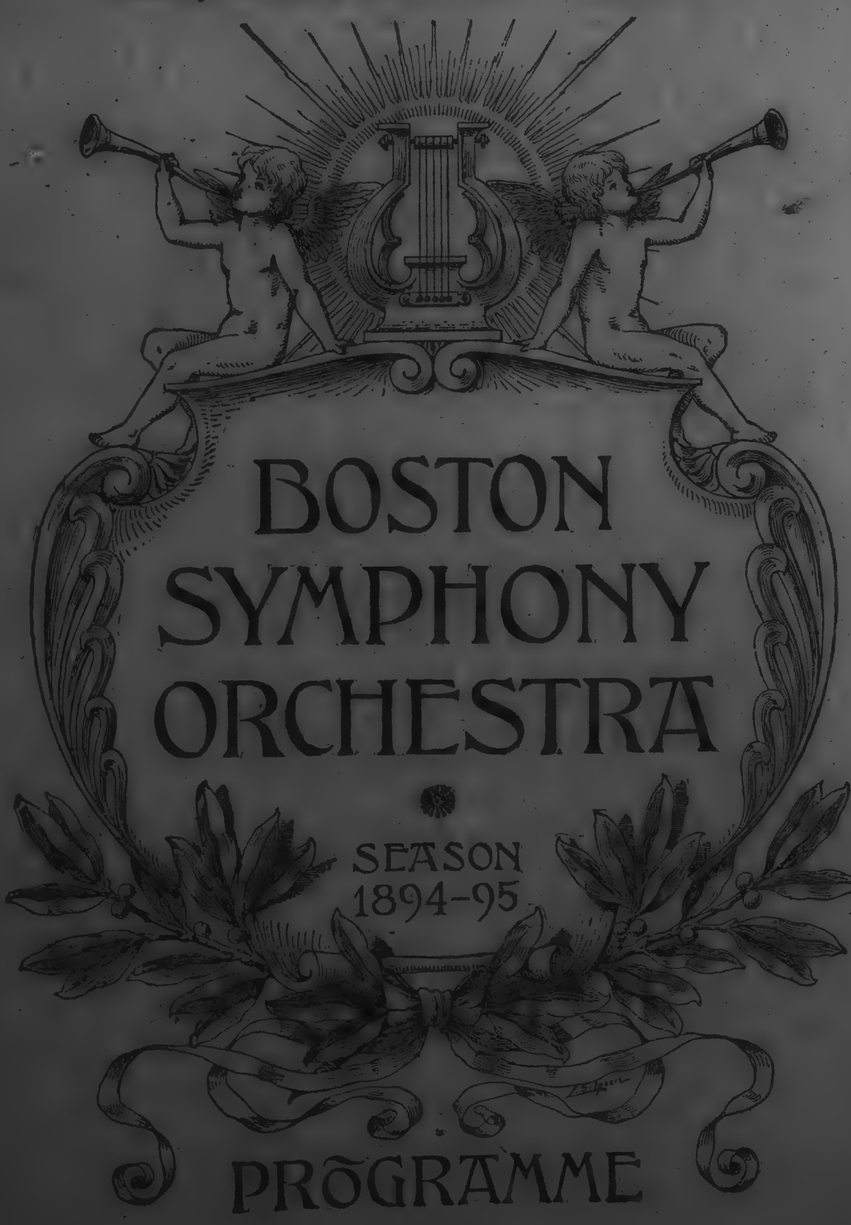
Friday, January 11
Friday, February 8
Friday, March 15

Beginning at 8.15 o'clock.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, January 8, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

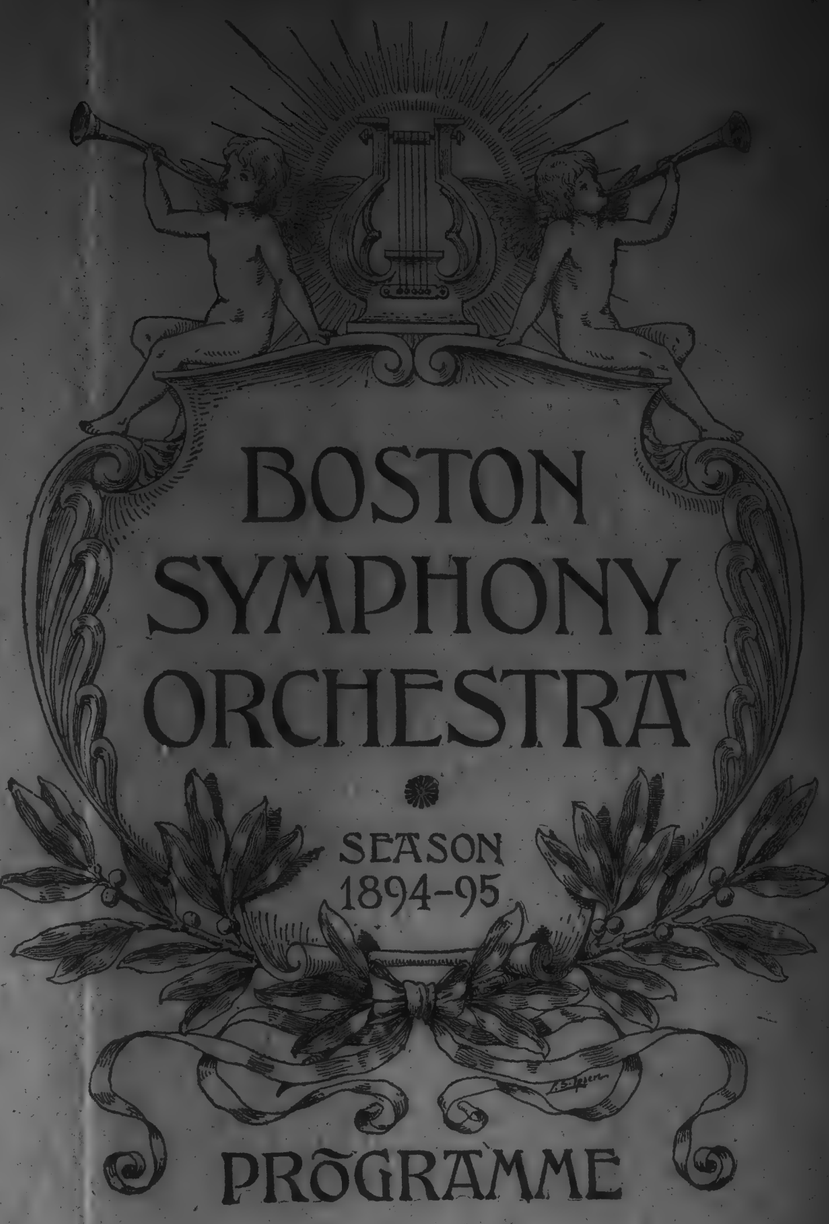
Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

[134]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, January 7, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

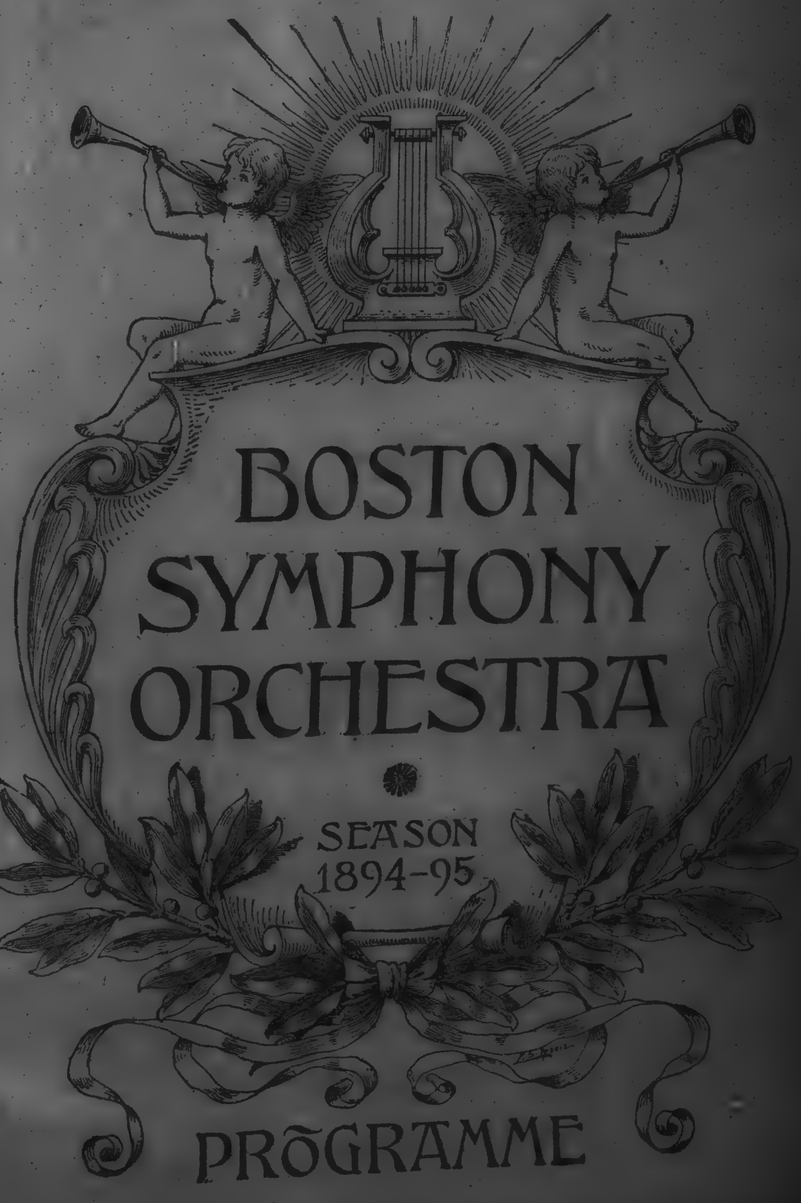
3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, January 9, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles Street.

Kneisel Quartet Concerts

Arrangements have been made for three concerts of Classical and Modern Chamber Music to be given by

The Kneisel Quartet of Boston

in the hall of the Mendelssohn Glee Club, No. 119 West Fortieth Street, on the evenings of the following days, namely:

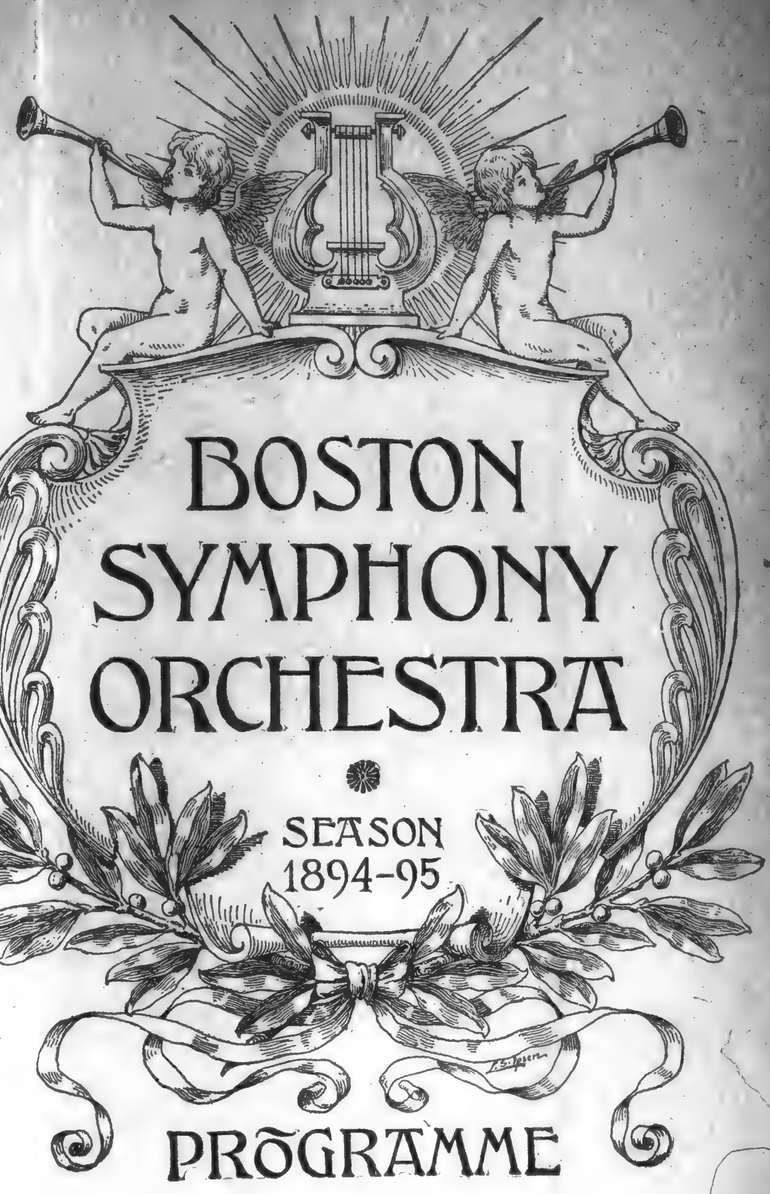
Friday, January 11
Friday, February 8
Friday, March 15

Beginning at 8.15 o'clock.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, January 7, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

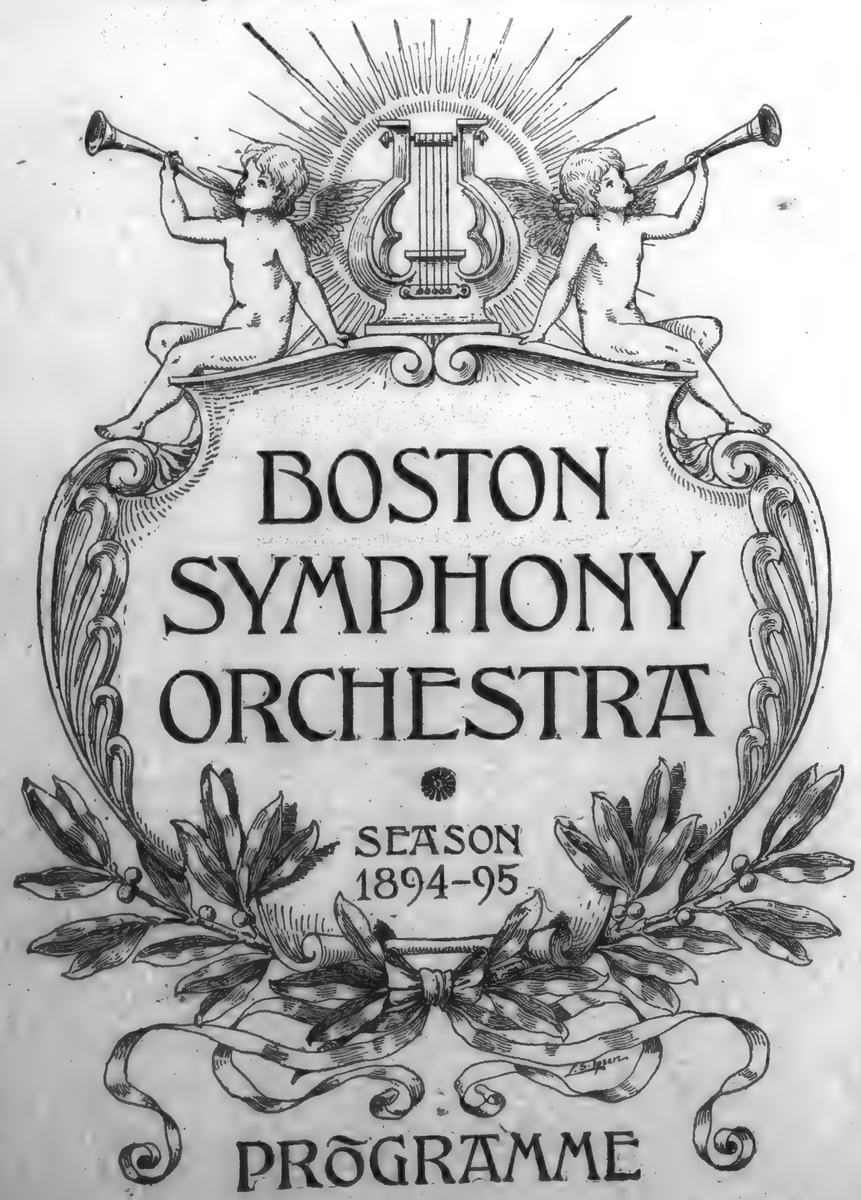
3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, January 8, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

[134]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, January 9, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles Street.

For these concerts subscriptions will be received at Schuberth's, No. 23 Union Square, where single tickets may also be had. The Kneisel Quartet has achieved recognition as the leading chamber music organization in the United States. Its members have devoted themselves with great assiduity and earnestness to the study of this highest form of absolute music; and, since it is well-known that a love for chamber music is the truest touchstone of a community's musical culture, it is urgently requested by those who have been instrumental in bringing about the projected concerts that the music-lovers of New York shall unite in making the venture a success.

Price of the subscription, $4.00. Single tickets with reserved seats, $1.50.

PRESS NOTICES.

"In all these works the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his fellows was quite beyond praise, altogether lovely in tone and sentiment, and finished in execution. The audience was rapturous in its applause, after each movement."— N. Y. Tribune.

"It is not too much to say that the Beethoven quartet was played divinely."— N. Y. Times.

"This Quartet [Kneisel] is the greatest in America; and, allied to its beauty of tone production,— a true quartet tone,— its interpretations are always significant and truthful."— N. Y. Recorder.

"Everything that Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski, and Schroeder select is sure to be well played."— N. Y. Evening Post.

"The fifth quartet of the series which forms Beethoven's Op. 18 was given with a perfection that aroused the audience (which was as large as the hall would allow) to the most fervid applause at the end of each movement. Such marvellous ensemble, such exquisite shading, require something more graphic than type for adequate description."— Boston Advertiser.

"The Dvořak quartet was given with a perfection that makes all criticism ridiculous. Never have the Kneisels done a finer piece of artistic work."— Boston Transcript.

"It is no hyperbole to say that the playing of the Kneisel Quartet at their fourth concert was perfect."— Boston Beacon.

Kneisel Quartet

FRIDAY EVENING, JANUARY 11

DVORAK . . . . . Quartet in F major. Op. 96
Allegro ma non troppo.
Lento.
Molto vivace.
Finale (Vivace).

CHERUBINI . Larghetto and Scherzo from the Quartet in D minor

BEETHOVEN . . . . Quartet in A minor. Op. 132
Assai sostenuto; Allegro.
Allegro ma non tanto.
Molto adagio (Song of thanksgiving in the Lydian mode, offered to the Deity by one cured of sickness).
Alla marcia, assai vivace.
Allegro appassionato.

II. CONCERT

FRIDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 8

HAYDN . . . . . Quartet in D major. Op. 64, No. 5
Allegro moderato.
Adagio cantabile.
Menuetto (Allegretto).
Vivace.

MOZART . . . . . Quartet in G major
Allegro vivace assai.
Menuetto (Allegretto).
Andante cantabile.
Molto allegro.

BEETHOVEN . . . Quartet in E minor. Op. 59, No. 2
Allegro.
Molto adagio.
Allegretto.
Presto.

III. CONCERT

FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 15

BRAHMS . . . Quartet in B-flat major. Op. 67, No. 3
Vivace.
Andante.
Agitato (Allegretto non troppo).
Poco allegretto con variazioni.

SCHUBERT . . Variations from the Quartet in D minor. Op. post

BEETHOVEN . Septet in E-flat major, Op. 20, for Violin, Viola, Horn, Clarinet, Bassoon, Violoncello, and Bass
Adagio; Allegro con brio.
Adagio cantabile.
Scherzo; Allegro molto e vivace.
Andante con moto a la marcia.
Presto.

ASSISTING ARTISTS { Mr. A. HACKEBARTH, Horn. Mr. H. LITKE, Bassoon.
{ Mr. L. POURTAU, Clarinet. Bass.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Monday Evening, Janua

BOST
SYMPH
ORCHE

SEAS
1894

PROGR

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, January 8, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

MUSIC HALL,

Wednesday Evening, Jan

BOST
SYMPH
ORCHES

SEASO
1894-9

PROGRA

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

3

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, December 31, at 8.

Fourth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Arthur Whiting.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in A minor, op. 132.
Assai sostenuto.—Allegro.—
Allegro ma non tanto.—
Molto adagio. (Song of thanksgiving in the Lydian mode, offered to the Deity by one cured of sickness.
Alla marcia assai vivace—Allegro appassionato.

HANS PFITZNER. SONATA for PIANOFORTE and VIOLONCELLO. op. 1.
Sehr bewegt.—
Langsam.—
Sehr schnell.—
Nicht zu schnell mit Humor
(First time.)

HAYDN. QUARTET in D major, op. 64, No. 5.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio cantabile.—
Menuetto (Allegretto).—Vivace.

The Piano is a Steinway.

Fifth Concert, Monday, January 21.

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, December 19, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Single tickets for the third concert at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 3, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

RIENZI — OVERTURE.

TANNHAEUSER. a) ACT II. ELIZABETH'S ARIA. b) ACT III. PRELUDE.

THE FLYING DUTCHMAN. OVERTURE.

LOHENGRIN. a) ACT II. BALCONY SCENE. b) ACT III. PRELUDE.

DIE MEISTERSINGER. a) ACT III. PRELUDE. b) ACT I. WALTHER'S PREISLIED.

RHEINGOLD. PROCESSION OF THE GODS.

DIE WALKÜRE. SPRING SONG.

SIEGFRIED AND DIE GÖTTERDÄMMERUNG. a) WALDWEBEN. b) SIEGFRIED'S PASSAGE TO BRÜNNHILDE'S ROCK, MORNING DAWN AND RHINE JOURNEY. (Richter Arrangement.)

Soloists:

Miss ELSA KUTSCHERRA.
Mr. ANTON SCHOTT.

Sixth Concert, Thursday, January 24.

Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall

(119 West 40th Street)

FRIDAY EVENING, JANUARY 11, AT 8.15
FRIDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 8, AT 8.15
FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 15, AT 8.15

Three Concerts

by the

Kneisel Quartet

....of Boston

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin
L. SVECENSKI, Viola
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

Subscription Tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of three concerts, $4.00, now on sale at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

[135]

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, December 31, at 8.

Fourth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Arthur Whiting.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in A minor, op. 132.
Assai sostenuto.—Allegro.—
Allegro ma non tanto.—
Molto adagio. (Song of thanksgiving in the Lydian mode, offered to the Deity by one cured of sickness.
Alla marcia assai vivace—Allegro appassionato.

HANS PFITZNER. SONATA for PIANOFORTE and VIOLONCELLO. op. 1.
Sehr bewegt.—
Langsam.—
Sehr schnell.—
Nicht zu schnell mit Humor
(First time.)

HAYDN. QUARTET in D major, op. 64, No. 5.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio cantabile.—
Menuetto (Allegretto).—Vivace.

The Piano is a Steinway.

Fifth Concert, Monday, January 21.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 3, AT 7½ P. M.

PROGRAMME.

RIENZI — OVERTURE.
TANNHAEUSER — a) ACT II. ELIZABETH'S ARIA. b) ACT III. PRELUDE.
THE FLYING DUTCHMAN — OVERTURE.
LOHENGRIN. — a) ACT II. BALCONY SCENE. b) ACT III. PRELUDE.
DIE MEISTERSINGER. — a) ACT III. PRELUDE. b) ACT I. WALTHER'S PREISLIED.
RHEINGOLD. — PROCESSION OF THE GODS.
DIE WALKURE. — SPRING SONG.
SIEGFRIED AND DIE GOTTERDAMMERUNG. — a) WALDWEBEN. b) SIEGFRIED'S PASSAGE TO BRUNNHILDE'S ROCK, MORNING DAWN AND RHINE JOURNEY. (Richter Arrangement.)

Soloists:

Miss ELSA KUTSCHERRA.
Mr. ANTON SCHOTT.

Sixth Concert, Thursday, January 24.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, December 19, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Single tickets for the third concert at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall. . . . . .

Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall

(119 West 40th Street)

FRIDAY EVENING, JANUARY 11, AT 8.15
FRIDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 8, AT 8.15
FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 15, AT 8.15

Three Concerts

by the

Kneisel Quartet

. . . . of Boston

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin
L. SVECENSKI, Viola
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

Subscription Tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of three concerts, $4.00, now on sale at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

[135]

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, December 31, at 8.

Fourth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Arthur Whiting.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in A minor, op. 132.
Assai sostenuto.—Allegro.—
Allegro ma non tanto.—
Molto adagio. (Song of thanksgiving in the Lydian mode, offered to the Deity by one cured of sickness.
Alla marcia assai vivace—Allegro appassionato.

HANS PFITZNER. SONATA for PIANOFORTE and VIOLONCELLO. op. 1.
Sehr bewegt.—
Langsam.—
Sehr schnell.—
Nicht zu schnell mit Humor
(First time.)

HAYDN. QUARTET in D major, op. 64, No. 5.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio cantabile.—
Menuetto (Allegretto).—Vivace.

The Piano is a Steinway.

Fifth Concert, Monday, January 21.

PRESS NOTICES.

"In all these works the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his fellows was quite beyond praise, altogether lovely in tone and sentiment, and finished in execution. The audience was rapturous in its applause, after each movement."— N. Y. Tribune.

"It is not too much to say that the Beethoven quartet was played divinely."— N. Y. Times.

"This Quartet [Kneisel] is the greatest in America; and, allied to its beauty of tone production,— a true quartet tone,— its interpretations are always significant and truthful."— N. Y. Recorder.

"Everything that Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski, and Schroeder select is sure to be well played."— N. Y. Evening Post.

"The fifth quartet of the series which forms Beethoven's Op. 18 was given with a perfection that aroused the audience (which was as large as the hall would allow) to the most fervid applause at the end of each movement. Such marvellous ensemble, such exquisite shading, require something more graphic than type for adequate description."— Boston Advertiser.

"The Dvorak quartet was given with a perfection that makes all criticism ridiculous. Never have the Kneisels done a finer piece of artistic work."— Boston Transcript.

"It is no hyperbole to say that the playing of the Kneisel Quartet at their fourth concert was perfect."— Boston Beacon.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, December 19, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Single tickets for the third concert at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall. . . .

Kneisel Quartet

FRIDAY EVENING, JANUARY 11

DVORAK . . . . . Quartet in F major. Op. 96
Allegro ma non troppo.
Lento.
Molto vivace.
Finale (Vivace).

CHERUBINI . Larghetto and Scherzo from the Quartet in D minor

BEETHOVEN . . . . Quartet in A minor. Op. 132
Assai sostenuto; Allegro.
Allegro ma non tanto.
Molto adagio (Song of thanksgiving in the Lydian mode, offered to the Deity by one cured of sickness).
Alla marcia, assai vivace.
Allegro appassionato.

II. CONCERT

FRIDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 8

HAYDN . . . . Quartet in D major. Op. 64, No. 5
Allegro moderato.
Adagio cantabile.
Menuetto (Allegretto).
Vivace.

MOZART . . . . . Quartet in G major
Allegro vivace assai.
Menuetto (Allegretto).
Andante cantabile.
Molto allegro.

BEETHOVEN . . . Quartet in E minor. Op. 59, No. 2
Allegro.
Molto adagio.
Allegretto.
Presto.

III. CONCERT

FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 15

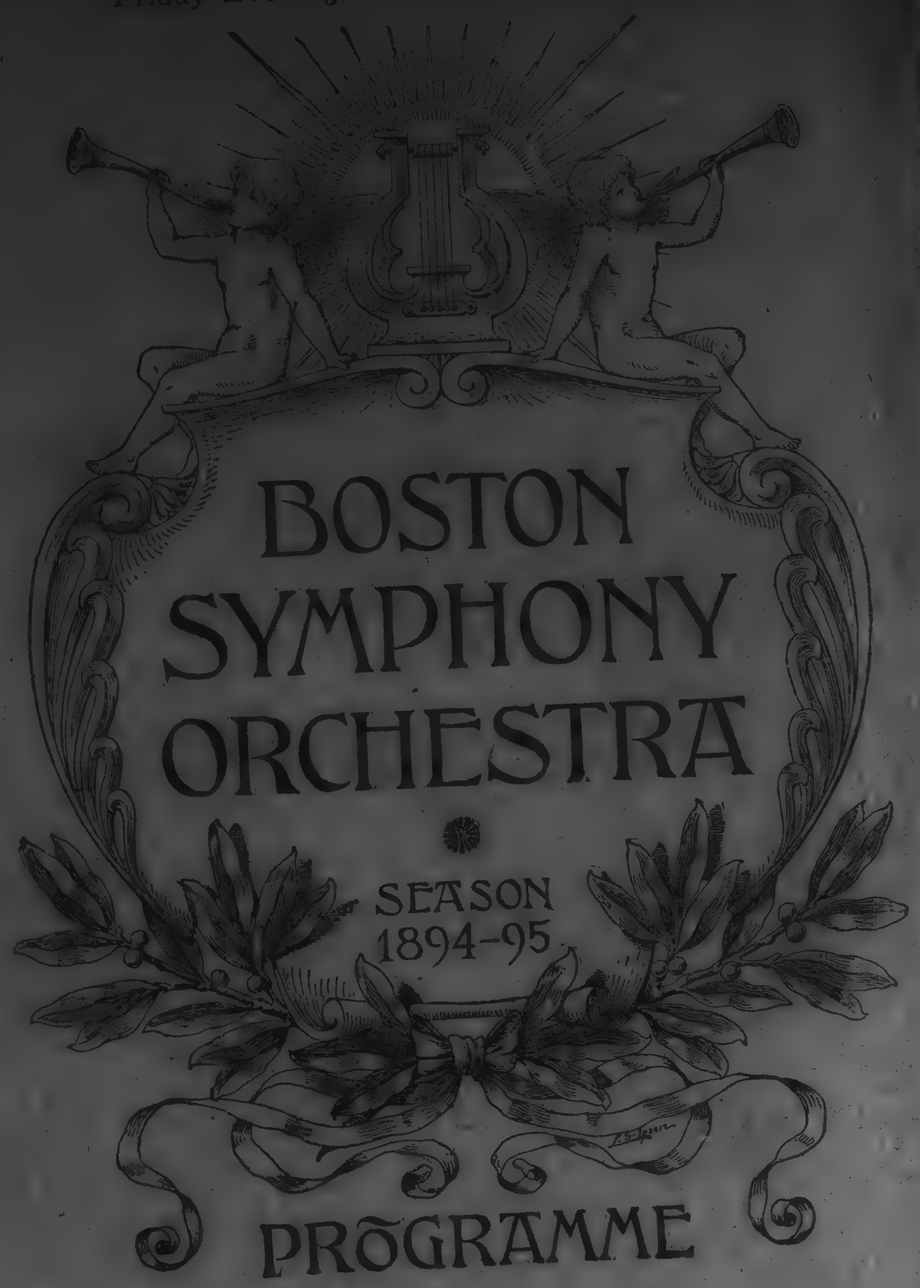
BRAHMS . . . Quartet in B-flat major. Op. 67, No. 3
Vivace.
Andante.
Agitato (Allegretto non troppo).
Poco allegretto con variazioni.

INCOMPLETE

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

FOOT GUARD HALL, . . . HARTFORD.

Friday Evening, December 7, at 8 o'clock.



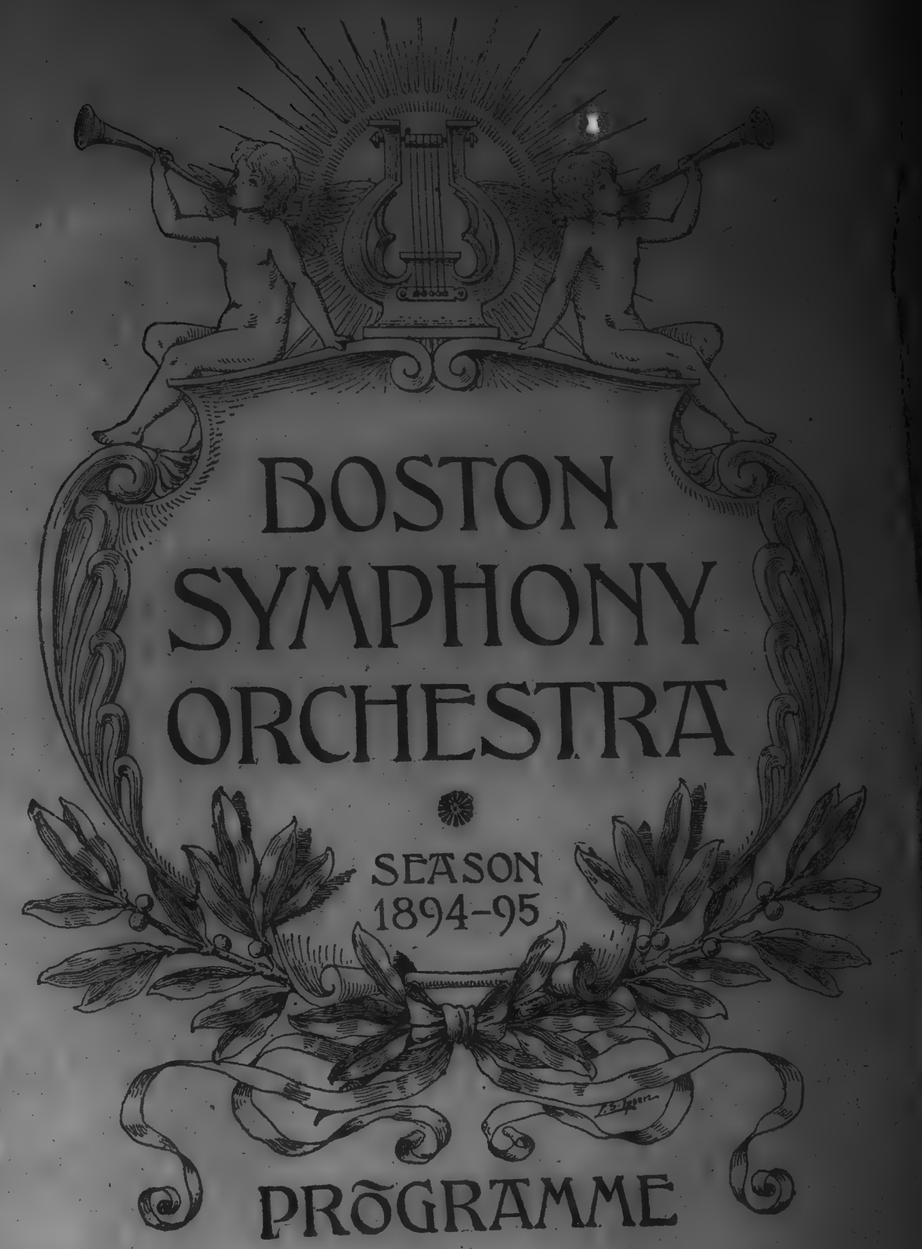
C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets on sale at Gallup & Metzger's Music Store, 201 Asylum Street,

HYPERION THEATRE, . . . NEW HAVEN

Under the auspices of The Department of Music of Yale University.

Saturday Evening, December 8, at 8 o'clock.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, December 10, at 8.

Third Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Carl Baermann and Mr. Leon Pourtau.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN. QUARTET in D major, op. 44, No. 1.
Molto allegro vivace.—Menuetto (un poco allegro).—Andante espressivo ma con moto.—Presto con brio.

BEETHOVEN. PIANO TRIO in B flat major, op. 97.
Allegro Moderato.—Scherzo (Allegro).—Andante cantabile, ma però con moto.—Allegro moderato.

BRAHMS. QUINTET for CLARINET, TWO VIOLINS, VIOLA AND VIOLONCELLO, in B minor, op. 115.
Allegro.—Adagio.—Andantino.—Con moto.

The Piano is a Steinway.

Fourth Concert, Monday, December 31.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 13, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART. OVERTURE. "Magic Flute."

SCHUMANN. SYMPHONY in C major, No. 2. op. 61.
I. Sostenuto assai.—Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace.—Trio I.—Trio II.
III. Adagio espressivo.
IV. Allegro molto vivace.

BIZET. SUITE. "L'Arlesienne," No. 1.
I. Prélude: Allegro deciso.—Andante molto.—Un peu moins lent.
II. Menuetto: Allegro giocoso.
III. Adagietto: Adagio.
IV. Carillon: Allegretto moderato.

SMETANA. OVERTURE. "Die Verkaufte Braut."

Fifth Concert, Thursday, January 3.

[136]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

FOOT GUARD HALL, ... HARTFORD.

Friday Evening, December 7, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets on sale at Gallup & Metzger's Music Store, 201 Asylum Street,

HYPERION THEATRE, ... NEW HAVEN.

Under the auspices of The Department of Music of Yale University.

Saturday Evening, December 8, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, December 10, at 8.

Third Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Carl Baermann and Mr. Leon Pourtau.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN. QUARTET in D major, op. 44, No. 1.
Molto allegro vivace.—Menuetto (un poco allegro).—
Andante espressivo ma con moto.—Presto con brio.

BEETHOVEN. PIANO TRIO in B flat major, op. 97.
Allegro Moderato —Scherzo (Allegro).—
Andante cantabile, ma però con moto.—
Allegro moderato.

BRAHMS. QUINTET for CLARINET, TWO VIOLINS, VIOLA AND VIOLONCELLO, in B minor, op. 115.
Allegro.—Adagio.—Andantino.—Con moto.

The Piano is a Steinway.

Fourth Concert, Monday, December 31.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 13, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART. OVERTURE. "Magic Flute."

SCHUMANN. SYMPHONY in C major, No. 2, op. 61.
I. Sostenuto assai.—Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace.—Trio I.—Trio II.
III. Adagio espressivo.
IV. Allegro molto vivace.

BIZET. SUITE. "L'Arlesienne," No. 1.
I. Prélude: Allegro deciso.—Andante molto.—
Un peu moins lent.
II. Menuetto: Allegro giocoso.
III. Adagietto: Adagio.
IV. Carillon: Allegretto moderato.

SMETANA. OVERTURE. "Die Verkaufte Braut."

Fifth Concert, Thursday, January 3.

[136]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, December 3, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, December 4, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, December 5, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles Street.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, December 6, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

2

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

[137]

Copies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall

(119 West 40th Street)

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 27, AT 8.15

The . . .

Kneisel Quartet

. . . . of Boston

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin

OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin

L. SVECENSKI, Viola

ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

Tickets, with reserved seats, $1.50, now on sale at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, December 3, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 22, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SGAMBATI. SYMPHONY No. 1, in D major, op. 16.
I. Allegro vivace, non troppo.
II. Andante mesto.
III. Scherzo; Presto.—Trio: Un poco meno.
IV. Serenata: Andante,
V. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
(First time at these Concerts.)

PETER BENOÍT. SYMPHONIC POEM, for FLUTE and ORCHESTRA.
I. Mélancolie.
II. Feux Follets.

MONSIGNY. CHACONNE and RIGODON from SUITE "Aline Reine de Golconde"

AUBER. OVERTURE to "Carlo Broschi."

RUBINSTEIN. BALLET MUSIC, from "Der Dämon."
I. FIRST DANCE: Allegro non troppo.
II. SECOND DANCE: Allegro.

Soloist:

Mr CHARLES MOLÉ.

Fourth Concert Thursday, December 13.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, December 4, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall

(119 West 40th Street)

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 27, AT 8.15

The . . .

Kneisel Quartet

. . . . of Boston

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin

OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin

L. SVECENSKI, Viola

ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

Tickets, with reserved seats, $1.50, now on sale at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 22, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SGAMBATI.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in D major, op. 16. I. Allegro vivace, non troppo. II. Andante mesto. III. Scherzo: Presto.—Trio: Un poco meno. IV. Serenata: Andante. V. Finale: Allegro con fuoco. (First time at these Concerts.)
PETER BENOIT.	SYMPHONIC POEM, for FLUTE and ORCHESTRA. I. Mélancolie. II. Feux Follets.
MONSIGNY.	CHACONNE and RIGODON from SUITE "Aline Reine de Golconde"
AUBER.	OVERTURE to "Carlo Broschi."
RUBINSTEIN.	BALLET MUSIC, from "Der Dämon." I. FIRST DANCE: Allegro non troppo. II. SECOND DANCE: Allegro.

Soloist:

Mr CHARLES MOLÉ.

Fourth Concert Thursday, December 13.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, December 3, at 8.15 precisely.

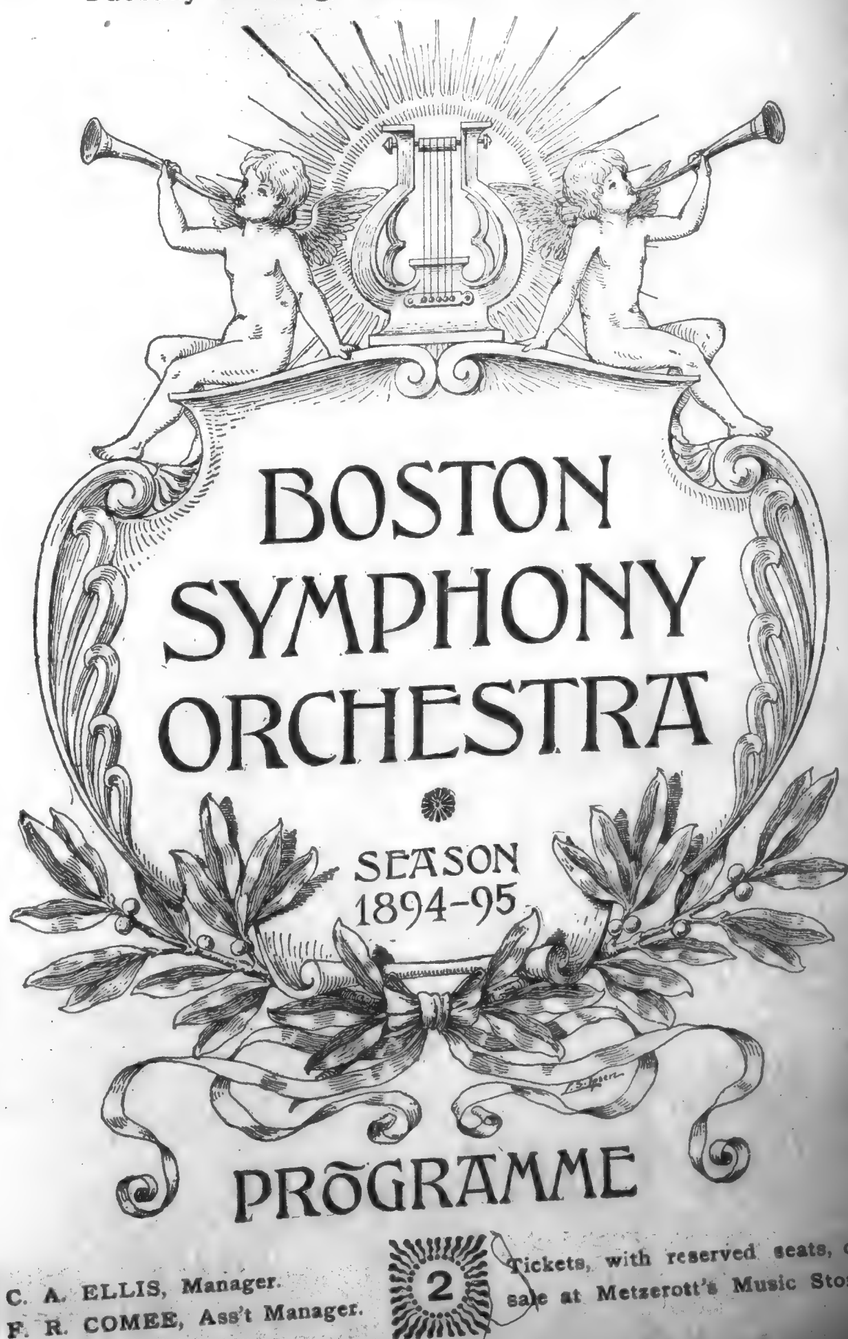
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, December 4, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

[138]

PRESS NOTICES.

"In all these works the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his fellows was quite beyond praise, altogether lovely in tone and sentiment, and finished in execution. The audience was rapturous in its applause, after each movement."— N. Y. Tribune.

"It is not too much to say that the Beethoven quartet was played divinely."— N. Y. Times.

"This Quartet [Kneisel] is the greatest in America; and, allied to its beauty of tone production,— a true quartet tone,— its interpretations are always significant and truthful."— N. Y. Recorder.

"Everything that Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski, and Schroeder select is sure to be well played."— N. Y. Evening Post.

"The fifth quartet of the series which forms Beethoven's Op. 18 was given with a perfection that aroused the audience (which was as large as the hall would allow) to the most fervid applause at the end of each movement. Such marvellous ensemble, such exquisite shading, require something more graphic than type for adequate description."— Boston Advertiser.

"The Dvorák quartet was given with a perfection that makes all criticism ridiculous. Never have the Kneisels done a finer piece of artistic work."— Boston Transcript.

"It is no hyperbole to say that the playing of the Kneisel Quartet at their fourth concert was perfect."— Boston Beacon.

Kneisel Quartet

. . . . of Boston

TUESDAY EVENING
NOVEMBER 27, 1894
AT 8.15

. . . Programme . . .

BEETHOVEN . . . Quartet, B-flat major. Op. 18

1. Allegro con brio.
2. Adagio ma non troppo.
3. Scherzo (Allegro).
4. La Malinconia (Adagio) — Allegretto quasi Allegro.

SGAMBATI . . . Quartet, D-flat major. Op. 17

1. Adagio — Vivace ma non troppo.
2. Prestissimo.
3. Andante Sostenuto.
4. Allegro.

(First time.)

HAYDN . . . . . Quartet, G major. Op. 77

1. Allegro Moderato.
2. Adagio.
3. Minuetto (Presto).
4. Finale (Presto).

Sanders Th

SEASC

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

III.

THURSDAY, NOVE

PRO

SGAMBATI. SYMP
I. Allegr
II. Andant
III. Scherz
IV. Serenat
V. Finale:
(First t

PETER BENOÎT. SYMP
I. Mélanc
II. Feux F

MONSIGNY. CHAC
Reine

AUBER. OVER

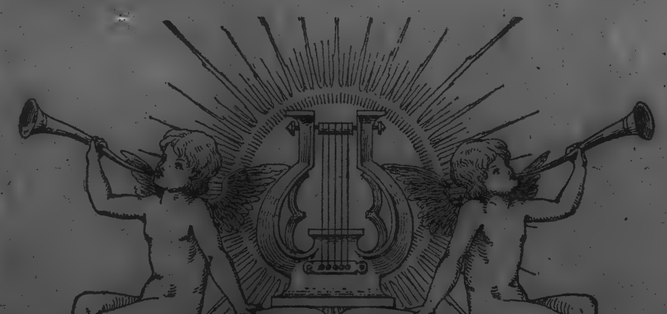
RUBINSTEIN. BALL
I. First
II. Secon

Mr CH

Fourth Concert Thursday, Dece

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, December 3, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

METZEROTT MUSIC

Tuesday Evening

B
SYM
ORC

PRO

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manag

[138]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 7, in A major, op. 92.
I. Poco sostenuto.—Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Scherzo: Presto.—Trio: Assai meno presto.
IV. Finale: Allegro con brio.

MACDOWELL. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in A minor, op. 15.
Maestoso.—Andante tranquillo.—Presto.

GOLDMARK. OVERTURE. "Sappho."
(First time.)

WAGNER. KAISERMARSCH.

Soloist:

Mr. E. A. MAC DOWELL.

The Piano is a Steinway.

Third Concert Thursday, November 22.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, November 12, at 8.

Second Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Programme.

CHERUBINI. QUARTET in D minor.
Allegro commodo.—Larghetto sostenuto.—
Scherzo (Allegro).—Allegro risoluto.
(First time at these concerts.)

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in E-flat major, op. 74.
Poco Adagio.—Allegro.—Adagio ma non troppo.—
Presto. Allegretto con variazioni.

RUBINSTEIN. PIANO TRIO, in A minor.
Moderato.—Allegro non troppo.—
Andante.—Allegro molto.
(First time at these concerts.)

The Piano is a Chickering.

Third Concert, Monday, December 10.

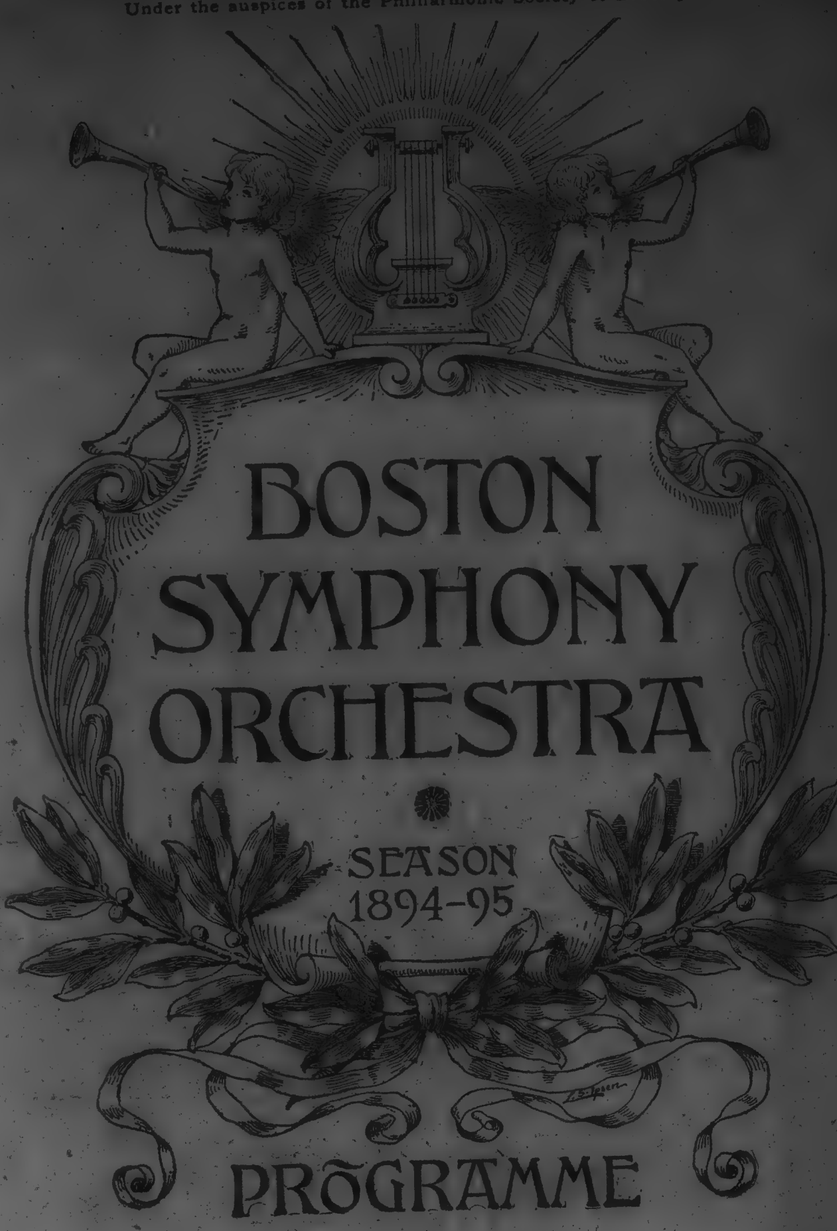
[139]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN.

Friday Afternoon, Nov. 2, at 3. Saturday Evening, Nov. 3, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, November 14, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Season tickets, with reserved seats, $5, and single tickets for this concert, at $1.25 each, now on sale at the Hall

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1894-95.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 7, in A major, op. 92.
I. Poco sostenuto.—Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Scherzo: Presto.—Trio: Assai meno presto.
IV. Finale: Allegro con brio.

MACDOWELL. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in A minor, op. 15.
Maestoso.—Andante tranquillo.—Presto

GOLDMARK. OVERTURE. "Sappho."
(First time.)

WAGNER. KAISERMARSCH.

Soloist:

Mr. E. A. MAC DOWELL.

The Piano is a Steinway.

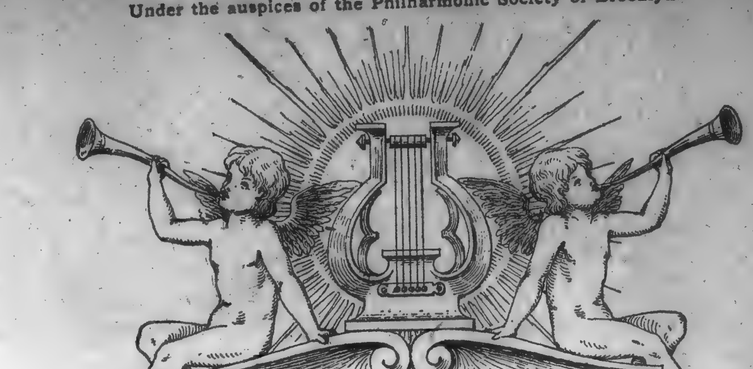
Third Concert Thursday, November 22.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN.

Friday Afternoon, Nov. 2, at 3. Saturday Evening, Nov. 3, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

Monday Evening, November 12, at 8.

Second Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Programme.

CHERUBINI. QUARTET in D minor.
Allegro commodo.—Larghetto sostenuto.—
Scherzo (Allegro).—Allegro risoluto.
(First time at these concerts.)

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in E-flat major, op. 74.
Poco Adagio.—Allegro.—Adagio ma non troppo.—
Presto. Allegretto con variazioni.

RUBINSTEIN. PIANO TRIO, in A minor.
Moderato.—Allegro non troppo.—
Andante.—Allegro molto.
(First time at these concerts.)

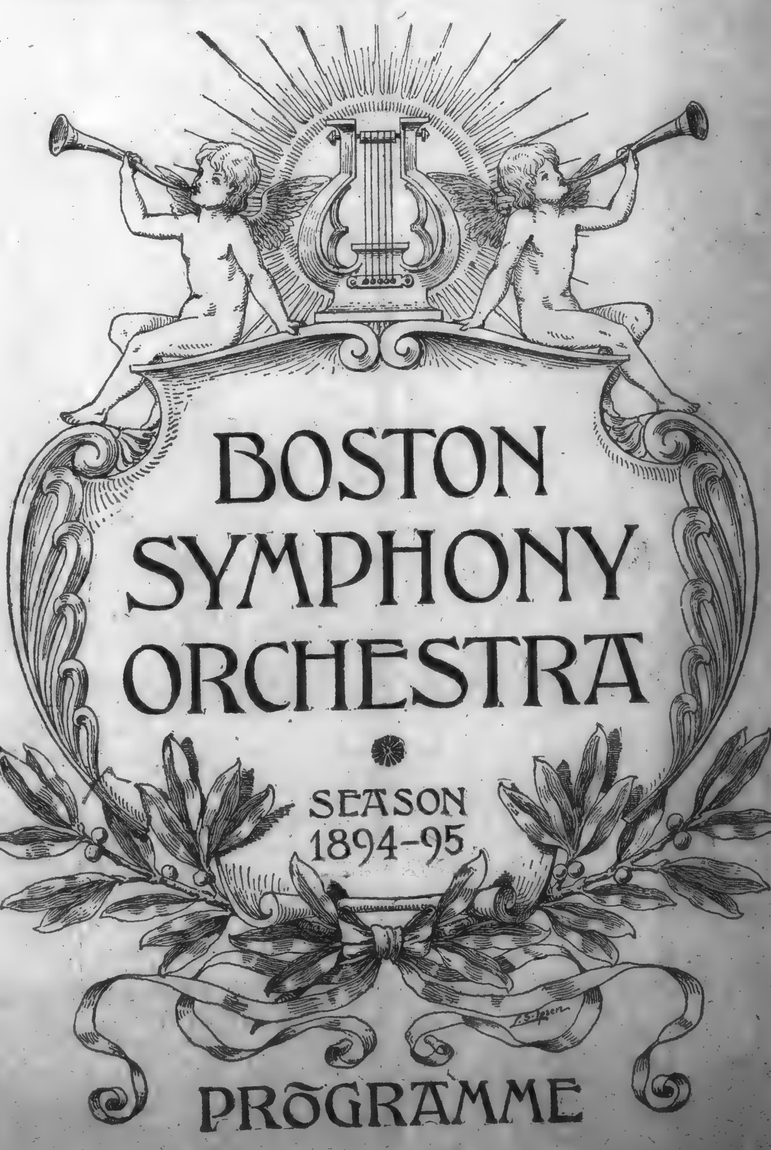
The Piano is a Chickering.

Third Concert, Monday, December 10.

[139]

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, November 14, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Season tickets, with reserved seats, $5, and single tickets for the second concert at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall.

Metropolitan Opera House

LESSEES & MANAGERS
MESSRS.
ABBEY. SCHOEFFEL. & GRAU.

J. T COWDERY.
ADVERTISING AGENT
AND PUBLISHER
123 WEST 42 ST , N Y.

11-1-94

ABBEY'S THEATRE,

Corner Broadway and 38th Street, New York.

ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU, - Lessees and Managers.

FRANCIS WILSON

AND COMPANY

Presenting - - "THE DEVIL'S DEPUTY."

LILLIAN RUSSELL OPERA CO.

IN THE

"QUEEN OF BRILLIANTS."

For a Limited Season. MONDAY, NOVEMBER 5th, 1894.

BEERBOHM TREE

AND ENTIRE COMPANY,

For a Limited Season, MONDAY, JANUARY 28th, 1895, at

ABBEY'S THEATRE.

TREMONT THEATRE,

BOSTON, MASS.

Messrs. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU .. Lessees and Managers

THE PARLOR HOUSE OF THE PLAY.

Handsomest Theatre in New England.

Playing the Leading Attractions Only.

TENTH YEAR OF

MME. SARAH BERNHARDT

Under the direction of .. .. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU.

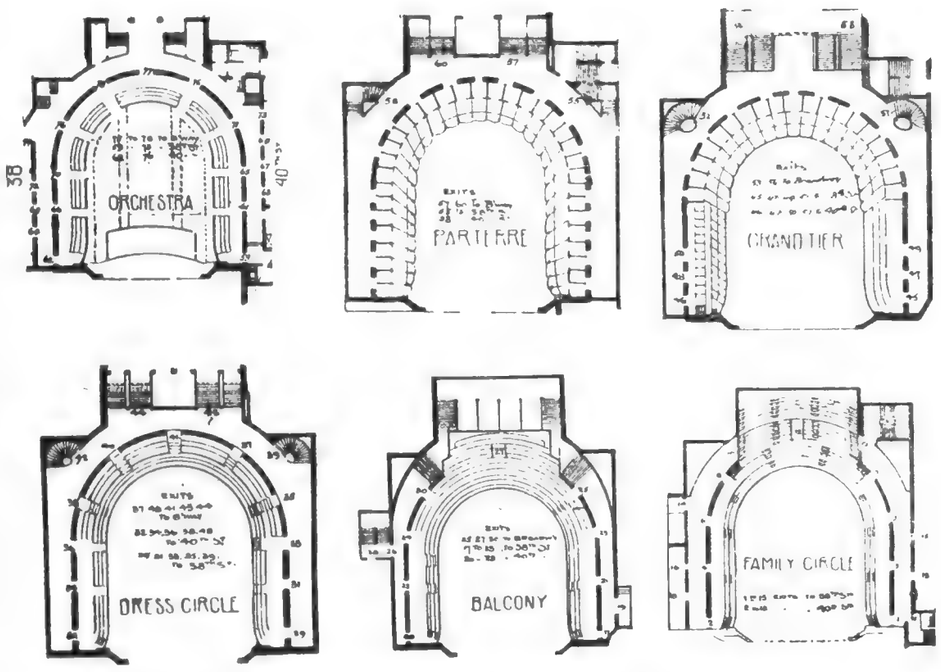


Diagram of Exits of the Metropolitan Opera House.

How to Keep Before the Public of New York and vicinity, with an expenditure of money for advertising which is within their means, is an absorbing question among many business houses.

To succeed in business and make money without advertising is out of the question in a community that lives only in the whirl of the present, and that readily forgets the most exciting event of hardly a week past.

It is an undisputable fact that pretty near the entire population, both city and suburban, go to the play houses. Therefore, if you have an attractive advertisement in the programmes of these play-houses, you are certain to be constantly before the public.

The cost of a two inch advertisement in all the leading places of amusement for one year would be about $2,500. If you compare this cost with what the same space would cost you in the daily papers, it will be discovered that there is a tremendous difference in favor of the programmes. The fact is, you can keep your business constantly before the city's population through an advertisement in the programmes for very much less money than by any other means.

I publish the programmes of the

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE,
CARNEGIE HALL,
ABBEY'S THEATRE,
BROADWAY THEATRE,
AMERICAN THEATRE.

For particulars as to space, rates, etc., address,

J. T. COWDERY,

Advertising Agent and Publisher,

123 West Forty-Second Street,

NEW YORK.

Advertisements prepared and inserted in any Programme.

"Seeing is Believing."

You can light "The New Rochester" without removing the chimney.

To improve upon and add to the best is not an easy thing to do but in making the New Rochester Lamp, that is what has been done. It is a marvel of perfection, indeed, and to see it will impress this one truth—The best Lamp on Earth. The choicest bric-a-brac in the palace of a Vanderbilt reveals nothing finer.

Ladies often like to go down among the large wholesale houses and buy of first hands They will find at our salesrooms (the largest in the world) a rare collection of Art in lamps. 3000 varieties.

THE ROCHESTER LAMP CO.,
42 Park Place & 37 Barclay St. New York.

The New Rochester.

St. James Hotel,

Broadway & 26th St.

DORVAL CO., - - - Proprietors.

FRENCH TABLE D'HOTE DINNER

FROM 6 TO 9 P.M., $1.25.

The restaurant à la carte being open until 1 A.M., is very desirable to theatre parties.

Mme. OATES,

288 FIFTH AVENUE,
New York City.

Special Designs in . .
Ball, Dinner, Carriage,
Street Costumes and Wraps.

CLAY.

"We are but clay," the preacher saith;
"The heart is clay and clay the brain,
And soon or late there cometh death
To blend us with the earth again."

Well, let the preacher have it so.
And clay we are and clay shall be:—
Well, so be it! for this I know,
That clay does very well for me.

When clay has such red mouths to kiss,
Strong hands to grasp it is enough;
How can I take it aught amiss
We are not made of rarer stuff?

And if one tempt you to believe
His choice would be immortal gold,
Question him, can you then conceive
A warmer heart than clay can hold.

Or richer joys than clay can feel?
And when perforce he falters Nay,
Bid him renounce his wish and kneel
In thanks for this same common clay.

The Pall Mall Gazette.

WINDS TO-DAY.

Winds to-day are large and free,
Winds to-day are westerly;
From the land they seem to blow
Whence the sap begins to flow,
And the dimpled light to spread
From the country of the dead.

Ah, it is a wild, sweet land
Where the coming May is planned;
Where such influences throb
As our frosts can never rob
Of their triumph, when they bound
Through the tree and from the ground:

Great within me is my soul,
Great to journey to its goal,
To the country of the dead;
For the cornel tips are red,
And a passion rich in strife
Drives me toward the home of life.

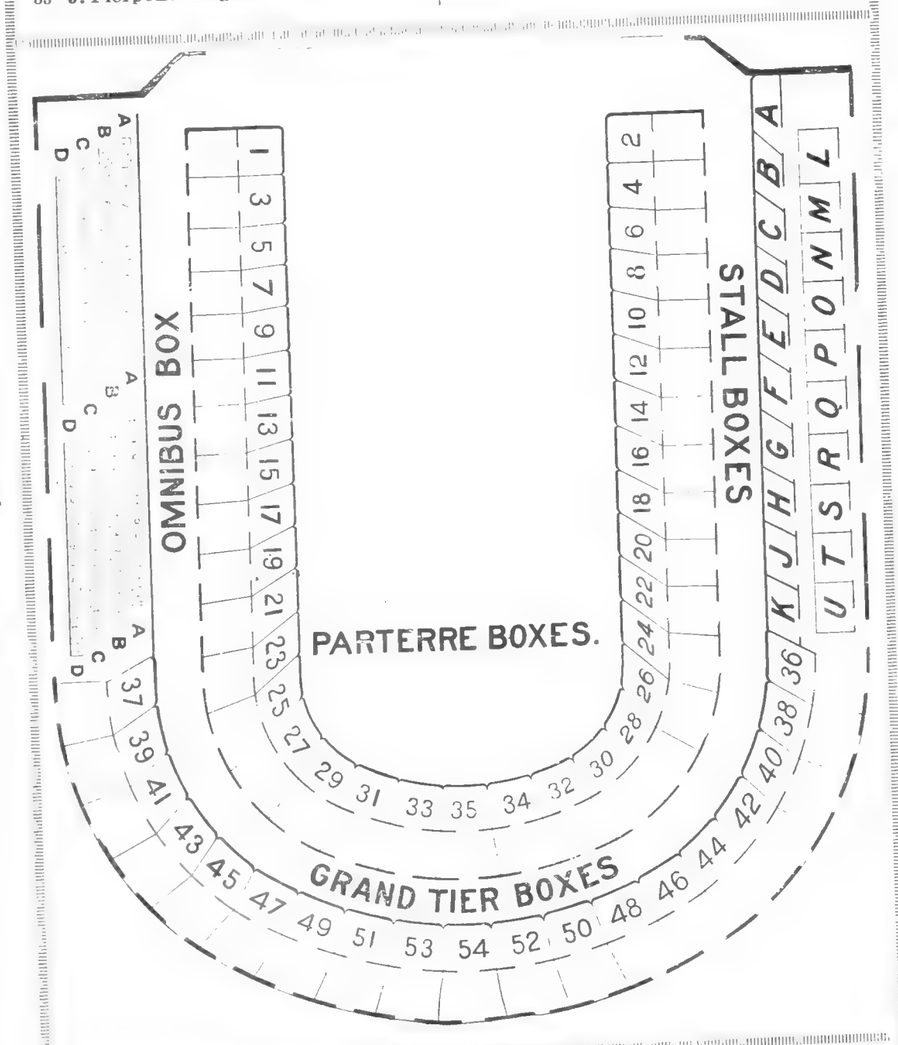
Oh, to keep the spring with them
Who have flushed the cornel stem,
Who imagine at its source
All the year's delicious course,
Then express by wind and light
Something of their rapture's height?

Michael Field, in Boston Budget.

List of Boxholders for the Opera Season.

PARTERRE.

1 Ogden Goelet.
W. E. Strong. Wednesdays.
W. H. Tillinghast. Fridays and odd
W. M. Kingsland. Matinees.
3 R. T. Wilson.
5 George P Wetmore.
W. W. Sherman.
7 J. J. Astor.
Mrs. Burke Roche. Wednesdays.
A Cass Canfield.
W. Stores Wells. Fridays.
9 W. C. Schermerhorn. Mondays.
Stanford White. Wednesdays.
Miss Helen T. Barney. Fridays
C. T. Barney. Matinees.
11 Perry Belmont.
13 Edward Cooper,
Henry T. Sloane.
15 Adrian Iselin. Mondays, Fridays and Matinees.
O. W. Randall. Wednesdays.
17 W. D. Sloane,
H. McK. Twombley.
19 Adrian Iselin, Jr. Mondays.
Joshua W. Davis. Wednesdays.
Addison Cammack. Fridays.
G. G. Frelinghuysen. Matinees.
21 J. Hood Wright.
23 E. T. Gerry.
25 G. G. Haven.
27 George S. Bowdoin,
Chas. Lanier.
29 A. T. Van Nest.
Charles Carroll Jackson.
Giraud Foster.
31 James Stillman. Nights.
Benjamin Brewster. Nights.
Cornelius Vanderbilt. Matinees.
33 Thomas Hitchock. Mondays and Matinees.
G. K. Clark, Jr. Wednesdays.
J. J. Wysong. Fridays.
35 J. Pierpont Morgan.
2 A. D. Juillard. Odd Nights and even Matinees.
J. F. Kernochan. Even Nights and Odd Matinees.
4 Captain Beach. Odd Night and even Matinees.
Miss De Forest. Even Nights and Odd Matinees.
6 Mrs. Paran Stevens.
8 Cornelius N. Bliss,
M. C. D. Borden.
10 George F. Baker,
H. C. Fahnestock.
12 Henry Clews.
14 Mrs. George H. Warren. Mondays Fridays and Matinees.
Mrs. M. B. Carpenter. Wednesdays.
16 Levi P. Morton,
George Bliss. Odd Nights and Even Matinees.
Austin Corbin. Even Nights and Odd Matinees.
18 Calvin S. Brice.
20 D. O. Mills.
22 W. Seward Webb.
24 Robert Goelet.
26 S. D. Babcock. Mondays, Fridays and Matinees.
Mrs. J. T. Farish. Wednesdays.
28 W. Bayard Cutting. Mondays, Wednesdays and Matinees.
Mrs. Breese. Fridays.
30 Anson Phelps Stokes. Mondays.
Mrs. David Stewart. Wednesdays.
Ernest Rudolph Gunther. Fridays.
W. C. Whitney. Matinees.
32 Elisha Dyer. Mondays.
W. F. Burden. Mondays.
Frederick Gallatin. Wednesdays.
Miss E. C. Whitney. Fridays.
Luther Kountze. Matinees.
34 Heber R. Bishop.
Sir Roderick Cameron. Wednesdays.



GRAND TIER BOXHOLDERS.

Opera Glasses to hire in the lobby.

PARFUMERIE.

ED. PINAUD,

PARIS.

DERNIERES CREATIONS,
VIOLETTE-REINE,
BOUQUET MARIE LOUISE,
parfums exquis pour le mouchoir.

GARDENS.

The wide fair gardens, the rich lush gardens,
Which no man planted, and no man tills,
Their strong seeds drifted, their brave bloom lifted,
Near and far over vales and hills;
Sip the bees from their cups of sweetness,
Poises above them the wild free wing,
And night and morn from their doors are borne
The dreams of the tunes that blithe hearts sing.

The waving gardens, the fragrant gardens
That toss in the sun by the broad highway,
Growing together, gorse and heather,
Aster and golden rod all the day.
Poppies dark with the wine of slumber,
Daises bright with the look of dawn,
The gentian blue, and the long year through
The flowers that carry the seasons on.

And the dear old gardens, the pleasant gardens
Where mother used to potter about,
Trying and pulling, and sparingly culling,
And watching each bud as its flower laughed out:
Hollyhocks here, and the prince's feather,
Larkspur and primrose, and lilies white
Sweet were the dear old fashioned gardens
Where we kissed the mother and said "Good-night."

Margaret E. Sangster.

Found Only in

The Wonderful Weber Tone

The WEBER PIANO

Warerooms:
5th Ave. & 16th St.

MAMMY'S HUSHABY.

Hushaby, hushaby, lil' baby boy,
Shet yo' eyes tight an' drap off ter sleep;
Coon was a-pacin' 'long at a mighty jog
When he seed a 'possum curled up on a lawg;
"Good eb'nin', Brer Possum, I'se glad you a'n't a dawg"—
Hushaby, lil' baby boy.

All de lil' mawkin' birds asleep in dar nes'
When night comes den sleepin' is de best,
Tek up m' honey boy an' hug him ter m' bres',
Hushaby, lil' baby boy.

Hushaby, hushaby, lil' baby boy,
Watch dawg bark an' booger man run:
Down in the medder lil' bunnies race,
Frolickin' an' jumpin' all about de place—
Jess yo' quit dat laffin' right in yo' mammy's face—
Hushaby, lil' baby boy.

Ol' brindle cow's a-calling, "goo' night, goo' night," she said,
Time all lil' chilluns fer ter be in bed;
Tight shet go dem bright eyes, down drap dat curly head—
Hushaby, lil' baby boy.

Chicago Times.

KNOX THE HATTER'S

WORLD-RENOWNED

THE STANDARD OF FASHION EVERYWHERE. HATS.

194 Fifth Avenue, under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York.
212 Broadway, cor. Fulton Street, New York.
340 Fulton Street, Brooklyn.
191 and 193 State Street, Palmer House, Chicago.
Agents in all the principal cities.

Highest Awards at the Columbian Exposition.

New Metropolitan Opera House

Sole Lessees and Managers,
Messrs. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Season of 1894–95.

FIRST CONCERT,

Thursday Eve'g, November 1,

At 8:15 o'clock.

SOLOIST:

MR. POL PLANCON.

PROGRAMME.

Sgambati - - - - - Symphony No. 1

I.	Allegro vivace, non troppo (D major) -	3–4
II.	Andante mesto (G minor) - -	6–4
III.	Scherzo: Presto (B-flat major) - -	3–4
	Trio: Un poco meno (G flat major) -	3–4
IV.	Serenata: Andante (D minor) - -	2–4
V.	Finale: Allegro con fuoco (D major) -	4–4
	(First time.)

Continued on Page 6.

Brut Impérial

MOËT & CHANDON

Maison fondee en 1743

ÉPERNAY-FRANCE.

LAVY-BRUAUX, EPERNAY.

B. Altman & Co.,

are exhibiting in their Show Rooms, on 2d Floor, a varied and exclusive selection of Rich Black Crepon Dresses and Skirts,

MADE UP IN

BLACK INTAGLIO & CAILLOU CREPONS, and CREPON DE SOIE,

18th Street, 19th Street,
AND Sixth Avenue.

VENETIAN STORE

86 FIFTH AVENUE,

ROSSI & PATRIZI.

ARTISTIC ITALIAN AND FRENCH FURNITURE,

Glasses, Filigree, Mosaics, Marbles, and Wrought Iron at very low prices.

KEEP A-GOIN'!

If you strike a thorn or rose,
Keep a goin'!
If it hails or if it snows,
Keep a-goin'!
'Tain't no use to-sit an' whine
When the fish ain't on your line;
Bait your hook an' keep on tryin'—
Keep a-goin'!

When the weather kills your crop,
Keep a-goin'!
When you tumble from the top,
Keep a-goin'!
S'pose you're out' o' every dime?
Gittin' broke ain't any crime;
Tell the world you're feelin' prime!
Keep a-goin'!

When it looks like all is up,
Keep a-goin'!
Drain the sweetness from the cup
Keep a-goin'!
See the wild birds on the wing!
Hear the bells that sweetly ring!
When you feel like sighin'—sing!
Keep a-goin'!

—Frank L. Stanton.

STEINWAY & SONS.

PIANO MANUFACTURERS BY APPOINTMENT TO

H. M. EMPEROR WILLIAM II. of Germany.
THE ROYAL COURT OF PRUSSIA.
H. M. THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND.
Their Royal Highnesses,
THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH.
H. M. UMBERTO I., the King of Italy.
H. M. THE QUEEN OF SPAIN.

His Majesty EMPEROR WILLIAM II. of Germany,

On June 13th, 1893, also bestowed to our MR. WILLIAM STEINWAY the order of THE RED EAGLE III. Class, the highest ever granted to an Industrial.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES MAILED FREE ON APPLICATION.

STEINWAY & SONS,

Warerooms, Steinway Hall, 107-111 E. 14th St., New York.

EUROPEAN DEPOTS.

STEINWAY HALL
15 and 17 Lower Seymour Street, Portman Square, W.,
LONDON, ENGLAND.

STEINWAY'S PIANOFABRIK
St. Pauli, Neue Rosen-Strasse, 20-24,
HAMBURG, GERMANY.

Mason & Hamlin
PIANOS
WITH THEIR IMPROVED METHOD OF STRINGING.

Mason & Hamlin
ORGANS
Have always maintained their supremacy over all others, having received Highest Honors at all Great World's Exhibitions since 1867.

Mason & Hamlin
LISZT ORGANS
Are the Finest Toned and Most Powerful Reed Organs made, and are an indispensable auxiliary of the piano-forte in the drawing-room.

SOLD FOR CASH, OR EASY PAYMENTS; ALSO RENTED.

136 Fifth Avenue.

AUTUMN.

Ladies fair; the end is near;
Soon will lie upon its bier
Every lovely blossom here.
Posies e'en with which the Year
Strives to hide her swift decay,
Now must pass from us away,
And in death be laid beside
Flowerets that in summer died.
Zinnias, flashing fire's bright hue;
Marigolds, whose buds pursue
Golden Sol from east to west;
Lilies, of all blossoms best
For the dying season's shroud;
Daisies, to St. Michael vowed;
Dahlias, set in order prim;
Asters, loaded to the brim
With the weight of tears unshed;
Hollyhocks, pink, white, and red;
Dainty columns wreathed with bloom:
Violets of rare perfume;
Roses, pallid, aye, and wan,
Yet so sweet; all will have gone!
Ladies fair, the end is near;
Dying is the sylvan year!

St. James' Gazette.

A. JAECKEL,

MANUFACTURER

FINE FURS.

We invite the most exacting criticism regarding Fit, Style, Workmanship and Price for quality in Fur Garments of every description.

19th Street, Bet. B'way and 5th Ave.

Opp. Arnold, Constable & Co.

SEND FOR FASHION PLATE.

FALL TIME.

Fall time in Georgia
Comes but onct a year;
Ketch the 'possum by the tail,
Or ketch him by the ear!

But ketch him!
O ketch him!
An' 'crost the griddle stretch him!
Be certain that you fetch him,
For it's only onct a year!

Fall time in Georgia—
Speakers on the stump!
Ketch the rabbit by the tail,
Or ketch him on the jump!

But ketch him!
O ketch him,
An' skin him quick, an' stretch him!
Be certain that you fetch him,
For it's only onct a year!

Fall time in Georgia—
Hear the partridge call!
When the hound dogs bay the buck,
Just ketch him—horns an' all!

But ketch him!
O ketch him!
An' on the hickory stretch him!
Be certain that you fetch him—
For it's only onct a year!

F. L. S. in Atlanta Constitution.

ROGER & GALLET, Paris,

Parfumerie Extra-Fine.

GRAND PRIX,

Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1889.

Extracts, Soaps, Powders, Dentifrices, Toilet Waters, Colognes, Sachets, Etc.

Heliotrope Blanc, Bouquet des Amours, Iris Blanc,
Vera-Violetta, Violette de Parme, Aromis,
Peau d'Espagne, Jockey Club, Chypre, Etc.

Park & Tilford, New York,

Sole Agents in the United States.

Continued from Page 4.

Haydn - Aria, "The Seasons" (Le Laboreur)

Gluck - - Tambourin, Gavotte, and Chaconne

I. Tambourin from "Iphigenie en Aulide" (D major) - - - - - - 2-2

II. Gavotte from "Armide" (F major) - 2-2

III. Grand Chaconne from "Iphigenie en Aulide" and "Orphee" (D major) - 3-4

Saint Saens - Symphonic Poem, "Phaeton"

Wagner - "Pogner's Address," from "Die Meistersinger."

Goldmark - - - Overture, "Sappho"
(First time.)

SECOND CONCERT,

Thursday Evening Dec. 6th

SOLOIST:

MR. CÉSAR THOMSON.

The Knabe Pianos used at the Metropolitan Opera House and by the Artists of the Company.

Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organ used.

The only authorized edition of the Opera Libretto to be had in the Opera House. Price 25c.

SCHWARZ
TOY BAZAR

42 EAST 14th STREET,

(UNION SQUARE).

Offers now the Finest Selection of TOYS, DOLLS,

GAMES,

Ever seen in this or any other country.
Many Special Novelties Displayed.

BEGIN IT.

The indecision brings its own delays,
And days are lost lamenting over days.
Are you in earnest? Seize this very minute.
What you can do, or dream you can, begin it.

Selected.

THE ISLE OF BOREDOM.

As you sail through life take pains and steer
Away from the Island that lies too near—
The Isle of Boredom, which all men fear.

The Island sets up like a shelf of rock,
But woe to the sailor who lands at the dock
And offers the people a chance to talk.

For they talk all night and they talk all day,
And try as you will to get away,
They pin you down and they make you stay.

They talk of the things they have done and said,
They talk you awake and they talk you to bed,
Till you almost wish they would talk you dead.

And the queerest thing, and the one to deplore,
About the dwellers upon that shore—
Not one of them knows that he is a bore.

So steer away from that Island shelf,
That is governed they say by a wicked elf
Lest you be a bore and not know it yourself,

Ella Wheeler Wilcox
in Youth's Companion.

Announcement.

THE opening night of Grand Italian and French Opera for the Season 1894-95 will be Monday, November 19, in the New Me ropolitan Opera House. The season will consist of thirteen weeks, comprising thirty-nine night and thirteen matinee performances.

The cause of the remarkable success of opera last season has given the keynote for all operatic enterprises in the Metropolis for the future—the works of the great composers, old and new, presented magnificently by the greatest lyric artists of the day in one of the great opera houses of the world. The management of the New Metropolitan Opera House, after expressing its thanks for the generous support by which it was sustained last season, desires to show its appreciation of that favor in the most effective manner possible. Nearly all of the great favorites of last year have been re-engaged. In addition, the names of several famous artists have been added to the list. The company, therefore, engaged for the Opera Season of 1894-95, will form a more complete organization than has yet been brought together in this or any other country.

The composition of the orchestra, as well as its conductors, will be the same as that of last year, an announcement which, it is hoped, will be warmly received by all lovers of good music.

The chorus will be strengthened by a number of young, fresh voices. The ballet has also been reinforced and increased by several valuable additions to its ranks.

An unusually brilliant season is anticipated. Not only will the repertory consist of the operas which were heard last season, but a number of new operas, with revivals of some of the famous old works, will be presented during the winter. They will be put upon the stage with the same attention to detail in scenery, costumes and properties which characterized last season's productions.

WM. KNABE & CO.

GRAND UPRIGHT AND SQUARE
PIANOS

EUGEN D'ALBERT:

From the fullest conviction, I declare them to be the best Instruments of America.

DR. HANS VON BÜLOW:

Their sound and touch are more sympathetic to my ears and hands than all others of the country. I declare them the absolutely best in America.

ALFRED GRÜNFELD:

I consider them the best Instruments of our times.

P. TSCHAIKOVSKY:

Combines with great volume of tone rare sympathetic and noble tone colour and perfect action

WAREROOMS:

NEW YORK.
148 FIFTH AVENUE

BALTIMORE
22 & 24 E. BALTIMORE ST.

WASHINGTON
817 PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

PUSEY & TROXELL, Printers and Stationers, 123 West Forty-second Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,
Wednesday Evening, October 24, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Season tickets, with reserved seats, $5, and single tickets for the first concert at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, October 29, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1894-95

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street. . .

ARTICLE PEELED AWAY

STEINWAY & SONS

PIANO MANUFACTURERS

BY APPOINTMENT TO
HIS MAJESTY
EMPEROR WILLIAM II. OF GERMANY,
AND
THE ROYAL COURT OF PRUSSIA.

GERMANY.

HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY
THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND.

ENGLAND.

THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES
THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS
OF WALES.
THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH.

HIS MAJESTY
UMBERTO I., THE KING OF ITALY.

ITALY.

HER MAJESTY
THE QUEEN OF SPAIN.

SPAIN.

HIS MAJESTY EMPEROR WILLIAM II.

On June 13th, 1893, also bestowed to our Mr. WILLIAM STEINWAY t
III. Class, the highest ever granted to an In AGLE.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF ST. C at Rome.
Palestrina, in 1584, has elected Mr.
following is the translation of hi
THE ROYAL ACADEM and in conformity to t number of their n
year from the fo

d composer tution. The
ain of music,
way into the d and tenth
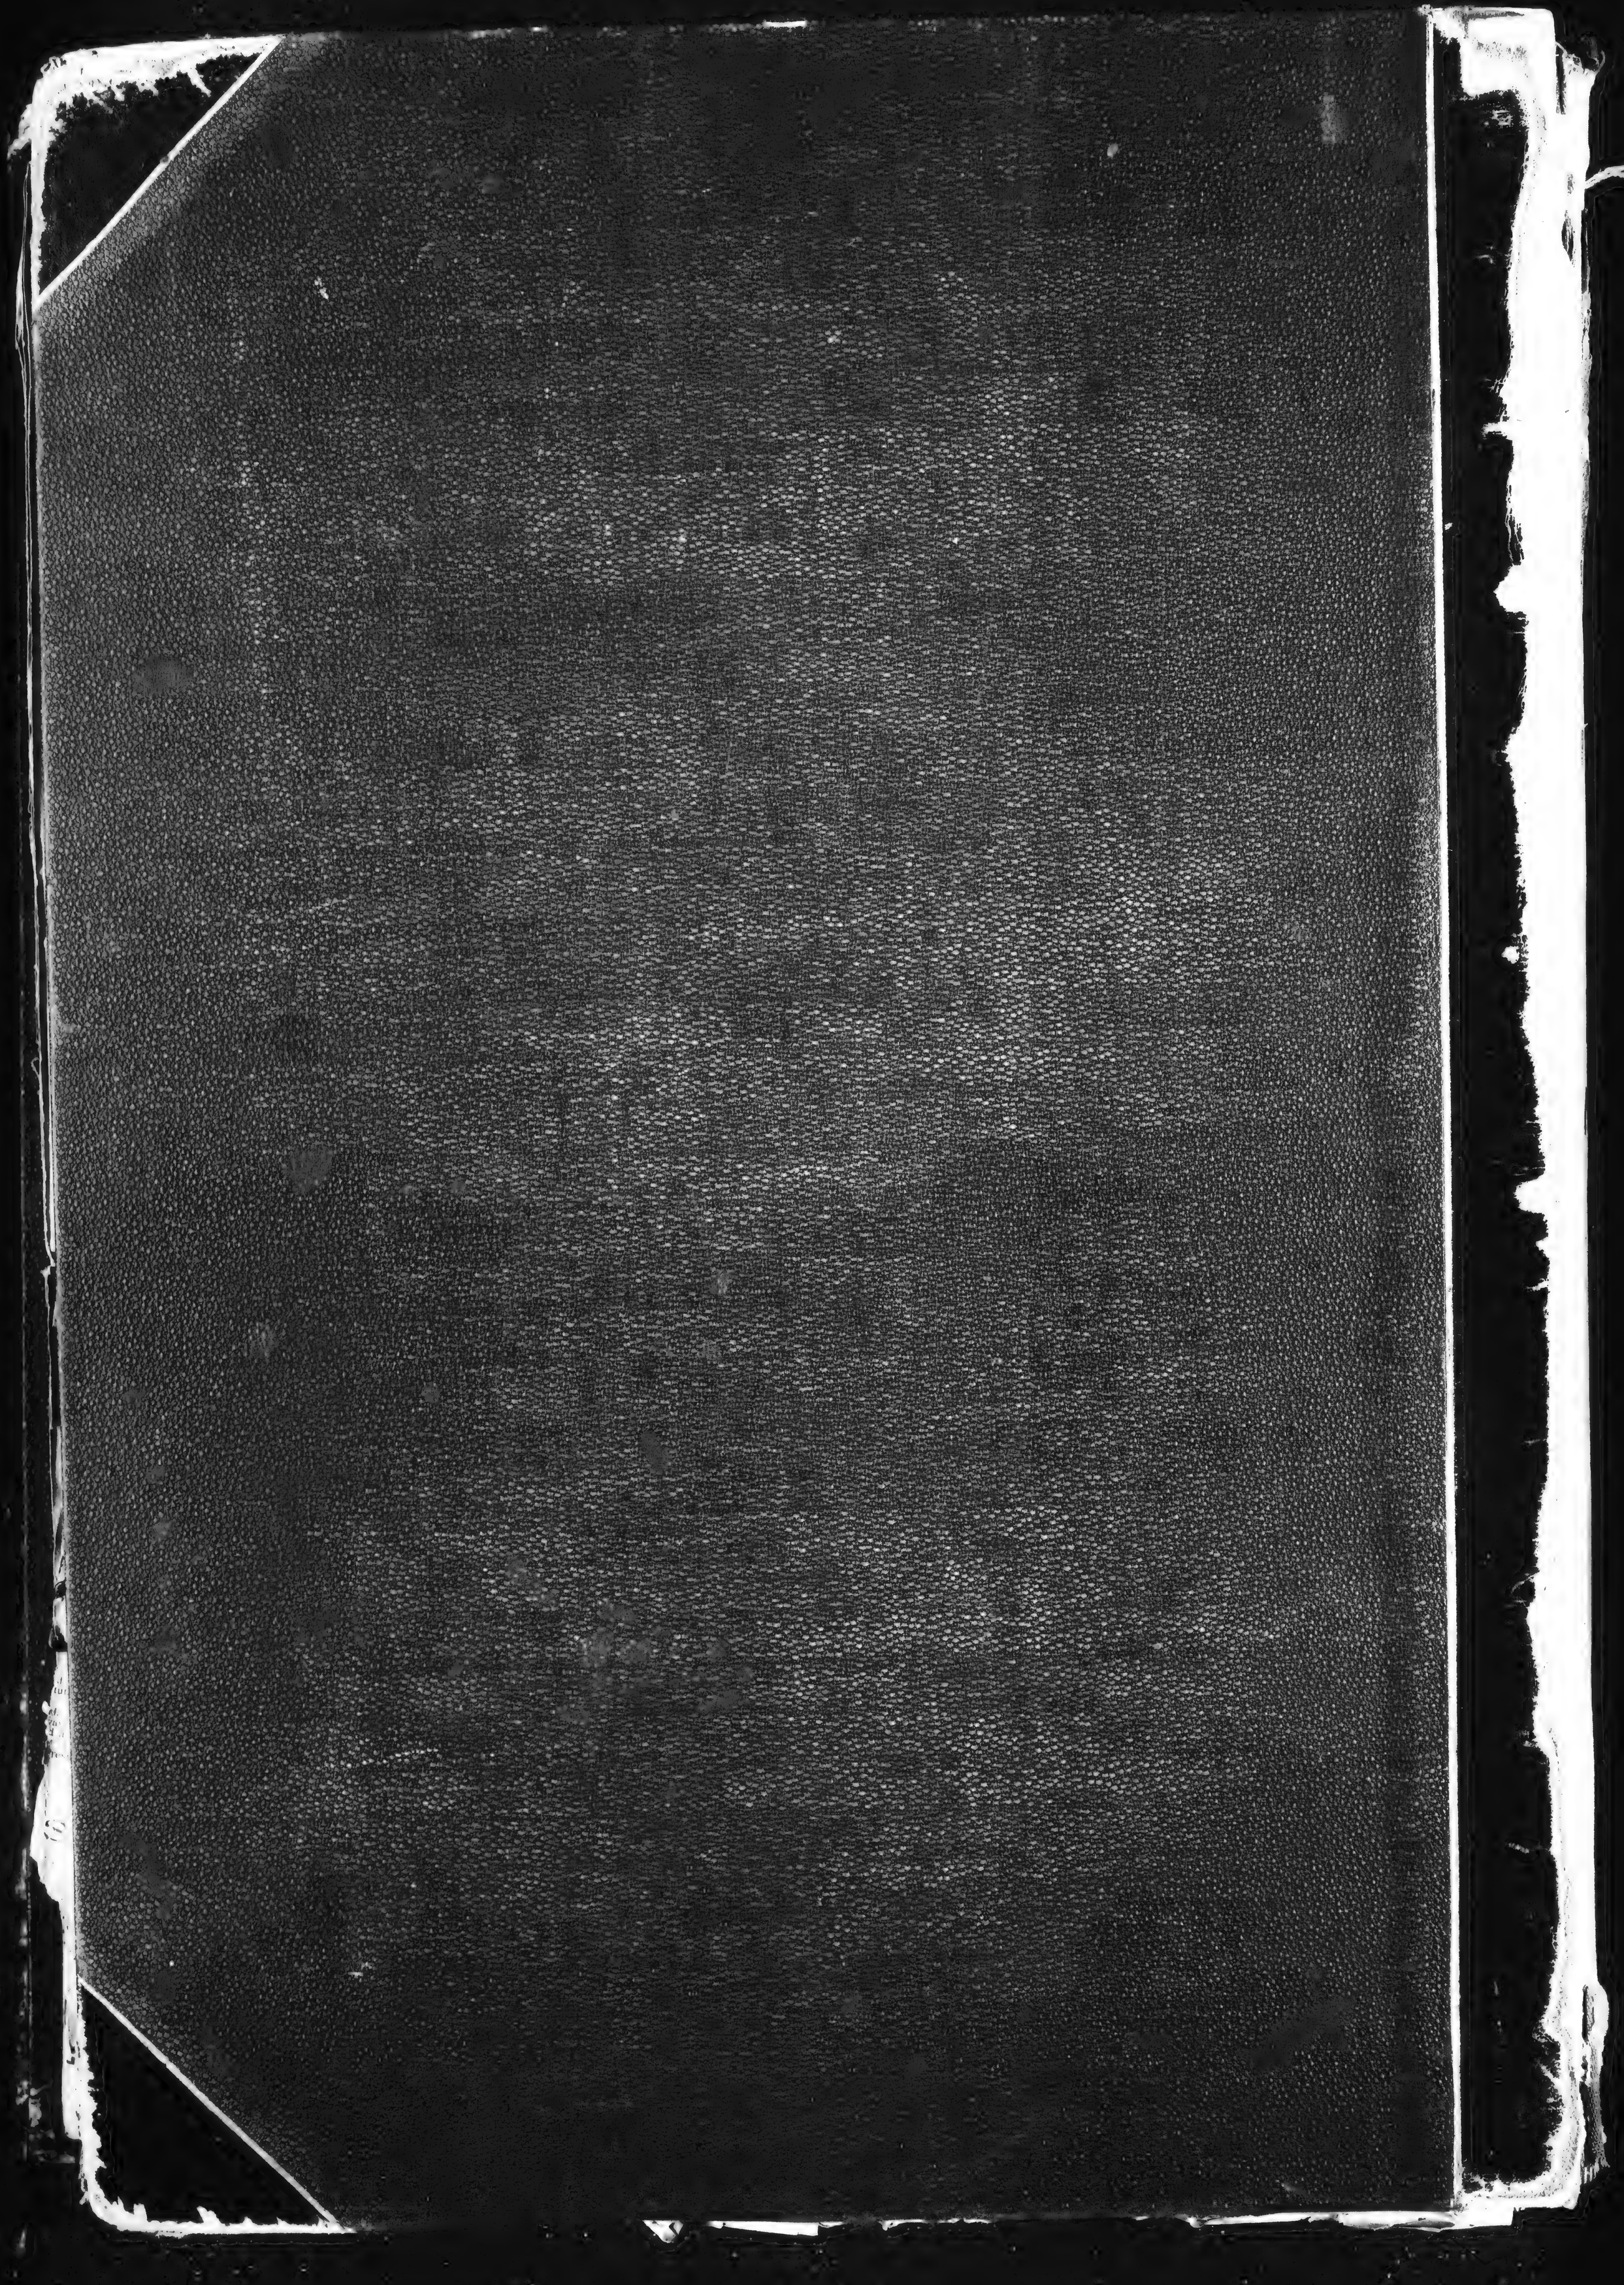
President.

S,

[141]



END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 8

BSO

1895 - 1896

SHIPMAN'S
Invoice & Scrap
BOOK

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

NOVEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, November 10, at 7, P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia Monday, November 11, at 7 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, Novem. 12, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 9.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 11.45 A.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Central R. R. of New Jersey, Ferry foot of Liberty Street, Wednesday, November 13, at 10 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 2.40 P.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Concert at Music Hall, Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues, at 8, P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R., Thursday, November 14, at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.40 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Friday, Nov. 15, at 8.50, A.M.
Arrive New York, 1.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
Hotel Baggage will be left in New York and forwarded to Boston on Saturday, November 16.
Leave New York, Central R. R. of N. J., Ferry foot of Liberty St., Saturday, November 16, at 10 A. M
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 12.20 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Matinee at Academy of Music, at 2.30 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Broad St. station Penna. R. R., at 6·50 P.M.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, November 17, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, November 9, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

DECEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, December 15, at 7, P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Broad St. Station Penna. R.R., Monday, December 16, at 7 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
1334th Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, Decem. 17, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 10.16 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 12.50 P.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R., Tuesday, December 17, at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
1335th Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.30 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
1336th Concert at Music Hall, Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues, Wednesday, December 18, at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Thursday, December 19, at 8.50, A.M.
Arrive New York, 1.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
1337th Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
1338th Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, December 20, at 8 P.M.
Hotel Baggage will be left in New York and forwarded to Boston on Saturday, December 21.
Leave New York, Central R. R. of N. J., Ferry foot of Liberty St., Saturday, December 21, at 10 A. M
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 12.20 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
1339th Concert (Matinee) at Academy of Music, at 2.30 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Broad St. station Penna. R. R., at 6·50 P.M.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, December 22, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, December 14, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

JANUARY ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, January 19, at 7, P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Broad St. Station Penna. R.R., Monday, January 20, at 7 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
1352d Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, January 21, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 10.16 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 12.50 P.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R., Tuesday, January 21, at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
1353d Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.30 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
1354th Concert at Music Hall, Mt. Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., Wednesday, January 22, at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Wednesday, January 22, at midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at 10, P.M.
Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Thursday, January 23, at 7, A.M.
NEW YORK ADDRESS, SCHUBERTH'S MUSIC STORE, 23 UNION SQUARE.
1355th Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
1356th Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, January 24, at 8 P.M.
Hotel Baggage will be left in New York and forwarded to Boston on Saturday, January 25.
Leave New York, Central R. R. of N. J., Ferry foot of Liberty St., Saturday, January 25, at 10 A. M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 12.20 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
1357th Concert (Matinee) at Academy of Music, at 2.30 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Broad St. station Penna. R. R., at 6·50 P.M.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, January 26, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, January 18, 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

MARCH ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 22, at 7, P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Broad St. Station Penna. R.R., Monday, March 23, at 7 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Rehearsal at Academy of Music, at 12 o'clock, noon.
1385th Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 24, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 10.16 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 12.50 P.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R., Tuesday, March 24, at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
1386th Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.30 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
1387th Concert at Music Hall, Mt. Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., Wednesday, March 25, at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Wednesday, March 25, at midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at 10, P.M.
Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Thursday, March 26, at 7, A.M.
NEW YORK ADDRESS, SCHUBERTH'S MUSIC STORE, 23 UNION SQUARE.
1388th Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
1389th Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 27, at 8 P.M.
Hotel Baggage will be left in New York and forwarded to Boston on Saturday, March 28.
Leave New York, Central R. R. of N. J., Ferry foot of Liberty St., Saturday, March 28, at 10 A. M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 12.20 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
1390th Concert (Matinee) at Academy of Music, at 2.30 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Broad St. station Penna. R. R., at 6.50 P.M.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, March 29, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 21, 1896.

SHIPMAN'S
Invoice & Scrap
BOOK

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

NOVEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, November 10, at 7, P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia Monday, November 11, at 7 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, Novem. 12, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 9.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 11.45 A.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Central R. R. of New Jersey, Ferry foot of Liberty Street, Wednesday, November 13, at 10 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 2.40 P.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Concert at Music Hall, Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues, at 8, P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R., Thursday, November 14, at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.40 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Friday, Nov. 15, at 8.50, A.M.
Arrive New York, 1.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
Hotel Baggage will be left in New York and forwarded to Boston on Saturday, November 16.
Leave New York, Central R. R. of N. J., Ferry foot of Liberty St., Saturday, November 16, at 10 A. M
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 12.20 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Matinee at Academy of Music, at 2.30 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Broad St. station Penna. R. R., at 6·50 P.M.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, November 17, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, November 9, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

DECEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, December 15, at 7, P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Broad St. Station Penna. R.R., Monday, December 16, at 7 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
1334th Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, Decem. 17, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 10.16 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 12.50 P.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R., Tuesday, December 17, at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
1335th Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.30 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
1336th Concert at Music Hall, Mt. Royal and Maryland Avenues, Wednesday, December 18, at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Thursday, December 19, at 8.50, A.M.
Arrive New York, 1.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
1337th Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
1338th Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, December 20, at 8 P.M.
Hotel Baggage will be left in New York and forwarded to Boston on Saturday, December 21.
Leave New York, Central R. R. of N. J., Ferry foot of Liberty St., Saturday, December 21, at 10 A. M
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 12.20 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
1339th Concert (Matinee) at Academy of Music, at 2.30 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Broad St. station Penna. R. R., at 6·50 P.M.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, December 22, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, December 14, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

JANUARY ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, January 19, at 7, P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Broad St. Station Penna. R.R., Monday, January 20, at 7 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
1352d Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, January 21, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 10.16 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 12.50 P.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R., Tuesday, January 21, at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
1353d Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.30 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
1354th Concert at Music Hall, Mt. Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., Wednesday, January 22, at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Wednesday, January 22, at midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at 10, P.M.
Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Thursday, January 23, at 7, A.M.
NEW YORK ADDRESS, SCHUBERTH'S MUSIC STORE, 23 UNION SQUARE.
1355th Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
1356th Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, January 24, at 8 P.M.
Hotel Baggage will be left in New York and forwarded to Boston on Saturday, January 25.
Leave New York, Central R. R. of N. J., Ferry foot of Liberty St., Saturday, January 25, at 10 A. M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 12.20 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
1357th Concert (Matinee) at Academy of Music, at 2.30 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Broad St. station Penna. R. R., at 6·50 P.M.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, January 26, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, January 18, 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

MARCH ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 22, at 7, P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Broad St. Station Penna. R.R., Monday, March 23, at 7 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Rehearsal at Academy of Music, at 12 o'clock, noon.
1385th Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 24, Philadelphia and Reading Depot, 12th and Market Streets, 10.16 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden St. Station, B. & O. R. R. at 12.50 P.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R., Tuesday, March 24, at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
1386th Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 10.30 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 11.30 P.M.
1387th Concert at Music Hall, Mt. Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., Wednesday, March 25, at 8, P.M.
Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Wednesday, March 25, at midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at 10, P.M.
Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Thursday, March 26, at 7, A.M.
NEW YORK ADDRESS, SCHUBERTH'S MUSIC STORE, 23 UNION SQUARE.
1388th Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M.
1389th Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 27, at 8 P.M.
